“What about burning down the whole of Seacombe?” bawled Steve, the fiddler. “I don’t know what you are talking about!” Margaret cried. “Listen to me a little, can’t you? The Frenchmen have kidnapped the Duke—”

“Which Duke?”

“But this is stupidity! The Duke of Wellington, of course! What other Duke does anybody care anything about? Can’t you understand, some of you? A lot of Frenchmen have come in a vessel to take the Duke to France, and they have got him from Grandcourt, they have him now at the shore, only they’ve no boat, because Mr. Golde has frightened away their boat with his hobby-horse; and we came to you to rescue him, only the vile French-woman shut us up in the tower, and set fire to the church—”

At last, here and there, a boorish mind opened to her earnest, prone, shrill pleadings. The crowd divided into a minority in favour of her improbability, and a majority in favour of Lise. The danger of the pump at any rate vanished. The parson adopted Margaret’s side, for the pleasure of becoming alarmed at public affairs; the apothecary and the fiddler led the opposition. There was an interval of general noisy jargoning.

Then Margaret had a thought. “But where is that Frenchwoman?” she cried. “I don’t suppose you have been silly enough to let her go!” Where was Lise? That became the question. It was soon known that she had disappeared, and this suspicious circumstance brought over adherents to the right side. Out went the rector’s hand, shaking Golde’s in a warm grip; some old dames came to tears with murmurs of “Poor thing! and to think, after all—”

At this point there was a clatter of broken chancel-windows heard, and out swarmed a belch of rufous smoke, throwing the crowd into backward rout. Margaret, running, too, was full of rage and inward fret. Everything seemed conspiring to delay the end for which, with so much strain, they had come to Seacombe.

But the rector lifted his sacred plumpness to a tomb-stone, and there was a speech. He said:

“I venture to address to you, dear friends, a brief, but pointed, discourse on this occasion. It would be folly, and an insult to the Understanding, if we refused to credit that there is some iota, or tittle, of Truth in the evidence of these witnesses, nor should we be either sensible or polite. Two, it has been wittily said, are better than One. And though it would be folly to deny a certain vagueness in these reports as to ‘Frenchmen,’ ‘Frenchwoman,’ and ‘the Duke,’ yet I, for my part, am ready to hold out to them the right hand of fellowship. Mr. Golde, it seems, is a Man of Respectability in the neighbouring Parish of Newton, and his Companion is known to the homeless men staying among us. While, therefore, deploring the great catastrophe which has resulted in the destruction of our dear old Church, let us beware lest we punish the Innocent for the Guilty. I therefore give my voice for investigating their Report. Let us go out. If there is, in truth, a Rescue to be effected, let us effect it. The French have felt the weight of British arms before, and run like curs before it; let them have a taste of Seacombe men to-night, if it be indeed true that they are near us. I myself, late as is the hour, offer myself as a volunteer—”

This was cheered. “But it won’t be any good,” shrilled Margaret, “if you don’t go now!” The rector took no notice of her impassioned cry.

“All who have fire-arms,” he went on, “let them—”

Truth is, there ain’t no Frenchmen there,” shouted the fiddler: and this, too, was cheered. “No?” cried Margaret, “and who burnt down the lighthouse?”

This was very plausible. It won conviction.

They had been wondering at the cause of the lighthouse fire. "Those who have fire-arms," went on the rector imperturbably in his slow gross bass, "let them assemble at the end of the street forthwith—"

"But which of us has fire-arms?" asked the fiddler.

There was no answer: a rusty match-lock leaned in the rector's kitchen; otherwise there was no gun in Seacombe.

But a humorous idea occurred to the fiddler. "What about the cannon?" he called. A full cheer, mixed with laughter, went up: and instantly, like wild-fire, a contagion of devilry spread through the mob of boors, the suggestion blending well with their humour of apathy and half-belief hardly one realising the affair as momentous.

At the mention of "the cannon," they became volatile, rowdily adventurous, eager for a sortie, caught with laughter. Seacombe stood on the edge of a low cliff, and "the cannon" were three sakers which had lain on rotten carriages pointing from the cliff seaward since Armadadays, the jest and pride of the village, utterly disintegrated, light with age. But the rector was no longer heard: the mob had rushed to a decision, like the decision of a single man. A detachment ran off toward the cliff, some stopping to procure ropes. In a minute all were hastening different ways about the street and alleys. "Don't forget them flags, Tom!" shouted the butcher to the postmaster, who, after Waterloo, had decorated the tavern with two ensigns. "And, mind the flute, Steve!"

"And don't forget that drum o' yours!" With these exhortations they dispersed, while the main body ran toward the village-end to wait.

A few minutes, and the rescue-party was ready, the rector in their midst, near him Golde and Margaret virtually prisoners, she sternly silent with rage and contempt. There were first three ringing cheers, and defiance to Frenchmen; and with lanthorns, and two flags flying, and the drum and flute making holiday, and three lads rattling galas on tin-pots, with a horn, two dust- bells, a watchman's rattle, and two of the cannons trundling behind, they started down the incline to the moor, a moving, junketing hubbub.

And it was thus that Seacombe set out toward four o'clock in the morning to confound the wiles of the French.

CHAPTER XXVI. THE CLIFFS

THE MORNING CAME slowly, and there was still no sign of it when Seacombe arrived at the point of coast indicated by Golde and Margaret. Of Frenchmen now, however, there was nothing to be seen: and no wonder: for Seacombe had come out as to carnival, with drums and hilarities.

And there, as they stood, confusion of tongues ensued. Margaret alone was fixed in silence, pale lips tight, her brain all conflict and guesses. That boat, anyway, had had plenty of time to return, and take them. "They are gone, sure!" she muttered, the words cutting her heart like the keenest personal pang. If the boat had not come back, then the Duke, she reasoned, must be free! for he would refuse to run with them at the sounds of Seacombe, and they were too few to carry him, without a good fight! But she could not hope: nothing conceivable could have prevented the boat's return: the Duke, she believed, was asleep in the frigate's cabin.

But to make sure?

"You see," the rector was saying, "we have put you to the proof: but here are no Frenchmen!"

"Stop — just lend me your lantern," she said, snatching a lad's. "You have to follow me, all of you! We shall soon know—"

She went along the high-water mark, the lanthorn held over sands light-coloured, shelly, and toilsome. The villagers trudged behind with bent backs, examining the strand. But though silent now, they were well lit up to anyone in the darkness above. After a time Margaret fell eagerly to her knees, with the cry:

“Here is their track!”

This was a dry band of footprints in shapeless mêlée, a mere indication of feet. The villagers peered, but with blank minds. At all events some party of men had been here, and their faith in Margaret grew.

A gleeful outcry from her: “They are still on land!”

The inference was hasty, but not groundless: for having edged farther down to the fallen tide-edge, in wet sand she saw three distinct foot-prints, the heels toward the sea.

She jumped up, crying: “It is that way they are gone!”

She pointed between west and north, following the direction of the trodden band. The whole company of smock-frocks, eager now, was ready to be off over the moor. “But stop,” said Margaret, “it is no good running about the moor, where they wouldn’t have any business. If they are on shore, they are near the sea—”

“Along the sands, then,” said the rector. “But we don’t want all those lanterns,” she went on; “why can’t you put them out, and have some sense, and keep quiet like decent people?”

Seacombe was now more subdued; out went its lights, and in silence it followed Golde, who went swinging the lanthorn in front. The loud surf was in their ears: the talk by the track had been uttered in shouts.

For ten minutes they trudged. The wind was freshening, and a gentle rain began to fall. And now, once again, Margaret, with a cry, fell upon her knees: she had come upon another oblique track; and this time there could be no doubt: the toes pointed seaward, losing themselves at the line where the surf came gently rolling.

The significance of this was felt by the dullest yokel. Even higher up the drizzle had given consistency to the foot-prints. From end to end of the track hurried Margaret, her bosom crouching low, eyes shrewd as gimlets. There was a momentous silence. Golde, close to her ear, said:

“Miss; are they gone?”

“No!” she screamed, leaping from her scrutiny, “they are here somewhere! This is a false track! All the prints are the same size, made by a woman’s shoes! She wants to make us think that they have gone on board — and they are here!”

Amid the silence which followed, a strange sound was heard: a splash, three splashes, quick- repeated.

“You hear?” cried Margaret— “there is the woman. Come — quick — this way — to the cliffs! All went after her, still westward, but also somewhat northward.

The splashes were made by Lise, who, standing on the bank above, and hearing Margaret’s outcry of discovery, had started into a run to reach her friends. Treading in her riding-skirt, she had splashed, half falling, into a salt-water pool.

On returning from Seacombe she had run straight, and to her amazement found the French still by the shore, with no sign yet of the boat. Approaching them, in a deep man’s-voice she had said: “Camille!” and when Verdier joined her, related what had happened. He determined to move away, told her where they would await the boat, and bid her hang behind, in case of danger from the village. The clamours of the yokels had soon reached her, and half the way from Seacombe she had followed them.

When they reached the first track, she was on the bank above, and when they surmised that the French were still on land, she ran forward, and made the false track by stepping back and fore without turning, so that her foot-marks pointed all sea-ward. Here she had waited, and on Margaret’s discovery of her ruse, started towards the cliffs, with a three-fold splash which revealed her whereabouts.

She flew — they after her. It was essential that she should reach her party before the Duke could catch sound or sight of another soul on the moor. The cliffs, two miles to the west, were the aim of both pursued and pursuers: a mass of Portlandstone, rising abruptly from the moor, and following the coast-line, till you come almost to Wyemouth. Their eastern wall, a mile long, runs north and south over the moor, sloping down toward the north, till it gently meets the plain. The two faces, the south and the east, meet at right angles, the south or sea-face being honeycombed by a succession of roomy caves; while in the east face overlooking the moor there is also one hollow, known as “Scobble’s Cave.”

It was towards this east face that the race was directed. But it was soon over. Lise ran north, making voluntary noises, and when the rescue-party was well started, shot off in a silent, gingerly run toward the high end of the cliff, where her friends should be waiting. The divergence was rapid, and soon the rector began to blow; the cannons, indeed, left behind, no longer impeded them, but the run, by common consent, slackened to a trot, and soon to a discontented walk.

“I shouldn’t fret, miss,” said Golde, with a pat on Margaret’s shoulder: “there is nothing for it but patience, and plenty of it, too.”

“Let me alone, Mr. Golde,” she answered wearily. “What patience can anybody have with people who can’t run a yard?”

Lise now had approached the cliffs with flying heels, then slackened, listening eagerly for a sound of the French. They were to wait close against the cliff-face overlooking the moor, near the shore. But in the dense darkness preceding dawn she actually butted upon the sheer rock: whether they were north or south of her was uncertain: and every instant so precious! She began groaning "Camille! Camille!" in low guttural, walking warily. The drizzle fell heavily now.

"Thank the good God!" she gasped presently, as a sound reached her strained ears. The Duke had said:

"You see, now, it looks like coming to rain. You should have brought some tents with you, if you meant living out here on the moor."

"Camille!" groaned Lise.

In a moment Verdier was with her.

"Another minute," she said, "and all is over! There are men, many, many, searching for you — from Seacombe! Camille! For the good God's sake—"

She was livid with fright. "Isn't there a cave, or something, about here?" he asked.

"Yes! it must be further north — a little. Scoble's Cave — it is your hope — run — run!" Verdier pelted. He took a sudden interest in the rain.

"Your Grace," he said hurriedly— "If your Grace will walk quickly with us this way, I think we can find your Grace shelter from this shower."

And northward, in rapid walk, they moved, Verdier's hand groping against the wall for the narrow cave-mouth; while behind came Lise.

CHAPTER XXVII. SCOBLE'S CAVE

UP TO NOW, neither sight nor sound of the rescue-party had reached the Duke: a short distance from the cliffs a series of hillocks blocked the general level of the moor from sight, hiding Margaret's lanthorn.

When therefore Verdier called: "In here — to the left," the Duke walked into a long passage hardly wide enough to admit three abreast.

They went in file, Verdier last, then Lise.

"There is a pool of some sort," she whispered at his ear, "you must not hesitate — you must go right through, and hide on the other side, far off. They will be certain to come in here."

"A pool?"

"Yes — it comes abruptly — walk fast, and you will be into it before you know, in the dark—"

"But— 'tis rather too much to expect of him, you know. He won't go through."

"You must make him somehow!"

"Don't be absurd, my dear. He is getting frightfully moody and angry, as it is."

"You must make him! If he could once be got well in — you must make him run — now."

"And how, pray?"

For answer she slipped by him, and ran rapidly, but silently, cringing against the wall. Once, twice, she stumbled, with echoed sound. But she slid swiftly beyond the foremost, and beyond still ten yards: then stopped, and lanced a shrill cry of piercing distress.

The whole party, with mixed impulses, ran forward, the Duke eager as the rest. "Lise has wits," muttered Verdier.

But Lise's cry was not all simulated: in it being mixed a note of real surprise, dismay. Suddenly, as she stopped her dark run, there had appeared before her — light! Terror seized her lest she should be seen, though, in fact, a bend hid her, and the light was of a kind which hardly revealed an object near it.

Still, as the Duke rescued himself from a stumble — his third in the short run — he was momentarily conscious of a female form, — Margaret's he was sure — rushing like a phantom in the opposite direction. The next moment they all dashed, spattering and struggling, into a morass.

Lise had called it "a pool", had said that the pursuers would be "certain to come in"; had spoken of it as being "in the dark": and in each case there was misstatement, due to the fact that, in spite of her Intelligence-Department scrutiny, she did not really know the country-side. She had visited Scoble's Cave one day, and seen a black, oily tarn slumbering where the passage ended, and the rock opened in a circular vaulted cavern. The sun, shining up the passage, had shown her that the walls rose sheer out of the unctuous water; and she had noted a fetid ill-odour, like garlic and rotten eggs. But she did not know that the fluid surface was only an inch deep, and that far down lay a barelymoist swamp of decomposing phosphoric offal, sea-fowl refuse, putrid fish, algæ, all the carrions and waste-products of the sea; nor that above this mawkish and pestilent mass there arose, in darkness, a luminous exhalation, a white and garish haze of light; nor that, for no consideration would a yokel of the country-side enter this place by night.

At that time, when witches rode, and the mind was in a state ready to believe whatever is extraordinary, Scoble's Cave had a bad name. Individuals, supposed to have entered it, had vanished, never to be seen again. The definite suction of the morass was sufficient to account for this, but the fact itself, together with reports of strange sights seen here, inspired sensations of vague immense awesomeness in reference to the Cave. Wyemouth, however, was a good-sized town, and freer-minded, and the Cave was the stock resort of its fishermen on the way over the moor each Monday, Wednesday and Saturday, in the passage being deposited rolled seines, creels, oars, logs, hand-nets, etc., while from time immemorial the tarn had been the repository of all the useless fish, and unsold, decaying residues of the hauls. It is doubtful, however, if even a Wyemouth fisherman would have entered the Cave by night; and it is possible that not a living soul had seen the wannish sheen which then emanated from it.

The morass is simply a phosphorus-swamp, precisely similar to that of Spendi, though for some reason less famous, its feeble luminosity being identical with that of a decaying haddock in the dark: for, originally a fish-pool formed by the sea's overflow into the cavern, in the course of ages it became a mere bog of fishy products.

But it was deep; and the French and the Duke were carried by their impetus almost to the middle. Some feet down, the substance is of the consistency of dough, and they were able to take some floundering steps: but then the full horror broke upon them: the insidious doom below, soft but strong, had caught their feet; the higher layers afforded no prise for upward effort; the marsh was sucking them in.

The more they floundered, the quicker the end. Huguenin, the first to plunge, had sunk in an agony of struggle to the chin, had gulped a first portion of the fatal filth, and was about to disappear. The Duke saw the backward hanging head; and knew that nothing could now save him. Most were still a chest above, he highest; all save him, fighting hard against the foul tomb that held and drew them. He had noted the effect of Huguenin's struggles, for objects within the mist of light were distinct, though all beyond lay dark: and he cried out:

"Don't dance about, any of you. That only makes the matter worse, it looks like." They glanced at him: there he stood in the sickly nebulous glare, slowly sinking, his brow twitching. A minute before he had been weary, languid, sullen; now, in the sudden peril, his eyes lifted with interest, keen, but calm: so keen, that before he sank an inch, he had estimated every possibility of the situation so calm, that the working of his mind was quasi-disinterested, as a mathematician is concerned with his problem for its own sake.

But puzzlement twitched his wry-pulled forehead: the roof was out of reach; the walls were smooth, and out of reach.

Danda, in his angry struggles, was nearly gone. Huguenin had bubbled his cry, and perished.

"It rather looks as if we were in for it," the Duke said to Verdier near him, "unless—"

"Well, your Grace?"

Verdier's cheeks were ashen. "Unless one of you has some twine."

Of all things twine seemed the most useless: but one tossed a coil. To his oak-stick, floating near, the Duke tightly tied it, round and round, near the ferule; then, the stick horizontal in his uplifted arm, he oscillated it, taking aim, and cast it. The effort sank him an inch. It flew straight through the middle of the passage, and fell. He drew it back, slowly, with one manoeuvring hand: and back it came to him — but empty, and ineffectual.

And again he cast, and again it returned ineffectual; and then again, and it returned ineffectual: with every hurl he sank an inch.

“Ah,” said he, “the old stick is not turning out so good a friend as it has been. Well, then, we must only keep him on his travels.”

And again he cast with calm accuracy, and again it returned — but not alone. The curved end had caught in a wide-spaced wicker-work, and brought a creel with it.

Something of this kind he had expected, remembering his stumblings over obstacles in the passage, and their softness underfoot.

“Ah,” he said, “I thought there was something. Some more like that, and we shall get on very well.”

He drew in the creel: pushed it towards Verdier, to lift himself upon.

And out, with wrinkled, speculative brow, he cast again: but it returned ineffectual. Immediately, however, five, six creels were cast in swift succession by invisible hands. Lise had stood quivering and paralysed in the passage, till she comprehended the meaning of the stick-and-twine, and flung the creels.

“Well,” said he, “Margaret knows how to succour both her friends and her enemies.” Creel after creel came flying, and with them old sacks, logs, a swab, a tiller; and down as the floating objects sank beneath their weight, so up they won the feet from the reluctant clutch of the slush. In three minutes they were on the other side, no longer seven, but six.

Here was a passage in the rock, nearly opposite that of entrance. But passing through, they stopped simultaneously, gazing in the extremity of surprise: for each saw the other shrouded from neck to toe in a feeble halo, not of light, but of the mere scum and frivolous froth of light, like the shimmering ghosts of huge glow-worms: and so phantasmal, mournful, was the impression, that when Verdier laughed, it was with a certain nervous tremor.

Through the passage, clearly visible to one another, they came out on a level space between two spurs of the gentle slope at the back of the seaward-looking cliffs.

Verdier here called Danda aside, proposing the ascent of a bill, in order to sight the light or boat or frigate. And up the slope they began to trudge.

By now, Seacombe had arrived at the mouth of Scoble's Cave, and there was a prompt movement to hurry past. It was the rector who called out:

"They may be in there!"

Seacombe did not relish the suggestion. Even Golde did not volunteer to enter. "We had better look!" said Margaret; and she entered, followed by Golde and the rector. Lise, having heard their approach, had slipped out of the passage to the moor. They passed through, and the moment the miasma shone before them, Golde cried out:

"Miss, miss, come back — !"

The rector, a local man, gave no second look, but ran back to scarce the villagers with awful news, followed soon by the two. They had seen a fearful thing: the creels and bags slowly sinking under the luminous haze were now barely indicated in dusky vagueness, and seemed the backs of drowned men: while still sticking straight up in the sheen was the right hand of the perished Frenchman.

And Seacombe ran, haltingly, obliquely, away from the cliff toward the shore, scared by the horror that the malicious pool had claimed yet another band of victims. But near the shore, with eyes wide in awe and pity, they stopped, doubtful, excited, and looked back.

And as they looked, an appalling spectacle met their gaze. Poised in mid-air they beheld six forms, like headless phantasms in shrouds, as it were, of the fugitive pollen of moonshine, wavering in a wan lilac luminosity.

It was impossible to doubt that these were the ghosts of the men lately perished. The French and the Duke stood on the hill-brow just climbed; but any outline of the hill itself was invisible in the blackness, and they seemed to hang suspended in air.

And suddenly, the Duke, for some purpose, raised his luminous stick in what seemed to Seacombe a menacing gesture: and with the action, Seacombe was gone — scattered like chaff — in headlong panic homeward, Golde and Margaret with the rest.

And it was thus that Seacombe, having gone out with timbrils and with dances to defeat the wiles of the French, returned singly and in fear, having seen a sight.

CHAPTER XXVIII. THE SHORE

THE SIX SHIMMERING men looked for the light of boat or ship, but saw only darkness. Here was a mystery before which the French stood aghast and helpless: and the speedy advent of morning, their terror before, became their hope.

Both, they believed, must for some reason be hiding their lights, and could not be distant: with the earliest beams, the situation would change.

They descended, since it rained a little, to take shelter in the west passage of Scoble's Cave, walking in loose order, hardly now keeping any surveillance: for all were visible from the neck downward, and the Duke, the tallest, was distinguishable.

And so they went, till, in the descent, they came to a path between bare cliffs, and now fell into single file, four, then the Duke, then one, at varying intervals. The Duke had designedly stepped into the path at the moment when one only was behind him. His brows were twitching; a smile, half scorn, half mischief, curved his lips; something worked in his mind: he was going to escape.

He was weary now of the adventure.

"I must turn in somewhere," he said to himself "and get some good sleep." His presence here was due to a promise: but it had been qualified by the condition: "unless some extraordinary chance offers." The passage through the luminous morass was that: he decided to use the luminous morass.

His means were simple and sure as possible: he made himself invisible. First, he went treading with studious noiselessness; then, at a sharp turn of the defile, he stood, and quickly, but without haste, threw off his coat, of which the inmost lining was hardly damp, except at the tails, which were wet through by the surface-fluid. With it he covered his legs, lining outward, and was now invisible, save for a triangular spot on his waistcoat, and a hint of light on the tail-lining; so, as the man behind turned the corner, he laid his waistcoat, lining outward, over the sheening tails. He had vanished, the hand which held the coat being behind it. He stood back against the rock over his stick. The whole was accomplished with whirlwind-rage, juggler-coolness. The man behind came, passed, and seeing a longish interval, slightly quickened his pace. The Duke put on his waistcoat, and, the coat still about his legs, followed their sounds down the winding path. He heard them enter the Cave-passage so close was he, and a moment stopped, thinking: Wyemouth should be his aim, and his shortest way over the moors. But he had no intention of being recaptured this time, and the open moor, with his glowing spots, might mean recapture. The shore, on the other hand, was full of possibilities — windings, crannies, caves: and he turned southward into the narrowing interval between two hills, till, through a split, he emerged upon the sands, and walked rapidly westward toward Wyemouth.

It was not till Verdier addressed some remark to him in the cave that they awoke. That he should slip them now, when he had stood in garments of light — this added to their stupor a touch of madness, a rage of incredulity. The simple method of the sagacious and many-counselled mind did not occur to them. Danda was like a maniac. Verdier, in prone rush, cried:

He ran up the hill-path alone, to the cliff-brow, whence both the hill's slope and a reach of shore were visible; the slope was smooth and treeless grass: the Duke was not there. Along the shore he had already passed behind a bluff: Verdier saw nothing save a lanthorn-gleam near the shore. But it vanished so instantaneously that he thought it an illusion of fancy. He ran back down the hill.

That lanthorn-gleam had vanished under Margaret's shawl. She had not run far from the spectacle of the men shimmering aloof in shrouds of moonshine. Her mind was strongly rational — she was “hard-headed.” She had stopped to look back, panting, but impudent, like a frightened-off dog, which yet rallies and faces round, head erect, ready to fly again. The rest ran on, all scattered, Golde with them, leaving her alone. As she stood looking, rather wild-eyed, frightened, defiant, the French moved to descend: and with their movement the spell broke. She gave forth a little sob, mixed with laughter.

“Bah! why it's them!” she said— “they are not drowned — though one of them is. It's that pool which makes them like that!”

The French, in their intense scrutiny of the sea, had not noticed her lanthorn.

She remained wondering what she was now to do, once more alone. Her hip, as soon as she found time to think of it, began to pain her again.

“Oh, I do wish Mr. Golde would come back,” she thought: “I don't think a man ought to run like that.”

Wearied and at a loss, she stood uncertain; then along the shore, she saw something: two coattails and a walking-stick taking a stroll by themselves — the Duke. She thought it must be a Frenchman sent for some purpose along the beach, and covered her lanthorn.

Soon she saw Verdier appear at the cliff-brow, and again covered the lanthorn. He ran back hurriedly.

“Something must have happened,” she thought, “I am not going to stand here, and do nothing.” And at once she ran to the beach, and along it; by the cleft through which the Duke had passed she entered the level space between two hills, and away yonder to the north saw the French running about like ghosts gone mad, widely separated. Her heart bounded with a vague premonition of good, and, eager to know, she went trotting ever nearer, when footsteps were heard behind, someone dashed by her with heels of furious speed, and sounds of — a skirt.

She, too, doubled her run, treading noiselessly in moist marl.

“Come! come!” cried Lise imperiously, within hailing distance of the French. They flocked round her. She had gone shoreward to spy for the boat’s light, and seen the faint luminosity which promenaded: the Duke had passed close to her, unsuspectingly; she had divined that it could not be one of her friends, and who it was.

“He is gone along — along the shore!” she gasped, in accents of agony, plainly audible to Margaret, her face distorted, pallid as death: “along the shore — quick — by the back of the hills — run — far forward — there are the clefts — wait on the shore — in a cave till he come—”

Without a second’s delay they were gone.

The cliffs and their hills behind are arranged in separate masses, with valleys and clefts, by which is passage from moor to beach. For the French to fore-run and intercept was therefore easy, they running straight along the moor, he walking all the long sweeps of the fore-shore.

But Margaret had heard, and never did her feet put on such shoes of swiftness. The French had hardly dashed into westward race, when she was off southward to the sands. This time, anyway, there would be no mistake!

Off then, she flew with the heels of a young hind, laughing to scorn the hip-pain, no longer careful to hide the swinging lantern.

But Lise saw the lantern, and knew well that it represented the weak spot of all their hope — Margaret Ferris. But for Margaret all had long been well, and over. Yet Margaret, this time, must be stopped — else good-bye to everything. And Lise had no gun to shoot her dead.

But she had an instant brain: she could intercept Margaret as the men were intercepting the Duke! running at the back to emerge upon the shore ahead of her — if she were swift! And she, too, went flying.

And somewhat in advance of Margaret she did come out upon the sands, and a minute waited for the on-hasting lantern. It happened low down, near the tide-rim, where the sand was less toilsome. When Margaret was within a yard of her spring, Lise had her, crying in her deep, intense, and panting guttural:

“Not this time, Margaret Ferris!”

She might as well have sought to bar the progress of a cyclone. The tussle, filled with the hissing of infuriate cats, lasted not a minute. Down upon the head of the Frenchwoman crashed the lantern: and Margaret flew forward, the other lying weeping in the sand.

CHAPTER XXIX. HOMICIDE

LONG BEFORE THE Duke was in sight, the French were waiting behind a large rock on the sand, till he should come.

He was walking leisurely, not far from the sea-edge. The fine roll of the surf was good to him to hear. He had put on his coat again, feeling fairly secure, thinking of nothing but a bed, and the splendid perseverance of the ever-preaching sea. The morning breeze fanned his hair.

Margaret hasted upon him with furious expedition, then suddenly, at the last moment, tentatively. She was not quite sure of her reception. Unfortunately, she had broken her lanthorn upon Lise, and he could not see her honest face, nor she his.

“My lord—” she said, quite close.

He half-turned his head, continuing his walk. He knew the voice.

“Well now, Margaret,” he said.

“My lord — stop, will you? — there is not an instant to be lost.” He walked on, neither faster, nor slower, without answer. Then, all at once, the full tragedy of the situation broke in upon her — the possibility that he might not listen to her this time: the one thing that she had not taken into account.

“My lord, don’t you believe what I say to you?” she wailed.

He did not answer.

“Don’t you believe what I say, sir?”

“Well, and what is it you say, Margaret?”

“The Frenchmen are on in front, my lord — they have run on in front behind the cliffs to wait for you — they must be in front now, waiting — will you turn back with me, my lord?”

Her head was screwed round, vainly seeking, with agonized interest, to peer into his face. It was as hard as the marble images of it which now frown upon the public places of England.

They walked on a minute, she not knowing what in the world to do. He said:

“It does not look, Margaret, as if your side was going to beat.”

“You are right, my lord,” she answered— “it won’t, not if you keep walking on like this another five minutes.”

“Is it that you still pretend that you are on my side, then?”

“What other side should I be on, my lord?”

“On the enemy’s, I gather. What if I tell you that I saw you in the cave?”

“Which cave, sir?”

He did not answer. He meant the momentary phantom of Lise rushing through the passage. “You never saw me in any cave, sir,” she said; “you might have seen Mrs. Opie. She is lying yonder in the sand now. I’ve killed her, I hope.”

“She is not, then, asleep at Grandcourt, Margaret?”

“Will you come with me, my lord?”

“Or out with a party of the servants looking for the Duke of Wellington, eh?”

“Won’t you come? Do, sir! Pray, do, my lord! I promise you — I promise you — if you will only trust me, just this once more — my lord—”

“You are impudent. And your impudence makes you rather a bad ally to your friends.”

“Ah, sir, what a man you are!”

“Have you a mother?”

“No, sir.”

“No one dependent on you?”

She was surprised. “No, sir.”

“Well, do you know where I am going now?”

“You are going among the Frenchmen!”

“No. I am going to Wyemouth. And I am going to take you with me, to give you a lesson. You have put your own head into the noose, Margaret.”

“I shouldn’t mind if you would keep yours out of it, sir. But I don’t know what noose it is you mean.”

“The noose means the House of Correction, Margaret, and the Constable!”

Saying it, he caught her wrist in an iron grip.

And now she began to cry, suppressing her sobs, lest the Frenchmen should hear. Only, she said, wailing:

“Oh, this is too hard of you, my lord! — believe me, I would have died to save you, sir!” And in that cry something there was which reached and wounded him — sorely for an instant: and at that moment — once more — in spite of everything, she had conquered him. He believed her.

An instant only: his stubborn heart would not yield. For two minutes longer he walked silent, his grasp on her wrist, hearing the convulsive catches of her breath. Then, all in a moment, she was free and running, her hand wrenched from his: and he a prisoner.

The stick went up, and dropped listlessly.

“Does your grace admit yourself a prisoner?” asked Verdier. He did not answer. He was thinking of something else: of Margaret, mortally angry with her — or with himself. Verdier asked again:

“Does your grace admit — ?”

“Let me see,” he said sharply, “how many are, there of you? — five. Well, very well.” The faintest hint of grey was in the east, but over sea and land darkness; nor as yet could any sign of ship or boat be seen; and to fill the time before the light, they set out to return to the secrecy and shelter of Scoble’s Cave, drizzle still falling.

The Duke walked preoccupied, his head bent. Had he not done her wrong? She had told him right! Perhaps knowing that he would not now believe, and therefore persist in going wrong? Was she, then, a Machiavel of craft? or a very angel of kindly purposes? If he had wronged her, he had wronged her quite beyond pardon!

She, all the time, was hanging behind, at safe distance, limping, hands clasped before. She had heard some mention of Scoble’s Cave among the party, and knew that thither they were returning. When they turned into the cleft of the cliffs leading to the Cave’s western passage, she would not venture after them on that side; yet they were like a magnet to her; she could not leave them: and ran round to the Cave’s east passage.

Here she thought herself alone: but two minutes before, Lise having also accompanied the return, but in advance, had run round, like Margaret, to this east passage, to wait and be near.

And so at the inner end of the passage, the two women met; and in the luminosity of the morass saw each other’s face.

Margaret gave a little cry of joy, a cruel cry. In that moment she forgot everything but one. They had come running; and the men, walking very slowly, were still some way off, when the women looked into each other’s eyes.

They wasted no words, feeling the meaning of this meeting. The long contest would end here. The Brahmin doctrine of “the Ferine Soul” found illustration in their stare. The true hatred — the hatred of hell — is when woman meets woman.

Neither had a weapon: but Nature is always armed: here were the thews to embrace, and the hands to squeeze, and the claws to rake.

Margaret flew at her with the cry of "Beast!" and at the same time the lady of fashion became a mere Fury, blood-thirsty, visage all inflamed. They became involved in a mere chaos of distracted intensities, pounding, tearing hair, clothes, flesh, pushing and pulling, tugging at the windpipe, and finally rolling together on the narrow space between passage-end and morass.

The aim of Margaret was to get her enemy into the morass itself. But it was not so easy: both were strongly built: one an athlete, the other large, a woman-of-the-world, and venomous. When they fell an entanglement of womanhood, it was difficult to say which was uppermost. At all events, Margaret made a grand effort to lift herself, and succeeded: but as she rose, Lise rose with her; and as with one heave of the whole frame, she thrust Lise forth, Lise had her still; and together, with simultaneous cry, they splashed, still struggling wildly, locked in maddest ecstasy, a considerable distance from the edge.

Either, by herself, must have perished, choked with filth, unless quick help came; thus desperately locked, all the help of man could avail them nothing.

When their cry shrilled out, the men were in the cave-passage on the other side: all rushed in, and at the edge stood looking, helpless and amazed.

"Let go each other!" shouted Verdier, pale as marble.

He might as well have shouted to the Portland rock. The mire had the women well by the feet; they had sunk to the neck; and still they struggled, seeking to destroy each other. The minute before the fatal slime must bubble in their gaping mouth was come.

The Duke with the rest, stood looking, his brain working mightily. He was asking himself questions of the most awful abstract import, grappling with doubts as to the relative powers of God and Man in the face of certain eventualities; and, at the very same time, was weighing like a judge, with nicest quick subtlety, evidence as to a host of minute details.

His measuring eye had seen at a glance that no human power could save both women, so fixedly locked. But he could save one — if he chose: one at the expense of the other. Only, had he the right? That was his bold question: and boldly his capacious intellect expanded to the breadth of it, and answered — Yes.

He would do a murder. “Just give me your pistol,” he said coolly to one.

The man hesitated.

“No — I won’t shoot you,” said the Duke— “make haste!” There was need for frightful urgency. The women were nearly gone. Yet when he had the pistol, he, too, hesitated.

For there was another question to be solved! The question of — which? One of the women was here doing noble duty; one engaged in an attempt against himself heinously wrong. But which? The wife of his friend, Opie? — or Margaret, who had led him, to his certain knowledge, into the arms of his enemies; who, to his certain knowledge, had lied to him?

He hesitated — and there was need for haste.

It was a terrible moment for him. His soul wrought intensely. To do right now — to see as the Judge of all the Earth saw — this was his effort, his task. By one of those mysterious travails of the spirit, akin to the operation of Intuition — by the fierce working of that affinity with Truth which is the chief trait of every noble mind — he decided, and decided well.

The pistol sounded, and a shriek rang through the cave. “Oh, Lise! Lise! Lise!” cried Verdier, when the smoke had thinned, covering his face, with passionate sobs.

CHAPTER XXX. "HAIL, HOLY LIGHT!"

IN SPITE OF the relaxing of Lise's arms Margaret was about to perish, her chin already sunken, when, once more, the Duke's action — so intense as to resemble tempest, so calmly exact as to resemble the planetary intercourse — saved her. He threw off his long coat, calling upon the French for theirs. Then, with his own hurrying hands tied them sleeve and sleeve; a moment later a coat-tail fell with nicest calculation before Margaret's face, and as she caught it, they drew her, holding high their end.

The Duke pulled her up, seated her on a block of rock. She was fainting, her colour ghastly, eyes closed. He bent over her assiduously, gently. But it was quite harshly that he said:

"How do you feel?"

She heard that voice and smiled. She knew what had happened! He had killed her enemy. for her! He had believed in her at the last!

"Well, now, how do you feel?"

She would not answer; she wanted him to on asking; she smiled. "Well, you have gone rather near to it this time, Margaret; you must now set about and come round again."

"Ah, my lord—" she sighed, and smiled.

The voice of Danda was heard. "We must be going! Bring the girl too!"

"And why the girl?" said the Duke.

"She is our prisoner, your Grace; our prisoner last night, and escaped Verdier through his paroxysm of grief.

"Is that so . . .? . . . Well, but she can't go now. You must wait."

The white exhalation of the morass was nearly invisible now, merging in vaguest silver into the growing day, as a veiled bride faints upon the bosom of her lord. It was morning. Margaret would not move.

“Now—” said Verdier. “Can you come now?” said the Duke gently.

“Yes, my lord.”

“Well, then—”

She rose bedraggled, with bruises, but erectly tall, a great brightness in her golden eyes. They went out. It was late September, and the morning had come suddenly: already it was magnificently broad and bright.

Southward through the cleft they came upon the beach, and here were startled by the sight of a man some distance away. He ran from them a little, then stopped, looking. Margaret recognised Golde, and waved her hand.

Golde, like her, had not run far from the phantoms: but by the time he recovered himself had lost her. He ran about a little, and, from an elevation sighted the lanthorn-shine: but it disappeared: she had seen Verdier at the cliff-brow and covered it. And since then he had been seeking her painfully over moor and shore.

All eyes now turned seaward: there lay a little fleet of little boats anchored beyond the surf-line, Wyemouth craft, and there all night, unknown to the French, had lain. But of their own boat, of the frigate, no trace.

At this, however, they hardly wondered: for the shape of the bay in which they stood afforded limited purview of the sea.

“We shall sight them from the headland there,” said Danda— “come on.”

“I hope the boat isn’t on the sea at all now,” said Verdier, “she might well get noticed by someone. We can take one of those craft there, as soon as we sight the frigate.”

“Why the devil did the frigate hide her lights?” queried Danda. “There was some reason or other, I suppose,” Verdier said nonchalantly, and siffled through his teeth-edges. Then: “Your Grace must be exceedingly hungry and tired!”

He did not answer. “Ah, well,” whispered Danda, “we will soon give him bed and breakfast,” and his inward- tending upper lip, longer than his chin, tightened viciously.

They walked westward, Margaret and the Duke in the centre. Golde following small, at a perfectly safe distance.

The musical caw of a large snow-white bird, scarlet-legged, was on high; over-sea a flight of gulls swung, skating the air with alternate wingtip dipped in the brine; in the neap-tide surf was a certain quietude now; and down by the water-edge lay rank abundance of brown seaweed twine; and all in the blithe fresh morning was the sea, the sea.

Round the curve of sand they went to a thin promontory, rising toward its end, whence was wide prospect of the sea; and near it the little fleet of boats, useful in case their own were not in sight.

And at the terminating bluff of gneissoid rocks, rugged and seamed with wet algæ, they stood, exposed to possible prying eyes, but no longer careful, since it was beyond doubt that all, at last, was safe.

But for some minutes they looked everywhere, and did not see the frigate.

Murmurs, hisses, curses, arose and multiplied. But to one another they said nothing, nor looked at one another, feeling now the intolerably harsh frown of Fate. Danda’s face, quaint as a bat’s, was a rigid pallor. The boat was not visible: the frigate was not visible. Here was a touch of the Inscrutable: this way lay — Madness.

“Well, your Grace—” Verdier said at last, with a wry and pale attempt at laughter. He was interrupted by a cry from Margaret. She had fixed her eyes, by a natural instinct, upon the scene of her great struggle with Verdier — the lighthouse. There it stood, black and burnt, distant and solitary. Her powers of vision were excellent. And suddenly:

“There — there’s their ship, my lord!” she cried, pointing— “oh, my lord, my lord — !” Her jubilant hands clapped with cruel glee. What she called “their ship” was five bow-timbers sticking above the water on Raddon Rocks. For, almost immediately after the boat had returned to the frigate during the night to procure more men, the frigate had run upon the lighthouse rocks.

That guiding light the Frenchmen had themselves quenched. . . .

At that laugh of Margaret, Verdier fixed her with a look of hate.

“Well, certainly, Margaret,” said the Duke, “it rather looks as if our side were going to beat, after all.”

Our side! He coupled her lovingly with him now! A sweet pain, like mixed honey and peppermint, went rankling in her heart.

But Verdier was a fellow of invincible mind, persistent, quick-willed, great in desperation. No sooner had he made out the wreck through screwed-up eyes, than he was resolved. He called Danda aside; whispered:

“I am off to Wyemouth — the French barque that hailed us two days since was bound there — is there now. I shall get her. That cave there — take the Duke: and wait till I send the barque’s boat to this point.”

Turning to the Duke, he said:

“Your Grace, I am going away for a time. But your Grace sees that there will be four of us left. And your Grace is one, unarmed. Will you go with them to save a row? I am dreadfully sorry to put your Grace to all this annoyance—”

“A general should disband his army, and let go his prisoners, when he has nothing to give them to eat,” said the Duke. “Well, but I will go with the four, to see what becomes of you.”

Verdier slipped down and ran along to the sands. Here he sent a flying shot at Golde, who, however, had retreated before him, keeping that safe distance of his. Verdier disappeared through a cleft, making over the moor for Wyemouth. The others came slowly along the headland.

“Do you see that man yonder on the beach, my lord?” asked Margaret.

The Duke, bending down his ear to her, looked.

“Yes, I see.”

“That is Mr. Golde, sir.”

“And who is Mr. Golde, Margaret?”

“He is the man who went through all the adventures with me last night, and the night before, my lord.”

“Is that so? Well, then, he must be an admirable fellow.”

“He is not a bad kind of man, sir. But he doesn’t like getting killed.”

“I see that — I see. That is why the fellow is hanging off over there.”

“But I shouldn’t like you to think he is a coward, my lord. There is nobody braver when it comes to the push. And he is very kind-hearted, and good.”

“Well, Mr. Golde is a happy man, Margaret, since you like him so much.”

She coloured.

“But this is what I wanted to say, my lord: that you needn’t be kept bothering with these men any more, because there are three of us now, and only four of them.”

“Well, but I don’t wish to see you and Mr. Golde shot down, Margaret. The four have guns, and we have none.”

“But are we to go on quietly, and do nothing, sir?”

“It is rather a good thing to know how to wait sometimes, Margaret.”

“They say that is how you won the battle of Waterloo, sir.”

“Well, there is something in that.”

“But, my lord — there is that Verdier who has just run off I can’t tell you, sir, what a beastly artful man that is.”

“He seems to me rather a gallant fellow. If I had the judging of the rascal, I should condemn him to be hanged, and then go to his funeral afterwards.”

“But, my lord — won’t you listen to me? He is a most cunning man, that man! and whatever it is he is gone to do, he will do. I could see it in his face.”

“And have you something to propose, then?”

“Yes, my lord! When we get to the cave-mouth, I am going to run. They can’t come after me, because not enough of them will be left to guard you. They can only shoot at me. Will you stand in front and prevent them, sir?”

“Why, yes. But what is it you mean to be after when you have run off?”

“Mr. Golde ought to have followed that Verdier, sir: but he didn’t think of it. He is not very much a one for thinking of things. I want to run and tell him to hurry off to Wyemouth, and rouse the people against Verdier. I believe that is where Verdier has gone to. He has gone to see if he can get a ship!”

“Well, but suppose you get shot?”

“You are not going to let them, sir!”

“Well, then, we shall see.”

The four were parleying hotly in French; and so, all talking, they crossed the sands to the cave. It opened in a roomy area beyond a passage ten yards long. They entered in double file: two, then the prisoners, then two. It was when the last were five yards within the passage that Margaret whispered, without looking at him:

He saw that the order of march was about as unfavourable as possible; that it would have been better strategy if she had started some seconds earlier; that the passage was too broad. He regretted his consent, perceiving danger: there were four pistols: somebody was going to be shot: he or she. Round glared his strong sure eyes, drinking in every possibility of the instant, and quickly he stooped to her with:

“Don’t go!”

He was the fraction of a second late. She was gone.

The two hinder men shouted an exclamation, one staggering, struck by her rush, she herself falling upon her hands beyond him.

“Shoot!” shrieked Danda, who had been of the van, but now of the rear, all having turned.

As one pointed, the weapon was vigorously struck downward; and by the time the man who had been staggered was prepared to fire, the Duke was before the four, facing them, yet seeing through the back of his head, as it were, the progress of Margaret. There came an instant when he perceived that he must guard her from three different shots at the same time. From one he saved her by a strike-out of the left fist, from the second by a downward sweep of the right hand. Before he could deal with the third, the percussion-cap was exploded, and he knew it; but the round-shot, passing through his right palm, fell spent on her skirt, just as she flew round the corner, and disappeared.

They made a rush to follow: but the Duke’s arms, stretched across the passage, barred them.

“No,” he said, “you may as well let her be off now. If you go after her, I shall run away.” They saw the crucified and sacrificial palm, dripping, the hard glint in his eye — and desisted. He went with them into the interior.

CHAPTER XXXI. THE BARQUE

MARGARET FLEW. AND Golde, seeing her come, ran to meet her — with suspicious glances at the cave-mouth, for he had heard the pistol-shot afar.

“We have got to go to Wyemouth at once, Mr. Golde!” she said: “their ship is wrecked on the lighthouse, and that Verdier is gone to get another, you see — oh, I wish we had the hobby-horse now—”

“There is a French ship in Wyemouth Roads, too,” said Golde. “I have been hunting for you all the morning, lass.”

“Have you — ? I thought you wouldn’t be far. . . Come!”

They started, steering their run for a cleft in the cliffs not far from the cave-mouth. The earth and its birds, sun and sea, were wide awake now, all blithely brisk, alert; but the men and women were still asleep; the shore was as deserted as at midnight; and far and near over all the land was hardly a human sound.

A little way they ran together, their nimble tread up-borne by the soft and passive sand, till Margaret stopped suddenly short, and with wide and solemn eyes stared into the wide and solemn eyes and bloodless face of Golde.

“O God, Mr. Golde!” she whispered, “what is that?”

She did not wait for answer: but flew back to cave just escaped — with winged feet — into the mouth, down the passage.

“That” was a multiple roar of wild beasts — of two tigresses, of a lion — the escaped menagerie beasts, which, knowing themselves in inhabited country, had herded within this cave, frightened, for a day and a night, famished now, mad with pangs. On the entrance of the French and the Duke they saw a meal from God.

Precisely what happened Margaret could never analyse: it was a whirl of frenzy. The cave was crowded with reverberations. One man was already rent to pieces, and close against the furthest wall she saw through the half-dark the Duke beneath the fangs of Apollyon.

At her cry — that voice which, alone of voices, they feared — the three beasts turned upward an emerald glow of eyes, paused in their jubilee, and cowered. But only for an instant: Nature was stronger in them than their fears. One tigress, springing from a wriggling crouch, brought down Danda in his flight, and above all sounds rang the intensity of his dying shrieks; while the other, wanton for slaughter, daintily discarded her first victim, and instantly had another man beneath ravening claws and hanging jowl.

Now Golde, too, appeared in the mêlée, his chest heaving at the weight of a huge pointed rock in his arms; and as one of the tigresses, with instant fastidiousness, dragged the last of the French beneath her talons, down upon her skull crashed the stone, and she fell dead.

The Duke, from the first, had sought the wall, and when he fell beneath the lion's rush, fell only as to the legs, the wall supporting his back. Then Margaret's cry was heard, and Apollyon, more timorous of her than the tigresses, looked up with hurried guilt, and hurriedly turned again to finish, and fly: but the snatch of his teeth carried with it the Duke's stick only: he had lost a moment, and in the next was faced by the eyes of Margaret.

What, at that instant, filled the Duke's mind was the daring of the girl.

"Pass that pistol there," he said, pointing to a weapon on the ground—"then run." She did not pass the pistol: but with a menace of crimson rage dashed her fist into the lion's face, and he, with a throat-murmur ran, and some distance away stood facing her, half-defiantly. At the same time she beheld the living tigress about to spring upon Golde, and with aggressive stamp, cried:

“Ah, you Fan! you dare!”

The tigress backed a step, while a shot from the Duke entered its skull. Margaret, seeing him take another pistol from the ground, now said:

“He won’t hurt, my lord — if you will please spare the poor brute’s life — he belongs to me—” Apollyon was backing away towards the wall.

One only of the four French, saved by Golde’s rock, had run out unharmed; and the next day was in the Wyemouth House of Correction.

Golde, Margaret, and the Duke went leisurely eastward across the sands, and northward over the moor toward Seacombe, for a horse to take the Duke to Grandcourt.

“To think that that foolish beast, Pol, should have torn your hand like that, my lord,” said Margaret, pointing to the bullet-wound in his palm.

“Ah,” said he, and smiled, “the fellow mistook me for a Frenchman, you see.” Then, turning to Golde on the other side of him: “That was gallantly done with the stone, Golde.”

Golde was timorously tingling at his nearness to the Great, with a constant tendency in his hand to go up and snatch off his hat.

“It was a privilege, your Grace, to be able to save that poor man’s life. Though they have served me some ugly turns, too, these men — your Grace.”

“Oh, my lord, my lord!” cried Margaret— “there — there — is where Mr. Golde rode the hobbyhorse!”

“Is that so? Which hobby-horse?”

As her hand fell, it fell somehow into his: and she told him, while Golde tingled and tingled, of the tacking ride, and of the race with Lise, and of the polyglot alarum of the bells, and of how Seacombe, having gone out with timbrels and with dances, returned singly, and in fear. It was not a walk, but a saunter through the blithe broad morning, she limping a little, the dry clasp of his hand filling her with comfort, her tongue loosed.

“And oh, my lord, I am so glad you saved Pol’s life! Do you know why — chiefly?”

“No. Tell me.”

“Because when that Verdier goes back to the cave, Pol will make short work of him.”

“And it would be little more than what that man deserves, too,” hazarded Golde.

“Ah, but I rather fancy Pol will come off second in that battle,” said the Duke.

He walked looking far away over the moor, with wrinkled speculative brow, smiling all the time. Something he wanted to say, and did not like to say it. At last he ventured bluntly:

“I am coming to the wedding.”

Margaret’s heart gave a big bound — and Golde’s. “Which wedding, sir?” she said, her eyes on the ground.

“Well, you have been telling me about it all the time, Margaret, and did not know. You must let me hear. And you, Golde.”

“And thanks to your Grace, too, for saying it!” said Golde.

She did not answer. She was white as a corpse. They were near Seacombe now. And half-an- hour later, when the Duke rode northwards, they two, on the slope of the hill, stood watching. And as he disappeared on the yon side of the bridge, Golde, who held her hand, turned his mouth and touched her lips, most timorously, gently, half-expecting her to spit and hiss like cats.

But she bore it tamely, with cast-down eyes, a little disgust in her nether lip. And presently an awful sigh came from her lifted bosom; and she said:

“Ah, Mr. Golde! I never expected that it would come to this.”

They walked back into Seacombe hand in hand.

It was still early; and about this time Verdier returned to the cave. The Duke’s prophecy proved correct: he had no sooner perceived the half-eaten bodies of his comrades, and the crouching lion, than Apollyon fell dead. At nine o’clock he was sitting out at the promontory-end, legs dangling, a hand supporting his chin, siffling through the teeth-edges, brooding with melancholy under-glance upon the frigate’s timbers on Raddon Rocks. And now, round a point of land came the stately French barque, crowded with white wide sails, like a countrywoman in Sunday-best, all starch and crinoline. Verdier had won her captain by a fabulous bribe: and at the sight of her, he threw back the head, all red, and laughed madly.

THE END

The Lord of the Sea (1901)

The Lord of the Sea was first published by Grant Richards in 1901 in London. Richards worked for T. W. Stead as an editor and writer at the highly successful Review of Reviews, before he established his first publishing company in 1897 at the age of only twenty-four. He would become an important figure in twentieth century publishing in Britain, not least because in 1901 he launched The World Classic series, which is still published today as the renowned Oxford World's Classics. Richards published many of Shiel's works over the course of the latter's career and maintained a close professional relationship with him for many years.

The Lord of the Sea is part of Shiel's 'future history' trilogy which also includes The Purple Cloud (1901) and The Last Miracle (1906). The novel centres on Richard Hogarth, who comes into the possession of enormous wealth via a meteorite stuffed with diamonds. Hogarth embarks on building a series of marine fortresses to become the supreme ruler of the sea and the dominant political force in the world. Shiel uses Hogarth's newly established position and power to express ideas about private landownership and social egalitarianism, based on the theories of Henry George. The novel is heavily plot driven and melodramatic; it involves prison escapes, hidden identities and thwarted romances. Unfortunately, Shiel's depiction of Jews plays heavily upon Anti-Semitic tropes and racist notions of an 'alien' invader destroying Europe.

I. THE EXODUS

IN THE CALLE Las Gabias — one of those by-streets of Lisbon below St. Catherine — there occurred one New Year a little event in the Synagogue there worth a mention in this history of Richard, Lord of the Sea.

It was Kol NidrÃ“, eve of the Day of Atonement, and the little Beth-El, sweltering in a dingy air, was transacting the long-drawn liturgy, when, behind the curtain where the women sat, an old dame who had been gazing upward smote her palms together, and let slip a little scream: “The Day is coming...!”

She then fainted, and till near ten lay on her bed, lit by the Yom Kippur candle, with open eyes, but without speech, her sere face still beautiful, on each temple a little pyramid of plaits, with gold-and-coral ear-rings: a holy belle. About ten P.M. three women watching heard her murmur: “My child, Rebekah...!”

She was childless, and whom she meant was not known. However, soon afterwards there was a form at the amulet-guarded door, and Estrella sat up, saying: “Rebekah, my child...”

A young lady of twenty-two ran in and embraced her, saying: “I have been to Paris and Madrid with my father — just arrived, so flew to see you. We leave for London to-night”.

“No: I shall keep you seven days. Tell Frankl I say so. What jewels! You have grown into a rose of glory, the eyes are profounder and blacker, and that brow was made for high purpose. Tell me — have you a lover?”

“No, mamma Estrella”.

“Then, why the blush?”

“It is nothing at all,” Miss Frankl answered: “five years ago when at school in Bristol I thrice saw through a grating a young man with whom I was frivolous enough to speak. Happily, I do not know what has become of him — a wild, divine kind of creature, of whom I am well rid, and never likely to see again”.

The old lady mused. “What was he?”

“A sailor”.

“Not a common sailor?”

“I fancy so, mamma”.

“What name?”

“Hogarth — Richard”.

“A Jew?”

“An Englishman!”

She laughed, as the old lady’s eyes opened in sacred horror, and as she whispered: “Child!”

Within three months of that night, one midnight the people of Prague rose and massacred most of the Jewish residents; the next day the flame broke out in Buda-Pesth; and within a week had become a revolution.

On the twelfth morning one of two men in a City bank said to the other: “Come, Frankl, you cannot fail a man in this crisis — I only want 80,000 on all Westring—”

“No good to me, my lord,” answered Frankl, who, though a man of only forty — short, with broad shoulders, — already had his skin divided up like a dry leaf; in spite of which, he was handsome, with a nose ruled straight and long, a black beard on his breast.

But the telephone rattled and Frankl heard these words at the receiver: “Wire to hand from Wertheimer: Austrian Abgeordneten-haus passed a Resolution at noon virtually expelling Jewish Race....”

When Frankl turned again he had already resolved to possess Westring Vale, and was saying to himself: “Within six months the value of English land should be — doubled”.

The bargain was soon made now: and within one week the foresight of Frankl began to be justified.

Austria, during those days, was a nation of vengeful hearts: for the Jews had acquired half its land, and had mortgages on the other half: peasant, therefore, and nobleman flamed alike. And this fury was contagious: now Germany — now France had it — Anti-Semite laws — like the old May-Laws — but harsher still; and streaming they came, from the Leopoldstadt, from Bukowina, from the Sixteen Provinces, from all Galicia, from the Nicolas Colonies, from Lisbon, with wandering foot and weary breast — the Heines, Cohens, Oppenheimers — Sephardim, Aschkenasim. And Dover was the new Elim.

With alarm Britain saw them come! but before she could do anything, the wave had overflowed it; and by the time it was finished there was no desire to do anything: for within eight months such a tide of prosperity was floating England as has hardly been known in a country.

The reason of this was the increased number of hands — each making more things than its owner could consume himself, and so making every other richer.

There came, however, a change — almost suddenly — due to the new demand for land, the “owners” determining to await still further rises, before letting. This checked industry: for now people, debarred from the land, had only air.

In Westring Vale, as everywhere, times were hard. It was now the property of Baruch Frankl: for at the first failure of Lord Westring to meet terms, Frankl had struck.

Now, one of the yeomen of Westring was a certain Richard Hogarth.

II. THE FEZ

FRANKL TOOK UP residence at Westring in September, and by November every ale-house, market, and hiring in Westring had become a scene of discussion.

The cause was this: Frankl had sent out to his tenants a Circular containing the words:

“...tenants to use for wear in the Vale a fez with tassel as the Livery of the Manor...the will of the Lord of the Manor...no exception...”

But though intense, the excitement was not loud: for want was in many a home; though after three weeks there were still six farmers who resisted.

And it happened one day that five of these at the Martinmas “Mop,” or hiring, were discussing the matter, when they spied the sixth boring his way, and one exclaimed: “Yonder goes Hogarth! Let’s hear what he’s got to say!” and set to calling.

Hogarth twisted, and came winning his way, taller than the crowd, with “What’s up? Hullo, Clinton — not a moment to spare to-day—”

“We were a-talking about that Circular — !” cried one.

At that moment two other men joined the group: one a dark-skinned Jew of the MoghrabÃm; the other a young man — an English author — on tour. And these two heard what passed.

Hogarth stood suspended, finding no words, till one cried: “Do you mean to put the cap on?”

He laughed a little now. “I! The whip! The whip!” — he showed his hunting-crop, and was gone.

His manner of speech was rapid, and he had a hoarse sort of voice, almost as of sore-throat.

Of the two not farmers, one — the author — enquired as to his name, and farm; the other man — the MoghrabÃm Jew — that evening recounted to Frankl the words which he had heard.

* * * * *

One afternoon, two weeks later, Loveday, the author, was leaning upon a stile, talking to Margaret Hogarth; and he said: “I love you! If you could deign—”

“Truth is,” she said, “you are in love with my brother, Dick, and you think it is me!”

She was a woman of twenty-five, large and buxom, though neat-waisted, her face beautifully fresh and wholesome, and he of middle-size, with a lazy ease of carriage, small eyes set far apart, a blue-velvet jacket, duck trousers very dirty, held up by a belt, a red shirt, an old cloth hat, a careless carle, greatly famed.

“But it isn’t of your brother, but of you, that I am wanting to speak! Tell me—”

“No — I can’t. I am a frivolous old woman to be talking to you about such things at all! But, since it is as you say, wait, perhaps I may be able — But I must be going now—”

There was embarrassment in her now: and suddenly she walked away, going to meet — another man.

She passed through stubble-wheat, disappeared in a pine-wood, and came out upon the Waveney towing-path. On the towing-path came Frankl to meet her.

He took her hand, holding his head sideward with a cajoling fondness, wearing the flowing caftan, and a velvet cap which widened out a-top, with puckers.

“Well, sweetheart...” he said.

“But, you know, I begged you not to use such words to me!” — from her.

“What, and I who am such a sweetheart of yours?” — his speech very foreign, yet slangily correct, being, in fact, all slang.

“No,” she said, “you spoke different at first, and that is why — But this must be the last, unless you say out clearly now what it is you mean—”

“Now, you are too hard. You know I am wild in love with you. And so are you with me—”

“I?” — with shrinking modesty in her under-looking eyes. “Oh, no — don’t have any delusions like that about me, please! You said that you liked me: and as I am in the habit of speaking the truth myself, I thought that — perhaps — But my meeting you, to be frank with you, was for the sake of my brother”.

“Well, you are as candid as they make them,” he said, eyeing her with his mild eye. “But what’s the matter with your brother? Hard up?”

“He’s worried about something”. “He must have some harvest-money put away?”

“He has something in Reid’s Bank at Yarmouth, I believe”.

“Well, shall I tell you what’s the matter with him? He’s afraid, your brother. He has refused to wear the cap, and he thinks that I shall be down upon him like a thousand of bricks...But suppose I exempt him, and you and I be friends? That’s fair”.

“What do you mean?”

“Give us one—”

“Believe me, you talk — !”

“Don’t let your angry passions rise. I am going to have a kiss off those handsome lips—”

Before she could stir he was in the act of the embrace; but it was never accomplished: for he saw her colour fade, heard crackling twigs, a step! as someone emerged from the wood ten yards away — Richard.

The thought in Margaret’s mind was this: “Father in Heaven, whatever will he think of me here with this Jew?”

Hogarth stopped, staring at this couple; did not understand: Margaret should have been home from “class-meeting”...only, he observed her heaving bosom; then twisted about and went, his walk rapid, in his hand a hunting-crop, by which, with a very sure aim, he batted away pebbles from his path, stooping each time.

III. THE HUNTING-CROP

ALONG THE TOWING-PATH to the farmhouse. He did not look behind: was like a man who has received a wound, and wonders whence.

A pallor lay under his brown skin, brown almost as an Oriental's, and he was called "the Black Hogarth" — the Hogarths being Saxon, on the mantel in the dining-room being a very simple coat — a Bull on Gules. But Richard was a startling exception. His hair grew away flat and sparse from his round brow; on his cheeks three moles, jet-black in their centre. Handsome one called his hairless face: the nose delicate, the lips negroid in their thick pout, the left eye red, streaked with bloodshot, the eyes' brown brightness very beautiful and strange, with a sideward stare wild as that sideward stare of the race-horse; and the lids had a way of lifting largely anon.

He passed through Lagden Dip orchard into the old homestead, into the dining-room, where cowered the old Hogarth, smoking, his hair a mist of wool-white.

He glanced up, but said nothing; and Richard said nothing, but walked about, his arms folded, frowning turbulently, while the twilight deepened, and Margaret did not come.

Now he planted a chair near the old man, sat, and shouted: "Listen, sir!"

Up went the old Hogarth's hand to push forward the inquiring ear, while Richard, who, till now, had guarded him from all knowledge of the Circular, snatched it from his breast-pocket, and loudly read.

As the sense entered his head, up the old man shot his palms, shaking from them astonishment and deprecation, with nods; then, with opening arms, and an under-look at Richard: “Well, there is nothing to be said: the land is his....”

Hogarth leapt up and walked out; he muttered: “The land is his, but he is mine....”

The question at the bottom of his mind had been this: “Does Margaret, too, go with the land?” But he did not utter it even to himself: went out, fingering the crop, stalking toward the spot where he had left the man and the woman. But Margaret was then coming through the wood; Frankl had gone up to the Hall; and Hogarth crossed the bridge and went climbing toward the mansion.

It was a Friday evening, and up at the Hall the Sabbath had commenced, two Sabbath-tapers shining now upon the Mezuzzah at the dining-room door, Frankl being of the CohanÃm, the priestly class — a Jew of Jews. As he had passed in, two MoghrabÃm Jews had saluted him with: “Shabbath”; and mildly he had replied: “Shabbath”.

But swift upon his steps strode Hogarth: Hogarth was at the lodge-gates — was on the drive — was in the hall.

But, since Frankl was just preparing to celebrate the kiddush, “He cannot be seen now”, said a man in the hall.

“He must”, said Hogarth.

As he brushed past, two men raised an outcry: but Hogarth continued his swift way, and had half traversed a salon hung with a chaos of cut-glass when from a side-door appeared the inquiring face of Frankl in pious skull-cap.

“What is it?” he cried — “I cannot be seen —”

He recognized the man of the towing-path, and on his face grew a look of scare, as he backed toward a study: but before he could slam the door, Hogarth, too, was within.

“Who are you? What is it?” whined Frankl, who was both hard master and cringing slave.

Hogarth produced the Circular: but of Margaret not a word.

“Caps-and-tassels, you?” — flicking Frankl on the cheek with a fillip of his middle finger.

“You dare assault me! Why, I swear, I meant no harm—”

Down came the whip upon the Jew’s shoulders, Frankl, as the stings penetrated his caftan, giving out one roar, and the next instant, seeing the two Jews at the doorway, groaned the mean whisper: “Oh, don’t make a man look small before the servants”, crying out immediately: “Help!”

Soon five or six servants were at the door, and, of these, two Arab Jews rushed forward, one a tall fellow, the other an obese bulk with bright black eyes, the former holding a slender blade — the knife with which “shechita”, or slaughtering, was done: and while the corpulent Jew threw himself upon Hogarth, the other drew this knife through the flesh of Hogarth’s shoulder, at the same time happening to cut the heavy Arab across the wrist.

Now, there was some quarrel between the two Arabs, and the injured Arab, forgetting Hogarth, turned fiercely upon his fellow.

Hogarth, meanwhile, had not let go Frankl, nor delivered the intended number of cuts: so he was again standing with uplifted whip, when his eye happened to fall upon the doorway.

He saw there a sight which struck his arm paralysed: Rebekah Frankl.

Two months had she been here at Westring — and he had not known it!

There she stood peering, of a divine beauty in his eyes, like half-mythical queens of Egypt and Babylon, blinking in a rather barbarous superfluity of jewels: and, blinded and headlong, he was in flight.

As for Frankl, he locked that door upon himself, and remained there, forgetting the sanctification of the Sabbath.

The Hebrew's eyes blazed like a wild beast's. The words: "As the Lord liveth..." hissed in whispers from his lips.

He took up a pinch of old ashes, and cast it into the air.

As Shimei, the son of Gera, cursed David, so he cursed Richard Hogarth that night — again and again — with grave rites, with cancerous rancour.

"I will blight him, as the Lord liveth; as the Lord liveth, I will blight him..." he said repeatedly, his draperied arms spread in pompous imprecation.

As a beginning, he sat and wrote to Reid's Bank, requesting the payment in gold of £14,000 — to produce a stoppage of payment at the little Bank in which were Richard's savings.

Afterwards, with mild eyes he repaired to the dining-hall, and sanctified the Sabbath, blessing a cup of wine, dividing up two napkined loaves, and giving to Rebekah his benediction.

IV. THE SWOON

HOGARTH WENT MOODILY down the hillside to the Waveney, across the bridge, and home, his sleeve stained with blood.

In the dining-room, he threw himself into an easy-chair in a gloom lit only by the fireglow, in the room above mourning a little harmonium which Margaret was playing, mixed with the sound of Loveday's voice.

The old man said: "Richard, my boy..."

Hogarth did not answer.

"Richard, I have somewhat to say to you — are ye hearkening?"

Richard, losing blood, moaned a drowsy "Yes".

And the old Hogarth, all deaf and bedimmed, said: "I had to say it to you, and this night let it be: Richard, you are no son of mine".

At this point Hogarth's head dropped forward: but many a time, during long years, he remembered a dream in which he had heard those words: "Richard, you are no son of mine..."

The old Hogarth continued to ears that did not hear:

"I have kept it from you — for I'm under a bargain with a firm of solicitors in London; but, Dick, it doesn't strike me as I am long for this world: a queer feeling I've had in this left side the last hour or two; and there's that Circular — I never heard of such a thing in all my born days. But what can we do? You'll have to wear the cap — or be turned out. Always I've said to myself, from a young man: 'Get hold of a bit of land someways as your own God's own': but I never did; the days went by and by, and it all seems no longer than an after-dinner nap in a barn on a hot harvest-day. But a bit of land — the man who has that can make all the rest work to keep him. And if they turn me out, I couldn't live, lad: the old house has got into my bones, somehow. Anyhow, I think the time is come to tell you in my own way how the thing was. No son are you of mine, Richard. Your mother, Rachel, who was a Londoner, served me an ill turn while we were sweethearting, hankering after another man — a Jew millionaire he was, she being a governess in his house; but, Richard, I couldn't give her up: I married her three months before you were born; and not a living creature knows, except, perhaps, one — perhaps one: a priest he was, called O'Hara. But that's how it was. Your father was a Jew, and your mother was a Jew, and you are a Jew, and in the under-bottom of the old grey trunk you will find a roll of papers. Are you hearkening? And don't you be ashamed of being a Jew, boy — they are the people who've got the money; and money buys land, Richard. Nor your father did not do so badly by you, either: his name was Spinoza — Sir Solomon Spinoza—”

At that point Margaret, bearing a lamp, entered, followed by Loveday, and at the sight of Richard uttered a cry.

V. REID'S

BY NOON HOGARTH knew the news: his hundred and fifty at Reid's were gone; and he owed for the Michaelmas quarter — twenty-one pounds five, his only chattels of value being the threshers, not yet paid for, half a rick, seed, manure, and "the furniture". If he could realize enough for rent, he would lack capital for wages and cultivation, for Reid's had been his credit-bank.

After dinner he stood long at a window, then twisted away, and walked to Thring, where he captained in a football match, Loveday watching his rage, his twisting waist, and then accompanying him home: but in the dining-room they found the lord-of-the-manor's bailiff; and Loveday, divining something embarrassing, took himself away.

The same evening there were two appraisers in the house, and the bailiff, on their judgment, took possession of the chattels on the holding except some furniture, and some agricultural "fixtures". The sale was arranged for the sixth day.

From the old Hogarth the truth could no longer be hidden...

Two days he continued quiet in the old nook by the hearth, apparently in a kind of dotage doze; but on the third, he began to poke about, hobbled into the dairy, peered into the churn, touched the skimmer.

"You'll have to wear the cap", Margaret heard him mutter— "or be turned out".

As if taking farewell, he would get up, as at a sudden thought, to go to visit something. He kept murmuring: "I always said, Get a bit of land as your own, but I never did; the days went by and by....”

Margaret, meantime, was busy, binding beds with sheets, making bundles, preparing for the flitting, with a heaving breast; till, on the fifth day, a van stood loaded with their things at the hall-door, and she, with untidy hair, was helping heave the last trunk upon the backboard, when the carman said: “Mrs. Mackenzie says, mum, the things mustn’t be took to the cottage, except you pay in advance”.

Now Margaret stood at a loss; but in a minute went bustling, deciding to go to Loveday, not without twinges of reluctance: for Loveday, with instinctive delicacy, had lately kept from the farm; and to Margaret, whose point of view was different, the words “false friends” had occurred.

Passing through an alley of the forest, she was met by a man — a park-keeper of Frankl’s — a German Jew, who had once handed her a note from Frankl. And he, on seeing her, said: “Here have I a letter for your brother”.

“Who from?” she asked.

“That may I not say”.

When he handed her an envelope rather stuffed with papers, she went on her flurried way; and soon Loveday was bowing before her in his sitting-room at Priddlestone.

“You will be surprised to see me, Mr. Loveday,” said she, panting.

“A little surprised, but most awfully glad, too. Is all well?”

“Oh, far from that, I’m afraid. But I haven’t got any time — and, oh my, I don’t know how to say it, — but to be frank with you — could you lend Richard two pounds — ?”

Loveday coloured to the roots of his hair.

He could not tell her: “Open that envelope in your hand”, for that would have meant that it was he who had sent the £50 it contained; and he had now only one sixpence in Priddlestone.

“That is”, she said— “if it is not an inconvenience to you—”

He could find no words. Some fifteen minutes before, having enclosed the notes, he had descended to the bar to get mine host to find him a messenger, and direct the envelope — for Hogarth knew his handwriting. Mine host was not there — his wife could not write: but she had pointed out the Jewish park-keeper sipping beer; so Loveday had had the man upstairs, had made him write the address, and had bribed him to deliver the envelope with a mum tongue.

“I’m afraid I’ve taken a great liberty—” she said, shrinking at his silence.

Then he spoke: “Oh, liberty! — but — really — I’m quite broke myself — !”

“Then, good-afternoon to you”, said she: “I am very sorry — but you will excuse the liberty, won’t you — ?”

In the forest she began to cry, covering her eyes, moaning: “Why, how could he be so mean? And I who loved that young man with all my heart, God knows — !”

Her eyes searched the ground for two sovereigns. Then she happened to look at the envelope: and instantly was interested. “Why, it is the Jew’s hand!” she thought, for the letters were angular in the German manner, making a general similarity with Frankl’s writing.

Curiosity overcame her: she opened, and saw...

“Oh, well, this is generous though, after all!” she exclaimed.

And now she ran, coming out from mossy path upon wide forest-road: and there, taking promenade, was Frankl, quite near, with phylacteried left arm.

“Why, sweetheart...” said he.

She stopped before him. “Well, you can call me what you like for the time being”, said she, laughing rather hysterically; “for I am most grateful to you for your generous present to my brother, Mr. Frankl!”

She had still no suspicion of Richard’s visit of chastisement to the Hall!

“Now, what do you mean?” said Frankl.

“Why, you might guess that I know your handwriting by this time!” she said coquettishly, and held out the notes and the envelope.

His eyes twinkled; he meditated; he had, more than ever, need of her; and he said: “Well, you are as ‘cute as they make them!’”

“But instead of sending us this, which I am not at all sure that Richard will touch, why couldn’t you pay it to yourself, and not turn us out—”

“I let business take its course: and afterwards I do my charity. But it wasn’t for your brother, you know, that I sent it — but for you”.

“I must be running—”

When she reached the farm, she gave the carman a secret glimpse of the notes, while Hogarth, who was now there, went to seek the old Hogarth, for whom a nest had been made among the furniture in the cart.

He was found above-stairs in an empty room, searching the floor for something.

“Come, sir”, said Hogarth, and led him step by step.

But as the old man passed the threshold, he fell flat on the slabs of the porch, striking his forehead, printing a stain there.

And the next day, the day of the sale, he still lay in the old chamber, on the ancient bed, dead.

VI. "PEARSON'S WEEKLY"

"ROSE COTTAGE" WAS without roses: but had a good-sized "garden" at the back; and here Hogarth soon had a shed nailed together, with bellows, anvil, sledges, rasps, setts, drifts, and so on, making a little smithy.

He engaged a boy; and soon John Loveday would be leaning all a forenoon at the shed door, watching the lithe ply of Hogarth's hips, and the white-hot iron gushing flushes; while Margaret, peeping, could see Loveday's slovenly ease of pose, his numberless cigarettes, and hear the rhymes of the sledges chiming.

As to Loveday's £50, she had dared to say nothing to Richard, but kept them, intending to make up the amount already spent, and give them to Frankl. Loveday, meantime, she avoided with constant care.

So two weeks passed, till, one day, Loveday, leaning at the forge-door, happened to say: "Are you interested in current politics? The East Norfolk division is being contested, one of the candidates, Sir Bennett Beaumont, is a friend of mine, and I was thinking that I might go to the meeting to-night, if you could come—"

"I invite you to supper here instead".

"Not interested?" queried Loveday.

"Not at all. Stop — I'll show you something in which I am interested".

He ran to a corner, picked up a Pearson's Weekly, and pointed to a paragraph headed:

"FIVE HUNDRED-POUND NOTES!

"FIFTY TEN-POUND NOTES!!

“ONE HUNDRED FIVE-POUND NOTES!!!” — a prize for “the most intelligent” article, explaining the cause, or causes, of “the present distress and commercial crisis”.

Loveday read it smiling.

“Ah”, said he, “but who is to be the judge of ‘the most intelligent’ article? Pearson must himself be of the highest intelligence to decide”.

“True”, said Hogarth. “But the man who offered that prize has indicated to the nation the thing which it should be doing. If I was able to form an Association to enter this competition — and why not? Stop — I will go with you—”

So that evening they walked to Beccles, and took train for Yarmouth.

The candidate to speak was a Mr. Moses Max, a Liberal Jew; the chair to be taken by Baruch Frankl; and in the midst of a row, the stately great men entered upon the platform and occupied it, hisses like the escape of steam mixing with “He’s a jolly good fellow”. Midway down the pit sat Loveday, and with him Hogarth, whose large stare ranged solemnly round and down from galleries to floor.

Frankl sipped water, and rose, amid shouts of: “Circular!” “Caps-and-tassels!”

He made a speech of which nothing was known, except the amiable bows, for a continual noising filled the hall; and up rose Mr. Moses Max, a stout fair Jew, whose fist struck with a regular, heavy emphasis. After ten minutes, when he began to be heard, he was saying:

“...Sir Bennett Beaumont! Is he the sort of man you’d send to represent you? (Cries of: “Yes!”) What is he? — ask yourselves the question: a fossilized Tory, a man who’s about as much idea of progress as a mummy — people actually say he’s got a collection of mummies in his grand fashionable mansion at Aylesham, and it’s only what we should expect of him. (Cheers, and cries of: “Oh, oh!”) And what has he ever done for East Norfolk? Gentlemen, you may say as you like about Jews — Jews this, and Jews that — and every man has a right to his opinion in this land of glorious Saxon liberty — but no one can deny that it’s Jews who know how to make the money. (Cheers and hisses.) They know how to make it for themselves (hisses) — and, yes, they know how to make it for the nation! (Loud triumph of cheers.) That’s the point — that touches the spot! (Cries of: “Oh, oh!”) Righteousness, it is said, exalteth a nation: well, so do Jews—”

“That is false”, said a voice — Hogarth, who had stood up.

The words were the signal for a shower of cheers swept by gusts of hisses; and immediately one region of the pit was seen to be a scrimmage of fisticuffs, mixed with policemen, sticks, savage faces, and bent backs; while the two galleries, craning to see, bellowed like Bashan.

Moses Max was leaning wildly, gesticulating, with shouts; while Loveday, who had turned pale on Hogarth’s rising, touched Hogarth’s coat-tail, whereupon Hogarth, stooping to his ear, shouted: “We will have some fun...”

“The paid agents of Beaumont!” now shouted Moses Max; “sent to disturb our meeting! Englishmen! will you submit to this? The nation shall hear—”

At that point Moses Max, in his gesticulation, happening to touch a switch in the platform-rail, out glowered into darkness every light at that end of the hall: at which thing the audience was thrown into a state of boisterous lawlessness, a tumult reigning in the gloom like the constant voice of Niagara, until suddenly the platform was again lit up, and the uproar lulled.

And now again Moses Max was prone to speak, with lifted fist; but before ever he could utter one single word, a voice was ringing through the Assembly Rooms:

“Where was Moses when the light went out?”

This again was Hogarth; and it ended Moses Max for that night.

Hogarth had not sat since he had called out “That is false”: his tall figure was recognized; and, with that electric spontaneity of crowds, he was straightway the leader of the meeting, men darting from their seats with waving hats, sticks, arms, and vociferous mouth, the chairman half standing, with a shivering finger directed upon Hogarth, shrieking to the police: but too late — Hogarth had brushed past Loveday’s knees — was dashing for the crowded platform-steps — was picking his way, stumbling, darting up them.

Crumpled in his hand was a Pearson’s Weekly.

Now he is to the front — near Frankl.

“Friends! I have ventured to take the place of our friend, Moses, here — no ill-will to him — for with respect to the question before us, whether we elect Beaumont or Max, I care, I confess, little. I’m rather an Anti-Jew myself (hissing and cheers), but it strikes me that the Jews are the least of our trouble. To a man who said to me that the cause of all our evil days is the inability of England to feed these few million Jews I’d answer: “I don’t know how you can be so silly!” Why, the whole human race, friends, can find room on the Isle of Wight — the earth laughs at the insignificant drawings upon her made by the small infantry called Man. Then, why do we suffer, friends? We do suffer, I suppose? I was once at Paris, and at a place called ‘the Morgue’ I saw exposed young men with wounded temples, and girls with dead mouths twisted, and innocent old women drowned; and there must be a biggish cry, you know, rising each night from the universal earth, accusing some hoary fault in the way men live together! What is the fault? If you ask me, I answer that I am only a common smith: I don’t know: but I know this about the fault, that it is something simple, commonplace, yet deep-seated, or we should all see it; but it is hidden from us by its very ordinariness, like the sun which men seldom look at. It must be so. And shall we never find the time to think of it? Or will never some grand man, mighty as a garrison, owning eyes that know the glances of Truth, arise to see for us? Friends! but, lacking him, what shall we do to be saved? — for truly this ‘civilization’ of ours is a blood-washed civilization, friends, a reddish Juggernaut, you know, whose wheels cease not: so we should be prying into it, provided we be not now too hide-bound: for that’s the trouble — that our thoughts grow to revolve in stodgy grooves of use-and-wont, and shun to soar beyond. Look at our Parliament — a hurdy-gurdy turning out, age after age, a sing-song of pigmy regulations, accompanied for grum kettledrum by a musketry of suicides, and for pibroch by a European bleating of little children. We are still a million miles from civilization! For what is a civilized society? It can only be one in which the people are proud and happy! The people of Africa are happy, not proud; not civilized; the people of England have a certain pride, not a millionth part as superb as it might be, but are far from happy: far from civilized. The fact is, Man has never begun to live, but still sleeps a deep sleep. Well! let us do our best, we here! I have here a paper offering a prize to the man of us who will go to the root of our troubles, and my idea in usurping the place of our friend, Mr. Max, was to ask you to form an association with me to enter that competition. There is no reason why our association should not be large as the nation, nor why it should not spread to France and Turkey. For the thing presses, and to-morrow more of the slaughtered dead will be swarming in the mortuaries of London. Will you, then? The understanding will be this: that each man who writes his name in a note-book which will lie at Rose Cottage, Thring, or who sends his name, will devote sixty minutes each day to the problem. I happen to be in a position to use a chapel at Thring, and there I will hold a meeting—”

At this point Frankl rose: Thring was his, his own, own, own; and now his eyes had in them that catlike blaze which characterized his rages.

“Here, police! police!” he hissed low, “what’s the use of police that don’t act!” And now he raised his voice to a scream: “Jews! Shew yourselves! Don’t let this man stay here...!”

About twenty Jews leapt at the challenge; at the same time Hogarth, seeing two policemen running forward from the back, folded his arms, and cried out: “Friends! I have not finished! Don’t let me be removed...”

Whereupon practically every man in the pit was in motion, for or against him, the galleries two oblongs of battle.

As up the two curving stairs stormed the mob, by a sudden rush like an ocean-current he was borne off his feet toward the side, and was about to bring down his sharp-pointed little knuckles, when his eye fell upon the face of a lady who had fainted.

He had had no idea that she was there! — Rebekah Frankl.

She had quietly fainted, not at the rush — but before — during Hogarth’s speech.

Hogarth managed to fight his way to a door at the platform back with her, entered a room where some chairs were, but, seeing a stair, could not let her go from his embrace, but descended, passed along a passage and out into a patch of green.

She, under the dark sky, whispered: “It is you”, her forehead on his shoulder; and added: “My carriage, I think, is yonder”.

Hogarth saw the carriage-lights at the field’s edge, bore her thither, laid her with care on the cushions, kissed her hand: and this act Frankl saw — with incredulity of his own eyes. As he approached, Hogarth walked away.

Frankl mastered his voice to say blandly in Spanish: “Well, how did you get through, sweet child? Who was that man — ? But stay: where are those two fools?”

This meant the two familiars — the Arabs, Isaac and Mephibosheth, one of whom had come as footman, the other as coachman — and, as he went raging about the carriage, with stamps, his boot struck against a body. There was enough light to reveal to his peering that it was Mephibosheth, whom Isaac had stabbed, and fled...

Frankl lowered his ear — doubted whether he could detect a breathing; and though scared, he being a Cohen, and the presence of death defilement, yet he stayed, bending over Mephi several minutes, thinking, not of him, but of Hogarth.

“It is that fool, Isaac, has done it”, he thought; “and if the man be dead —” What then? “If he be dead, I’ve got you, Mr. Hogarth, in the hollow of this hand....”

His fingers passed over the body: there, sticking in the breast, was a cangiar which Isaac, in his panic, had left, and Frankl’s hand rested on the handle; if he did not consciously press the knife home, very heavily his hand rested on it, eyes blazing, beard shaking....

Then he drew out the knife carefully, to hide it in the carriage, listened again close, felt sure now that death was there, and now scuttled, as if from plague, guiltily hissing: “Putrid dog...!”

Presently he led his carriage to the station, and made a deposition of the murder.

Asked if he had any suspicion as to the culprit, he said: “Not the least: I left the man alone with the carriage, and who could have had any motive for killing him beats me.”

VII. THE ELM

HOGARTH, MEANTIME, HAD made his way to the front of the room, then vomiting its throng, discovered Loveday, and, deciding to walk home, they were soon on the cliffs.

And suddenly Loveday: “To-morrow will conclude my fifth week in Westring. What, do you suppose, has made me stay?”

“I have wondered”.

“I work better here...Hogarth, you inspirit me”.

“Is that so?”

“It is, yes. Merely your presence is for me a freshness and an enthusiasm: I catch in the turn of your body hints of adventurous Columbuses, Drakes, nimble Achilles; and sibylline meanings in some glance of yours infect my fancy with images of Moses, blind old Homers — prophet, lawgiver, poet—”

They were passing along a stretch of sand, with some lights of Lowestoft in sight, arm in arm; and Hogarth said: “Well, you speak some big words. But my life, you understand, has been as simple and small as possible. I will tell you: my father sent me to an extraordinary school — where he got the coin I could never find out — Lancing College at Shoreham. There I did very well — only that I was continually getting it! What was the matter with me when a boy I can’t understand: I was the devil. One summer vacation (I was fourteen) I stole three pounds from the old man, and ran away one Sunday night. Passed through London and soon was apprentice in a blacksmith’s shop in a Kent village called Bigham. But in six months I had the forge at my fingers' ends, and was off: nothing could hold me long. One day I turned up before the Recruiting Office of Marines in Bristol — just of the right age for what they call 'second-class boys' — and decided upon the sea — that sea there — which, from the moment I saw it at the age of four, caused me a swelling of the breast with which, to this day, it afflicts me. Well, I got the birth-certificate of another boy, scraped through, was entered into a District Ship, and finally sailed in the St. Vincent to the Pacific Station.

“However, my trial of His Majesty's ships was not a success: twice I was in irons, once leapt into mid-ocean; nor could the battleship hold me when she had nothing to teach me; so I did to the King what I had done to the old man — cut and ran.

“It was at Valparaiso, and I made my way across the continent to Buenos Ayres.

“I forget now what took me to Bristol: but there I was one day when I happened to see — what do you think? — a girl — sixteen — I a stripling of nineteen, or so — but she most precocious, spoke like a woman — a grating in a wall between us. Ah, well, God is good, and His Mercy endureth for ever. But she said it could never be — she a Jewess: though that, by the way, is nonsense, for she is a Jewess, and a Parisienne, and a Hindoo, and a Negress, and a Japanese, and the man who marries her will have a harem. My friend, I have seen her this very night!”

He was silent. Suddenly he broke out: “I came home raving! The old man was scared out of his wits by my frenzy — I drank like ten men — in a month was the terror of Westring. One midnight, going home through the beech-wood — I don't know if you have noticed a hollow elm-tree which stands to the right of the path?”

“I think I have”, said Loveday.

“We shall pass near it presently; and at the moment when we approach it, I shall feel a little thrill in my back: always it is so with me. But I was saying: that midnight, as I passed the tree, drunk as I was, I saw a naked black man with a long beard run out; I took to my heels; he was after me; till I reached the bridge, when I stopped, faced him, fired a blow into his eyes, and he vanished.

“During the week I continued to see apparitions. My groans were heard in the farm-yard: Lord have mercy upon me! Christ have mercy upon me! I was visited by the Methodist preacher at Thring; and finally I found solace: I became a class-member, a leader, a local preacher.

“For some time I have been conscious of dissatisfaction among the people with my preaching, who say that my God ’is not a personal God’, and that my Christianity is ‘rum stuff’: I am therefore meaning to give it up. But I still preach every second Thursday night.

“It was about that time that, by accident, I found out the power of my hand to cure headache, and things like that, and the sensation among these villagers was enormous, I can tell you, six years ago; now they come to be touched without the slightest sense of the unusual. But what I have done well in was — the farming. I knew little of agriculture—”

At this point they turned into the lane to Westring: and Loveday went with him a little beyond Priddlestone to see the fatal elm.

VIII. THE METEOR

THE NEXT MORNING, after breakfast, Hogarth went down old Thring Street, and spent a penny for a note-book to contain the signatures of his association.

But this was no day for interest in that scheme: for under the projecting first-floor of the paper-shop were newspaper placards bearing such words as:

THE EARTH IN DANGER
SHALL WE PERISH TO-NIGHT?

and Hogarth was soon bending in the street over a paragraph, short — but in pica.

M. Tissot, the astronomer, had, at half-past ten the previous night, observed through the 40-inch telescope of the Nice observatory a body which seemed a tiny planet or aerolite of abnormal size. It was sighted at a point two degrees W. of α Librae at an angle of $43\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ with the horizon, and had been photographed, its elements calculated, its spectrum taken. The ascertained diameter was $3^{\circ} 17''$, or about 73 miles, and its substance seemed to consist of ironstone mixed with diamond.

By noon a fresh light was thrown upon the little world, the Yerkes observatory and Greenwich both uttering their voice, the Astronomer Royal announcing that the so-called planet was merely a meteor — not more than 400 yards in diameter, with a low velocity of two miles a second; and its distance was less than a tenth of that estimated by Tissot. The Yerkes observatory fixed the diameter at 230 yards. All, however, agreed in the opinion that it must strike the earth between ten and twelve that night.

These later announcements so much allayed the panic, that by one o'clock Hogarth, on peeping into the note-book on the box before the smithy, saw six signatures; and a young man who came about six P.M. to sign, cried out: "Hullo! the book is filled up!" on which Hogarth ran out, saying: "Don't run away on that account, I'll run and get—" darting into the house to ask Margaret where a certain account-book was.

"Didn't I throw it into the box of rubbish in the cellar at Lagden, when we were leaving?" she asked; on which he threw off his apron, and was off toward Lagden Dip to get it.

He had almost cleared the village when he was blocked by a crowd before a cottage, from out of which were coming screams — a woman's; and he ran in, found a man named Fred Bates beating his wife, planted a blow on his chest.

The next morning the wife of Bates was found dead, greatly disfigured about the face, whereupon Bates was arrested, and Hogarth, as we shall see, was subpoenaed to give evidence of the beating.

In ten minutes he was at the old farm-house of the Hogarths.

The new tenant was a Mr. Bond, a bankrupt metal-broker, who had two hobbies — farming and astronomy; and, as Hogarth approached the yard-gate, he saw Mr. Bond, his two daughters, his servants, grouped round an optic tube mounted on a tripod. He asked permission to get the account-book, got it, in a few minutes was again passing through, and, as he went by, bowing his thanks, Mr. Bond said: "But — have you seen the asteroid?"

"No — whereabouts?"

"Not quite visible to the naked eye yet: but come — you shall see".

He himself looked through, fixing the sight, turning the adjuster; then with fussy suddenness: “Now, sir—”

Hogarth put an eager eye to the glass.

“You see her?” said Mr. Bond, rubbing his soft old palms; “straight for us she comes — in a considerable hurry by this time, I can tell you! and if she happens to break up in the air, then, pray, sir, that a splinter of her may fall into your back yard — not too big a one! but a nice little comfortable piece” — he rubbed his palms— “for you know, no doubt, of what her substance is composed? Diamond, sir, in extraordinary evidence! in conjunction with specular iron ore, commonly called the red haematite, and the ferrous carbonate, or spathic iron. You see her, sir? you see her?”

Hogarth whispered: “Yes”.

There, fairest among ten thousand, sailing the high seas she came; and longer than was modest he stopped there, gazing, then ran, wondering at her daisy loveliness, not dreaming that between himself and her was — a relation.

She broke up with a European display soon after eleven that night over the North Sea.

IX. HOGARTH'S GUNS

AT THE MOMENT when Hogarth was peering through the telescope, a man was loitering before his cottage — one of the Hall's park-keepers; and when Margaret put out her head to look for Richard's coming, the man whistled.

In a moment a note was in her hand.

"DEAR MISS HOGARTH,

"This is to ask you to be certain sure to meet me this evening at 9 P.M. on the towpath. It isn't to-day that you are well aware of the state of my feelings toward you: but it is not to talk sweethearting that I wish to see you now, but about your brother, and the matter is about as important as can be. If I were in your place, I should destroy this letter.

"Yours, with my respects,

"BARUCH FRANKL".

Margaret tore it up, and "My goodness!" she thought, "what is anyone to do? If I only had the money to make up those fifty pounds! May the Holy Spirit guide me now...!"

Later in the evening she stole out, and met Frankl.

He assumed a very respectful tone.

"Miss Hogarth", said he at once, "have you heard?"

"No, sir".

"You have not been told that your brother has been to the Hall?"

"What in patience for?"

"He came — you couldn't believe — to beat me!"

"Richard! I don't understand. When?"

“Yesterday”. (In reality it was four weeks before.)

“But what about?”

“Revenge! Blind, murderous revenge for turning him neck and crop out of Lagden!”

“You are in a temper! But I can’t understand a word of it!”

“Well, that is what I had to tell you. He came to my house — And how good have I been to this man! Didn’t I send him the fifty pounds — ?”

“Well, that was kind. But I must tell you, Mr. Frankl, that Richard knows nothing of the fifty pounds—”

“Well, then it is your fault! Oh, he did not know of the fifty pounds? Then it is your fault entirely, this rage of his against me — He threatened to shoot me dead — thrice he threatened — soon, he said—”

“Not Richard?”

“Yes, Richard! — your nice Richard! But what did I want you for tonight? It was to let you see that I have it in my power to let your brother in for three months hard — not less. But you know, my dear, don’t you, that I wouldn’t do anything to give you pain? That is why, so far, I’ve taken no steps. But your brother must be unarmed. I can’t have my life exposed, after his threats, and all”.

“Unarmed....”

“Yes. I have it on good authority that your brother has guns. I must have those guns put into my own hands by you...”

“But I couldn’t! He would find out...”

“Then I must act, that’s all. Or no — I give you another chance — tell him of the fifty pounds I sent — that may disarm him in another way—”

He was sure that this she would not now do, yet felt relieved when she cried out: “I couldn’t! Not now! Can’t you see?”

“Well, there is nothing to be done, then. I must act, that’s all”.

“But don’t be hard! What can I do? Sooner or later he’d be sure to miss them!”

“Poh! he is not always shooting, I suppose? And after a few weeks I’d give them back. Anyway, think it over: and I’ll be here on Tuesday night next at nine to receive them. Good night—”

She looked palely after him, her feet in a net, new to her, woven of concealments and deceit.

At eleven that night she was sitting in their diminutive parlour, — Hogarth at a table inscribing the association’s names received by post that evening; and at last, bending low over her sewing, she said: “Richard, is it true you have been to the Hall?”

He started! “Yes. Who told you?”

“I heard it”.

He looked at her piercingly. “Answer!”

“I heard it”, she said with a stubborn nod, quite pallid.

He turned upon her a stare of displeasure; but in that second they heard a shouting down the village, ran to the front, and saw heaven all like cancer and cracked window-panes, for from a central splash of passion the shattered asteroid had shot long-lingering ribbons of lilac light over the bowl of the sky.

X. ISAAC

ON THE TUESDAY was the inquest on the murdered Mephibosheth; ending in a verdict of wilful murder against some person unknown.

The same night at nine Frankl had Hogarth's two guns from Margaret on the towing-path, she now well inveigled into his net, and under his commands.

"I want you", he said, "to meet me-here again on Thursday night, at 7.30".

"But you will tell one why, I suppose!"

"When you come you will hear. And don't let anything keep you away — not anything, mind — if you take my hint".

She left him with her head hung, praying for deliverance, but consenting.

The next (Wednesday) morning Frankl was in a high room of the Hall, in a corner of which cowered the Arab, Isaac, and he said in his strong bass in Arabic: "Well, Isaac, well".

A groan broke from the obese heap of grief; down each side of his kefie streamed waves of trembling; on his square-cut beard of ritual flecks of foam.

"Isaac, why did you kill Mephibosheth?"

Vigorously sputtered Isaac, spitting out the ill-omened words. He said: "Your servant did not kill Mephibosheth".

"Well, there was an inquest to-day, the Court decided that you did, and has sentenced you to be hanged by the neck like a dog".

The Arab sprang up, his thick bluish under-lip shivering.

“An eye for an eye”, said Frankl solemnly: “it is written in the Torah”.

“Mercy My father served your father—”

“I have remembered that: that is why I have saved you from hanging like a dog at the hands of these Goyim vermin: but, Isaac, you must die—”

“God of — !”

“You dare raise your voice! Blood for blood—”

“Mercy! — I did not mean to kill — !”

“Blood for blood, you dog! Raise it, and I fell you! Raise it, and the noose sinks into your fat swine’s-throat! Can’t you understand? — you have been tracked by the avengers of blood! and you may swing lingeringly, with a crowd of Christian boys and girls mocking round you, or you may shoot yourself in one painless flash. Which shall it be?”

Isaac, again dropping a-heap, covered his face, without answer.

“Well”, said Frankl, walking away, “I can’t wait all day. The detectives are at this moment downstairs—”

Now the Arab leapt up, and, in a movement of great dignity, with an out-rush of both arms, rent his caftan from the top to its muslin girdle.

“I will shoot myself”, he said quietly.

Frankl took snuff.

The same night he took his secretary’s typewriter, and spelled out the following note:

“SIR,

“Permit me to ask you as an old friend of your father’s if you are aware that your sister Margaret is the lover of the lord of the manor? Everybody seems to see it, but yourself. I have reason to know that the very day you receive this she will be meeting him at about 7.30 P.M. under the old elm in the beech-wood near the Hall-park.

“ONE WHO SHALL BE NAMELESS”.

Hogarth received it by post the next morning.

He had to think, as he worked, of something to say at the service that night on the text: “God’s way is in the Sea”, but the glare of forge and heated metal swam vaguely, a fog of red, about his consciousness. And mixed with those recurring words: “the old elm”, “God’s way”, something with a voice shouted inside him — a name — Margaret! Anon his face flushed to a dusky turbulence, and he hurled the sledge high to shatter the earth, like Thor.

Suddenly he had the thought that he would clean his rifle, and, dropping a hot iron which vanished with a stifled cry into black water, he tossed his tongs clattering, and almost ran toward the cottage.

He had not, however, reached the back door when he heard his name called from behind.

And now happened to him the most momentous event of his life — though nothing could have seemed more commonplace.

It was an old fellow named Tom Bates who had called him — father to that Fred arrested for the murder of his wife — a Yarmouth fisher and herring-curer.

And when Hogarth twisted round, with that stare of his large and bloodshot eye, “Here”, said the old man, “take them” — holding out a basket of herrings.

Hogarth seemed not to understand, but then said: “All those for me?”

“Every bloomin’ one!” answered Bates, with the dropped jaw of pantomime, and a far-away look of blue astonishment which he had.

“It is extremely handsome of you. Can you spare all that — ?”

“Spare, ya’as! They’re easy enough come by, for that matter. Why, the day’s work of a fisherman gives him enough fish to live on all the week, and he could lie around idling the other six days, if he chose, only anybody can't live on nothing but fish “.

These words, destined to produce a horror of great darkness, and a cup of trembling of which all the nations should drink, hardly affected Hogarth at the time. He did, indeed, shoot an interested glance at the old man, but the next moment his mind, numb that morning, was left dark.

“Here — take them — they are yours”, said Bates. “But with regard to that God-forsaken son of mine: you'll be givin' evidence agen him, I'm told —”

When his sleeve wiped a tear, Hogarth promised to make his evidence mild, and was left alone.

Now his purpose of cleaning the rifle was turned: he went back to the forge, and worked till Margaret, at one o'clock, called: “The dinner is on the table”.

At that table, for a long time, silence reigned, Margaret's eyes fixed on his face, his on his plate.

Toward the end he said: “Are you going to chapel to-night?”

Her bosom heaved; she cleared her throat: she had to meet Frankl by the towing-path.

“I don't think I shall...”

Margaret!

“Why not?”

“I have something to do”.

“What?”

Silence.

“What?”

“Something” — with a stubborn nod, and pallor— “if I tell you something that should be enough”.

“You will go to chapel to-night”.

“That I shan’t”.

“Yes”

Silence.

A little before seven they left the cottage together for the chapel, Hogarth taking his hunting-crop — from habit; he had also a little Bible; in his jacket, tight at the slight waist, unbuttoned at the breast, lay the anonymous letter, and a little poetry-book, neither moon nor star lighting the night, bleak winds swooping like the typhoon among the year’s dead leaves.

The chapel was a paltry place, though in the wall to the right of the preacher was a slab bearing the inscription:

ON THIS STONE
JOHN WESLEY PREACHED IN THE VILLAGE, ON THE 9TH JULY 1768

And they sang a hymn; Hogarth “prayed”; read a chapter; once more the harmonium mourned; Hogarth gave the text: “God’s way is in the sea...”

Even as he uttered it, he happened to glance toward the “mission-pew” — a square pew rather behind the pulpit: Margaret no longer there.

A paleness as of very death — then a dreadful wrath reddened his dark face.

He seized his hunting-crop; and, without a word, sped bent and thievish down the steps — and was gone.

Upon which Loveday in a middle pew, perceiving here something sinister, like a still wind flew to a back door, before ever the amazement of the people had given place to a flutter like leafage; and running fast, he came up with Hogarth by a stile twenty yards behind the chapel, touched his shoulder.

“To the devil with you...!” shouted Hogarth, running still, and there Loveday stood.

Margaret, meantime, was hurrying toward the towing-path, while Richard, in a direction at right angles to hers, was pelting toward that spot terrible to him — the elm.

At the moment when he entered the deep darkness of the beeches, he heard what sounded like a pistol-shot, rain now falling drop by drop, and through the forest with an uplifting whoop, like batsmen, swooped the tomboy winds.

Now, approaching the elm, again he felt that thrill which the spot had for him, and came peering, at slower pace: no sound but the gibbering rout of the stiff-stark beech-leaves. Some steps more, and now he was at the mound which surrounds the tree: stood, listened: silence, sightlessness: Margaret not there.

One more forward step: and now his foot struck a body.

As he stooped, his hand touched a revolver — which was his own; another moment, and he saw running lanterns borne by two park-keepers, and by their light saw the body of Isaac, who but now had shot himself with the weapon that was in Hogarth’s hand.

The park-keepers had just been urged by their master to the spot, he having, he told them, heard a pistol-shot; and before anyone could speak Frankl himself was there, defiled with the presence of the dead.

He looked from Hogarth to the corpse, and from the corpse to Hogarth, then, snatching the weapon from Hogarth’s hand, exclaimed: “Why, bless my heart, you’ve murdered the man....”

XI. WROXHAM BROAD

IN A COTTAGE in Thring Street, marked “E. Norfolk, E. 58, Constabulary”, Hogarth passed the night, having been arrested the moment he returned home from the elm.

A few minutes afterwards Margaret, who had found no Frankl at the towing-path, came home to the ghastliest amazement throughout Thring, so that sleep overcame the village only toward morning.

At 7.30 A.M. Hogarth was marched to Beccles, then after an inquest-verdict appeared before the magistrates’ court, and was committed.

One of the witnesses in the summary-jurisdiction court had been Loveday, who had deposed that Hogarth, on leaving the chapel, was, beyond doubt, in a passion; and mixed with the crowd was Margaret, who, standing thickly veiled, heard that evidence. And thought she: “Is it possible that he can be giving evidence against Richard like that? And smiling, the mean, false thing—”

She had disappeared on the morning after the arrest: and Loveday was now racked by disquiet, wondering how she was living, though she and he were in the same train, unconscious of each other, when he followed Hogarth to Norwich; and, as Margaret stepped upon the Thorpe platform there, a Jew, who was watching the arrival of every train, spied and shadowed her to the old Maid’s Head, this intricate city being now crowded, the Assizes all in the air, mixed with the Saturday cattle-market.

At ten the next morning Margaret learned at the Guildhall the address of her brother’s defending solicitor, and set out to find him, the wretchedest woman on earth now.

But as she passed by the archway in the tower of St. Peter Mancroft, Loveday stood before her; and she started like a shying horse.

“Good morning” — she went on past him.

He took two steps after her. “Are you in a hurry? Can I come with you?”

“It is quite near. Thank you — I’d liefer go alone”.

He, a delicate being, all nerves, was repelled; lifted the old cloth hat; but then again stepped after her, saying: “But are you angry with me for something?”

“Why should I be? I have no right to expect anything from you, Mr. Loveday”.

“No right? You have, a little, I fancy!”

He said it at her ear with such a lowering of the eyelids, that it pierced to her fond heart, and she smiled with a “H’m!” uncertain, half turned to him; but said: “I must be getting on—”

“But it is most important that I should talk to you about everything. Where are you staying?”

“It is some distance from here”, she answered, undecided whether or not to give her address.

“Ah — in that case — but still — will you meet me? Say here — this evening?”

“I will see if I can”.

“At seven?”

“I will see”.

So they parted, she to tread that intricacy of streets round the Market, with stoppages for enquiries, till she found the office, where she presently sat in an inner room, veil at nose-tip, and before her at a grate stood Hogarth’s solicitor.

What, till now, for shame, she had concealed, she revealed: showing how Richard could not possibly have taken the revolver with him to the elm, since she, two days previously, had secretly given it to — someone.

Mr. Carr, the solicitor, frowned, elaborating his nails.

“This is very extraordinary”, he said. “Whyever did you keep us in the dark as to all this before? And to whom was it that you gave the revolver? and why?”

“Am I bound to tell that?”

“No, but you may be sure that the truth will be got from you. Stay — I must ask you to excuse me now. But tomorrow morning at this hour — will you? As for your brother, have no fears at all: he is now absolutely safe”.

Margaret went rapidly away, not knowing whither, only returning toward late afternoon to her inn. As she entered, a letter was handed her from Frankl.

“Dear Miss Hogarth:

“It is only due to you that I should see you at once to explain the mystery of this affair, so as to clear your brother, and as it would not do for me to call upon you for obvious reasons, the only thing for us to do is to meet to-night on Mousehold Heath at 7 P.M. without fail...”

What now was she to do? At “7 P.M.” she had half promised Loveday to meet him.

And what had her meetings with Baruch Frankl, innocent as they were, brought upon her and hers!

Yet Frankl must be kindly intentioned, she reasoned — since he had sent them the £50; and she thought of that agony of humiliation when she had asked Loveday for £2, and he had refused.

And he had given evidence against Richard with his down-turned smile.

But he had said a word at her ear — and her crushed heart had leapt. She did not know what to do, fell by her bedside and prayed to be taught which of the two was Richard's best friend.

As she passed over the inn-threshold, she decided in favour of Frankl: and a few minutes past seven was on Mousehold Heath.

Frankl hurried to meet her, and the hand which he held out was rather cold; but she did not take it.

"No, Mr. Frankl", said she, "before I give my hand, it is only what is due to me to hear how Richard's pistol, which I trusted to you, was found where it was—"

"Well, that is only fair", answered Frankl; "that is only fair. But I have a carriage there, let us get into it, and sit as we talk".

She could see no carriage in that dark, yet it stood only some yards away — Frankl's own.

"I think I prefer to stand..." said she.

"As you like. But with regard to the gun, I should have thought that you could have guessed how it was — but no, you always mistrust me instead — the Jew. Don't you know that the dead man was a servant in my house? Well, I left the two guns in my study, and he, wanting to shoot himself, stole one, that's all".

"It was he shot himself?"

"Why, who else? You don't suppose Richard shot him! You are as cool as they make them".

"Well, that was how it was! But couldn't you say that at the police-court — ?"

"I am going to at the big trial, of course. But I was ill, am ill now, and here have I been running about all day on your brother's behalf, and dead tired — and ill, and all — and you won't let me have a rest in the carriage —”

“Well, as you put it in that way...” she said.

So they walked to a motor-brougham, sat within, and as they commenced to talk again, the brougham moved.

“Tell me”, said Frankl, “have you mentioned to anyone that you had given the guns to me?”

“I told Richard's solicitor this morning—”

“That was horribly imprudent, without consulting me!”

“I think I have been silent long enough, don't you? I didn't mention your name, but—”

“Oh, you didn't mention my name! That's all right, then! Look here, do you know — ?”

“Well?”

“I believe you love me in your heart. Can't help yourself”.

“Oh, Mr. Frankl, do I look as if I was in the mood for that kind of fun tonight, a poor wretch like me, steeped in misery, my God knows”.

“I love you!”

He suddenly grasped her wrist, his eyes blazing.

“Stop — let me get out of this—” she said.

“Wait! — I give you your chance! — Listen: I am not a man whose mind you can read right off like a book, I twist like an eel, I am deep, I am tricky, and I never yet met the man that I didn't hoodwink. Ninety-nine per cent of what I say is a lie; even when it is the truth, it is a lie just the same. But at this particular moment I am talking the God's truth: I want you! You shall be my little girl! Chuck Richard! — chuck the swine's-flesh! — I'll take you right away — to Paris — this very night—”

She had arisen, alarmed by his hissed fury. “But, you are stark, staring, raving mad”, she said proudly, “that is what you are”.

Frankl struck the side of the brougham, it flew, and Margaret tottered backward with an exclamation. The next moment she sent forth a scream, the grip of Frankl on her wrist agonizing her bones.

“Where are we going?” she cried out.

“I gave you your chance!” was Frankl’s fierce answer.

“Let me get out! — you must be a wretch — to take advantage—”

He put his mouth to her ear till it touched. “Your nice Richard flogged me like a dog! I felt the cuts to the marrow of my damned soul! Now I’ve got him in the hollow of this hand! Why, you helped me! you helped me! That’s good! And I’ve got you, too”.

Blackness and swiftness bound her; a dizziness overcame her. Soon they were by a great pool of gloomy water — Wroxham Broad — where heron, wild duck, and the mast of the darkling boat brooded among bulrush; and now in three minutes more the brougham was sweeping over the lawn of a lonely building, surrounded by walls.

She, peering, saw with joy both lights and a well-dressed man and woman; and, as the carriage stopped, she sprang out with alacrity, Frankl with her, still grasping her wrist.

“Sir”, she blurted out at once, “you will help me, I know. I am a poor unfortunate woman — my name is Margaret Hogarth—”

“We know!” said the gentleman, and, approaching Frankl’s ear, asked in Yiddish: “How long has she had her delusion?”

“Only about a week, I think. She may be violent at first, but—”

“Come in, Miss — Hogarth”, said the gentleman.

Margaret passed the threshold; the doors closed upon her...

XII. THE ROSE

ON THE THIRD morning of his confinement in Norwich, Hogarth was hurried into the hall of justice and the witness-box — in the dock Fred Bates.

Bates had denied — with sufficient impudence, it seemed: for his wife had been found dead, battered and burned about the face, Bates' own hand also burned by the poker with which, red-hot, he was presumed to have beaten her.

The same afternoon Bates was sentenced to death: but, having had sunstroke in Egypt, was afterwards reprieved.

And two mornings later Hogarth heard the bar of the prisoner's dock clang behind himself.

The speech of leading counsel for the Crown was short: a letter, found on the prisoner, would be produced, in which some busybody had falsely informed the prisoner that Mr. Frankl would meet his sister under a certain elm-tree: and the prisoner, in a crisis of passion, had hurried from the pulpit to that tree, on observing that his sister had left the chapel (to keep a real appointment with Mr. Frankl elsewhere). Under that tree the prisoner had encountered the murdered man, whose Oriental dress on a dark night would give him a resemblance to Mr. Frankl, himself a Jew. The prisoner had then shot the deceased, mistaking him for Mr. Frankl, and had been found holding the smoking weapon, which he admitted to be his own. It was a painful case; but the chain of inference was not assailable.

“Not assailable” found an echo in the minds of solicitor and counsel for Hogarth, who with growing anxiety were awaiting the coming of Margaret with her story of the weapons. Margaret was where her name was changed to Rachel.

Now was the r  gime of examining counsel for the prosecution. The usher called: “Baruch Frankl!”

A voice in the gallery shouted: “Caps and tassels!” while Frankl, in the witness box, bowed largely to both bench and bar. He put his palms on the red-hot rail, caught them up, put them again, caught up, put them; and still he bowed, while a trembling of the chin gave to his beard a downward waving.

“Now explain to the court the reasons for the state of the prisoner’s feelings toward you”.

“For one thing I had turned him out, because he could not pay his rent; for another, his sister was inclined, my lord, to be a little bit weak on my account—”

“A little bit what?” asked his lordship.

“Just a little bit weak, my lord”.

“A reciprocal weakness?”

“Well, my lord, you know the world — so do the gentlemen of the jury —”

“And of the Jewry!” screamed his lordship, amid laughter from the merry wigs.

As Frankl stepped down, a name was called at which Hogarth went cold as a ghost: “Rebekah Frankl”.

And in she stepped splendent, to stand like a Nubian woman, with that retreat of the hips, her ears torn with their load of gold, her throat and breast ablaze, she bringing into that English court the gaudy heat of the Orient, Baal and Astarte, orgies of Hindoo women in temples of Parvati, the pallid passion of Bacchantes. Though not tall, she was lofty, and her ebon eyes had that very royalty of the stare of the bent form in the dock, whose heart throbbed quick like paddle-wheels that thrash the sea, she his wild divinity, wild wife of his wild youth....

At her shocking beauty the Court stood hushed.

She suggested the East: but in her speech was the energy of the West — sharp — a bass almost like her father's.

“You recognize the prisoner?”

“Yes”. She smiled.

“You were present on the day of the 11th November when the prisoner entered your father's house, and attempted to strike him?”

“Did strike him”.

“He did?”

“Yes”.

“Did he seem in a passion?”

“Seemed severe”.

“Severe! But was he not highly excited?”

“He did not seem so. Frowned and flogged”.

“By whom was he ejected?”

“Went of his own accord”.

“But — try to remember. What made him go?”

“He suddenly saw me, and fled”.

Laughter droned through the court, in which she naïvely joined, while Hogarth's eyes and hers met one instant, blazed outrageously, and dropped....

That was all. Counsel bowed.

The day grew toward evening, and still the stuffy Court sat.

But Margaret Hogarth did not come; a defending counsel finished examination, counsel on the other side again addressed the Court, and again defending counsel. The judge then held the scales, the jury trooped away, the crowd buzzed.

The light in the room seemed to brood to a denser yellow, and anon to grow dim; the stuffed court festered; voices spoke, but low. The King of Terrors was here.

When the jury came, the judge was called, Hogarth stood up, and the clerk of arraigns put a question to the foreman.

The foreman said: "We find the prisoner guilty: but beg to recommend him to the mercy of the Crown".

"On what grounds?" asked his lordship.

"On the grounds of past good conduct and strong provocation".

The judge then placed on his head a square of velvet and passed the sentence of the Court.

During the reign of stillness that followed, while the court clock's ticking was still loud, something which was thrown struck Hogarth on the arm, a red rose, black at heart, that had lain on the breast of Rebekah, who, when Hogarth looked round at her, was calmly drawing her mass of cloak about her throat.

XIII. OUT OF THE WORLD

A WEEK LATER a governor and a chaplain together entered Hogarth's cell with news of his reprieve.

Eight months later he was being trundled in "Black Maria" to Paddington Station amid a Babel of escaped tongues, when, sitting in his pigeonhole, he heard the unknown voice before him cry: "Well, Jim, we're away to the mountain's brow!"

Jim, nothing but a voice, was heard: "Worse luck! I knows Colmoor, and I knows the Scrubs, and I knows Portland; and of the five I say — give me Jedwood. Who's the guy in front o' you?"

"Hi, you in front there, who are yer?" cried the first, pounding.

He was answered by a deep voice, which said:

"I AM WHO I AM".

"All right, keep yer 'air on, if you've any left! It's the Lawd Chief Justice, mate! 'E says 'e's 'oo 'e are!"

"Old on! I knows who it is: it's that new-comer, 33. They say he was once a priest—"

But now speech was swallowed up in hubbub, as the van ran battering down a rough street near the station.

Then again Hogarth was whirled into night and space, and, toward morning, after the bumping climb of a van, was bidden to alight on moorland, where he spied, far off, set on a hill, a mighty palace of Romance, all grim, aloof, which was Colmoor.

The next morning while the outdoor gangs were being searched on parade before the exit, Hogarth saw a face which he knew; and “You, Bates”, he said, “I thought you were in Eternity!”

But no: there stood Bates, all capped and arrowed, cropped and neat, not wearing the filthy old scarf of liberty any more.

The neighbor of Hogarth now was a stout man, with black hair, and grey eyes.

He it was who had been — a priest: and in “Black Maria” had given that answer: “I am who I am”.

XIV. THE PRIEST

A YEAR PASSED, during which John Loveday exhausted the resources of civilization, (1)in seeking Margaret, and (2)in investigating the innocence of Richard.

He had, however, a sprightly, adventurous nerve in the mind, and would pull his velvet sleeves busily up — such was his little way. He began to plot.

About the same time the ex-priest, in that far-off world of Colmoor, said one day to Hogarth: “You won’t be here long!”

“You jest,” Hogarth answered; “if I had the chance of escape, I should never take it. I am here by due legal process”.

“Tut, if I say that you will escape, it is not because I am a prophet, but a man of the world, and know what happens in it”.

Converse with this deep, world-wise, and fluent man had now become to Hogarth like manna, or rather a vice, like opium: for in those grey eyes of the cleric was hinted anon the baleful glint of the cobra’s.

That day, a Saturday, outdoor gangs were recalled early, to “clean up” for Sunday, and out across the heath rang the great bell, Colmoor being famous for its bell, its tone and great size, larger than even the eight-ton “Mighty Tom” of Christ Church, for though its thickness was only six inches, it weighed, bell and clapper, ten tons, and was seven feet high and seven in diameter.

A busy Saturday afternoon ensued, and whatsoever Hogarth’s hand found to do he did it with his might, though his face now seemed all eyes — brown, bloodshot, imperially large, morbidly staring.

He was giving the finishing touches of order to his wooden spoon and salt-cellar, his tin knife, plate, and pint cup for gruel, when a Warder Jennings peeped in with, “No. 76 — you are to follow the assistant warder at once”, and Hogarth descended to an ante-room where an official handed him a letter, which had been read and initialed by governor and chaplain.

An event! — a letter in Colmoor, like a shark’s fin on the voyages of old sailing ships.

It was from Loveday, and concluded with a reference to Hogarth’s “poor old grandmother”.

So Hogarth, who had no “grandmother”, propped his forehead to ponder that thing; and presently said: “Oh, it is a cypher”.

And by noting little peculiarities in the shapes of the letters, a double cross to a t, a q like a g, etc., he soon had “flemecops-leftquary” — which he took to mean: “flee to me in the copse to the left of the quarry”.

He smiled with tenderness at the dear heart planning and daring so very much for him. But in his smile was a touch of disdain also, he not intending to “flee”.

XV. MONSIGNOR

HOGARTH'S FIRST THOUGHT, as getting-up bell clattered r  veille through the gallery, was of Loveday's cypher, and by the time the warder came to ask if he would see governor or doctor, a thought of Monsignor O'Hara had somehow mixed itself with the thought of the cypher; when an orderly handed in the day's brown loaf, he was thinking, "Strange that he never told me what he has done"; eating his pint of gruel, he thought: "If I will not escape myself, I might perhaps let another."

"What!" said O'Hara on the march out, "you still here?"

"Where should I be?" answered Hogarth, dull and sullen.

"Where palaces stand open for you, and bank-notes — have you ever realized something very charming in the Helen pallor of a bank-note, Hogarth? And gold-yellow, sparkling gold! Hogarth, I — love gold! It is a confession—"

"Is it that love which brought you here?" Hogarth asked with his sideward stare.

Whereupon the priest turned a cold gaze upon him — had regarded Hogarth as a well-bred man, or would hardly have conversed with him.

"I had a motive for asking", said Hogarth, eyeing the face of the prelate — a man of very coarse feature; a small head, made to receive the tonsure, with a low brow; a stern bottom lip, and long upper; a fat neck held majestically erect; and up stuck his double chin. In profile, the part between the sharp edge of the bottom lip and the chin-tip was divided, down near the chin tip, by an angle and crease; and the lower face seemed too massive for the size of the head.

Nothing could be more exquisite than the contrast between his air of force, authority and importance, and the knickerbockers, the coarse cap, the canvas slop-jacket, which he wore.

Outwardly calm, he was yet very excited by that “I had a motive”; he said to himself: “Suppose this man has some plan! He could invent ten, if he only knew it. And suppose he would tell me it, if I make him believe me innocent! It would be like him!”

When the eleven o’clock dinner-bell rang, and they two were again together, O’Hara said: “Hogarth, I have for some time been intending to give you my story. Have I in your eyes the air of a guilty man?”

“God knows,” answered Hogarth, with a shrug; “you talk nicely, and you know much”.

“So much for the hollowness of friendship!”

“Don’t be sentimental”, said Hogarth: “I never pretended to be any friend of yours; but I do respect your talents, do pity your misery: and if I knew the solid facts of, as you have said, your ‘innocence’, I might—”

“What?” whispered O’Hara with a thievish, fierce glance.

“Help you”.

“In God’s truth?”

“I might”.

O’Hara said: “I don’t find it so cold as it was this morning. You must have observed a certain peculiarity of moorland climates — the same being true of the Roman Campagna, and of Irish peat-lands — that they are colder than elsewhere in the absence of the sun, and warmer in its presence. This afternoon — I will tell you—”

They had reached the great gates, and were marched to parade-ground for the second of the four daily searches; then, after three ounces of fat mutton and forty minutes' rest, the third search, the second march-out.

And immediately beyond the gates O'Hara began: "In order to paint you my life, Hogarth, I must give you at once to understand what has been its mainspring and secret: my passion for my Church—"

He paused, while his lips moved in prayer, and he crossed himself.

"From boyhood my dream was to see my Church supreme in the warfare of the world, I being a King's College and Maynooth man, at twenty-three was Senior Chancellor's Medallist, and seven years later, sent to Rome was quickly received into the Vatican household. It was recognized that I had a future: both gifts and graces; piety; a versatile tongue; a powerful voice; some learning; could dine, I could look august; above all, I knew my man and could talk him over. My great day came when, one morning, in St. Gregory the Great on Mount Coelius, I was consecrated Bishop Coadjutor to his Eminence the Archbishop of Westminster. Now I was on the heights. My life during the next ten years was a life of bustling action — and was led always with one unselfish object. No man ever spoke a greater number of words than I, Hogarth. I have breakfasted with the Prime Minister, lunched with a President of the Conference, and dined with the Bishop of London: between the three meals I have written a hundred letters and pitched into ten cabs. Such a life is very exhilarating, in comparison, for example, with quarrying. Oh, my God what am I fallen! Most of that time I was running over Europe: from Madrid to Vienna, from Rouen to Rome. It happened that the Archbishop of Paris was organizing a scheme of Church-workhouses in France, in the absence of municipal ones, such as we have here.... Well, it was a grand thing, but was falling through for lack of funds: so I, on my way to Rome, undertook the mission to plead the cause before his Holiness, and succeeded to this extent that, on my return, I had with me a casket from the good old man containing seven diamonds, which I might either dispose of personally, or hand over to the Paris fund. Now, it was during my stay at Rome that that series of events, culminating in the Jewish exodus from Europe, occurred; and on my journey home I was seized with the mighty thought that, since many of the Jews were perishing of want, that was the moment to reach their spirit through the body, and add their race to the trophies of the Church. Was it not a thought? You yourself, who are a Jew—”

Hogarth’s eyes opened in surprise.”I am not a Jew “.

“No? I should have said that there was a hint of expression somewhere — But to resume. I retained those seven diamonds, and disposed of them”.

“Honest behaviour!”

“Perfectly honest! I acquainted the Pope — he sanctioned it! And now, I, single-handed almost, threw myself into that task. I hired, I built, I begged, I borrowed, I formed committees, I haunted Religious Houses, I sweated, I ran, I wept, I visited dens, I smoked opium, I drank gin, I framed memorials, I learned Yiddish, I read the Mishna and Gemara, I interviewed Rabbonim, I wrote tracts: I was busy. In the midst of it, I had to visit Rome ceremoniously, to assist at an interview between the Duke of York and his Holiness — arrived on the Monday, and on the Wednesday, I remember, attended a Court Ball in the suite of his Royal Highness. That night, when I returned to the Vatican, I found all the Piazza di San Pietro crowded. I do not know if you were free at the time when my friend, M. Tissot, startled everybody by predicting the collision of an asteroid with the earth? Tut, the silly being — he should have known from the body’s response to the spectroscope that its condition was too friable to resist our atmosphere. But I never yet knew an astronomer not imbued with sensationalism they acquire a certain megalomania from their intercourse with space. But, at all events, the people, dreading the destruction of everything, had crowded toward the Vatican. The Duke of Genoa, I, and some of the College of Cardinals, stood watching from a balcony; and very imposing, I remember, was the moment when a glare appeared — I must stop—”

They were at the face of the rock, and the “halt” and “set to work” parted them.

But again on the final march back at 5.15 when nightshades were falling fast like snow, and the arm now felt the pick a load, O’Hara began his muttering:

“I was telling you about the asteroid”, he said. “Now this body, it was given out, contained diamonds in large evidence, and the mere thought of such a thing bursting in mid-air, and scattering itself about was, I — I confess, a little fascinating to my mind. A man might let his soul gloat upon such a hope till he went lunatic with lust! I — I confess, the thought was alluring to me. Diamond, my son: lucid — But when the body burst, and none of it came my way, I drove it from my mind: in fact, I never heard of a trace of it having been seen — hissed itself into gases in mid-air. Except in one instance — one instance.

“When I reached Calais on my homeward way, stopped there a day, awaiting the coming of Rouen, for whom I had nuncio communications, and in the evening went to visit a cottage where I had once been a great favourite with an old fellow called Sant’A©-you know those Calais fishers, with painted sabots, and ochred trousers. And ‘What!’ said I to Sant’A©, ‘the nets already spread at this hour?’ ‘Nothing to be done to-day, my Father’, he answered, and explained that he had attempted to pick up a stone before his door, and — it had burned him: he showed it me: it had the appearance of a piece of ferruginous rock, stuck with pieces of dirty glass; and it had burned Sant'Ä© on the midnight of the asteroid's scattering.

"Imagine my excitement: 'The asteroid', I thought, 'may add fifty thousand Jews to the Church'. I asked Sant'Ä© for the stone — Do you blame me?"

"Go on," said Hogarth.

"That day two months I had the diamonds lying polished in a casket in my house. My evil destiny, Hogarth, ordained that the casket was the one given me for Paris by the Pope, the number of the new diamonds the same — seven: and one day, about that time, the Vatican organ, the Osservatore Romano, published a dreadful article, hinting that I had applied to my own purposes seven diamonds entrusted me for Paris: the Pope, just dead, must have left some record of his gift. My friend, before I had heard a whisper of the attack upon me, the casket, whose lid was mosaicked with the Papal fanon, was secretly searched by a secretary in my house: the seven diamonds were seen.

"Imagine the horror of what followed: I was abandoned by all — superior and inferior; the story of the meteor was received with sneers. The scandal reached the public papers — the public prosecutor. And here now is the wretch, Patrick O'Hara."

The latter part of this narrative was fiction! The Pope's diamonds O'Hara had duly handed to the Archbishop! and though there was such a man as Sant'Ä©, no asteroid had ever fallen at his door. In fact, O'Hara was "serving time" for an assault upon a lady in a railway compartment between Whitchurch and Salisbury.

But Hogarth spent that night in meditating the pros and cons as to O'Hara's escaping; and, in a moment of destiny, said at last: "If he is undeservedly doomed—" and swooned to sleep.

The very next day was foggy....

On the march out O'Hara said: "Here is something like a fog. On the Carinthian Alps, where you have dense woolly fogs, there is a race of goats, which—"

"Would you like to escape?" whispered Hogarth.

"Who?"

"You".

"Hogarth — ! My God — !"

A trembling seized the priest's leathery left cheek, he at that instant seeing a vision of the world — Andalusian wines, hued ices, the opera-house, and great greyhounds of the sea, and a snuff which his gross nose loved at Gorey.

"Hogarth, you are not mocking me?" chattered the priest's jaws, hurrying like a jarred spring.

"I am quite serious. You will have to run for it though".

"Run! I am not such a young man! Have pity Hogarth".

"Bah! Be a man".

The priest approached his mouth to Hogarth's ear: "I should die of fright! My heart—"

"What would it matter? I thought you had more beans".

"But have you — a plan?"

"Yes. You must run to the copse—"

"I shall be shot!"

"Probably".

"I could not—"

"Then, do not".

"Tell me, boy! Tell me, Hogarth..."

“Within the copse to the left of the quarry there is almost certainly at this moment waiting a man who, as soon as you pronounce my name, will help you—”

“You say almost certainly”.

“I can’t see him, O’Hara. But I should say he is there on a morning like this”.

“What a risk! What a risk!” went the priest with lifted eyelids each time.

“You cannot escape from prison without risk. But I, personally, would venture upon ten times as much, if I thought it becoming. There is, however, another risk: that you may not strike the part of the copse where he is. But near the middle it is high—”

“Why, it is nothing but risks!” whined O’Hara with opening arms.

“You are not bound to try it. By the way — can you swim?”

“Yes — I suppose so — yes”.

“Then lift yourself to it, and risk it. I should, if I were you. Think of liberty, activity. Prick your spirit, grip at it, and spring it”.

“Do you think I shall be shot?”

“No! It does not matter! Crush your doubts, martyr yourself to your aim, and your aim will give you the crown of martyrdom”.

“Well — God reward you — I will think of it—”

“Do it!”

“I will!”

“In that case, don’t trust to your own eyes — I will give you the signal with my handkerchief — so: you keep your eyes fixed on me. Then run, zigzagging. And tell Loveday for me to look after you, and not make any more plans for me. Good-bye, O’Hara! All this is very unselfish of me, for I lose my old talky-talky O’Hara—”

They parted at the rock, and set to work.

As minutes, half-hours passed, the condition of O'Hara became piteous, hideous. His knees knocked together. Like death he dreaded, like life awaited, that signal. He said to himself: "This Hogarth will be my ruin...God deal not with me after my sins...!"

Hogarth was waiting that the warders' morning watchfulness might yield to the influence of use and time; but near nine, when the morning fog showed signs of thinning, he approached the water-can to ask for a drink, O'Hara being then two yards from him, wheeling a barrow.

As he stooped to the water, his huge stare ranged the moor, took in the truth of it, and, after waiting ten, fifteen seconds, he upset the can. As two officers, at the outcry, ran toward the spot, Hogarth, his eyes fixed upon them, waited — and all at once, with a flourish, drew his handkerchief.

O'Hara, with a heavy but impassioned run, was away...

He had not run five yards when a chorus of whistles was shrilling.

And quick, that monotony reels into a very frenzy of sensation: it is no more the same world, the same men. Lo, in the Palace of Continuity is an Event.

33 was off.

Five hundred pairs of eyes lit up, and the flurried warders ran in random dismay to see to it! How if all the five hundred should do the like, simultaneously? — a possibility underlying, through all its breadth, the little social "system" which has produced Colmoor.

But the five hundred, exhorted, stamped at, shouted at, remained quiet, though restive, only the wild eye showing the wild thought, while two of the warders pursued O'Hara who had also to run the blockade of two pickets of the civil guard.

The escaping convict, however, has this advantage: that his mind is strung to a far higher pitch than his pursuers'; and, given a certain ecstasy, everything can be accomplished.

So O'Hara separately dodged the two pickets, and was making bolt for the copse before three rifles, aimed at a large vague ghost, rang out, and did not hit. He plunged madly into the brambly bush.

Immediately a bleating like a child's trumpet was heard from its midst; and in a few seconds, not one, but four, men were seen to rush toward the river, all in convict knickerbockers, stockings, caps, all in black overcoats: and one carried a bundle.

Beyond the river one was shot in the leg — a black sailor, who, with two roughs, had undertaken the risk for lucre. The rest escaped.

XVI. THE ROPE

SOON AFTER THIS Hogarth was taken with vomitings, his heart retching at Colmoor. His dark cheeks jaundiced; those mobile nostrils of his small bony nose yawned, like an exhausted horse's; his face was all a light of eyes.

Whether or not some suspicion of his complicity with O'Hara had occurred to the authorities, he now found himself transferred to another "graft": from quarrying was set to trenching.

Four things are inexhaustible in the earth: the hope of a gambler; the sea; the lip of a lover; and the capacity of Colmoor to be trenched and quarried.

And in Hogarth's new gang was — Fred Bates.

One day, Hogarth, intent upon his work, heard a sob and, glancing, saw that Bates had dropped his spade and buried his face in his hands.

"What, Fred, not giving in?" He went quickly and pressed his palm on Bates' brow, saying: "Patience! Stiffen your back: look how I slip into it!"

"Ah, Hogarth, you don't know. I am an innocent man".

"So am I."

"Yes, but I was certain in my own mind to be out within anyway, six months; you wasn't. That makes a difference, don't it? That touches the nerve, don't it? Ah!"

"And how did you expect to be out?"

"I had a brother-Bob-in the 9th Lancers in Punjab and his regiment was ordered home just a week before I was arrested. Well, the morning after the missus was killed, I went early — for I knew I'd soon be arrested — to a stableman at Beccles — you know old Harris — and I made him swear to give a letter to Bob the moment Bob put foot in Southampton, and to nobody else. In the letter I told Bob where he was to look for so-and-so, and how he was to prove my innocence—”

“But I don’t understand a word of what you are saying”, interrupted Hogarth.

“I’ll tell you. I did not kill my Kit. The burn on her face, and on my hand, wasn’t any red-hot poker. Did you ever hear such bosh? Look here, you mind, don’t you, the talk that week about the world getting blowed up by some comet? Well, about 3 P.M. on the comet day, as I was walking home through Lagden Dip, an old gent, the same as took the farm over after you, he comes up to me, and he says: ‘If you should happen to see anywhere in your travels’, sez ’e, laughin’ and rubbin’ his hands, ‘a piece of hot iron after eleven to-night, you bring it to me, and I’ll put a cheque for One Thousand Pounds there in the middle of your palm’. Well — I said it was a Wednesday, didn’t I? And Wednesday bein’ the pay-day on the Eastern, me and the missus had a drop o’ beer that afternoon, and you know ’ow you come and caught me a-paying of her — dirty dog that I was those days. But, Hogarth, you hadn’t hardly gone when we made it up between us, and the rest of that evening we was just like — well — two bloomin’, cooin’ doves! kissin’, blubblin’, havin’ drinks, and doin’ our week’s shoppin’ together. Well — stop, here’s Black—”

They were interrupted, and for two days found no other chance.

Two days during which Hogarth received another letter from Loveday, of which one paragraph was as follows: “The fifteen pounds which you left in Lloyd’s Bank I have managed to withdraw for you on the authority of your aunt, Miss Sarah Hogarth”, and at once he scented a cypher, having no fifteen pounds, and no aunt.

When he had unravelled it as before, he had: “Why you failed? Expect — Balloon — Rope”.

He was astounded: and could only conclude that O’Hara had not delivered his message.

And as the image of O’Hara had mixed itself with his thoughts of the corpse, so now the image of Fred Bates mixed itself with the balloon.

It was partly through his evidence that Bates was here...!

On the third day Bates, as though he had just left off, resumed his story:

“You know Seely’s, the general shop, at Priddlestone”, said he; “it was there we always did our Wednesday-night marketin’ — nobody would believe what high old jinks those Wednesday pay-days was to us Great Eastern blokes! By the time we reached Priddlestone, we had a quart of four-ale down us, let alone what we’d had before, and, as the saying is, one glass leads to another. By now we was feeling just nicely, thank you, and instead of going to Seely’s, we took a short cut to ‘The Broom’, and it was going on for past eleven when we found ourselves in — you know the beechwood between Priddlestone and Thring — she singing all the time with her head thrown back, at the top of her voice.

“Hogarth, it gives me the creeps to think of! Suddenly it looked as if the whole wood was lit up: there was the sky all cut up with streamers, I saw my Kit quite plain, then all at once there was a whishin’ and a rushin’ among the trees, like steam — and I saw my Kit drop smack. In two ticks my head was sober: but, as I ran to her, I staggered sideways upon my left hand, and I let such a yell out of me — had put my hand upon something flamin’ hot.

“The minute I bent over my old woman I knew she was a deader; and I dropped down, and I called of her, and I shook of her, and it was quite two hours before I come to myself properly, by which time the affair what struck her down was gone out in darkness. Of course, the first thing I thought of was the old gent at Lagden. ‘This should mean a cool thou’, says I to myself. But I knew I should be arrested first thing in the morning, except I told plain out what had happened: and that, you bet, I didn’t mean to do, for if once I mentioned that there piece of iron before I had it safe off the lord-o’-the-manor’s land, I knew it ‘ud be taken from me. But to take it off before another day or two was out of the question — it was too hot. So says I to myself: ‘I’ll get convicted; and to-night I’ll write a letter to Bob, telling him where to find the affair, how to get the thou, and after he’s got it, how to set about gettin’ the case retried ‘.

“Well, so said, so done. You know that old elm in the beech-wood? I dug a grave at the foot of it, and managed to kick and roll the affair into the grave, then I took up my Kit, carried her home, and by the time I pegged out the letter to Bob, I saw day breakin’. So I made paces for Beccles, knocked up old Harris, and gave him the letter for Bob. By eight o’clock I was arrested—”

At this point the 5.15 recall-bell rang out, and there was falling into line.

The next time that they had speech together, Hogarth said: “And were you such a clown, Fred Bates, as to imperil your life for a paltry thousand pounds?”

“Paltry thousand pounds?” answered Bates, surprised: “Hark at this! Didn’t I peril my life ten times more in Egypt for a bob a day? I tell you I was certain in my own mind of getting out in a few weeks!”

“Well, what happened to prevent you?”

“Only this: Bob died on the troop-ship coming home; that’s all”.

“But you could write old Harris to open your letter to Bob, and act on it, or else hand it over to your father”.

“My word, but haven’t I wrote? Old ‘Arris is either dead and buried, or gorn away, or somethin’. I’ve waited a year and nine months — good God! and no answer yet”.

“Poor Fred! I could weep blood for you. Believe in God!”

“More Devil than God about Colmoor, it strikes me”.

“As though you knew! Suppose I strike you blind — now — with a flash of Him?”

“I don’t take your meaning, sir”, said Bates, with a strange heart-bound and sense of awe.

“Do you remember 33 of the quarry-gang, Fred?”

“Yes”.

Hogarth whispered: “It was I who got him off”.

Bates whitened to the lips. “I — I thought as much”.

“There is yet another chance, which you, if you like, may take”.

Bates saw heaven opening; but with this vague hope was left two days.

On the third, Hogarth explained what he assumed to be the new plan of Loveday.

“I take it”, he said, “that he will pass over the moor in a balloon trailing a rope, which will have a loop to be slipped under the arms. I tell you, there are dangers in this scheme: you may be shot. Are you for trying it?”

“Trying it, aye”, said Bates, with fifty times the boldness of O’Hara.

And now began for these two a painfulness of waiting days, the sleep of both, meanwhile, being one nightmare of confused affrights, balloons and deliriums.

Ten times they re-discussed every possibility of the scheme, Hogarth giving messages for Loveday, heaping counsels upon Bates. Nothing remained to be said, and still the days passed over the time-worn hearts, till a month went by.

At last something was observed in the sky — afar to the N.W. — in the afternoon turn, about two o'clock, a mist on the moor, but the sky almost cloudless.

Whereupon Hogarth, who first saw the object, stepped, as if looking for something, close to Bates, hissing: “Goodbye! Keep cool — choose well—”

Bates shovelled on steadily, as though this was a day like others; but twice his knees gave and bent beneath him; and there was a twitching of the livid under-lip, piteous to see.

It drew nearer, that silent needle, while Bates worked, delving, barrowing, making little trips; plenty of time; and no one noted his lip which pulled and twitched.

Without visible motion it came, wafted on the breaths of high heaven: half an hour — and still it was remote, fifteen hundred feet up. Bates and Hogarth peered to see a rope, but could none.

After fifty minutes it was actually over the moor, all now conscious of it; but the rope was indistinguishable from the air.

Yet it was there, walking the ground, at its end a horizontal staff....Hogarth, with wiser forethought than Loveday's, had predicted, not a staff, but a loop.

It passed twenty yards from the quarry, Loveday no doubt imagining that Hogarth still worked there; but the quarry was some hundred and fifty yards from the trench.

Its course, nevertheless was toward the trench: and on walked deliberately the fluctuating rope, the staff now travelling the gorse ground, now bounding like a kangaroo yards high, to come down once more yonder.

A moment came when Hogarth, with intense hiss, was whispering to himself: “If I were he, I should dash now”.

But Fred Bates did not move.

Hogarth suffered agonies not less excruciating than the rack.

“Oh, whyever does he wait?” he groaned.

But now — all suddenly — it was known, it was felt, deep in five hundred ecstatic hearts, that a convict was gone — a man overboard — a soul in the agony — battling between life and death.

Like tempests the whistles split the air.

Where is he? Who is he? What mother bare him? It is 57! And he is there! — on high — caught, to the skies.

The tumbling of four ballast bags from the balloon was marked: the balloon darted high, wildly high; and with her, seated on the bar, the cord between his thighs, darted high Fred Bates.

Exultant! the five hundred faces wax fire-eyed, each heart a flame of madness. But yonder is Warder Black taking trembling, yet careful, aim: now the report is echoing from the two Tors, the granite-works; and that smoke no sooner thins than a whole volley of crackling musketry is winging toward that dot under the clouds.

And it was hideous — pitiful — the quailing heart waited and was still to see the dot dissever itself from its rod: he had been hit: was in the middle of the vast and vacant air: and wheeling he came.

A shockingly protracted interval did that fall fill up: the five hundred, gazing as at some wonder in heaven, did not, could not, breathe: the outraged heart seemed to rend the breast in a shriek. Would it never end, that somersault? Wheeling he came.

In reality it occupied much less than a minute: and now he is no more ethereal, but has grown, is grossly near, attended by the raving winds of his travelling: is arrived. And the thump of his coming was heard. As he touched the earth he jerked out circular....

Here was a tragedy remembered many a year at Colmoor, and always with feelings of the deepest awe.

XVII. OLD TOM'S LETTER

THE FATE OF Bates filled Hogarth's mind with a gloom so funereal, that now his strength, his great patience, all but succumbed.

One evening, while his broom lay stuck out under the notch of his cell-door in order that Warder Black might count him, he took his tin knife, and began to scratch over the hills and valleys of his corrugated wall some shining letters:

VEN

He was now, after long reflection, convinced that he was the victim of a plot of Baruch Frankl's: yet in his heart was little rancour against Frankl, nor, when he wrote his "V E N", was he thinking specially of Frankl — hardly knew of whom, or what. It may have been of the system of things which had given to Frankl such vast powers over him; but, the "N" finished, he pshawed at himself, and threw the knife down. If something was wrong, he knew not at all how to right it, supposing the world had been his to guide.

But a simple incident was destined to transform his mood — a letter from old Tom Bates, the father of Fred.

And as hitherto we have seen him passive, bearing his weight of pain with patience, after that letter we shall find him in action.

Old Bates' letter was handed him three weeks after the scratching of his vague "VEN".

"DERE MISTER HOGARTH:

“thise fu lines is to ast you how you er getn on, and can you giv a pore old feller ane noos ov that godfussakn sun ov mine hopn they ma find you as they leave me at present wich i av the lumbeigo vere Bad and no Go the doctor ses bob wot you no was in the ninth lancers he dide comen home so ive only fred left out of the ate. I rote to im fore munths agorne, but no anser, no doubt becos i cum to london soon arter, so no more at present from “Yours trule,

“TOM BATES”.

The old fellow, Hogarth saw, did not know of Fred’s fate: Fred, the last of eight. He would find it hard to answer that letter.

When “beds down” was called, his head was still full of one thought: old Tom Bates; and he could not sleep; heard the bell ring for the change of warders; the vast silence of the prison’s night; and still his brain revolved old Tom.

The stealthy slipper of the night-warder passed and re-passed. Anon a click of metal on metal, and the bull’s-eye searched him.

Suddenly he remembered that visit to the forge at Thring, and the present of herrings which old Tom in his guernsey, had brought.

“Here — take ’em — they’re yours”, old Tom had said.

He had just then, he remembered, been on the point of going into the cottage to examine his guns, when the old man came, and stopped him — a fatal, appointed thing, apparently. Had he actually gone, he would have found the guns vanished, and would never have been condemned....

And what was it that the old man had said about fish, and fishermen, and the sea?

He bent his brow to it, and finally remembered: “The day’s work of a fisherman gives him enough fish to live on all the week, and he could lie round idling the other six days, if he chose; only anybody can't live on nothing but fish all the time".

Was it true? Yes! He remembered facts of Yarmouth....

But since true, it was — strange.

Was the sea, then, a more productive element for men to work in than the land? No, that was absurd: the land, in the nature of things, was more productive.

Then, why could not all men procure an easy superfluity by one day's work, as the fisher could, if he chose to live naked in a cave, eating fish alone? In that case the fisher could change some of his day's-work fish for the shore people's day's-work things, and so all have a variety as well as superabundance.

At the interest of this question, he leapt from his hammock, peering into that thing, and his fleet feet were away, running after the truth with that rapt abandonment that had characterized his hunting and football. This was clear: that there was some difference between land and sea as working-grounds for men. Shore people, like a shoemaker, did not have for themselves enough shoes from even five, or six, days' work on which to live in plenty for a week: and hence would take nothing less than an enormous quantity of the fisher's fish in exchange for a pair of shoes, making him, too, poor as themselves. But since land work was as productive as sea work, and far more so, it could only be that the shoemaker did not get for himself all the shoes which he made, as the fisher got for himself all the fish which he caught: some power took from shore people a large part of what they made, a power which did not exist on the sea. That much was sure.

What was this power, this inherent difference?

He could think of no inherent difference except this: that shore workers paid rent for land — directly and indirectly — in a million subtle ways; but fishers paid none for the sea.

So, then, if shore folk paid no rent, they would have a still greater superfluity of shoes, etc., from one day's labour in six than the fish-rich fisher?

So it seemed. So it was — as with savages. He started! But one minute's reflection showed him that it was in the very nature of the shore to pay rent: because one piece of land was better than another — City land, for instance — and those working on the better must pay for that benefit. Civilized land, therefore, was bound to pay rent.

So that the shore people could never have the easy superfluity of the fish-rich fisher — because land was bound to pay rent? And the fisher must buy the shore things so dear with his easy-got fish, toiling, he, too, all the week — because land was bound to pay rent?

The wretchedness of Man, then, was a Law?

Hogarth, confronted by a wall, groaned, and while his body was cold, his brow rolled with sweat, he feeling himself on the brink of some truth profound as the roots of the mountains....

“Land was bound to pay rent”: he reached that point; and there remained.

“But suppose the workers on shore paid the rent among themselves....?”

At last those words: and he gave out a shout which begat mouths of echo through the galleries of Colmoor.

“If the workers on shore paid rent among one another” — then they would — on the whole — be in the very position of the fish-rich workers on sea, who paid no rent at all, the nation — as a whole — living on its country rent-free: England English, America American, as the sea human: and our race might then begin to think, to live!

It seemed too sublime — and divine — to be true! Again, point by point, he went over his reasoning with prying eye; and, on coming back to the same conclusion, hugged himself, moaning. At last — he knew.

And away now with the dullness and lowness! That blithe and hand-clapping day! Good-bye, Colmoor! the daily massacre, the shame and care. Men could begin — if in a baby way at first — to think, to see, to sing, to live.

He saw, indeed, that that would hardly have been fair business if he, for example, had paid his rent to the English Nation instead of to Frankl, Frankl having bought Lagden with money earned. But he thought that Frankl would hardly be slow to resign that rent, if once he was shown....

But if Frankl was slow — what then?

The oblong of ribbed glass over his flap-table showed a greyness of morning, as he asked himself that thing.

In that case — Frankl could be argued with.

But if he still refused?

Then the question could be gone into as to whether that which is good for forty millions, though apparently bad for Frankl, is not forty million times more just than unjust, goodness being justice; also, as to which had the primary right to England, Frankl or the English.

But if he still refused?

Suddenly Hogarth giggled — his first laugh in Colmoor.

That could be arranged....

For him, Hogarth, the great fact was this: that he saw light. Into that humble cell the rays of Heaven had blazed.

After standing motionless a long time, he dropped to his knees, and “O, Thou, Thou”, he said....

An hour later, when asked by an orderly if he wished to see doctor or governor, he replied: “The Governor”.

XVIII. CHLOROFORM

(CAPTAIN BUCKNILL, THE Governor, was making his morning rounds, when he heard that among the convicts claiming to see him was 76.)

A little man, prim, snappy, compact: an army officer, with moustachios stuck upon him, to curve and finish him off.

“Well, what is it, 76?” said he busily at the cell door.

Hogarth struck a hand-salute — his old habit on His Majesty’s ships.

“Sir, I wished to tell you that I have determined to escape from this prison — if I can”.

“Indeed, now! This is a most refreshing candour, 76!”

“I have said what I had to say”, said Hogarth. “You keep a sharp eye on me, and I, too, will keep a sharp eye”.

The Governor puffed a breath of laughter, turned on his heels, walked away, and that day spoke to three officials with regard to Convict 76.

And during a week Hogarth lay deep, chained, in a punishment-cell.

But during its first four days he had invented three separate plans of escape, and had determined upon the one which seemed the surest, though longest.

When he again came up into the light, he was a marked man, under Warder Black’s constant suspicion.

Now, however, his expression was changed: he no longer belonged to Colmoor, though he was there. Sometimes he felt like shouting at the burden of his secret. In his impatience to proclaim it, he pined to write to Loveday — but now his punishment had lost him that privilege.

Meantime, the problem was to get ten good miles beyond Colmoor: a hard one; but his brain had already accomplished a task far harder: and the greater implied the less.

His first thought, when he had begun to plan, had been Loveday; his second, that on no account could he permit Loveday to incur further risk, or expense, for him; his third, that he might yet use Loveday to any extent not involving risk or expense.

At the next weekly "School" he sat near a Thames-works hackle-maker, who, though he could write, was no scholar, and was laboriously spoiling a second letter-sheet, when Hogarth whispered him: "Can I help you? I see it's to your mother. I could get her a quid from a friend of mine".

"Well, I'm much obliged....!"

The laborious letter, after half an hour, had in it:

"If you go to 15, Cheyne Gardens, the gentleman will give you a sovereign which he owed me for cutting down the elm in the beech-wood at Teddington for him".

Now, Loveday lived at 15, Cheyne Gardens, and had only to see those words "the elm in the beechwood," to scent a cypher from Hogarth.

He offered five pounds for that letter: but it was two weeks before he decided upon the intended words: "Small chloroform — trenches — rock".

There were several trenches, many rocks: yet one midnight, when a blustering wind huddled the bracken, and the prison stood darkling, wrapped in mystery, a lonely figure in an ulster was there; and under each of three rocks he deposited two vials: for the formation of only three gave the least chance of concealment.

What Hogarth's plan could be he racked his brain in vain to dream, guessing that prisoners, on returning from the moor, must be searched, even to the ears: Hogarth, therefore, could never use the vial within the walls, and must mean to use it without — a sufficiently wild proceeding. But the finding of the vials, was sure: for the “rock” which Hogarth had had in mind was one of those granite ones common on Colmoor, standing five feet high on a small base; and one day he swept his hand among the gorse under it, and, with a glad half-surprise, touched two vials.

Three days later he again swept his hand among the gorse, touched the vials, breasted his handkerchief, laid the vials on it, and presently contrived to tie them together with a twig.

At his feet now was a wheelbarrow full of marl, and two yards off Warder Black, waiting for him to roll the barrow; but, inserting his spade between a wheel and a side of the barrow, his back toward Black, Hogarth, with a tug, bent the spade: then walked to Black.

“Look here”, he said, “that spade isn’t much good now....”

Black strode to look, Hogarth a little behind him: and at the instant when the officer was a-stoop to lift the spade, Hogarth took the vials from his breast, and laid them upright in the little pocket of Black’s tunic, near his bayonet-sheath and cartridge-box, above the belt.

By the time the matter of the spade was settled, the great bell rang, the gangs went marching over the old familiar level, up the old path in the grass-mound on which the Palace stands, and so, in lax order, like shabby French conscripts, powdered, toil-worn, into the gates.

Then the search on parade: during which, as Black busily searched him, Hogarth said: “Search well”.

They were then led up to cells.

And the moment Hogarth’s door closed upon him, he put his skilly-can on the floor, and, with one stamp, stamped it out of shape; also he broke his cup, and pocketed two fragments of it.

A few minutes afterwards, before cocoa, Black, trotting in heavy haste here and there in the gallery, looked in to say: "Bath to-night".

And Hogarth: "Warder! a word with you! sorry, I have trodden on my can...."

Upon which Black went stooping to look, the can now standing on the low shelf; and as he said "I shall report this", Hogarth, stooping, with quick deftness had the vials picked from the thick pocket.

"Well, fall in", said Black to him; "better take your precious can, and give it to a bath-room warder for the store-keeper to change".

Hogarth, as he passed out, placed the vials on the shelf over his door, where they were secure, since cells were never searched; and, the bathers having formed in single file, five feet between man and man, away they moved and down — away and down — lost in space, treading the journey of galleries, till, at the bottom, they passed up a vaulted corridor, monastically dim, across a yard open to starry sky, and into the door of a semi-detached, steep-roofed building, which was the bath-house.

A row of thirty-five baths; a very long bench for undressing; in the space between bench and baths three warders walking: such was the bath-house: all whitewashed, galvanized iron, and rigour; but for its old record of uneventfulness a scandal was preparing that night.

Outside the door a fourth officer paced, and a cord within rang a little bell in one click, to tell when, the bathing over, the door should be unlocked outside.

After giving up his can near the door to a warder, who laid it on the bench, Hogarth undressed slowly; got off his boots; and now had on only knickerbockers and stockings: he got off his stockings.

And the moment his bare soles touched the floor, he felt himself once more agile on the ratlines, larky for a shore-row, handy in any squall. Let them all come, therefore! He smiled; passed his palms down his crib of lean ribs.

“Good gracious, why don’t you hurry up there...?” an officer came asking, stooping.

At “there” he saw stars-and-stripes, dropped upon his back: Hogarth was away toward the door, while the bathers started with shouts, though in no bosom arose any impulse to follow, the bath-house being the centre of a maze of twenty unscaleable walls, prison within prison.

But as for Hogarth, in such a dazzling flash did he dash toward the door, that he had struck down the second officer before the outcry of the first, and had pulled at the door-bell before the third could cry “Don’t open!” — a cry muffled into his maw by a cuff prompt as thunder.

This third man, however, grasped the fugitive by the middle: and while the overthrown two were running up, and the key without seeking the lock, a short, venomous tussle was waged just near the door, till Hogarth, wringing his naked body free, tossed his antagonist by the knees to slide into the path of the two on-comers; at the same time, catching up his battered can, and smashing it into the face of the door-orderly, who now peeped in, he slipped through, and was gone into a yard, small, of irregular shape, and dim, with one wall-lantern, and but one egress (except the egress into the prison-hall), namely a blind-alley between the laundry and carpet-makers’ building on one side, and stables on the other: blind alley, yard, and all, being shut in by big buildings.

By the time the door-orderly opened his eyes, and one of the inside three had rushed out, Hogarth had vanished; and these two, shrilling whistles to reinforce the bath-room guard, pelted down the blind-alley to effect, as they thought, a sure capture. But Hogarth was not there.

Back they came trotting, breathless, rather at a loss. One panted: “He must have run back into the great hall....”

The other panted: “He’d hardly do that — hiding in the yard still, must be. There’s that little nook....”

The “little nook” is a three-sided space in a corner, very dark, formed by one wall of the campanile, or bell-tower, together with a wall of the laundry-house, and a third wall which shuts in the yard; the entrance to it narrow, and one looking up within it seems to stand at the bottom of a triangular well, split at one corner. It is not far from the bathhouse, and into it Hogarth had really darted; but when the officers came peering, no trace of him.

He had, in fact, gone up the lightning-conductor, which runs down a bell-tower remarkably high, Colmoor having been built during the Napoleonic wars for French prisoners at a time when the theory was accepted that a lightning-conductor protects a space whose radius is double the height of the conductor. The tower is a five-sided structure with a Gothic window into which it is impossible to get from the conductor, because a corner intervenes, and it is a feat to swing from the conductor to the laundry-wall coping, and thence, leaping up, to grip the window: at each of which ordeals Hogarth hesitated, pierced with chills; to his observations from afar it had seemed so much less stupendous; but in each case he dared, and reached.

All this time the can was between his teeth.

Arrived on the window, his arms out groping, he felt a slanting beam — climbed it — found it short-mounted upon a horizontal one, all here, as he had expected, being a chaos of beams, raying every way. Thrice he sneezed low, and felt cobwebs in his face.

And groping he went, seeking the great Bell of Colmoor, which he had doomed, hearing sounds of the to-do, echoes that ran below, and the vague shout of somebody, till he touched the flat top of the bell, clamped to the swing-beam on which he sat astraddle; felt also that along the top of the beam lay an iron bar; made sure that this was in actual contact with the clamps of the bell: and, no longer hesitating, set to work upon the can.

Tugging with his dog-teeth under the upper rim, he got a loose end, and wrenched the rim off; then, tearing along the solder, got the cylinder separated from the bottom; and, opening it out, had a sheet of tin. And now, by the help of his fragments of cup, he set to hack-sawing, breaking, tearing this into strips, no easy thing, in spite of the thin-worn condition of the can: but finally had six strips.

The edge of one strip he inserted under an end of the bar of iron on the beam; then connected that strip with another by loops, slid again to the window, and there lay connecting the six strips by a smith's-trick, with skew loops, non-slipping, getting a tin string five feet long. He then took the leap to the laundry coping, and thence the spring to the conductor, this being all the more ticklishly perilous because he could barely see it.

Hanging away now from the conductor by the left elbow, he reached out the right arm across the corner to catch the tin, which stuck toward him from the window: and he wound its end round the conductor, electrically connecting the bell with the conductor.

And now, standing with one foot on a staple below the tin, he twice sawed the conductor's soft metal with the fragments of cup, cutting and tugging out three inches of it, thus isolating the conductor's point atop from its earthing; then he tossed the piece cut out behind the laundry-coping.

This done, he listened, cast a searching eye below, slid down the rod.

The yard was at present silent, but as he moved to give himself up in the prison-hall, five night-warders with bull's-eyes fell out, still seeking him.

And as he knelt with clasped hands of supplication and bent bare back, like a captured slave, they fell savagely upon him, and cried one: “Well, of all the idiots...!”

XIX. THE GREAT BELL

THE NEXT MORNING Hogarth was not marched out, and near dinner-time was summoned before the Governor. Here he stood in a cage of bars in a room of “No.1” prison, devoted to prison-offences; and before him, at a littered table, sat governor and chief warder, with the witnesses of the outbreak near.

The case was gone into, the report made: whereupon the Governor looked up and down the length of Hogarth, and suddenly gave vent to a laugh.

“So, No. 76”, said he, “this was the threatened escape?”

Hogarth was now all contrition and hanging head.

“I beg for mercy”, he said, with a little smile.

“Oh, I am not your judge...Where were you when the officers were looking for you in the yard?”

“I was hiding in that little nook”.

“Confounded carelessness on someone’s part...And what cut and swelled your mouth?”

“I bashed into the wall in the nook” (The can had cut him!).

“You must have been mad!”

“Yes, sir”.

During the next two weeks he had round his ankles a chain which, rising in two loops, was fastened to a band round his waist; and he was set to turn “the crank”.

Finally, he was led forth to stand before the periodic Director, who, after reading the report, turned to a volume of writing in which was Hogarth's record: good — till lately; and the Director addressed him with sternness, which yet was paternal: he would sentence him to one month in a punishment cell, to two months in chains, and to one dozen lashes.

And two days later he was led to the flogging-hall, which, as he approached it, sent forth screams; the doctor looked at him and consented; the Governor said: "Get it over".

Hogarth stripped to the waist, his teeth chattering: but not with fear. On the contrary, he felt a touch of exultation.

The wrists of his outstretched arms having been bound to "the triangle", the Governor gave the sign, the cat rose, and sang, and fell.

Slowly up, and whistlingly down, rasping, reaping. At the seventh shock he fainted: and thence onward had a long dream, in which he saw Rebekah Frankl in Hindoo dress and jewellery, and she threw at him a red rose black at heart with passion, and her body balanced in dance, and her hands clapped at him.

During the next month he tholed the cold of that same punishment-cell; and during the next was in his old cell, but in chains, picking oakum. All this time, if he was aware of high winds by night, he was in an agony, till the next day the great bell rang its treble.

About the middle of February he was once more trenching in the open air.

But a fear had stolen into his mind: for the string of tin was not strong, and the winds of the last month may have dislocated it. In any case, he might have to wait a year, two, ten....

Occasionally he would redden with suppressed and turbulent energy.

But on the 17th of March, toward evening, England was visited by a storm long remembered, lasting three days, during which the poor prisoners were comforted with rations of hot soup and cocoa.

On the morning of the fourth day when the gangs were once more taken out Hogarth was hardly conscious of frigid winds or agued limbs: for three days the great bell of Colmoor had not rung; and his ears were open.

Of the prisoners, who, by practised instinct, get to know the moment at which it should sound, three presently straightened up, spade in hand, to glance at the prison: and suddenly heard — a sound.

A dull something somewhere — from the prison? unless it was some shock of the wind...Hogarth gazed piteously into the faces near him...No one seemed to have heard.

A few seconds, like eternities...Then he saw a warder look at his watch; then — another! and — they glanced at the prison; and — they approached each other; and — they laid whispering heads together.

Then — joy! — came five officers, wildly running from the prison gates, calling, waving....

And now he knew, and smiled: the babble of that lalling tongue was dumb.

And the very next day, when the afternoon-gangs were marching out, they saw descending from a carriage before the Deputy Governor's house a gentleman with a roll of diagram-paper — a bell-foundry expert, summoned by telegraph from Cardiff.

Hogarth resolved to act that night.

XX. THE INFIRMARY

AS SOON AS the cell-door clicked upon him, he commenced to work: first took off his boots; then felt over the doorshelf for the chloroform; wet his handkerchief with some of it: then inserted the vials across the toes of his boots, which were a succession of wrinkles, far too large; then put on the boots again.

He then lay on the floor, close to the low shelf; and, pressing the handkerchief over his mouth and nose, breathed deep, knowing that in four minutes, when he did not obey the order of “brooms out”, his cell would be opened.

As he sank deeper and deeper into dream, it was with a concentration of his will upon one point — the handkerchief, which, if smelled by anyone, would ruin all; and finally, as he drew the last gasp of consciousness, he waved it languidly from him under the shelf; then, with a sigh, was gone.

He had known that he must have about his body the unmistakable signs of an abnormal condition in order to sleep a night in the infirmary — which was what he wanted. And thither, when shakings and the bull’s-eye had sufficiently tested him, he was swung away, and the doctor’s assistant summoned.

Hogarth’s pupils were hurriedly examined, his heartbeat tested; and the freshman frowned, smelling an odour which, in another place, might have been chloroform, but here was pharyngitis; and he muttered, “Digitalis, perhaps....”

From a table Hogarth was swung to a bed by two of those well-behaved convicts who act as hospital-orderlies, and there two hours later had all his wits about him, and a racking headache.

His first thought was his boots — expecting to find them under his stretcher, and himself in flannels; but he had them still on, and also his work-clothes, humanity to the sick in the first stages not being in the Colmoor code.

He spent half an hour in stealthily tearing a square foot from his shirt-tail; then, weary and sick, went to sleep.

When, soon after 3 A.M. his eyes again opened, all was still. He lay in a long room, rather dim, in the midst of a row of stretchers which were shut in by bars containing locks and gates, and on the other side of the room a row of stretchers, shut in by bars. At a table in the middle, on which were bottles, lint, graduated glasses, sat a warder, with outstretched legs and fallen head: near him, standing listless, a convict hospital-orderly, who continually edged nearer the stove; and, half-way down the room, another.

Occasionally there were calls from the sick-beds — whispered shouts — apologetic and stealthy, as of men guiltily conscious of the luxury of being ill; but neither night-warder nor orderlies made undue haste to hear these summonses. There was, beside, an octagonal clock, which ticked excessively in the stillness, as though the whole place belonged to it.

Hogarth took off his boots under his blanket, and from them took out the vials; then, sitting up, commenced to call the warder, at the same time wetting the torn piece of shirt with some of the fluid.

“All right, I’m coming — shut up!” said the warder, but did not come.

So Hogarth grew loud; and the warder, presently rousing his drowsy bulk, unlocked the gate of that compartment, as Hogarth said to himself: “Do it handy...”

And as the warder stooped, Hogarth clapped the rag upon his mouth and nose. A struggle followed a muffled sob, both standing upright now, till the warder began to paw the air, sank, toppled upon the bed, whereupon Hogarth slipped into the blanket again, and called out in the voice of the warder: “Come here, Barrows — see if this man is dead “.

He had now drawn the warder over him, holding up his chest with one arm, had also poured chloroform upon the rag, and when the convict-orderly came, Hogarth, by means of a short struggle, had him asleep, then seized the warder’s truncheon and keys, and ran out in his stockinged feet.

At that sight, the sick, the dying, the two rows of stretchers, were up on elbow, gazing with grins. To the second convict-orderly who came running to meet him Hogarth hissed: “Not a word — or I brain you with this! If I tie your feet, you won’t have to answer for anything. Come along....”

He was an old fellow, and when he realized the impending truncheon, the menace of Hogarth’s eyes, and the silence of the warder, he permitted himself to be dragged toward Hogarth’s stretcher; and his feet were quickly knotted in his own stockings.

Now again Hogarth ran: but not many steps, when he felt himself tapped on the back, and, glancing in a horror of alarm, saw one of the two patients who had occupied with him his cage of bars — a wiry, long-faced Cockney shop-boy, who had had his ankle crushed by a rock at the quarry.

“Are you off?” he asked.

“That’s my business—”

“No, you don’t. Part, or I give the alarm”.

“What is it? Do you want to come with me?”

“That’s about it”.

“But — your foot’s sick, you fool”.

“You’ll carry me in your awms, as a father beareth his children....”

“You are cool! What are you in for?”

“Murder, my son-red, grim, gory murder!”

“Guilty?”

“Guilty, ya’as. What do you think?”

“Then you may go to hell”.

“‘Ell is it? I’m there: and if I linger longer loo in it, you linger, too, swelp me Gawd!”

Hogarth was nonplussed.

“But the foot...”

“Never mind the foot. Foot’s still good for a run. Do we go shares?”

“Come along, then”.

“But you ain’t ‘alf up to snuff, I can see, though you are pretty smart in your own way: I’d ‘ave felt the confidence of a son in you, if you ‘adn’t overlooked that wine—”

To Hogarth’s dismay, he turned back to the table, put a black bottle, half full, to his lips, and with tilts anc stoppages set to gulp it, while eager jokes, touched with jealousy, began to jeer from the beds.

“Lawd Gawd, that was good!” said the Cockney with upturned eyes, “and what do I behold? — broth, ye gawds!”

Now a saucepan of cold broth was at his lips; and not till he had drunk all did he run after Hogarth into the other arm of the ward, where one of the keys unlocked the door at its end, and they passed out into the infirmary exercise-hall, now dark, Hogarth dragging the Cockney, who limped, and kept up a prattle of tipsy ribaldries.

Then, emerging upon a platform of slabs, from which the jump into the infirmary exercise-yard is twenty feet, Hogarth leapt. The Cockney stood hesitating on the brink.

“As sure as my name’s ‘Arris, you’ll be the bloomin’ ruin of me...” he said aloud.

“Sh-h-h”, went Hogarth, “one more word, and I leave or knock you speechless”.

Now at last Harris jumped, Hogarth catching him, and they ran across the yard northerly, Harris complaining of cold, being in hospital flannels, his feet bare, Hogarth bitterly regretting the burden of this companion, meditating on deserting him. Accordingly, when they had run down a passage, and were confronted by a great gate, spiked a-top, Hogarth said: “I’ll get up first”, and, forcing the small end of the truncheon into the space at the hinges, he got foot-hold from which he caught the top hinge and scaled, a feat of which he considered Harris incapable; and, instead of helping him up, leapt down with a new feeling of lightness, hearing from the other side “Dastardly treachery...!”

Again he ran through dark night wild with winds wheeling snowflakes; and, seeing in the unpaved court in which he now was a clothes-line supported on stakes, he seized both, to run with them to where the court is bounded by the great outer wall: for though it is thirty feet of sheer rock, the mere fact of stakes being found there, and of a vanished rope, would furnish grounds for the belief that he had scaled it: he therefore leant the stakes against it, and kept the rope.

About to turn, he felt his back touched; and, spinning round, saw Harris panting.

“There’s a friend that sticketh closer than any bloomin’ brother, Mr. 76”, Harris said. “Try that game on again, and I give myself up; and where will you be then?”

“You silly wretch!” said Hogarth: “before I am free, there’ll be a hundred difficulties and pains. Are you prepared to undergo them? You couldn’t, if you tried”.

“Bear ye one another’s burdens, it is”, said Harris: “with thee by me what need I fear? Lawd Gawd, that wine was good! it’s got into my poor ‘ead, I believe. On, general; where thou leadest, I will follow”.

Hogarth looked at him, half inclined to knock him down, and half to shelter, and save.

“All right”, said he. “Can you climb?”

“Climb, yes, like a bag of monkeys”.

“Come, then”.

He mounted three low steps before four doors at the north end of the infirmary buildings, where, as he had observed from the moor, a spout runs up the wall at its east end; and up this he began to climb.

““Old on!” called Harris: “I can’t do that lot”.

“Sh-h-h! — you must! — come—”

Harris made three attempts before he reached the first footrest, and there stuck, vowing in loud whispers that he would no further go, and Hogarth had to come back, and encourage him up. Finally, they went running southward on the leads between the infirmary roof and its coping, and had hardly reached the south end when a whistle shrilled, and they saw a warder run across the exercise-yard with a lantern.

“Stoop!” whispered Hogarth.

Crouching, they stole along the south coping, and thence dropped to a flat cistern-top, Hogarth, with a painful “Sh-h-h”, catching Harris as he fell, for the signs of alarm and activity every moment increased.

Up a series of little brick steps, the base of a chimney over the kitchen — then across another stretch of leads beneath which is the tailor’s shop — then, stealing in shadow under the beams of overhanging eaves by a garret window, behind which was a light, and someone moving — then a spring of three feet between two cornices — then a running walk at a height of a hundred feet along a beading four inches wide, holding on with the upstretched arms — then, with course changed from south to east, along more leads — then a climb of ten feet up a glazed main — and now they were skulking behind the coping of the great No. 2 prison.

Now, contiguous with the back of the bath-house is a wall which runs from No. 2 prison to the bell-tower, dividing the bath-house yard from the bell-yard; but the top is not horizontal, being lower at the bell-tower end, neither is it broad, and to reach it from the prison coping a drop of seven feet is necessary: this Harris refused to do. “Not for Joe”, said he: “I’ve already run my ‘ead into enough perils by land and sea on your account. If this is what you’ve brought me out moonlighting here for....”

Hogarth did not wait, but disappeared over the side: and Harris, after five minutes’ pleadings, followed. They then drew on the belly to the bell-tower; and here again Harris refused the leap to the conductor. When finally he dared, and Hogarth sought to steady him, as he came sprawling upon the rod, both went gliding down, till checked by a staple.

But they climbed again; Hogarth undid the half-fused string of tin from the conductor, swung to the laundry coping, caught Harris, leapt to the window, drew up Harris; and was ensconced far up among the beams in thick darkness in the belfry an hour before daybreak.

At this time the great gates were open, and the moor being scoured for the two.

XXI. IN THE DEEP

THEY HAD NOT been ten minutes in the tower when Harris began to whine of the cold; whereupon Hogarth took off his slop-jacket and waistcoat, and put them upon the Cockney.

As from two sound-escapes far down near the bell some twilight came in, near eight Hogarth descended, working from beam to beam, to find that on one side the bell-metal had been melted into a lumpish mass, its rim shrivelled up, leaving an empty space under the motto Laudate Domino (mistake for Dominum) omnes gentes; and on the opposite side ran a crack from top to rim. Sliding still lower on a slanting beam, he could look obliquely upward into the bell's interior, and see the clapper, a mass weighing eight hundredweight, and so long, that quite down at the bell's rim were two hollows where it had constantly struck. It, too, had been blasted; but the bell-rope hung intact from a short beam at right angles to the swing beam; and, having found this much, he searched where he had left the bottom of his tin can, and clambered back with it into the upper regions.

About eleven, lying along two beams, they could see the portal below opened, and four men came in, looking unreal and small; whereupon the leverage wheel was pulled, the swing-beam swung, the bell struck the clapper, and throughout the tower growled grum sounds: after which the four stood talking half an hour, and went away.

A little later — it must have been after the forty minutes' dinner-interval — about twenty convicts entered with two warders, bearing three ladders.

When these had been fastened together and set up, and the leverage wheel removed, they went away.

It was evidently to be slow work. Not till about four did a solitary man mount the ladder, and take stand, far down under the bell, gazing up a long while, with stoops, and changes of posture. Hogarth thought that it was the bell-foundry expert whom he had seen; but could only guess: for all here was dim and remote.

By now he had sawed the clothes-line into two pieces with the tin, one piece eight feet, the other much longer — had intended tearing his clothes into strips for ropes, but the clothes-line was still better. In both ropes he made knots for hand-hold, a large knot at one end of the short one, and he attached the string of tin to the other end. Descending now, he tied the longer rope round the swingbeam, let himself down to the rim of the bell, and with the right hand pushed the tin into the hole in which the clapper swung, reaching up, until the tin over-balanced, ran, and toppled down beside the clapper; drawing the tin now, he brought the rope down till it was stopped by the knot; and now, by a swing off from rope to rope, could climb into the bell. He then reascended, taking the longer rope, and the tin, with him.

As night fell, he judged that by the next he would succumb. Happily, Harris, who had eaten later than he, was snoring in a nook; but toward morning began to whine again, and sulk, and kept it up all the day. Not a soul now entered, and as the blackness of night once more filled the place, Harris threw up the sponge, with “Here goes for this child....!” Hogarth flew across the space which divided them, and a quarrel of cats ensued, both being under the influence of the fury called “hunger-madness”. It was only when Harris felt the grip of Hogarth at his windpipe that he squealed submission, whereupon Hogarth threw himself away; and half the night they sat, nothing but four eyes, eyeing each other.

That night what was a revival of the great gale took place, belling like bucks about their heads, and noising through the tower in many a voice. This so increased their sense of desolation, that even the heart of Hogarth fainted, they like castaways on some ocean whose glooms no sunrise ever goldens; and now a doubt arose whether, even if the bell were removed on the morrow, Harris would have strength to cling on during the descent.

However, early the next day hope revived when five men entered, four mounting among the beams to the swing-beam with tools, one at the ladder-head shouting up orders; and Hogarth, when they had gone, whispered Harris: “They have been unscrewing the sockets in which the bell-beam swings”.

“Let them unscrew away”, said Harris, his chin shivering on his hand.

Five more hours; during which only once did three men enter, seeming to do nothing but talk, with upward glances.

But at three it was evident that there was considerable to-do, though above there the row of the winds drowned all sound. A crowd, chiefly of convicts, passed in and out; then twelve men, one after the other, ran up the ladder, and thence climbed among the beams, with six cables. Half went to the east, half to the west, side of the bell; and three of the cables were fastened round the swing-beam near one end, three near the other end; one three were then cast over a beam higher than the swing-beam, to the north of it; the other three cast over a beam to the south of it; and the six ends lowered — operations which Hogarth, lying on his face, could just see; and the twelve had hardly begun to descend, when he saw a lorry backed into the gateway, filling half the area of the tower; whereupon over a hundred convicts were swarming over and round it.

“Now”, said Hogarth; and he hurried down, tacking his way with slides and runs among the intricate beams, tied the rope to a beam above the swing-beam, and let himself down to the bell’s rim; reached out then, caught the knotted rope that was within the bell, and climbed, the clapper now so rough, that hand and knee found grip; and he spent a minute in estimating his power of holding on with one arm, and with both, to its support-shaft.

And now he whispered Harris, and caught and half-sustained the Cockney.

Now they could hear echoes of the tongues below; and now Harris, clinging alternate with Hogarth, arms and legs, face to face, by rope and shaft and clapper, whispered: “But-good Lord-look ’ere-there are some people coming up!”

Four convicts were indeed climbing: but even directly beneath the bell, where it was impossible to come, they would hardly have distinguished the forms huddled in its dark cavern, and their aim was higher, to stand ready, when the beam should lift, to swing it diagonally across the square of beams which had supported it, so that it might find space to descend. And soon the bell-beam stirred at the tightening ropes: the fugitives felt themselves swinging, rising, poised — descending.

They were dizzily aware of shouted orders, the creaking of the toiling, slipping ropes, little jolts and stoppages, two hundred eyes blinking up, not seeing their cringed-up limbs — unnecessary cautious: for the nearer they descended to-ward the half-light, the surer did the area of the lorry make their invisibility. At last they were near; the bell lingered, swinging; babel was around them; the Governor’s voice; a cheer: the bell was on the lorry.

Someone struck the bell with a hammer, there was talk, swarmings round it, then shoulders pushed at the lorry wheels, which squealed and moved amid a still fussier babel drawn by four horses, and seven yoke of cattle. The fugitives could hear the opening of the great gate, the laborious exit, and, in a moment's pause, again the Governor talking, it seemed far off, to the expert....

Wearily creaked the cart — beyond the moor — to a country road.

Now chattering words came from Harris: "All damned fine! I don't deny that you know your way about—"

"Way out", said Hogarth.

"Yes, a gamesome sort of cock you are in all weathers...but what next?"

"'Next' is to fall upon your knees and worship me, you cur".

"Thou shalt worship the Lawd thy Gawd", chattered Harris; "no bloomin' fear! This is only a new kind of punishment cell. You've got me in; 'ow are you going to get me out?"

Hogarth believed that the lorry was en route for the railway, and hoped to escape in the transfer of the bell; but that night lorry and bell slept in a shed outside a village en route for the sea.

At four A.M. they were again en route, and at intervals during the day, opening their now feeble and sleep-infected eyes, could hear the hoots of the two cattlemen, the sound of winds, the rowdy gait of the crooked-legged oxen, and stoppages for drink or rest, and anon an obstruction, with shouting and fuss. It was night before the waggon came to rest on a jetty, the elaborate day's journey done.

The fugitives were then deep in sleep, and only awoke at the rattle of a steam-crane in action above them, to find the bell beginning to tilt, lift and swing; then they were on a deck; and soon afterwards knew that it was a steamer's, when they heard the bray of her whistle, and presently were aware of blaring winds, and billows of the sea.

Harris was for then and there crying out, but Hogarth, now his master, said: “To-morrow morning”; and they fell again into their morbid slumber.

When they again awoke, uproar surrounded them, voices, a heaven-high shouting of quenched fires and screaming steams; moreover, the bell was leaning steeply, they two huddled together at its edge.

Harris began to bellow: but he was not heard, or not heeded.... There had been a collision.

“If you can’t swim, better catch hold of me”, Hogarth shouted— “there will be—”

But the earth turned turtle, and Hogarth felt himself struck on the shoulder, flung, and dragged down, down, into darkness.

After an upward climb and fight to slip the clutch of the ship’s suction, in the middle of a heavy sea he managed to get off his clothes, and set to swimming, whither he did not know, a toy on mountains of water.

Exultation raged in him — a crazy intoxication — at liberation attained, at the sensation of warmth, at all that water and waste of Nature.

But within ten minutes it is finished: he shivers, his false strength changing to paltriness, the waves washing now over his head; and now he is drowsing...drowning...

XXII. OLD TOM

HE CONTINUED, HOWEVER, to swim after his conscious efforts ceased: for his body was found next morning on a strip of Cornish sand between Gorran and Mevagissey, washed by every sheet of surf.

His rescuer, a shrimp-fisher, occupied one of three cots perched on a ravine; and there on the evening of the second day he opened his eyes on a settee, four children screaming in play around him; he so far having been seen only by a reporter from Mevagissey, and the doctor from Gorran, who, on his wide rounds, had been asked into the cottage.

The same night Hogarth spoke to the fisher: told him that he was not a wrecked sailor, had reasons for avoiding observation, and would pay for shelter and silence: whereat the fisher, who was drinking hot beer, winked, and promised; and the next day took for Hogarth a telegram, signed "Elm Tree", to Mevagissey, asking of Loveday five pounds.

Finally, one midnight, after two weeks of skulking, he reached Whitechapel, where, the fact of his brown skin now giving him the idea of orientalizing himself, at a Jew's, in a little interior behind the counter, he bought sandals, a caftan, a black sudayree, an old Bagdad shawl for girdle, and a greenish-yellow Bedouin head-cloth, or keffie, which banded the forehead, draped the face like a nun's wimple, and fell loose. For these he discarded the shrimp-man's clothes; and now dubbed himself "Peter the Hermit".

For he meant to start-a Crusade.

At a police-station on the third day he saw a description of himself: three moles, bloodshot eye, white teeth, pouting mouth; but over the moles now hung the head-cloth.

For several days he lay low in a garret, considering himself, abandoning himself to sensuality in cocoa, vast buns, tobacco: rioting above all in the thought of the secret truth which lay in his head.

Up to now, not a word to anyone about it; but on the seventh night he spoke.

It was in some “Cocoa Rooms” in a “first-class room”, strewn with sawdust, where, as he sat alone, another man, bearing his jug, came and sat; and soon he addressed Hogarth.

“Talk English?”

“I am an Englishman”, answered Hogarth.

“What, in those togs? What countryman?”

“Norfolk”.

“Know Manchester?”

“I was there one day”.

“Difference between Manchester and London, isn’t there? I am a Manchester man, I am. All the difference in the world. This cold, stiff, selfish city. Londoners, eh? A lot of peripatetic tombstones!”

And so he went on; this being his whole theory of God and Man: that Londoners are peripatetic tombstones, but Manchester-men just the other way — seemed a mechanic, brisk-eyed, small; a man who had read; but now, evidently, down on his luck.

“Then, why come to London?” — from Hogarth.

“Looking for work”, — with a shrug— “looking for a needle in a bundle of hay. What would you have? the whole place overrun with Jews. England no longer belongs to the English, that’s the long and short of it”.

Hogarth looked him in the face. “Did England belong to the English before the Jews came?”

“How do you mean? Of course it did”.

“Which part of it?”

“Why, all of it”.

“But fix your mind upon some particular piece of England — some street, or field, that you know — and then tell me: did that belong to the English?”

“Belonged to some Englishman”.

“But you don’t mean to say that some Englishman is the English?”

“Ah, yes, I know what you are driving at”, said the mechanic, with a patronizing nod: “but the point is this: that, apart from vague theorizing, a man did manage to make a good living before these dogs overran the country”.

“But — a good living? How much did you make? — forty shillings a week? toiling in grime six days, sleeping the seventh? I call that a deadly living”.

“Well, I don’t, you see. Besides, I made, not forty, but forty-five shillings, under the sliding-scale”.

“Yes, but no brave nation would submit one day to such petty squalors after it was shown the way to escape them”.

“There is no way”, said the mechanic: “there are the books, and the talkers; but the economic laws that govern the units like you and me are as relentless as gravitation. Don’t believe anyone who talks to you about ‘ways of escape’”.

“But suppose someone has a new thought?”

“There can be no new thoughts about that. The question has long since been exhausted”.

“Well, come “ — with sudden decision— “I will tell you a thought of my own “. And he told.

If the English people paid the rent for England to themselves — to their government — instead of to a few Englishmen, then, by one day’s labour in six, Englishmen would be much more rich in all things than a fisherman, by one day’s labour in six, was rich in fish.

The expression which he awaited on the face before him was one of illuminated astonishment; but, with a chill in his nerves, he saw the workman’s lips curve.

“Bah!” said the Manchester man, “that is an exploded theory!”

Exploded!!!

Hogarth was rather pale.

Yet he knew that it was true....Who, then, could have been exploding the Almighty?

“Who has exploded it?”

“Been exploded again and again!” said the Manchester man; “of all the theories of land-tenure, that is about the weakest: I should know, for I’ve studied them all. The fact is, no change in the system of land-tenure will have the least effect upon the lot of the masses; would only make things worse by unsettling the country — if it didn’t mean a civil war”.

“I begin to see”.

Hogarth got up, walked home meditating: and suddenly blushed.

It was known! by mechanics in cocoa-rooms! — that secret thing of his secret cell. And it was not believed!

As for him, what was he now doing outside Colmoor? That question he asked himself, as he sat unsandaling his feet; and he commenced to dress himself again: but paused — would first see Loveday.

Accordingly, the next night, the two friends met at Cheyne Gardens.

And a long time they sat silent, Loveday feeding his eyes upon his friend's face, that hard, rounded brow which seemed harder, and frowned now, that gallant largeness of eye which seemed now wilder, and that manly height, which seemed Mahomet's in the Oriental dress.

"But where have you been for five weeks?" asked Loveday.

"Skulking, and thinking. But about my sister...."

"Do not ask..." said Loveday.

There was a long silence.

"Did not O'Hara tell you to make no more efforts for my escape?" asked Hogarth.

"Who is O'Hara?"

"Why, the priest who escaped, instead of me, through the copse".

"O'Hara was not the name he gave me; and no, he said nothing about that. I got him off to America, and only saw him twice. I thought him rather — But why didn't you escape yourself?"

"I thought it improper".

"But you did finally?"

"For a reason: you remember the association which I was forming to answer the question as to the cause of misery? Well, that question I have answered for myself in prison".

"Really? Tell me!"

Hogarth absently took up a water-colour drawing from the table, and turned it round and round, leaning forward on a knee, as he told how the matter was. Meantime, he kept his eyes fixed upward upon Loveday's face, who stood before him.

In the midst of his talk Loveday scratched the top of his head, where the hair was rather thin, and said he, twisting round: "Forgive me-let me ring for some brandy-and-soda—"

Hogarth stood briskly up.

“What I say, I can see, is not new to you?” said he.

“No, not new”, Loveday confessed: “I believe that it is quite an ancient theory; there are even savage tribes whose land-tenure is not unlike what you advocate — the Basutos, for example”.

“And are these Basutos richer, happier, prettier fellows than average Englishmen?”

“Oh, beyond doubt. Don’t suppose that I am gainsaying you: I am only showing you that the theory is not new—”

“But why do you persist in calling it a theory? Is the fact that one and one make two a theory?” — Hogarth’s brow growing every moment redder.

“What can one call it?”

“Call it what you like! But do you believe it?”

“It is quite possibly true; and now that you say it I believe it; but I have never seriously considered the matter.”

“Why not?”

“Because — I don’t know. It is out of my line”.

“Your line! Yet you are a human being—”

“Well, partly, yes: say — a novelist”.

“Do not jest! It is incredible to me that you have written book after book, and knew of this divine thing, and did not cram your books with it!”

Loveday flushed. “You misunderstand my profession; and as to this theory of land-tenure, let me tell you: it will never be realized — not in England. Anyway, it would mean civil war....”

Again those words! “Civil war....”

And as, for the second time, he heard them, Hogarth dashed the picture which he held to the ground, shattering glass and frame: which meant that, then and there, he washed his hands of the world and its wagging; meant also his return to Colmoor.

He dashed from the room without a word; down the stairs; out into the street.

As he ran along the King's Road, he asked a policeman the way to the nearest police-station, then ran on through a number of smaller streets, seeking it, till, at a corner, he stopped, once more uncertain, the night dim and drizzling.

He was about to set off again, when, behind him, he heard: "Excuse me, mister — could you give a poor man a penny to get a night's lodging?"

Turning, he saw — old Tom Bates: still in the guernsey; but very senile and broken now.

The fish-rich fisher...! he had come to this...

Hogarth had twenty-eight shillings about him, and, without disclosing himself, put hand to pocket to give them all, just as the old man reached up to his ear to say: "It's the lumbago; I got it very bad; but it won't be long now. It wur a bad day for me as ever I come to Lunnon! I'm Norfolk born, I am: and I had eight sons, which the last was Fred, who, they say, met his death in Colmoor...."

At that word, "Fred", Hogarth started: for under the elm in the beech-wood between Thring and Priddlestone Fred had concealed a thing fallen from heaven, which could be sold for — a thousand pounds.

That would keep the fisher rich during the few days that remained to him!

But the old man could hardly go himself; if he could, would bungle: the thing was heavy — on the lord-of-the-manor's land....

Do a kind act, Hogarth. He would see the old place, his father's grave; and there was a girl who lived in the Hall at Westring whom it was a thrilling thing to be near, even if one did not see....

“Here are two shillings”, said he, in an assumed voice: “and if you be at this spot, at this hour, on Thursday night coming, you shall have more. Don’t fail”.

Again he ran, and took train, two hours later, for Beccles.

XXIII. UNDER THE ELM

HIS RISK OF arrest here, round about his old home, was enormous, and he drew the Bedouin keffie well round his face, skulking from the station to the “Fen”, northward, where he got an urchin to buy him a paper lantern in a general shop, and now trudged up to Priddlestone, then down through meadows to the beech-wood, the night rough with March winds.

It was not the winds, however, which made him draw close his Arab cloak, but his approach to the elm: there, one night, he had seen a naked black man! there had fallen the Arab Jew.

He stood twenty yards from the tree, till, with sudden resolution, he strode, soon had the lantern ruby, and since the grave of “the affair” had been dug with a piece of wood, for such a piece he went seeking, having thrown off his caftan.

Instead, he found the rusted half-blade of a spade, and commenced to dig round the roots, the lantern shine reddening a face strangely agitated, uncertainty of finding what he sought heightening his excitement: for the earth showed no disturbance, and since three years had passed since that night of Bates in the wood, the object might have been already unearthed. After an hour his back was aching, his hands dabbled, his brow beaded, while the night-winds blew, the light now was commoved, and now glowed a steady red; and still he grovelled.

Presently, as he shovelled in a circle, always two feet deep, moving the light as he moved, he saw on the top of a shovelful of marl — a twig: barkless, black, cracked — scorched!

To an immoderate degree this thing agitated him — some whisper in the back of his head — some half-thought: he began now to root furiously, with a frowning intentness.

But suddenly he shuddered: a finger seemed to touch his shoulder behind; and he twisted with wild eyes, caught up the light, peered, saw no black man — nothing: but quite five minutes he stood defiant, with clenched fists; then resumed the work, though with a constant feeling now that he was being watched by the unseen seers.

After two new strokes he struck upon something hard, and, digging eagerly round it, found a quart-can, full of earth. And instantly all doubt vanished: for this must have been the beer-can carried by Bates.

Strong curiosity now wrought in Hogarth, a zeal to lay eyes upon that object which had careered through the heights of space to find that beech-wood and that elm-tree; and during fifteen minutes his little implement digged with the quick-plying movement of a distaff-shuttle, he fighting for breath, anon casting a flying wild glance behind, but still digging.

Now, frequently, he came upon burned objects, twigs, cinders. Even the marl had a scorched look; and his agitation grew to ecstasy.

Something very singular had happened to his mind with regard to this “affair” of Bates: Bates had said that it had fallen on the asteroid night; and O’Hara had told him — falsely, indeed — that a piece of the asteroid, fallen upon the French coast, had had diamonds; yet, somehow, never once had his mind associated the Fred Bates “affair” with the thought of diamonds, but only with the “thousand pounds” which Bates had been promised by old Bond. So at the moment when he had begun to dig, his whole thought was of “a thousand pounds”; but, somehow, by the time his implement at last grated against something two feet down, that word “diamonds” had grown up in his brain.

But diamonds! In the midst of his shovelling the thought flashed through him: “The world is God’s! and to whom He wills He gives it....”

Now at last the thing lay definitely before him: he grated the spade from end to end, scraping away the marl; and it was very rough....

The size and shape of a man’s leg, and red, anyway in the red lantern-shine — his sight dim — he moved and saw in an improbable dream; and when he tried to lift the object and failed, for a long time he sat on the edge of the trench, passing one palm across and across his forehead, till the lantern-light leapt, and went out.

He sprang upright then — awake, sure: they were diamonds, those bits of glass, big celestial ones, not of earth, in hundreds; when he passed his hand along the meteorite he felt it leprous, octahedron, dodecahedron, large and small: if they were truly diamonds, he divined that their owner must be as wealthy as some nations.

About three in the morning he managed to raise the meteorite; refilled the trench; and since it still rained, rolled the meteorite to the hollow of the elm, put on his caftan, and with his back on the interior of the tree, his feet on the meteorite, tumbled into a wonderful slumber.

XXIV. FRANKL SEES THE METEORITE

HE WAS AWAKED by a footstep, and, starting, saw rocking along the forest path one Farmer Pollock, wearing now fez and tassel, and he saw his clothes all clay, and, with a smile of fondness, saw how, even beneath its grime, the meteor dodged and jeered, with frolic leers, in the beams of a bright morning that seemed to him the primal morning, a fresh wedding-morning, swarming with elves and shell-tinted visions, imps and pixy princes, profligate Golcondas.

Going first to the spot where he had digged, to give to the surface a natural look, he trampled the lantern into the mire, threw the tin can far, then, taking a quantity of marl, plastered the meteorite, to cover its roughness; then boldly left it, starting out with consummate audacity for Thring, where everybody, police and all, knew him well.

A singular light now in his eyes, an evil pride; and he had the step of a Prince in Prettyland. Corresponding to an inward majesty, of which, from youth, he had been conscious, he now felt an outward, and had not been awake eight minutes when his brain was invaded by plans — plans of debauchery, palaces, orgy, flying beds of ivory arabesqued in fan-traceries of sapphire, in which Rebekah Frankl lolled, and smiled; and on toward Thring he stepped, prince new-crowned, yet by old heredity, high exalted above laws, government, and the entire little muck of Man.

At one point where the path ran close to Westring-park proper, the park on higher ground, a grass-bank seven feet high dividing them, he saw a-top of the bank in caftan, priest-cap, and phylacteries, taking snuff — Baruch Frankl.

Hogarth skipped up, and stood before the Jew, having drawn his face-cloth well forward.

“Could you give a poor man a job?”

“You a Jew?”

“Yes”, replied Hogarth, not dreaming how truly: “London born”.

“A Froom?”

“I keep the fasts”.

“What you doing about here?”

“Tramping”.

“Fine mess you are in”.

“I slept in a hollow tree down yonder — an elm tree”.

“Well, there’s many a worse shake-down than that. Who are you? Ever been about here before?”

“I was once”.

“You put me in mind of an old chum of mine....Well, here’s half-a-crown for you to go on with”.

“Make it a crown”, said Hogarth, “and get me to clean up down there; in a shocking state with mast and leaves”.

Frankl considered. “All right, I don’t mind”.

“I shall want a spade, and — a barrow”.

“Go down the path yonder, till you come to the stables, and tell them”.

Frankl resumed his musing stroll, and Hogarth ran for the barrow.

In twenty minutes he was again at the elm tree, and, with a scheme in him for seeing Rebekah, heaped the barrow with refuse, pushed it between a beck and the wood, till, wearying of this, he was about to get the meteorite into the barrow, when he had the mad thought that Frankl must be made to see and touch it, so set off to seek him: and a few yards brought him face to face with Frankl.

“Well, how goes it?” asked the Jew.

“There is a weight there which I can’t lift”, said Hogarth. “Then you must do the other thing. Don’t lift it, and you don’t get the pay. What weight is it?”

“It is here”.

Hogarth led him, led him, pointing. Frankl kicked the meteorite.

“What is it?” he asked.

“It can’t be a branch”, said Hogarth; “too heavy — more like a piece of old iron”.

“Well, slip into it. A strapping fellow like you ought to be able to do that bit”.

“But suppose it’s valuable?”

“I make you a present of it, as you are so hard up”.

Now Hogarth, by tilting the barrow, with strong effort of four limbs, got the meteorite lodged, while Frankl, his smile lifting the wrinkles above his thick moustache, watched the strain: then, with arms behind, went his contemplative way.

Hogarth rolled the barrow toward Thring.

XXV. CHURCH ARCHITECTURE

IT WAS ALREADY eleven o'clock, the sun shining in a bright sky, under which the country round the Waveney lay broad to the hills of mist which seemed to encompass the valley; yet, when one came to them no hills were there, but were still beyond. When Hogarth came out from the wood upon a footbridge, to his right a hand-sower was sowing broadcast, with a two-handed rhythm, taking seed, as he strode, from his scrip; and to the left ran a path between fields to an eminence with a little church on it; straight northward some Thring houses visible, and north-east, near the river, Lagden Dip orchard. Only two stooping women in fields near Thring could Hogarth see; also, still further, a gig-and-horse whose remote motion was imperceptible; also the trudging two-handed process of the sower nourishing the furrows. But for these, England, supposed to be "overcrowded", seemed a land once inhabited, but abandoned.

To Hogarth the whole, so familiar, looked uplifted now, the sunlight of a more celestial essence. Westring he would buy — though one memorable night in Colmoor he had arrived at the knowledge that it was not just that Westring should be anyone's; but then what one bought with his own diamonds was surely his own — his name being Richard.

He had passed the bridge, when, glancing to the left, he saw a fifth person in the landscape — a man under a sycamore near the church, gazing up, with hung jaw, at the apse window — dressed in a grey jacket, but a clerical hat, and he had a note-book, in which he wrote, or drew. Hogarth, whose mind was in weathercock state, rolled the barrow to the hill, left it, went stealing fleetly up, and gripped the man's collar, to whisper: "In the King's name I arrest you".

The man's hand clapped his heart, as he turned a face of terror.

"There is — some mistake — My God! Are you — ?"

"Yes".

"Hogarth?"

"Who else?"

"But you have killed me! My heart—"

"Serves you right. Why didn't you give your right name to Loveday? And what are you doing here?"

"I was just examining this lovely old church, with its two south aisles, and one north, like St. John's at Cirencester. When the church fell in England, architecture was abolished — But as to why I am in Norfolk at all, I am skulking: and here is as another place. Your friend packed me off to America; but for some reasons I should prefer Golmoor — old Colmoor, eh? I fear I am a voluptuary, my son, fond of comfort, and old things, and pretty things. And all that I shall have yet! Tut, O'Hara is not done with the world, nor it with him. As to Norfolk, I once knew — a person — in this neighbourhood—"

The priest paused, regarding Hogarth with a smile, the "person" meant being Hogarth's mother; and he said: "But you are quite the Jew in dress: do you know now, then, that you are of the Chosen Race?"

"Singular notion! This is a mere disguise".

"Ah. But you look quite radiant. You must have come into a fortune. When I heard of your escape, I said to myself—"

"How did you hear?"

"Why, from Harris".

"Harris is drowned".

“Harris is now under that little roof down there — there” — the prelate stabbed with his forefinger: “Harris is my shadow; Harris is my master. He was picked up naked by the ship which ran down your vessel, recognized me one day in Broadway, and threatened to give me in charge if I did not adopt him ‘as my well-beloved son’. Well, from him I heard all, how you called fire from Heaven — it was gallant. But aren’t you afraid of capture down here in your own country?”

“I cannot be captured”.

Those stony eyeballs of O’Hara, bulging from out circular trenches round their sockets, surveyed Hogarth, weighing, divining him, while his bottom lip, massive as the mouth of Polynesian stone gods, trembled.

“How do you mean?”

“I can buy King on throne, Judge on bench, Governor and Warder, the whole machinery. Even O’Hara I could buy”.

“I am for sale! Hogarth! I smelled it about you, the myrrh of your garments! And didn’t I prophesy it to you years ago? What a development! That beast, Harris, will dance for joy! Oh, there is something very artistic to my fancy, Hogarth, in the metal gold — brittle, bright, orpimented—”

“And diamonds?”

“Hogarth, have you diamonds?”

“Yes”, said Hogarth, smiling at the effect of ecstasy upon O’Hara.

“Prismic diamond!” cried the prelate: “but how — ?”

“Do you want to enter my service?”

“Do I want?”

“Well, I want a tutor, O’Hara; and you shall be the man. Undertake, then, to teach me all you know in two years, and I’ll give you — how much? — twenty thousand pounds a year”.

“My son”, whispered O’Hara, “what a development — !”

“Good-bye. In Thring Street there is a little paper-shop. Come there to-night at seven”.

He ran down the hill: and as he went northward, pushing his barrow, O’Hara had a lens at his eyes, saw the meteorite, and wondered.

XXVI. FRANKL AND O'HARA

MRS. STURGESS, OF the paper-shop, a clean, washed-out old lady, held up both averting hands at her back door, as Hogarth threw back his keffie, finger on lips; but soon, her alarm warming into welcome, she took him to a room above, to listen to his story of escape.

“And to think”, said she, “there is the very box your sister, poor thing, left with me to keep the day she went away, which never once have I seen her dear good face from that day to this. Anyway, there’s the box—” pointing to a trunk covered with grey goat’s-hair, the trunk to which the old Hogarth had referred in telling Richard the secret of his birth, saying to deaf ears that it contained Richard’s “papers” — a box double-bottomed, on its top the letters “P. O.”, with a cross-of-Christ under them.

“But, sir”, said Mrs. Sturgess, “you must be in great danger here. I hope” — with a titter— “I shan’t be implicated—”

“Don’t be afraid, Mrs. Sturgess, it will be all right, and, for yourself, don’t trouble about the paper-shop any more, but buy a little villa near Florence, where it is warm for the cough — don’t think me crazy if I tell you that I am a very rich man. Now give me a steak”.

Mrs. Sturgess served him well that day with a pang of expectancy at her heart! Always, she remembered, Richard Hogarth had been strange — uplifted and apart — a man incalculable, winged, unknown, though walking the common ways. He might be a “very rich man”...

His meal over, Hogarth threw himself upon a bed, to dream another trouble of bubbles and burden of purples; woke at four; and, with a procured cold-chisel, hammer, and a calico bag, went to the fowl-house where he had left the meteorite, shut himself in.

Sitting in the dust there, he set to chisel out the gems from the porous ore, and as the chisel won the luscious plums, held them up, glutting his gaze, scratched his name on a fragment of window-pane, and was enchanted that the adamant rim ripped the glass like rag: the whim, meanwhile, working in him to purchase Colmoor, to turn the moor into a paradise, the prison into a palace; where his old cell stood in Gallery No. III to be the bedroom of Rebekah.

To see her that very night was a necessity! and when it was dark he set out.

But that plot failed: on presenting himself at the front of the mansion, he was sent round to the back, where he received payment, and was dismissed; and when he again started for the front, intending to force his way in, he decided upon something else, and walked back to Thring.

He reached the Sturgess cottage soon after six, ate, with a candle returned to the lean-to to resume his work, and was still intent upon it at seven, when Mrs. Sturgess ran out to tell him that “the gentleman had come”. He said: “Show him up to my room”.

The first thing which O’Hara noticed in that room was the goat-hair trunk, with the initials and cross, the initials his own.

After some minutes he furtively turned the key, dived into a mass of things, paused to remember the whereabouts of a spring, found it, and, lifting the upper bottom, peered beneath; saw a bundle of papers; and, without removing the band, ferreted among them, and was satisfied — Hogarth’s “birth-papers”.

He presently went to a back window, and saw ruddy streaks between the boarding of the shanty, while sounds of the hammer reached him.

He would go and meet Hogarth: no harm in that; but it was stealthily that he hurried down the stair and carried himself across the yard, grinning a grimace of self-conscious caution, to peep through a cranny.

Hogarth's back was toward him, the iron leg lying near a box in which was a sitting hen, on its top a candlestick, the calico bag, and a lot of the gems: at which the priest's palm covered his awed mouth, and with a fleet thievishness, like a cat on hot bricks, he trotted back to the cottage.

Ten minutes later Hogarth entered, nodding: "Ah, O'Hara..."; and he called down: "Mrs. Sturgess! pen, ink, and paper!"

When these came, he sat and wrote:

"I have escaped from prison, and come into great power. I summon you to meet me at the elm in the beech-wood to-night at nine. I beseech you, I entreat you. I burn to ashes. Rebekah! My flames of fire! I am dying.

"R. H."

He enclosed, and handed it, without any address, to O'Hara.

"O'Hara", said he, "I want you to take that for me. Come — I will show you the place. You ask in the hall to see 'the young lady': her name does not concern you; but you can't mistake her: she is so-pretty. Give the note to no one else, of course: it mentions my escape, for one thing. I know you will do it well".

He conducted O'Hara, till the two towers of Westring were visible; pointed them out; then went back, and in an hour had finished his work on the diamonds.

O'Hara, meantime, going on his way alone, muttered: "You go fast, Hogarth: prelates of the Church your errand boys? But there is a little fellow called Alf Harris...if he had seen what I have seen to-night, you would be a corpse now".

In twenty minutes he was at Westring, which he knew well, for twenty-five years before he had lived in the Vale: but he supposed that Lord Westring de Broom was still the inmate.

He asked to see “the young lady”, persisted, and after a time Rebekah came with eyebrows of inquiry.

The moment O’Hara saw her well, his visage acquired a ghastly ribbed fixity. Even before this, she, by one flashed glance, had known him.

But she took the envelope with easy coolness. And, instead of then returning upon her steps, went still beyond, and whispered to two men in the hall: “Do not let that man pass out!”

As she again returned inward past O’Hara, she remarked: “You might wait here a little”.

She travelled then, not hurrying, down the breadth of a great apartment to a side room where her father sat, capped and writing; and she said: “Papa, the man who assaulted me in the train is now in the hall. As his sentence was three years, he must have escaped—” She was gone at once, the unaddressed envelope, still unopened, shivering a little in her hand.

Frankl leapt up, rather pale, thinking that if the man had come here, he must mean mischief; but remembering that the man was a gentleman, a priest, he took heart, and went out.

O’Hara, meantime, stood at bay, guessing his exit blocked, while the terrors of death gat hold upon him, the flesh of his yellow jaw shivering. But he was a man of stern mind — stern as the rocky aspect of his face, and the moment he saw Frankl coming (he had seen him in the Court), he started to meet him — stooped to the Jew’s ear, who shrank delicately from contact.

“There isn’t any good in running me down, sir”, he whispered in sycophant haste. “I pledge you my word I came here without knowing to whom. O do, now! I have already suffered for my crime; and if you attempt to capture me, I do assure you, I strangle you where you stand! Do, now! I only brought a letter—”

Frankl, half inclined to tyrannize over misery, and half afraid, swept his hand down the beard.

“Letter?” said he: “from whom?”

“From a friend”.

“Which friend?”

“A man named Hogarth”.

O’Hara said it in an awful whisper, though not aware of any relation between Hogarth and Frankl.

Whereupon an agitation waved down Frankl’s beard. The news that “a man named Hogarth” had written to his daughter would hardly have suggested Richard — safe elsewhere; but, one night at Yarmouth, he had seen Richard Hogarth inexplicably kiss his daughter’s hand.

“Hogarth?” said he: “what Christian name?”

“Richard”.

The agonized thought in Frankl’s brain was this: “Well, what’s the good of prisons, then?” — he, too earnest a financier to read newspaper gossip, having heard not a word of the three escapes from Colmoor.

He said: “Well, sir, generally speaking, I’m the last to encourage this sort of thing; but, as yours is a special case, I tell you plain out that, personally, I don’t mean a bit of harm to you. Just step into a room here, and let us talk the matter quietly over”.

He led O’Hara to his study; and there they two remained locked half an hour, conferring head to head.

XXVII. THE BAG OF LIGHT

REBEKAH, HAVING EXCUSED herself from three ladies, her guests, alone in her room opened her letter.

Glanced first at the “R. H.”, and was not surprised. He had “escaped”, had “come into great power”: that seemed natural; but he “summoned” her to meet him, and she saw no connection between his “great power” and his right to summon her.

She held the paper to a fire, and, as it began to burn, in a panic of flurry extinguished the edge, and hustled it into her bosom; then perambulated; then fell to a chair-edge with staring gaze; then, rocking her head which she had dropped upon a little table, moaned: “He is mad....”

“My flames of fire! Rebekah! I am dying....”

He suffered; and a pussy’s wail mewed from her; but with a gasp of anger which said “Ho!” she sprang straight, and went ranging, with a stamping gait, through the chamber, filling it with passion. “I won’t go!” she went with fixed lips, as something within her whispered: “You must”.

To escape herself, she went again to see what had happened with regard to the convict, whose face would carry to the grave the scars of her nails.

There were no signs of any disturbance; and she asked a footman: “Where is the man who was here?”

“With your father in the study”.

That seemed a strange proceeding: she felt a touch of alarm for her father, and, passing again by the study, peeped; could see nothing for the key, but heard voices.

This messenger of Hogarth, she next thought, was a criminal: he might betray...so she stole into an adjacent room, to peep by a side door of the study, and though a key projecting toward her barred her vision, the talkers were near this point, and she could hear.

“The diamond block”, O’Hara said, “is the same which he rolled across the bridge this morning; to that I’ll swear”.

“Then it must be the very same block he showed me”, Frankl said in a whisper; “that thing was worth millions....!”

“Undoubtedly it was the same”.

“Oh, but Lord”, groaned the Jew in an anguish of self-deprecation, “where were my eyes? where were my wits? I must have been dreaming! No, that’s hard!”

“Well — nil desperandum! Let us be acting, sir!”

“My own land — !”

“They are still safe enough: come—”

“He may have lost one or two — in his excitement. Thousands gone! He may have hidden some!”

“Tut, he has hidden none”, said O’Hara; “we may have all. Let us make a move”.

“But he is a strong man, this Hogarth. Why do you object to the assistance of the police?”

“What have the police to do with such a matter? Hogarth would simply bribe. And there are three of us—”

“Who is this Harris?”

“He is a Cockney — assassin”.

Frankl took snuff, with busy pats at alternate nostrils.

“What will you tell him is in the bag?”

“Anything — rings — something prized by you for sentimental reasons. We offer him a thousand — two thousand pounds. And he will not fail. He strikes like lightning”.

“And we share — how?”

“Come — let us not talk of that again, sir. What could be more generous than my offer? You divide the diamonds into two heaps, and I choose one; or I divide, you choose; and, before I leave you, you give me a declaration that it was by your contrivance that I escaped prison, and that the gems which I have, once yours, are duly made over to me”.

“And you collar half!” gibed the Jew with an ogle of guile; “that’s about as cool a stroke of business as I’ve come across. You don’t take into account that the whole is mine, if the concern fell, as you confess, on my own land! And just ask yourself the question: what is to prevent me handing you over this minute to the police, and grabbing the lot? Only I’m not that sort of man—”

O’Hara drew a revolver.

“You talk to me as though I was a schoolboy, sir”, said he sternly. “Be good enough to learn to respect me. I am not less a man of the world than you are, and quite competent to safeguard my own interests. Supposing I was weak enough to permit you to send for the police, the moment they had me I should tell of Hogarth in hiding; they would go for him, and he, after bribing, may be trusted to take wing with the stones, leaving you whistling. Or perhaps you would care to tackle him in person? He would wheel you by the beard round his arm like a Catherine-wheel, I do assure you. All this you see well, and pretend not to. Do let us be honest with each other!”

“Well, I don’t want to be hard”, said Frankl, looking sideward and downward, plotting behind an unwrinkled brow, intending to have every one of the diamonds; so did O’Hara, who already had his plot.

“No, don’t be hard”, said O’Hara: “I am not. I give you an incalculable fortune; I take the same. Live and let live! Why should two shrewd old fellows like you and me be like the dog which, wanting two bones, lost the one he had? Come, now — give me your hand on it”.

“Well, I’m hanged if you are not right!” cried Frankl, looking up with discovery: “Share and share alike, and shame the devil! That’s the kind of little man I am, frank, bluff, and stalwart — Ha! ha! Give me your hand on it, sir!”

“Ha! ha! you are very kind. That is the only way — absolute sincerity—” and they shook hands, hob-nobbing and fraternizing, with laughs and little nods, like cronies.

“Stop — I’ll just ring for a drop of brandy—” said Frankl.

“No! no ringing! — thanks, thanks, no brandy—”

“Well, you are as cautious as they make them. Oh, perfectly right, you know — perfectly right” — he touched O’Hara’s chest— “not a word to say against that. I am the same kind of man myself—”

“Come; are you for making a move?”

“Agreed. Where is my hat? I suppose a man may get his hat! — ha! ha! — I can’t very well go in this cap—”

“You use mine — with the greatest pleasure. I do not need — Ah? quite the fit, quite the fit”.

“Why, so it is. Ha! ha! why, it’s a curate’s hat, and — I’m a Jew!”

“Excellent, excellent, ha! ha!”

So they made merry, and, with the bitter lip-corners of forced merriment, went out, while Rebekah, who had caught a great deal of that dialogue, crouched a long time there, agitated, uncertain what to do.

That her father should coolly look on at an assassination for a fortune was no revelation to her: she had long despised, yet, with an inconsistency due to the tenderness of Jewish family ties, still loved him; the notion of appealing to the police, therefore, who might ruin Hogarth, too, did not enter her head.

She ran and wrote: “Your life and bag of gems are at this moment in danger”; and sent it by a mounted messenger addressed to “The Guest at the Paper Shop”.

But in twenty minutes the messenger returned to her with it, Hogarth having gone to the rendezvous at the elm — long before the appointed time.

When, accordingly, Frankl, O’Hara, and Harris arrived at the paper-shop back yard, and Harris had stolen up the back stairs, he presently, to the alarm and delight of the others, sent a whisper from the window: “No one ’ere as I can see!”

And the search for the diamonds was short: for Hogarth had actually left the bag containing them on the trunk, and Frankl and O’Hara returned with it to Westring, holding it out at arm’s length, one with the right, one with the left hand, like standard-bearers.

Hogarth, meantime, was striding about the elm, and once fell to his knees, adoring a vision, and once, at a fancied step, his teeth-edges chattered.

Rebekah! He called, groaned, hissed that name, while his to-and-fro ranging quickened to a trot.

And now, fancying that he heard a call “Come !” he stood startled, struck into a twisting enquiry to the four winds; but could not locate the call, ran hither and thither, saw no one.

“Come to me, little sister”, he wailed tenderly, while to swallow was a doubtful spasm for him, her name a mountain in his bosom.

When he was certain that it must be nearer ten than “nine”, he set out in the sway of a turbulent impulse to spurt for the Hall: but as he reached the point of proximity between path and park, just there where her father had stood that morning he saw her patiently waiting — ever since that “Come!”

He flew, and was about to skip up the bank, when, with forbidding arm, she cried: “Don’t you approach me!” — and he stood checked and abject, one foot planted on the bank, looking up, ready to dart for her in her Oriental dress, flimsy, baggy at the girdle, her arms bare, her fingers clasped before her, making convex the two tassels of the girdle, from her ears depending circles of gold large enough to hoop with, a saffron headdress, stuck backward, showing her hair in front, falling upon a shawl which sheltered her frank recumbent shoulders. She did not see Hogarth at all, but stood averted, implacable, unapproachable, looking across the park, while Hogarth occupied a long silence in gazing up to where, like a show, she stood, illumined by the moon.

At last he sent to her the whisper, “Did you call just now? Did you say ‘Come’?”

“What is it you want with me, Hogarth? You have ‘summoned’ me: but be very quick”.

“I told you: I am wealthier than all the princes—”

“Well, let me inform you that your life is in danger here; if you are a wise man, you will not fail to leave this neighbourhood this night”.

“But no one knows—”

“It is known, Hogarth: your friends are false, and your enemies crafty. You will have to walk with your eyes open, my friend. What will you do with all the money?”

“I will buy the world, because you are in it”.

Now she flashed upon him one glance, in which there was astonishment, and judgment.

“You said that so like my father! Hogarth among the dealers? I thought you would be more squeamish, and arduous, and complex”.

“But if a man is famished, he is not complex, he runs to the baker’s. You can have no conception how I perish! And I cannot be contradicted-I claim you-I have the right-I am the lord of this lower world—”

“But you do not see the effect of your words: you disappoint me Richard. How of what the poet sings:

...this is my favoured lot,

My exaltation to afflictions high?

That is more in your line, you know, but you are dazzled, Hogarth-fie. To buy me! And how would you like me afterwards, having renounced my obligations? And how would I like you-I whose name is Rebekah, who will mate with none but a wrestler, a fellow of heroic muscle? I feel certain that you are dazzled. It is natural, I suppose — But are all the people in the world so happy, that you too, can find nothing to occupy you but the market-place, with its buying and selling? And to buy me? I am not for sale! How dare you, Hogarth?”

With this she walked off; but, having a creepy instinct in her back that he was on the point to follow, catch, and snatch her away, she span round again, crying: “Do not follow me! Mind you! If you like, be at the elm-tree again at half-past ten-and I will communicate with you. Goodbye—”

Now she did not once look back; and he had not heard that fainting “Good-bye”, it had fainted so.

He found himself presently in his room at the paper-shop, and lay biting the bed-clothes, spasm after spasm traversing his body.

Then, turning on his back, he lay with his face now toward the trunk, and a little clock ticked ten more minutes before the fact stole into his consciousness that the bag was not on the trunk.

For some time the disappearance was too stupendous to find room in his brain. He got up and paced, stunned, just conscious of a feeling of unease.

Now he was searching the room mechanically. It was not there....

And again he paced, tapping his top teeth with a finger-nail; and now he called down the stair: "Have you seen, Mrs. Sturgess, the calico bag you gave me to-day?"

"Why, no".

"Has anyone been in my room?"

"Why, no, sir! Only myself".

Again he began to pace, and suddenly the grand reality stabbed his brain like a dagger: he was poor....

O'Hara! Where was he....?

His forehead dropped upon the mantel-board, and he leant staring downward there, a miserable man.

But suddenly the man said quietly aloud, raising himself: "All right: better so. O, I have not been myself — virtue has gone out of me — !"

Presently he noticed that it was near the hour of her unexpected rendezvous under the elm....

And nearly all the way he ran — wild to see her again — until he neared the tree, when, descrying a female form, he came stooping with humility, but soon saw that it was a girl, her head in a shawl, whom he did not know.

And she, coming to meet him, said: "What is your name, sir?"

"Why?"

"I am Miss Frankl's messenger".

"My name is Hogarth".

"Will you turn this way that I may see your eyes?...All right: Miss Frankl directs me to give you these".

The girl, who had been weighted down toward the left, handed him an envelope, and a steel box.

Never was he so bewildered! On the way home, he observed that the box had three knobs of gold, surrounded by rays, and, inlaid in the top, the letters "R. F."; when he tore open the envelope in his room he found in pencil on one half-sheet:

"Turn the 10 of the right knob to the ray 5; the 5 of the middle knob to the ray 0; the 15 of the left knob to the ray 10: and the box will open".

No more. When he had set wildly to work, and the lid turned back, his eyes beheld the calico bag.

Rebekah had, in fact, before setting out to the rendezvous at nine, seen her father and O'Hara return to the Hall, bearing the bag between them; and, she, crouching at the side door, as before, had heard them talk, arranging details. Her father had then said that before he could write any document, he must either ring or go search for paper: and suddenly she had heard an oath, a thud, a scuffle, had turned the key, softly entered, seen the men struggling against the other door, a revolver, held by the muzzle, in O'Hara's hand; and before she had been sighted by the two desperate men, had had the bag, lying near on an escritoire, and was gone. She had then sent some servants to the scene, and hurried to her chamber.

Later she had heard that O'Hara had escaped through a window, and that her father was raving below in a sort of fit: for Frankl supposed that O'Hara had the jewels, as O'Hara that Frankl had them; and after tending her father, she had dashed out to the rendezvous, the jewels then in her room.

As for Hogarth, he did not neglect her warning: and, having left a note for O'Hara, telling him where to find him, at Loveday's, took a late train southwards.

By what marvel Rebekah had become possessed of the jewels he did not even seek to fathom; but one of his uppermost feelings was shame for having suspected O'Hara of stealing them: and for years could never be got to believe in the bad faith of the prelate, his tutor.

Near midnight, on reaching the obscure townlet of Hadston, he there took a bed — not to sleep.

At the tiny inn-window he made periodic arrivals, looked out unseeing at a cart, a wall of flint and Flemish brick, and a moonlit country, then weighed anchor, and swerved away on another voyage; then arrived anew, looked out, saw nothing, and weighed.

He walked now in the dark of the valley of humiliation, with those words written in flame in his brain: "This is my favoured lot — my exaltation to afflictions high": he had allowed a woman to say them to him, and he went "I!"

He, the richest of men, was, therefore, that night poorer than any wretch, brought right down, naked, exposed to death, and he filled that chamber with his moans: "God have mercy upon me! a vulgar rich man...a dreadful contented clown...."

But toward morning he lay calmer, weeping like Peter, and at peace.

Being without money, he sent the next day a small stone to Loveday, asking him to sell it; also to meet old Tom Bates on the night appointed, and keep him till he, Hogarth, came to London.

Four days later he received the money in the name of "Mr. Beech", but the old Bates had not kept the rendezvous; and a month later a detective agency discovered that the fisher was dead.

At Hadston Hogarth remained two months, the most occupied man anywhere, yet passing for a loungeur in the townlet.

Here and now he was descended deep into himself, aspiring to greatness, set on high designs; and, as the days passed, his thoughts more and more took form, though sometimes, with a sudden heart-pang, he would flinch and shrink, pierced by a consciousness of the unwieldy thing which he was at; and he would mutter: “I must be mad”. Anon he would start and cower at a distinct sound of cannon in his ears.

Usually, during the day, he had with him an atlas, a pair of compasses.

One day he took train, to see the sea.

Another day, happening to look into the goat-hair trunk, he saw that account-book, containing the addresses of the signatories to his old “association”, and was overjoyed. “Quite a little army”, he tenderly said: “I won’t forget them”.

After two months he left Hadston for London, having in his head a new age hatched.

XXVIII. THE LETTER

IT WAS NIGHT when Hogarth broke into the presence of Loveday at Cheyne Gardens with a glad face, crying: "Forgive me, my friend, for being a boor!"

"You are forgiven", Loveday answered with his smile, hastening to meet him: "the broken picture, you see, is in a better frame, and so are we. What could have made us invent a quarrel about — land, of all things!"

"Come, let us talk", said Hogarth: "not long — all about land, and sea, too. I suppose you have nothing to tell about my sister? Never mind — we shall find her. Come, sit and give me all your intelligence. You are not interested in land, then? You will be in ten minutes — it is interesting. Listen: all the land of the earth is mine, and all the sea especially — a good thing, for, for a hundred years Europe, especially England, has wanted a master: the anarchy of our modern life is too terrible! it cannot arrange itself; and now the hour has struck, though none has heard the bell".

"Hogarth! but you gabble like a mad god", cried Loveday. "I am all in the dark—"

"I will tell you".

And he spoke, first going into his discovery at Colmoor, frowning upon Loveday, ploughing the truth into his brow; proving how modern misery, in its complexity, had its cause in one simple old fault, sure as the fact that smoke ascends, or apples fall. And when he saw conviction beam in Loveday's face, he next told what had happened at the elm-tree, and what would happen-soon; whereat Loveday, like a frightened child, clung to his arm, and once gasped: “Oh no — my God!” and once felt a gory ghost raise horror in his hairs.

An hour afterwards they were bending over a sheet of paper, Hogarth in his shirt-sleeves, writing, Loveday overlooking, suggesting, when two men were announced, and in stepped O’Hara with bows and polished hesitations, followed by his shadow, Harris; and, “Ah, O’Hara...” cried Hogarth, still writing, “who is that with you?”

“A friend of mine”, said Loveday, for O’Hara had introduced Harris to him, and he had adopted Harris as a human study, horrid, but amusing.

The moment O’Hara saw the face of Hogarth, he started, muttering: “He has the diamonds back! God! is he a magician?”

And Harris drawled nasally: “Of course, you wouldn’t know me now, Mr. 76! Were there not ten cleansed, but where are the nine, it is”.

Hogarth was silent — had not yet decided what to do with Harris.

“This is my tenth call here, Hogarth”, said O’Hara, “in the hope of seeing you, and the streets, you know, are no small risk. You see how I am muffled up, and this gentleman, too. By the bye, I have selected a cargo of books for you—”

“No study for a month”, said Hogarth, “but I shall want you all the same. Just come over here and watch me write this thing. You, Harris, sit right over there”.

Harris cursed, but obeyed, while O’Hara came and bent under the golden glow of the silk shade a brow puckered with a care of puzzlement, as he read.

Then he fell into the work, and was soon the director of it — invaluable! knew everything! remembered forgotten points; explained technicalities; the proper person in each little State to whom the document must be directed, the style of addressing him. Of one sentence he said: “That will never do — lacks formality”; and of another: “Tut, they will laugh at that — it is provincial and insolent”, distracted between the work and his brandy glass. At last, about eleven, the three brains had produced a letter.

Hogarth laid claim to the sea as his private property, and warned the nations.

XXIX. PRIORITY OF CLAIM

A GENTLEMAN — a Permanent Under-secretary — stood one noon, his back to a fireplace in a bright-carpeted room at the Foreign Office, letting his eyes move over some opened letters submitted to him, and presently came upon the following document, its crest a flag, containing in blue the letters “R. F.”:

“17 LEADENHALL STR., E.G.

“To the Most Hon.,

“The Marquis of Hallam, K.G., “Foreign Office,

“Westminster, S.W.

“MY LORD MARQUIS:

“I have the honour hereby to make formal announcement to Your Lordship that I am on the point of setting up in the midst of the world a new Power, whose relations with the King’s Government will, I trust, be relations of friendliness.

“It is my desire that Your Lordship forthwith convey to the King’s Most Excellent Majesty the announcement which is the subject of this Memorandum.

“My purposes and policy in the establishment of the new Power will hereafter appear; and my properly accredited Ministers will, in due course, present themselves at the Chancelleries of the world.

“Hitherto a British subject, it is my will to acquire diplomatic recognition — as soon as such shall comport with the dignity of the Great

Powers — as an Independent Sovereign, under the title of: ‘Lord of the Sea’. (Address: ‘Your Lordship’s Majesty’, or ‘My Lord King’.)

“The domain of my Power will be the sea: and to the sea I hereby set up claim as far as such points of latitude as have been attained by Man, and over all degrees of longitude. Provided only: that nothing in this claim shall be held to infringe upon the prior claim of any nation to a ‘three-mile limit’ round its coasts, nor to any national fisheries whatsoever, nor to any claim of the Kingdom of Denmark with respect to the Sound.

“The validity of my title to the sea must be considered to rest on the same basis as the title of any private owner to any area of the earth’s crust: namely, Priority of Claim. If one is valid, so, necessarily, is the other, this title to land, based on Priority of Claim, being admitted in the Law of all civilized Nations.

“This my claim will come into operation on this day three years hence.

“I have the honour to subscribe myself

“Your Lordship’s

“Obdt. Servant,

“RICHARD HOGARTH “.

The Under-secretary, a pale, distinguished man, read this letter with a little lift of one eyebrow, then let it drop from him into a waste-paper basket.

At the German, the Turkish, capitals it met much the same reception. Nowhere did it reach the eye of a Departmental Head. It went to Siam, to the Prince of Monaco, to Ecuador, and was tossed to cumber a basket, or moulder on a file.

But Hogarth, who knew that it would be instantly forgotten, had written it so as to be able to say that he had written it.

At that time he was lodging in a top room in Bloomsbury, and had an underground den in Leadenhall Street, on its doors the words: “R. Beech & Co.” Thither in a brougham he drove daily, lying very low, but holding in that den interviews with all sorts and conditions of men, and feeling his way toward operations of dimensions so immense, that their mere project had a modifying influence upon industry.

XXX. MR. BEECH

DURING SIX WEEKS Hogarth lived that life of daily passage between Keppel Street and his office, unknown to the general world, but spreading a noise of rumour through certain circles of the business world. All day in the den the gas-jets brawled upon him, he not for minutes casting a glance, if a clerk brought a caller's name. And here was no novice modesty in the tackling of affairs; as O'Hara, who would be there, said: "You must have been born in the City; you have the airs, the very tricks, of Threadneedle Street, you — Jew". In a day the prelate counted seven hundred and thirteen telegrams from the Terni Cannon foundry, many a diamond dealer, polisher, cutter, the Vulcan Shipyard of Stettin, the Clydebank, Cramp of Philadelphia, the Russian Finance Minister, San Francisco, Lloyd's, metal brokers, the Neva, and one night, the eve of a dash to Amsterdam, he, with O'Hara, Loveday, and five clerks, sat swotting till morning broke, sustained by gin and soda-water. The priest lived with wide eyes at the easy fleetness with which Hogarth rolled off him the greatest affairs: as when on the day after his return from Holland he stood, his thumbs in his waistcoat armholes, with quite the right air of serene City-king, his tallness possessing considerable natural courtliness, and the De Beers' Secretary sat before him, saying, "Well, Mr. Beech, I have spent the morning with your brokers, and have felt that I must see you personally before calling a meeting. This proposition is so tremendous—"

"I only wish I had some time", said Hogarth, "I would invite you to dine upon the matter; but it is really so simple — everything at bottom is merely twice two are four. And you are not obliged to turn over Kimberley to me: only, in that case, as I have said, I shall be compelled to flood the market with diamonds as cheap as cat's-eyes—”

When De Beers stared, Hogarth shrugged, saying: “I suppose I must convince you—” and, unlocking a safe, he took out an Ã©crin which contained three stones. De Beers appeared to see Titania peering in their fairy painting.

“Of stones of this water and carating”, said Hogarth, “we have two hundred and eleven in the Bank of England, two hundred and thirty-eight in other English and Continental banks, and seventy-five in safe-deposit. The carating of these three is 111-1/2; and in the sixties, such as this one” — he took a stone from among coppers in his pocket— “we have three hundred odd on hand, all flawless, and an equal number cutting. When I point out, what you know, that our mine is as yet without the delicate plant of Kimberley, the stones being simply picked from the blue-earth by three inexpert friends of the firm on the spot, you will recognize that the wealth of a mine can no further go....”

He was rid of the visitor within six minutes, and within three weeks, by knack and organization, had gathered into his hands most of the reins necessary to the control of the world's trade in diamonds.

In an outer room sat O'Hara, writing, reading Theocritus, or a little book on mediaeval embroidery, forefinger on cheek; and anon, absolutely without motive, he would rise, creep, and peep through a keyhole at Hogarth, then on stalking, bowing tiptoe, grinning a rancid grimace of stealth, get back to his seat, and read — the tutor falling over head and ears in love with his pupil: one of those passions that end tragically.

One day, as he so sat, the bell pinged, the door opened, and O'Hara jumped to find himself face to face with — Frankl, who had come to see the new diamond king, in the firm belief that Mr. Beech was none other than O'Hara; and, "I thought as much!" said he.

"Sh-h-h", went O'Hara bitterly— "for God's sake! he is in there — !"

"Who is?"

"Hogarth!"

"Well, but—"

"Outside — in the passage—"

They stepped out; and Frankl, his eyelids red, said: "I have only this day crawled from bed with the blow you struck my temple, or I should have had you before this—"

"Sh-h-h. Your own fault, sir. You played false first—"

"Played false with my own diamonds? You hand me over this day one-half those stones, or I bring a civil action for the whole, hound you to beggary, and drag you back to your convict-cell where you come from".

"Don't lift your voice, I beg of you. Tut, you rave. You can't bring a civil action against a great millionaire who doesn't care to defend; and as for me, I do assure you, I haven't fifty pounds to-day. It is Hogarth who is Mr. Beech!"

"Who?" — Frankl obtruded a startled ear, frowning his eyes small.

"Hogarth. He has the diamonds back!"

"Which diamonds? How did he get 'em?"

"He is — in — there: better go and ask him! He got them by black art — by the aid of the legion of mediaeval witches which wait on him — God knows how he got them! You gave them to him! I gave them to him! but he's got them — in — there! Better go and ask him — don't be afraid — just for the roaring fun of it—"

"Hogarth?"

"Yes — Hogarth, Hogarth".

“Cheated the gallows? And out of prison? And rolling in my wealth, my riches, my diamonds? Oh, no! — is that fair? A dog? Is that how the world is run? God of Israel!”

“There is this to be said for him: that he deserves to be rich—”

“Who? So you are taking his part now?”

“Tut — !”

“There is no tut about it! You confess that you are nothing more than a penniless hanger-on: well, then, I have you! back to prison you go this hour — !”

O’Hara’s cheek trembled; but he said: “A sufficiently vain threat, sir: I am Hogarth’s tutor: he won’t let me be taken. Don’t waste your time, you impotent Jew—”

“Tutor? That’s good! What you teaching him? — murder? outrage? He ought to have a tutor, he! That’s good! Tutor! Well, suppose I drop a line first post to your nice pupil to let him know that it was his tutor who stole his diamonds—”

At this threat O’Hara felt himself outflanked; and though his eyes surveyed the Jew unflinchingly during a silence, inwardly he had succumbed.

“A man in Hogarth’s situation”, he slowly said, “is always liable to attack. Why should two sharp old fellows like you and me, whose interests are identical, quarrel?” — and instantly Frankl took note of that surrender, that weak spot, and knew that the man was his.

“Well”, said he, “so true — two old gaol-birds like you and me, eh? So true, so true. But what beats me — who runs Beech’s? Hogarth is only a young farmer: he can’t operate all the big things I hear about this Mr. Beech —”

“Tut, you do not conceive the man as he is at all”, said O’Hara: “perhaps you cannot. High finance, the first day he looked into it, ceased to mystify him, for he goes always to the ground of things, touches bottom, where first principles lie, and first principles are simple as two and two. It was because he had discovered a first principle that he escaped from Colmoor. And he is as nimble as six twisting minnows: what you or I learned in a year he learns in an hour, and if he does not know the usual way, not an instant does he hesitate to invent a way. You know about Owthwaite’s: how the recent shake-out of the market threatened their collapse, like so many others’. Owthwaite’s, in fact, had already declared, when Hogarth decided to help them over. And how? Not Bills! He filled up a call-in of two millions and a half by the India Council, resettled loans and short-discount business, cheapened money, and in twelve hours his protégés were off the rocks. And now I hear—”

“But why not buy a chapel, and preach about him? I hate—”

“Stop! O Lord — he is calling—”

“Here’s my card; I want to see you to-night at that address at eight”.

And that night at Frankl’s town-house in Hanover Square Jew and prelate conferred, O’Hara for some time resisting, but finally again taking sides against his saviour. He disclosed that Hogarth, beyond doubt, kept a few diamonds in a goat-hair trunk in his room — enough to make two ordinary fortunes, and also carried two or three, with some hundred-pound notes on his person; and this was made the basis of a scheme for bringing about the arrest of Hogarth, the first step being to get from Hogarth the sum he carried about him, leaving him in a situation where he would find himself powerless to bribe.

This Frankl undertook; and O’Hara promised to lend Harris, and some friends of Harris.

Now, during these weeks Hogarth was living in some fear, haunted by insecurity and a vision of Colmoor; and, remembering the theft at Thring, with a consciousness of Frankl somewhere in him, he went not only with diamonds on his person, but a revolver as well, and a puñal of Toledo.

But three evenings after the conference in Hanover Square, he received this letter:

“Dearest Richard:

“It is long since we have met. This is to let you know that I have heard of your getting out, and your coming into great things, which has made my heart rejoice. I, alas, am just the other way about. I am staying for the next two days at Woodfield Cottage, Wylie Street, Finchley Road, N. I understand that you are lying low, so better not come to see me perhaps, but send me something.

“Your loving

“Margaret”.

And at sight of these words such a whirlwind transacted itself in the brain of Hogarth, that he hardly awoke to sense till he found himself in a railway compartment, going northward. It was only then that, reading the letter again, he started.

The handwriting was hers! he was sure. But the words...?

“I, alas, am just the other way about”— “better not come to me perhaps, but send me something”. There was a tone here not in character. But her handwriting! This was no forgery. If she had written from dictation that might explain it.

In this uncertainty he left the train, and took cab, scenting trouble ahead.

The difficulty was to find Wylie Street, which was a half-built street of five cottages in a new neighbourhood of brick, and when what was supposed to be Wylie Street was discovered, the cab had to stop, for across it lay bricks, hods and barrows in mud. So Hogarth alighted, and, peering, stumbled forward: no lamp; above, a labouring half-moon riding a sky of clouds, like a poor ship riding the bleak morning after a hurricane, her masts all gone by the board: and Hogarth could just see that three of the five cottages were roofless brick, the fourth unfinished, so the fifth, alone on the other side, must be— “Woodfield.”

“Woodfield” was unlighted: and the moment he ascertained this, he felt himself the victim of a plot; but not all the whispers of prudence could hold him now from seeing the adventure through. Loudly he flung back the little gate, with rash precipitancy entered: and as he sprang up the three steps to ring, he was seized.

They were five, three being big fellows, two masked.

His main sensation was gladness that none, apparently, was a policeman; and he set hilariously to work with his knuckles. This, however, could not save, soon he was on his back, striking his head; but when he saw that the object was to rifle his pockets, letting be, he managed to steal out the puñal from his breast, and presently with a sudden upheaving and scattering rage, was staggering to his legs. Before he could be stopped, he was making for the gate, but close upon him ran one of the five — a slim man, masked — who fired Hogarth’s own pistol at his legs, but missed: whereupon, Hogarth, with a backward twist, struck at random with the dagger, which entered the man’s breast. But at the same time a whistle shrilled, and from an opposite cottage rushed out at last what he dreaded — three policemen.

These had been placed there on the understanding that it was thither that Hogarth would go, the object of the plot being to rifle his pockets before he was officially taken; and it succeeded to the extent that his pockets were rifled: but he knocked down one officer, and dodged the other two, reaching his taxi; and, having previously arranged with the cabman, got off racing.

But the masked man whom he had struck down was Harris, who for weeks lay raving in fever — an ill-fated stroke, for Harris had a memory.

As for Hogarth, he rushed home to Keppel Street, hurried down the trunk, and was off to Cheyne Gardens.

“Well”, he cried, breaking in upon Loveday, “this phase of our life is up! Look at my clothes: I have had a fight — Frankl, I suppose. I wanted to live a simple life for two years: but they won’t let me, you see. Ha! — then the other thing. From this night we bury our identity under mountains of splendour. It is disgusting to me, this life, skulking, thinking to bribe honest men. Meantime, you must find me some room to hide in with the trunk — mustn’t stay here to-night. And to-morrow you buy me a boat to take us off from some point of the coast — Come—”

XXXI. THE HAMMERS

WITHIN SIX MONTHS Hogarth, as distinct from “Beech”, had risen upon the consciousness of Europe, say like the morning sun: and the wearied worker, borne at evening through crowded undergrounds, might read his name with a listless incomprehension.

He impressed the popular fancy, especially in Paris, where he was best known, as erratic: as once when, by a stroke of financial sleight-of-hand, he got the young Government of Russia into a tight place, then refused them a loan, except on condition of the lease to him of the Kremlin: and for three months squalid old Moscow was the most cometary Court anywhere — acts savouring of a meteorite waywardness which impressed him, more than anything, upon the everyday world; and he won a tolerant wonder.

However, an outcry, led by the Intransigent, denounced his acquisition of the site of royal St. Cloud for his Paris residence on the ground that he was a Jew, betrayed by his face — an accusation which caused the buying up of hundreds of thousands of his photographs — and on the ground that his design was to familiarize the people with the idea of his sovereignty, and by a coup to seize the Government; at which Paris was in a ferment, and a midnight mob traversed the Bois and demolished some of his mason-work. The next day, however, the Minister of the Interior announced from the Tribune that Hogarth was no Jew, but an Englishman pur sang; and, on the whole, Hogarth had his way: the noise died down; and where parterres and avenues had stood on the old palace site, there arose one of those enchancing fabrics, which, from the Bosphorus to London, bore the name of “The Beeches”.

At this time he had dependent upon him a retinue, serving him in multifarious ways from electrical adviser to spy, and from chancellor to recruiter, numbering many hundreds. He knew five thousand faces by sight; in England had two armies — a small one collecting data as to acreages, tenures, trades, scales, wages, prices, crimes, mines, and a large one, numbering five thousand, doing gun-practice in Westring Vale: for, England being for sale, he had bought at thrice its market value that part of it called Westring; and on the sea also he kept a little army of a thousand, borne in old cruiser-hulks bought from the English Admiralty, hulks whose crews, in rotation, changed places with drafts from the Westring barracks.

Once he disappeared from Europe, and when he returned the President of the Republic of Ecuador, thenceforth one of his closest friends, was with him; whereupon, through newspapers in the pay of Beech’s, the rumour commenced to appear that the Ecuador Government was giving orders for coast-defence on an unparalleled scale, in view of probable hostilities with Peru.

In the midst of which activities O’Hara said to him one morning: “You can now be called a mathematician”.

“I have many admirers, and but one teacher, O’Hara”, Hogarth answered: “teach me”.

O’Hara cut a secret grimace.

After the failure of the Finchley Road plot he had had another repentance, and had set himself earnestly to the cultivation of Hogarth’s mind; but the priest’s spirit was not “erect”; he had “falls”; maintained a correspondence with the Jew, whose eye of malice never slept; and once at Cairo, twice in Paris, Hogarth had to use words like these: “I must tell you, O'Hara, that I have heard of your recent behaviour. Naturally, there are those that see for me, and I do not mean to be compromised by your low revels”.

“Wretch that I am!” broke out O'Hara with smitten brow, and for half a day was on his knees in an affliction of self-reproach. Yet the same night he wrote a letter to Frankl containing the words: “You do not know, you cannot dream, the high and slippery road which H. has chosen for his feet: the future is big with events. Wait: his sublime path is not without pitfalls....”

Study with O'Hara was in the morning; at night, when possible, that other study of the working world: and often then Hogarth would withdraw from opera in the St. Cloud palace, or from some “crush”, to give an hour to the river of statistics with which he was inundated.

Till these years he had never seen into the sea of things as it is: his life so isolated — had not even read newspapers.

Now he saw and knew. There below him blazed some masque of beauty and majesty, moving under a moonlight of blue-darting jets of electric light all among colossal columns of alabaster robed in vine and rose; or there below some Melba voice, all trembles and maze of wobbly trebles, warbling: and the thronged hall sat tranced; but before him — figures: parents killed their children for insurance-money — keeping children in cellars till their flesh grew green, keeping sore the stumps of children's legs; with some trades certain comic-sounding names had got to be associated, “potter's rot”, “phossy jaw”, — enormous horror; each day in England one million people had to seek pauper-relief, many perished; of aged persons 40 per cent were permanent paupers; children were paid 2-1/2d. for making 144 match-boxes; pretty girls (though pretty girls were detestably rare) were allowed to work, nay forced to — far harder than any ten savages ever dreamt of working; in Glasgow 41 of every 100 families lived in one room:

fathers, for weeks, did not see their children, except asleep; girls took emetics to vomit up cotton-dust — enormous horror, comic-opera in Hell: and below in the “crush” the voice of the warbler, cooing, shook.

Sometimes he would mutter: “But that can’t be true!” There, though, the figures lay; and presently he would take heart, and say: “Well, not for long now, God help me....”

Whether God helped him or not, certainly Man was helping him: ten thousand and ten thousand hammers — from Spezzia to Belfast — in model-office and mould-loft and rolling-mill — in foundry and yard and roaring forge — were ringing upon metal for him, their clamorous industry clattering over Europe and America carillons of his name.

XXXII. WONDER

ALMOST SUDDENLY THAT noise of chiming hammers reached the general ear.

First in the German Admiralty was wonder when a spy, engaged as a workman at Birkenhead, sent to his Government information that the British Government was up to something: something of a novelty so extraordinary, that as yet he could form no conception as to its object. That it was intended for the sea one must suppose: yet it was evident that nothing of such odd draughtsmanship — of such mastodon proportions — had ever yet taken the water.

He had been clever: had penetrated even the model-office, peered at detailed draughtsman's-plans, developed from the original specifications, as well as at orders for Krupp plates, frames, etc.; had listened in the yard to the talk of four naval men acting as a Board of Inspection; was able to give details of the machining of enormous processed plates to sizes determined by templates, the length of pan-headed rivets, the specific gravity of an average cubic foot, the scarfing of edges, the accumulation of prepared material. The wooden half-model, he said, was a one-ninety-sixth, instead of the usual one-forty-eighth; yet, even so, it was 5 ft. 7-1/2 ins. long, as much broad, and 1 ft. 3/4 in. high. This meant that the structure would measure 180 yards square — over one-tenth of a mile — with a depth of 34 yards. Already the far-reaching chaos of scaffolding had run up eight yards, with stringers and frames to a like level. There were no keel-blocks, for there was no keel — or rather, the keel was a circular plate a yard in diameter, resting on a single block, the shape of the structure to be a perfect square, along the sides of which four battleships might lie like toy-boats: the bottom, from circular keel to upward bend, having the same shape as a battleship's seen in midship section, only with four faces instead of two. From the knee-bend the sides ran up perpendicular; but at the level evidently intended to be the water-line they struck inward, so that the flat roof was smaller than the area below; the position of this water-line giving a definite clue to the intended displacement; and this again showing that the whole — roof, sides, bottom, and all — would be one wall of Simmons armour — steeling and backing — layer on layer — no less than 4ft. 9-1/4 ins. thick.

Yet this stupendous ark, or citadel — so simple was its plan — would be turned out in less time than a second-class cruiser; and its cost, apart from yard-modifications and groundways, small in proportion.

This, and much else, the spy reported: but the new fact was obvious as the sun; the British and French Intelligence Departments, too, were soon conning it; and a week later it was established that, not one, but at least eleven, such structures were a-building in the world.

There went the rumour: "It is the Government of Ecuador's order..."

This was at the end of April; Hogarth, obeying some instinct which continually drew him toward Asia, then loitering alone in Trebizond tea-gardens and bazaars, buying a braid-bag, mule-trapping, or silver sword of the Khurdish cavaliers; while Trinity House gave the alarm that if ever the steel monsters, whatever their object, were launched, "they would constitute, in the absence of proper precautions, a serious danger by night to the world's mercantile marine", and while Lloyd's, the Maritime Exchanges, the Hydrographic Offices, lived in a species of amazement, and were already putting the steel islands into the gazetteers and manuals; the newspapers, too, inundated with the views of the public, took sides, maintaining, some of them, that it was the part of Governments to ascertain the objects of the new works, others that any tampering with their progress at this late stage might even mean revolution, so profound was their intimacy with industry. Hogarth, meanwhile, having come to El Khiff, the camp of the Bedouin pilgrims, there spent some days, and then, passing between Jerusalem and Jericho in a caravan of Moabite sheiks, went visiting the holy places of Israel, everywhere examining the country, especially its agriculture, with great minuteness. It was only on his return to Jerusalem that he heard of the agitation in Europe: and at once set off Westward from Joppa.

From his arrival at Paris toward the end of May the wildest legends, originated by him, began to be printed, the most persistent relating to the diamond and banking House of Beech, which, it was given out, had discovered diamonds within the crust of a Pacific rock-island: the new structures, ordered by them, being designed to blast the coast-wall with dynamite guns. Cavillers pointed out that diamonds never occur in nature in this fashion, and that, even so, it did not need a fort made of armour five feet thick to fire off dynamite guns; but so continuously was the thing repeated, explained, and puffed, that when the London manager of Beech partially admitted it, the most incredulous acquiesced; though at the very same period it was proclaimed that the President of the Ecuador Republic, Hogarth's friend, had admitted to the Great Powers that the forts were to his order (as, in fact, they nominally were); and anti-climax was reached when a naval expert, asked to do a hurried article for the Times, made some error in calculation, and came out with the statement that the fort-things would sink of their own weight. This article was headed "Beech's Folly"; and even when the error was detected, the roar of merriment retained its momentum and rolled: so that, to the hour of the first launch, the enterprise was commonly referred to as “Beech’s Folly”, and scarf-pins, ink-stands, etc., in the shape of the forts, were sold with that superscription: “Beech’s Folly”.

This, translated into French, became that horrible gallicism: la b  tise Biche.

Gradually, however, the Ecuador-Beech rage died down the hammers, heard for nine days through the turmoil of the world, were again drowned in it. The scarf-pins ceased to sell. The ‘buses rolled, the Bank cashed notes, the long street roared — and all was as usual.

Only, in the valley of Westring there was drill and target-practice and barrack-life routine, the Westring-eccentricity being associated with the millionaire, Hogarth, the island-eccentricity with the House of Beech: and in the popular mind Beech and Hogarth were two notions. Islands were building in Italy, France, Germany, Russia; in England, Scotland, Ireland; at Maine, Baltimore, Newport News: but the Governments, lacking the machinery, and also the initiative, and judging to-morrow by yesterday, gave no sign from their Olympus.

In June, John Loveday being then at Westring, one morning O’Hara arrived, he, too, having left medi  val chasubles to grind at war, and though he no longer taught Hogarth, a relation persisted between them; and always not far from O’Hara was to be found Harris, living now on the pinnacle of dandy bliss, twisting a dandy stick.

It was on the last night of this visit to Westring that O’Hara at a late hour went with stealth and hesitations along a corridor of the Hall, and finally tapped at Loveday’s door, who, detesting the priest, and reading in bed, disgustedly dashed off his cigarette ash, as he called: “Come in”.

And a long time they spoke of things other than the real object of O’Hara’s visit, till O’Hara said: “But — may I ask you something?”

“Do”.

“Well, now, you are a fellow more in the counsels of Hogarth than another. I want to ask you right out frankly — is it a fact that Hogarth is choosing Admirals for the islands?”

“I believe it is”, answered Loveday with his long-bow smile of amusement: “I already know, for example, that Saltoun will admiral the Homer in the Indian Ocean, Vladimir the Ruskin in the Atlantic Crescent, and the young Marquis of Erroll the Justice in the Yellow Sea”.

“Those all?”

“All I know of. I believe, however, that Hogarth is in the throes of decision as to the rest”.

“I see”.

There was a silence full of Loveday’s smile.

“But”, said O’Hara, “what I meant is this: you know what I have been to Hogarth; without me, what could the poor fellow have done, after all? I have taught him to think, to dance, and to dine. Now, then, I ask you right out frankly — am I, my son, in the list of Admirals?”

Loveday, flushing, started upright, and sank back. “No, I don’t fancy that your name is among those entertained, O’Hara”.

“We will see about that. Woe to Hogarth, and to his advisers, if he dare slight O’Hara, my son! What! after preparing myself with toilsome zeal for this post? and after two promises from Hogarth’s own lips — ?”

“I deny the promises on Hogarth’s behalf”.

“Oh, you! Hogarth looks upon you as a plaything. I do assure you, you are not taken seriously, Mr. Loveday. How should such as you know what Hogarth promises or designs? “ — his cheeks trembling.

And, Loveday, smiling again, though pale: “Well, if we admit the promises...but — have you accurately acquainted Hogarth with your past,

sir?”

“Most decidedly, sir!”

“If you have not, I think he should know it”.

“Your threats do not affect me, sir! In three days I shall be in Petersburg with Hogarth, and shall take a pleasure in writing you the name of the island to which I am appointed”.

“In three days I also — !” He stopped: but O’Hara understood.

Now the door rushed open, and in looked Harris in under-vest and drawers, beneath his arm a bundle of walkingsticks, which he had been caring and telling.

And “’Ere”, he drawled, “when are you coming to ‘ave that bit of cold mutton? It’s past twelve o’clock as it is”.

“I am coming, boy”, said O’Hara, rising with brisk obedience.

“Then, come, why don’t you! There were shepherds watching their pretty little flocks by night, but to leave a man watching the cold animal is a bit out. Come along!” — and O’Hara went.

He reached Petersburg twelve hours before Loveday, his reason for choosing that time being his knowledge that Frankl was in Petersburg, and with him Rebekah, Frankl being in a deal with the new-rÃ©gime Minister of Finance.

For, as O’Hara had been asking himself the agonized question: “By what absolute finesse can I, just now, win Hogarth?” the mere presence of Rebekah in the same city with Hogarth drew him thither.

But the next day, when Loveday came, nothing had been done — no chance of tÃ¢te-a-tÃ¢te with Hogarth: and that day was O’Hara an anxious and tremulous man, living on the tip-toe and qui vive of lynx-eyed keenness.

The same night at a masque at the Palace of Peterhof Loveday got a chance of dialogue with Hogarth, they seated amid greenery and coloured gleams, Hogarth groomed to the glittering glass of his shoes, his legs stretched, arm akimbo; and presently Loveday led the talk to things of the sea. “What an extraordinary activity! The British Government launches the Peleus next Monday at Deptford — the first 28,000-ton war-boat; and seven cruisers on the slips. Then the French, Austro-German, Russian—”

“Ha! — I know. They won’t build long”.

“Still the confidence?”

“You can only ask, my dear boy, because you do not yet see what a thing the battleship really is — much more than half a sham. The march of invention is from the complex to the simple: for simplicity is strength; but to the moment when I began to construct, naval construction had not followed this law: for from the old smooth-bores, aimed with tackle and quoin, to the present regime of electric wires, you have had a continual advance in complexity — always within the same little arc of thought — till now the most complex of things is a battleship; and if you ask me which is the weaker, a battleship or a watch, I answer a battleship — weak meaning liability to the injuries which they were built to resist. In such a case as that of the Maine, sunk at Havana, one might fancy that the task of naval constructors is to turn out a thing to sink with a minimum of trouble; and you remember the Camperdown and Victoria, how, playing about together, one happened to touch the other, when down plunged that other. These ships are a compromise between three motifs — speed, resisting attack, and attacking: and the first is so antagonistic to the second, and also to the third, that the net result is almost a Nonentity, or No-Thing. Nothing, in fact, could be more queer, unfounded, than these ships; and the future will look back upon them with pity. Hence the simple islands, following the law: and don't think that their efficacy is a thing riskier than arithmetic itself."

"Good", went Loveday. "But, Richard — captain your islands with decent men".

"You have something on your mind: what is it?"

"It is — delicate. Have I your permission to speak?"

"Why, John, yes".

"Well then — is O'Hara to be an Admiral?"

"Old Pat? Hardly, I think. He may. But no — I don't think. Poor old talky-talky. He has worked hard for us, John: and his fund of experience, in one way and another, has been invaluable. Well, I don't know: I have had the idea, but I don't suppose that, in reality — Still, I am fond of him, John. Such a tongue, and such a versatile brain, is he! He was my comfort for many a sombre day in prison—"

Listening near with rancid grin behind some greenery, O'Hara kept nodding emphatic assents of satisfaction to Hogarth's praise.

"But, stop", said Loveday: "do you know why he was in prison?"

"He was innocent".

"Of what?"

"Of stealing some diamonds entrusted him by the Pope".

"Bah! he lies. His trial was a cause célèbre, and hence the false name he gave me at first: the moment I heard you say 'O'Hara' I knew the man. He had committed an assault upon a lady in a train—"

"Beast that he is", went Hogarth, while O'Hara's eyes started from his head: "and liar, too, it seems. Ha! — he gave me the most circumstantial story. Why didn't you tell me this before?"

"It was delicate—"

“Beast that he is. Yet how complex is character! the man’s tenderness for his Church is so charming—” “Fiddlesticks! Look here, Richard, I am come all the way from Westring to tell you this thing. Don’t you give vast powers to that man: it isn’t decent; and I have a feeling that it will be a baleful piece of weakness. And don’t get easy, and tolerant, and fat in the eyes, Hogarth. That is a very significant Bible-story — the implacable disaster sent upon old Eli for no greater crime than a bonhomme indolence. And in order to arouse your wrath against this O’Hara, I am going now, against my will, to tell you something: the name of that lady in that train”.

“Someone whom I know?”

“Yes”.

“Who?”

For a moment Loveday’s answer hesitated: and in that moment, O’Hara, with lightning decision, had his mouth at Hogarth’s ear: “Come with me quick — then fall down and worship me for a month! Someone is in the Malachite Hall!”

Like sudden death Hogarth’s colour fled his face; in another instant he was a blind, oblivious wight...had known that she was in Petersburg; but not that she was at the masque.

In a moment shrubbery, lights, all life, rushed into transformation for him: and with an excitement of the eyes, the bloodshot left looking bloodier, he went after O’Hara, tossing back at Loveday that fatal saying: “To-morrow....”

A little previously O’Hara, having got from Frankl details of Rebekah’s dress, had spotted her in primrose silk, black mask and domino, and soon with Hogarth refound her in the crush: whereas Hogarth went about prospecting over the crowd, with that excitement of his red-veined eyeballs, once even entered into talk with a group of four diplomatists, but all the time with eyeballs absent in hankering tracking, out prowling after one morbid form, as the stallion's prowls after his Sally.

After an hour she said in French over her shoulder: "Why follow me?"

And as he bowed compliance, she added: "Are you well?"

He said: "Yes", and bowed, and she nodded twice, smiling a little, as they parted.

He, on the wings of exaltation, made haste to salute the Throne and leave the palace, rushing toward solitude to brood upon that smile, those familiar nods, and the gentle "Are you well?" — in his landau with him O'Hara, who persecuted him even to his bedroom; and when, after an hour, the priest at last reappeared in a corridor, the night-lights there shone upon an exultant visage, like a climber's who, after long clamberings, at last stamps on the Matterhorn, and looks abroad.

When he entered his own room, he stood with a hung head, till, sharply looking up, he ejaculated with amazed, realization and opening arms: "Well, it's done! — I've got it!" Now he put forefinger to nose, and cut a beastly face at himself in the mirror-wall.

The next day Hogarth rather guiltily said to Loveday: "Well, I have promised old O'Hara the Mahomet for the Straits. Don't frown — I owe him something, and the clever beast got over me in crazy moment".

"Quite so", Loveday coldly said: and thenceforth, the thing being done, was mum as to the name of the lady connected with O'Hara's crime.

He returned immediately to England, having there many occupations, which multiplied as the islands everywhere neared completion, the first of the launches taking place at Spezzia on the 7th of February.

A fortnight before this event the Beech-fever had revived, the coming launch being no secret, and the doubt whether "Beech's Folly" might be no folly, and the question what, on the whole, Beech's Folly might really bode, filled once more the consciousness of the Western world. By the 1st of February a drop was recorded in many general securities, in "governments", rentes, and consols; in Berlin the bank-rate rose one per cent.; it was stated that specie was accumulating in European vaults; while up leapt futures-cotton in the Liverpool market. At last the First Lord of the Treasury, in a speech at Manchester, gave sign of the Government's consciousness of the new fact, saying that he could only repeat the answer given by the First Lord of the Admiralty to the recent Deputations of the Chamber of Shipping and of Merchant Shippers, that Britain and the other maritime nations would know how to protect the seas from any nuisance. He anticipated no nuisance. The structures popularly known as "Beech's Folly" (prolonged laughter) would be provided with lighthouses: and until they proved a nuisance on the ocean's fairways, the Governments must permit to private enterprise that free hand which was the characteristic of our age; moreover, a recognized Government had avowed its association with these structures.

Nevertheless, the fever heightened. The light-system of the Boodah, now included in the usual alphabetical lists of derelicts, was conned by thousands of mariners, while in the crowded captains', underwriters', and committee rooms at Lloyd's discussion buzzed and speechified in every tone of gravity. Suddenly in the F. G. and S. clause marine insurance underwent a profound modification; and it was then that the millionaire, Schroeder, at that time a German clerk in the City, managed to borrow five thousand pounds, and quickly cleared his pile by underwriting on larger F. C. and S. terms. And again raged the sale of the islands as penny salt-cellars, finger-basins, etc.; in broker's and sub-editor's office the tape-machine clicked the hourly progress of preparations at Spezzia; while every by-street was dreadful with that music-hall chorus:

“To Spezzia runs the Pullman train;
The Follies soon their sense will teach;
We’ve Beech, O dear, upon the brain,
He brains upon the beach”.

Meantime, the question of the drawing-room was “Are you going to Spezzia?” and by the 7th so great a pilgrimage of tourists — experts, idlers, cinematographers, special correspondents, ministers of state, Yankees, officers, social stars — had flocked to the scene, that accommodation failed in the town and surrounding hill-country, from Le Grazie on the west, to Lerici on the east of the Gulf.

The morning dawned bright — Italian sky, tranquil Italian sea — and by nine the harbour was alive with small-craft and Portovenere steamboats, all gala with flags; on the land side, too, over the hills, up the old road called Giro della Foce, and before the villages commanding the town, spread a cloud of witnesses; while the multitude in possession of permessos for the dock-region stretched across a hundred and sixty acres, perched on every coign, and murmuring like the sea.

And all in the air a fluttered consciousness of the to-come, the present nothing, an hour hence everything — like the suspense of nature before gales, and that greatness and novelty of marriage-mornings: for such a bride that day would rush to the brine as it had never embraced.

There lay the hulk, all nuptial in colours, her roof looking like a plaza of Lima or La Paz at Carnival, flags in mountain-ridges round her edges, flags in festoons, in slanting clothes-lines, in trophy-groups, on bandroled poles, bedecking her; some scaffolding still round her; and three running derricks, capable of wielding guns and boilers of 140 tons, craned their shears about her. A temporary stair under flags ran right up to a ledge above the waterline: from which ledge little steel steps led here and there to the roof; round the edge of roof and ledge running two balustrades, surrounding the hulk; and over that upper portion, four times repeated in white letters ten feet high, the name BOODAH boomed itself.

By eleven some seven hundred people stood and sat on the roof — the À©lite of Europe, invited to the luncheon after the launch, seeming to the tract of on-lookers quite dainty and visionary there, like objects mirrored in an eye. And they formed groups, of which some chatted, and were elegant, and some spoke the gravest words uttered for centuries.

“What, really, is the Boodah?” asked a Servian Minister of a French: “is she a whim, a threat, or a tool?”

“She is too heavy for a whim”, answered the French, “too dear for a threat, and too fantastic for a tool. Time will show”.

But this was no answer at all: something more to the point came from a multitudinous tumult of sledges below — the workmen “wedging-up”.

At last, soon after noon, Hogarth, with a considerable following, was seen ascending the steps, on his arm the Queen of the Ceremony — a little Bavarian Gräfin, famous for her face: he, princely now with that cosmopolitan polish picked up in Courts, bending above her with laughter, making her laugh also, as they paced up. And at once the invited, including the Board of Verification, entered the hull upon a tour of sight-seeing, conducted by a manager of the contractors.

Already the set-up wedges had raised the Boodah from her keel-block, and left her resting on the great braced ground-ways; and now down to the sea’s brink the greasers were busy, prodigals in tallow, while, within, the seven hundred trooped from spectacle to spectacle, like a tourist group guided through the Louvre.

An hour, and they anew appeared on the roof, trooping toward that balustrade that faced the sea: upon which the throngs felt the impending of the event, and intently watched. But there seemed no hurry, Hogarth all gay chatter, anon lowering the lids a moment, as he looked over the water; till suddenly hundreds of glasses detected a champagne-bottle with ribbons in the christener's hand; and the consciousness of the moment come moved the hosts when Hogarth, even as he chatted, disengaged a flag, and let it fall: it was a signal; down it fluttered; and instantly, down there, bustle broke loose, as the call "Saw-off!" went forth, and the saws set flurriedly to fret through the timbers which bind groundways to slidingways.

"Now?" whispered Hogarth at the christener's ear: and, even as he spoke, the voice of a noising arose and droned from Spezzia, its hills, its villages, and its sea; the Boodah, only half-liberated, strained in travail; crashed from her bands; slipped down the greased gradient — plunged — and, gathering momentous way, went wading deep, deeper — like Behemoth run mad — amid a wrath of froths and a brawling of waters, into the sea.

There, deep-planted, she stretched: on the surface appeared a reef of steel; and the stirred-up water slapped vapidly upon those flanks, like waters upon the Norway wall.

XXXIII. REEFS OF STEEL

NOTHING WAS EVER so scrutinized as the movements of the Boodah during the next two months.

One morning three weeks after her launch three steamers took her in tow, with progress so slow, that at nightfall they were still visible from land; but the next morning had vanished.

Two days later they were met on the Genoa-Leghorn route, six steamers then towing the Boodah, their course S. by W.

Again and again it was met, that funeral of the sea: the prone, tearing steamers, the reluctant bulk. Sometimes a captain's glass might make out a few men lost on the roof like men on a raft, smoking, seated, leaning over a balustrade.

Southward and westward it swam. On the seventh day there arrived at Ajaccio from Marseilles twenty-five bluejackets; and these, in a hired speronare, put to sea, and joined the Boodah twenty miles from the coast.

Thenceforth, a smoke would be seen at a point of the roof, indicating that she, too, was steaming: for it was known that she had a screw and a rudder; and so closely was she observed, that her now added rate could be fixed — two to three knots a day.

She must therefore have some small engines about 4,000 H. P.: and since their motif could only be one thing, resistance to ocean currents, this meant that the Boodah was intended to rest always in one spot: a startling conclusion.

Occasionally a Surveying Service warship would peep above the horizon, watching her.

As she passed through the Straits, seventy-five English blue-jackets put out from Trafalgar, and joined her.

With such reports passed the weeks. Occasionally five or six coal-ships would be seen about the Boodah; her number of tug-ships might be as low as two; sometimes nine, ten.

At night she made a fine display, and homeward-bound boats from Cape Horn, from Pernambuco, Para, Madeira, spoke highly of her two revolving-drum lighthouses: for these, from opposite corners of the roof, at the rate of a revolution per minute, poured into space two shimmering comets, like Calais and the Eddystone — rapt spinning-dervishes of the sea that hold far converse with the dark, till morning. And between these two ran a festoon of electric lanterns, Japanese and Moorish, cut in ogives; and festoons of coloured moons drooped round the balustrades, so that the blaze and complexity of it presented to ships a spectacle of speckled mystery, fresh to the sea.

After five weeks a hundred and seventeen blue-jackets put out from Portsmouth in a chartered barque and joined her, she still in tow, making now about N. by W.

But by the time this news reached Europe the eyes of Europe were no longer given up to the Boodah: for another Boodah, called the Truth, was a-tow through the North Channel from Belfast; and she had not reached the Mull of Cantire, when a third was launched at San Francisco, so that the interest of the islands became complicated.

What would they do? What could they? Compared with this question, the riddle of the Sphinx was simple, the supposition that they were going to batter coast-walls in the S. Pacific being hardly now tenable. The Boodah finally came to rest some miles North of lat. 50° and East of long. 20° : and there — just on the northern rim of the Gulf Stream where it divides, part toward Ireland, and part toward Africa — she remained, precisely in the middle of the trade-route between Europe and Boston, New York, Halifax: a route covered for fifty miles — twenty-five north, twenty-five south — by her 19.5-inch guns.

It is impossible to describe with how wild a heart, or thrilling a boding, the world heard this thing: eight days later the International Conference of Maritime Nations met at The Hague.

But nothing happened — or the opposite of what was feared: for, as months passed, the Boodah, planted there in the ocean, rapidly became the recognized gathering-point of the fashion and gaiety of Europe, thither flocking the socially ambitious and the “arrived” together, and to have been invited to those revels of taste and elegance became a superiority. Gradually, as the names “Beech”, “Ecuador”, ceased to be associated with the islands, the name of Hogarth took their place; and Hogarth had engaged Wanda, sweetest of tenors, to a year’s stay in the Boodah, whose orchestra was the most cultured anywhere; Roche, her chef, had two years previously been put into a laboratory to devote his soul to the enlargement of his art; and he and that tenor lived in suites of the Boodah such as most princes would consider Utopian.

Hardly anything in her interior suggested the ship: no hammocks for marines, rolling-racks, sick-bay, lockers, steam-tables, wash-rooms, she being just a palace planted in the Atlantic, her bottom going down to a layer of comparative calm, so that hardly ever, in a storm, when the ocean robed her sides in white, washed abroad her slippery plateau, and drenched with spray her lighthouse tops, did the ballroom below know shock or motion. Into her principal hall, far down, circular, one descended by a circle of steps of marble, round which stood a colonnade of Cuban cedar, supporting candelabra and silks; and from atrium-pools sunk in the floor twelve twining fountains brandished spiral sprays, the floor being of a glassy marble, polished with snakestone, suffused with blushes at the coloured silks and at a roof gross with rose and pomegranates, hanging chandeliers; round the raised centre of the floor stood two balustrades, three feet high, hung with silks, the inner circle thirty feet across, higher than the outer, forty-five across: a roseate room, strewn with cushions, colours, flushes; but that raised space was empty: reserved for — a throne.

The throne, still unfinished, had been three years making in India.

And during nine months the Ã©lite and joyous yachts arrived, not at the Boodah only, but at others of the twelve which, one by one, were launched and towed to position; and a round of events transacted themselves in the fortresses: Marie Antoinette balls, classic concerts, theatrical functions by troupe or amateur, costume-balls, children's-balls, banquets of the gods, grave receptions. By now there ran right across the Boodah's roof, in the form of a cross, two double colonnades of Doric pillars, at the four ends being Roman arches: and here, some summer afternoon, the passing ship would see a bazaar, all butterfly flutter, feminine hues like flower-beds, cubes of coloured ice, flags, and a buzz of gaiety, and strains of Tzigany music — rainbow-tints of Venice mixed with the levity of the AndrÃ©ssy Ut of Pesth. Sometimes a fleet of craft would surround the islands. Besides, to each was attached a yacht, and a trawler which continually plied for it between island and land.

At this time Hogarth was deep in debt, and Beech's living upon credit.

So, gradually, a good deal of the awe which the structures had inspired passed off. On the whole, they seemed mere whimsical castles-of-pleasure. The trains of industrious ships grew habituated to their gaudy brightness by night, to their seething reefs, or placid mass, by day. On foggy days the mariner was aware of the islands wailing weird siren-sounds of warning. The islands waved common-code signals of greeting to the passer. Trinity House sent them the usual blanks and instruments for recording meteorological observations. Their positions were marked in British Admiralty Charts, in American Pilot Charts, in "Sailing Directions". The great greyhounds, racing to Sandy Hook, raved with jest past them. The islands began to seem a natural part of the sum of things. There they lay, stable, rooted, trite, familiar; and the question almost arose: "How came it that they were never there before?" — just that object, of that form and colour, seemed so old and natural in that particular spot. So the frogs hopped finally upon the log that God sent them for sovereign.

Meantime, the more thoughtful of men did not fail to observe, and never forgot, that no ship could possibly depart from, or arrive at Europe, without passing within range of some one of the islands' guns. A row of eight lay an irregular crescent (its convexity facing Europe) from just outside the Straits of Gibraltar, where O'Hara admired the Mahomet, to the 55th of latitude, where the Goethe lay on the Quebec-Glasgow route: these commanding the European trade with the States and with S. America, as well as with W. and S. Africa, and with Australia by Cape Horn; another in the narrows of the Gulf of Aden, commanding the world's traffic by Suez with the East and with S. Africa; another in the middle of the narrows of the Kattegat, commanding all Baltic trade; another, fifteen miles from San Francisco, and another a hundred and fifty miles from Nagasaki, on the edge of the Black Stream, commanding the Japanese-San Francisco, the Australian-San Francisco trades, and great part of the Japano-Russo-Chinese. These were the principal trades of the world.

Like the despair of Samson awaking manacled and shaven, an occasional shriek would go up from some lone thinker, who perceived that the kingdoms of the world had lapsed into a single hand; and in the privy cabinet the governors drank to the dregs the cup of trembling. But their speech was bold, the matter hung long, the peoples ignored and wrought: there was seed-time and harvest; the newsboy brawled; the long street roared. Far yonder in the darkness and distance of the deep the islands flashed and danced, and were fashionable.

Richard Hogarth held back his hand.

XXXIV. THE “KAISER”

IT WAS THE habit of Hogarth, when in the Boodah, to rise very early and ascend in flannels to one of the four doors opening upon the ledge — blocks five feet thick, moved by hydraulic motors — and sometimes Loveday would accompany these walks, they always seeing on the plane of the sea some sail, or by a spyglass the fading light-beam of the Goethe north, of the Solon south; or they watched how the Boodah's galaxy, too, waxed faint and garish as some drama of colour evolved in the East; saw gulls hover and swing, fins wander: and marking that simple ampleness of the plan of sea and arch of heaven, their hearts felt enlargement.

One morning, the 3rd October, Loveday was up even before Hogarth, having started awake from a gory nightmare, this altogether not being a day like others: and when the two friends met on the ledge, they walked a long time in silence.

Only after the dayspring began definitely to dabble in its chromatic chemistries Loveday at last remarked: “Did you ever think why I took such pains to get you to come down with me to Lord Woolacot’s last autumn two years?”

“Yes”, answered Hogarth: “you wanted me to see the model farms, and how the young ladies fed the poor, and how the tenants loved their lord, and everyone thought himself happy. Only, I didn’t see what the pastimes of Lord Woolacot’s daughters have to do with the process of the suns, and with the woe of Oldham. Ah, Lord, it is a job, I tell you, pulling this vile thing straight! Of course, the eagle doesn’t blink: but I am only one man, and the world, and its stupid sins, are a tidy burden. Ha! — never mind. Look at that big Boodah of a sun how he blooms: isn't he launched and handled all right? Let us of this desert bend the knee to him like the old Sabāns. There is hope”....

It was known that on that day, at half-past eleven A.M., the Kaiser Wilhelm der Größste would pass on her second voyage within some miles of the Boodah, this ship being the greatest afloat, having a cargo-carrying deadweight of 45,000 tons, and travelling the waters like a railway-train at 37 miles (32 knots).

So toward noon Hogarth, in a peaked cap, jacket, and white boots, was again on the roof, a glass and book of Costonlights in his hand, while not far off a knot of five officers in frockcoats talked, and near one light-house, where a number of men stood, a flagstaff flew the ensign — blue letters “R. F.” on a white ground, looking Russian; on the northern horizon two fox-tails of smoke; on the western three diminutive sails; between the two, quite real and big, a brig becalmed; and now the Kaiser Wilhelm: for that yonder could be only she, with so fervent a growth, from the first moment of her upward climb, did she approach. It was twenty minutes to noon, and she was somehow a little late, that punctual strong wrestler with space.

The officers on the Boodah spoke of her in low and stealthy voices; looked at her with queer and stealthy glances.

““As a bird to the snare...”” muttered one.

“She comes all right, but will never go”, said another.

“She will be always near us”, said a third.

“Life is an earnest thing, after all”, said a fourth: “there are wrongs, it seems, which only blood can wash out: it comes to that at last”.

Now Loveday ran up, looking scared and busy, a quill behind his ear, Hogarth now having the glass at his face, while his eyes struggled with the reek from his cigar-end.

“Is that she?” Loveday asked him.

“Yes, poor boat”.

She was nine miles away; in four minutes she was less than seven, and now distinct: — her three staysails; her four funnels; the stretched-out space between her raked masts; her host of cowls and boats; her high victorious hull, silently running.

And all along her lines were lines of faces thick as dahlia-rows in June — globe-trotters; captains of industry; children; the Wall Street operator who plotted a stroke in Black-Sea wool, and to him time was money — I guess; commercial travellers, all-modern, spinning, prone, to whom the sea was an insignificant and conquered thing; engineers; capped enthusiastic Germans, going forth to conquer; publishers, ladies, lords, all the nondescript prosperous: and all ran there blithe, sublime, and long drawn-out; and they toyed with oranges, nuts; and they looked abroad to see the Boodah — ship’s-surgeons and officers with them — jesting, as they munched or sucked.

But the Captain who had often seen the Boodah, was log-writing in the chart-room...

As her ensign of greeting ran up her main, her clocks struck twelve, the full noon — like an omen — come; she not then three miles from the Boodah.

And simultaneously with the hoisting of that ensign, and the striking of those clocks, the old-worn wheels of Roman Civilization stopped dead.

The Boodah ran up the signal: “Stop!”

Those who understood rubbed their eyes: it was like a vision at high noon; they could not believe.

At that news the Captain, a handsome fair-bearded man, rushed like a madman from pilot-house to bridge, and the startled passengers saw his lighted eyes. He had some moments of indecision; then down he, too, rang that word: “Stop”.

The engines left off; the Kaiser’s speed, as from heart-failure, gave in, died away.

By this time all the passengers knew, in a state of tremor saw confused runnings to and fro, and face caught from face dismay; the voyage was spoiled, the record! What, then, had happened to the world? And now again the Boodah is signalling: “Let the Captain come”.

The Captain’s hands were shaking; he could not speak, could only gasp to the first-officer: “By God, no; O, by God, no”. Then, as great quantities of black-grey reek, wheeling all convolved, were now enveloping the vessel, resting on the sea, reaching away in thinner fog even to the Boodah, and as, the day being calm, there was a difficulty in reading the flags, the Captain gasped: “Take the trumpet — ask them — But don’t they pay for this...?”

So out brayed the trumpeted query, and back the inexorable trumpeted answer: “Let the Captain come”.

So, then, the Kaiser would never reach Sandy Hook? To put out boats! — to parley! — while the earth span with quick-panting throbs, every second worth seven thousand pounds!

“But don’t they pay for it...?” so, with a painful face of care, the Captain questioned space.

But he would be mild and patient as a lamb that day! His order went forth: the ship forged ahead; a longboat, hurriedly lowered to starboard, was manned for the first-officer to put off in her, while every heart of the passengers thumped, every face an ecstasy of emotions.

Then a wretched, long interval...

The ship's-officers were received on the Boodah in a deck-room containing a number of boats with castored keels, capable of being quickly launched down an incline, where Mr. F. Quilter-Beckett, the Admiral, with some lieutenants, awaited them at a bureau on which lay documents, while in the background stood Hogarth and Loveday, and, "Gentlemen, this is a most damned wild piece of madness!" broke out wrathfully the first-officer, as he dashed up wild-eyed to the level: "in consideration of the guns you have in this thing—"

"But your Captain?" asked Quilter-Beckett, a courtly man, with a dark-curling beard, a star on his breast.

"The Captain won't come!" whined the officer in perfect English: "I suppose you realize the terrible consequences of this stoppage, gentlemen?"

"But you are wasting time, sir. You represent your Captain?"

"Of course, I represent — !"

"Then just cast your eye over this" — that so slighted letter, sent years before by Hogarth to Foreign Offices, claiming the sea as his private manor.

The officer read it half through with flurried closeness; then, "Well, but what is all this?" he broke out: "is it a piece of comedy, or what, gentlemen?"

"It is serious; and the last clause comes into operation to-day: only such ships being held authorized to pass on the sea as pay to the first-reached sea-fort on any voyage a tax, or sea-rent, of 4s. per ton on their registered tonnage, with an additional stamp-tax of 33s. 4d. for receipt, and a stamp-tax of £1 16s. 8d. for clearance. You will see at a glance the clauses of the law, if you cast your eyes over this schedule—"

"Law!" the other broke in: "you talk of Law! But doesn't the sea, then, belong by right to all men — ?"

“Not more than the land. Ask yourself: why should it? But I do hope you won’t argue: your time must be so precious”.

Out shrilled the Kaiser Wilhelm’s whistle of recall.

“I must go!” said the officer with a worried hand-toss: “I must go. If you give me those documents, I will show them to the Captain — but he is not the sort of man — this is mere piracy, after all! But, good God, gentlemen, if you only dare touch that ship, I shouldn’t put myself in your place this day week for all—”

He snatched the papers, dashed, and his men, in a passion of haste, lay to the oars, the Kaiser only four hundred yards from the Boodah; and the officer, shaking aloft the documents, pitched up the stair, the centre of five hundred pairs of scared eyes, while the captain bored his way to him.

Two minutes of intense low speech, crowded with gestures: and suddenly the Captain’s face, till now haggard, reddened; out went his shaken fist; with eyes blazing like lunacy, up he flew to the bridge; and now he is bending down with howling throat: “Passengers to their berths!”

Simultaneously, above the engine-room stair a bell jangled; round swung the pointer to “Full Ahead”; and ere the decks were cleared of their bustle the Kaiser, like a back-kicking hen, scratched up under her poop a spreading pool of spume, which tossed spasmodic spray-showers and spoutings: and she stirred, stretched like a street, churned the sea, and, wheeling to reveal her receding stern, was away.

By which time Hogarth was standing at a cubical cabin of steel on the roof, with him Loveday and Quilter-Beckett, his brow puckered with wrinkles, the sun troubling his eyes.

“I suppose the chef is warned?” — he threw away his cigar.

“Oh, yes, my Lord King”, Quilter-Beckett answered.

And Loveday: “She sweats like a thoroughbred” — haggard, but assuming calm: “few things could be more profusely expeditious”.

“Ah, make phrases, John,” murmured Hogarth.... “Well, but hadn’t you better be getting out the boats?”

Upon which Quilter-Beckett stepped into the little erection, touched a button, and in a minute the water round the southern side was swarming with twenty-three boats whose blue-jackets began to row toward the Kaiser.

And presently, “It’s no use waiting”, said Hogarth, looking in upon Quilter-Beckett: “I should mine and shell her at the same moment, if I were you; tell them to get it in well amidships”.

Now a few seconds, full of expectation, passed, the Kaiser Wilhelm already two miles away: till suddenly space opened its throat in a gulf to bay gruff and hollow like hell-gate dogs; and, almost at the same moment, close by the Kaiser a column of water hopped with one humph of venom two hundred feet on high: when this dropped back broad-showering with it came showering a rain of wreckage; and instantly a shriek of lamentation floated over the sea, mixed with another shriek of steam.

For the moment the ship, enveloped in vapours, could not be seen; but in two minutes glimpses of her hull appeared, shewing the bluff bulge of her starboard bottom: for she leaned steeply to port with a forward crank, her two starboard screws, now free, spinning asleep like humming-tops. A six-inch shell, beautifully aimed, had shattered her engines, killing two stokers, and a torpedo-mine had knocked a hole nine feet across in her port beam.

But as the Boodah’s boats, meanwhile, had been racing toward her, and as her own port boats were quickly out, all were got off; in fact, she floated so long, that her ship’s papers with £270,000 in specie, and a few hundred-weight of mailbags were saved, and even after the boats reached the Boodah she still stretched there motionless, until, with a sudden flurry, she determined to plunge.

Soon afterwards Hogarth had the Captain in his suite, to tell him that he did not wish any intelligence of the event to reach the world for four days, during which passengers and crew would be his guests, and then be sent on to America, his object, he said, being to impress the loss of the Kaiser upon the consciousness of all, by making all anxious as to her fate.

So that night her passengers danced till late, for there was no resisting the hospitality of Hogarth, or the witchery of those vistas and arcades, grand hall and lost grot, salons and conservatories, there in the dark of the ocean, or such an enchantment of music, and fabulousness of table; the host, too, pleaded prettily for himself; and now they pardoned, and now they pouted, but always they banqueted, kissed, lost themselves in visions, were charmed, and danced.

XXXV. THE CUP OF TREMBLING

IT WAS BY the merest chance that Baruch Frankl and his daughter were not on the Kaiser: for Frankl was the half-nephew of Mrs. Charles P. Stickney, a New York Jewess, and as the marriage of Miss Stickney with Lord Alfred Covern was only fifteen days off, Frankl had made arrangements to accompany the bridegroom across, but had been detained by stress of business; happily for him — for Lord Alfred, the bridegroom, was a dancing prisoner in the Boodah.

Early, then, on the third morning thence, Charles P. Stickney, the bride's father, a natty little Yankee, hurried a-foot to the Maritime Exchange: for, to his infinite surprise, the Kaiser's arrival had not been in the morning's paper: so the little arch-millionaire stepped toward Beaver Street, sure that the Kaiser had come in too late for the press.

Early as it was, he found the place as thickly a-buzz as though it was that feverish hour between eleven and twelve.

He pushed his way to the bulletin-board, inscribed with the hours at which ships are sighted and entered into dock: the Kaiser was not there: and with prone outlook he went seeking an assistant superintendent; but, sighting a fellow-operator, come, as usual, to digest the world, from barometer-reports to coffee-quotations at Rio, Charles P. Stickney cried to him: "Funny about the Kaiser! Know anything?"

"It's the darndest thing..." mumbled the other, still star-gazing at a blackboard prices-current of American staples: "raise Hell this day, I guess"....

And on through the rooms Stickney shouldered: all in the air here an odour of the sea, and of them that go down to it in ships; pilot, captain, supercargo, purser; abstracts from logs, copies of manifests and clearances, marks and numbers of merchandise, with quantities, shippers, consignees; here peaked caps, and the jaw that chewed once, and paused long, and, lo, it moved anew; Black Books, massive volumes enshrining ancient wrecks; vast newspaper-files in every tongue; records of changes in lightships, lights, buoys, and beacons, from Shanghai to Cape Horn; reports, charts, atlases, globes; the progress of the rebellion in Shantung, and the earthquake last night in Quito; directories, and high-curved reference-books, and storm-maps; every minute the arrival of cipher cablegrams, breathless with the day's Amsterdam exchange on London, or with the quantities of tea in transitu via Suez or Pacific Railway; and the drift of ocean-currents, and the latest position of the Jane Richardson, derelict, and the arrival of the Ladybird at Bahia; and the probabilities of wind-circulation, atmospheric moisture, aberrations of audibility in fog; and in the middle of it the pulse of the sun, the thundering engines and shooting shuttles of this Loom; a tiptop briskness and bustle of action; a scramble of wits; a mÃlÃe to the death; mixed with pea-jackets, and aromas of chewed pigtail, and a rolling in the gait.

Into this roar of life that word Kaiser stole: and it grew to a chorus.

Charles P. Stickney, butting upon a tearing clerk who was holding aloft a bulletin of icebergs and derelicts, tried to stop him: upon which the clerk, who would not be stopped, cried with a back-looking face of passionate haste: "London message just received — no intelligence of Kaiser—"

But he had hardly disappeared, when another man from an inner room rushed, waving something: the Navesink Highlands lookout had wired the Kaiser in sight! And while the Exchange rang with cheers, Stickney, a colour now in his sere cheeks, went boring his way outward.

The lookout had said it — those blue eyes that never failed there on his watch-tower, he knowing the ships that sail the sea as the Cyclops his sheep, in his heart so knowing them all, that as that sea-glass detected a speck on the horizon, those sea-wise nostrils sniffed its name: for between the Mary Jane and the Mary Anne, both off-shore schooners, is all the world of difference: if you would not see it, he knows. And he had wired the Kaiser! — so expectant his outlook: and that day wept like a ruined man.

Swift upon his first wire a second flashed: and one of those craped days of the tragedies of commerce followed, the boding, the loss, flashed everywhere, pervading Europe and America.

The next morning the Exchange, all the exchanges, the Lloyds', the bourses, were crowded from an early hour, but subdued: no news, not a word; but still — there was certainty: for had the Kaiser and her wireless been merely disabled, she would undoubtedly by now have been reported: she had foundered.

Foundered! — in the serenest weather in which ship ever crossed the water....

But at eleven the truth came: for the brig which had lain becalmed near the Boodah at the moment of the tragedy, and now was nearer England, had flashed the news: “many of the Kaiser’s passengers mutilated, many drowned”.

Death, then, was in the pottage of Life; the air tainted with specks of blood....

That day Man, as it were, rent his garments, sitting in ashes, and to Heaven sent up a howl of fear, of anguish, and of hissing hate.

Those who lacked the intelligence to feel the fear, felt the hate: every girl, the shirt-maker, the shopman, feeling himself robbed of his very own; the Duke in the centre of his oak-lands felt it; the burglar, the junk-dweller of the Yangtse, the pariah of the Hugli. Lamentation and a voice in Ramah, wail on wail. For God had given the sea to man, and it had been seized by a devil.

God had also given the shore; and it, too, had been seized: but, as that had been before their birth, they had not observed it — in such a numb somnambulism shambles humanity.

But the theft of the sea was new and flagrant, it, and the air, being all that had remained: and a roar for vengeance — sharp, and rolled in blood — rose from the throat of man.

Accordingly, when Mr. C. P. Stickney during the afternoon wired for information to the White House, he received the reply: “Encourage calm on ’Change. Government in touch with Europe. Great naval activity. Await good news, seven P.M.”

It was about seven P.M. that what the White House would have considered specially good news occurred: for the Boodah then telegraphed through to O’Hara’s Mahomet at the Straits:

“B. 7651. Begins. After to-morrow (Monday) you begin taxation, as per Order B., 7315, of 2nd inst. But if warships desire to pass out, (not in), permit, till further order. Richard. Ends”.

Which meant that if any Power, or Powers, desired to concentrate force upon the attack of any island, the Lord of the Sea granted them facilities.

The Kaiser passengers had now been sent off to New York, the Boodah’s halls seemed the home of desolation; and, as the night advanced, Hogarth and Loveday walked on the roof: for they could find no rest, the sky without moon or star, the sea making of three sides of the Boodah a roaring reef, the wind blowing cold, they two wrapped to the nose in oilskins with sou'-westers, lashed by rages of rain and spray.

Yonder, to the north-west, appeared a ghost, a thing, a derelict brig, driving downhill on the billows, like a blind man gadding aimless with a crazy down-look, the rags of her one sail drumming on the gusts; and near, nearer, within a stone's-throw of the Boodah, she swaggered wearily, drab Arab, doomed despondent Ahasuerus of the deep, nomad on the nomad sea; and on into the gloom of the south-west she roamed, to be again and again re-created by the rolling light-drum, while Hogarth with a groan said: "If I were only dead! I feel to-night like a man abandoned by the Almighty".

Loveday muttered those words so loved by Hogarth:

"....this is my favoured lot,

My exaltation to afflictions high"....

And Hogarth: "Do you know what is burdening me tonight? It is the curses which the world is at this moment hurling upon me: as when one man, thinking evilly of another, sticks needles into wax, and needles of pain pierce the other..." a sense of evil which was deepened the next day by an ominous little accident, when one of his old gunpractice hulks arrived from Bombay, bearing the throne: for as this was being conveyed into the Boodah a front leg was broken.

Meantime, the world's trade went on as before: only, night and day, its ships lay-to, to pay rent with threat and curse: in all only thirteen ships being sunk ere sea and earth had learned the new conditions.

And from the very first day of this taxing a deeper sense of pain and hardship pervaded the world, the Lord of the Sea now taxing at 4s. per ton a world's tonnage of 29 millions, 7 1/2 millions in sailing-ships, 21 1/2 millions in steamships, once in a voyage — a little less than the revenue of Britain.

So one night he received message from O'Hara that "British Mediterranean fleet has passed through the Straits, homeward".

It was not for nothing that the nations had allowed three weeks to pass before avenging the Kaiser: soon enough the Cabinets had been in intercommunication; but in the "Concert" had occurred — a hitch.

Britain had proposed the destruction of the islands in detail, the Powers to contribute weights of metal proportionate to their mercantile marines: as a basis for calculation she had offered her force in Home and Mediterranean waters; and, this having been accepted, by the 5th ships were under the pennant, and outfitting.

Now, all this time, things had been in a pretty whirl: oratory from pulpit, platform, stump, eyes on fire, mobs that went in haste, shrieks of newspaper passion, organized burglary, and a strange epidemic of fires: for the modern nations lived by the sea, and it was seized. Moreover, on the 6th, after a meeting at the Albert Hall, organized by the Associated Chambers of Commerce, our Government— "Liberal", under Sir Moses Cohen — suffered a defeat of thirty-four votes on a division.

And it was during the turmoil that ensued upon this that the German Foreign Office (on the 9th) sent to the new Russian the wireless "Bion"-meaning— "Let us meet to discuss the subject of-England".

That meeting took place at Konigsberg.

It was now that a fort-man — formerly a Nottingham shoemaker — landed from the Truth's yacht at Frederikshavn, and thence wrote to the Daily Chronicle, to say, briefly, this: That, supposing the European navies joined to batter away with 15-inch guns and torpedoes at five feet of steel, they might finally succeed in mining a hole in it; but if the thick steel happened to have still bigger guns, "and other things", with which, meantime, to batter back at the thin ships, then it would be the ships, probably, which would get holes in them: it was a question of Time. Also he said that the islands were defended by devoted men, every one of intelligence and high principle, who knew what they wanted, and meant to have it — their shooting average being 97 per 100. He advised his country not to try it, especially in view of certain political rumours which he had picked up in the Cattegat.

This letter, although badly spelled, aroused a sensation. The “high principle” of the fort-men, indeed, met with bitter laughter; but its hearty patriotism, simplicity, technical knowledge, were so remarkable, that now a doubt as to the battleship arose — and with it a gnashing of teeth. The service-clubs, the “experts”, wrote this and that; the public poured forth letters, schemes, plots, inventions — like the brain of the world versus the brain of Hogarth. “Starve Him Out”, was a title in the Contemporary: but the reply was bitterly obvious. And into the midst of this racket burst the news that the negotiations with Germany, Russia and France were at a deadlock.

These Powers had raised this question: “In case of the capture of the islands — what shall be done with those most powerful engines?”

Here was a riddle. For whichever nation took even one would score a vast advantage.

If, now, Britain had had the greatness of mind to declare for the sinking, in any case, of all the islands, the difficulty was solved, but the new-Government brooms would score a point and gain a trick, and they proposed the division of surviving forts in the proportion of fighting-power contributed.

The Continent objected: Britain was “firm”; whereupon the French Ambassador sent to Downing Street his withdrawal from the crusade.

And so when — on the 22nd — the fleets assembled at Portland and Milford Haven before rendezvous at the Lizard, the whole original proposal had fallen through: for here was neither tricolour nor saltire, only three German ships, only five Italian; the “probability”, moreover, of the capture of a sea-fort by England was imminent: and on the evening of the mobilisation of the squadrons feverish activity was reported from Toulon; a British Legation attaché, seeing fit to stroll round the Caserne Pepinière, beheld in the yard an extraordinary crowd of limbers: and, pitching into a cab, from the nearest postes et télégraphes wired to London the word: “Angleterre”.

Too late: the British fleets were gone, leaving the Channel and Western Mediterranean desert.

Now the nation awoke to a consciousness of dark skies: cloud of the west rushing to meet a yet lurider eastern — with probability of lightning.

The fleet could hardly return in less than five days — if it returned! Would the hostile nations be good enough to await its return? The lightning would be “near”.

A day of fear, in which flash tracked flash: till at 11.30 P.M. the rumour pervaded the crowd round St. Stephen’s that the new Ministry had suffered defeat: and the drifting ship was captainless.

And early the next morning a number of Boodah boats, out running a regatta, came tearing back, all fluttered; soon after which Quilter-Beckett was hurrying into Hogarth’s presence, who was at coffee, to say: “Well, my Lord King, here they come at last — and enough of them, I think”.

XXXVI. THE “BOODAH” AND THE BATTLESHIPS

THE SHIPS HAD gone forth in two lines ahead at ten knots, Admiral Sir Henry Yerburch, K.C.B., being in the flagship Queen Mary, with the capital-ships being nearly all of the five mosquito flotillas, and half the Home submarine; though what was the object of the torpedo craft (unless they were to go within 2,000 yards of the Boodah's guns) was not very evident.

At that news, Hogarth, putting on a wide-awake, and lighting a cigar with rough perfunctory puffs, ran along a corridor to call Loveday, whereupon the two went out to the ledge and up to the roof.

There, at the south edge, stood a marine trumpeting something at Hogarth's yacht; and, just landing at the Boodah from his gig, a fretful Yankee skipper, register in hand with a bag of £900 sea-rent in gold, while twenty yards yonder rode his smoking ship loaded with grain for Rouen; and on the eastern horizon the armada, in crescent at present, moving with fires banked at two knots, a glare hiding them from the naked eye, but the glass revealing them like toys in the abstract, ethereally hazy.

And now the yacht's cones shewed steam, three of her boats making toward the Boodah; soon at the landing-place stood Wanda, some interpreters, Mons. Roche (the chef), women, engineers, paymasters, civil servants, waiters, etc.; and Hogarth, seeing them, approached, questioned them, and, hearing that they had been ordered a day's pleasure-trip round the Solon, with lifting hat shook hands all round.

By this time some fifty officers and blue-jackets were about the roof and ledge, some discussing, others unfixing lanterns and festoons, with shouted directions. Leaving which, Hogarth and Loveday descended to an office of Loveday's, and Hogarth was just saying: "Quilter-Beckett could destroy a quarter of those warships yonder — now, if he chose — without firing a gun—" when in, with flushed face and stretched stalk, hurried Quilter-Beckett, crying: "My Lord King, I thought you would be here — just look — !"

He held out a Sea telegraph-form-from O'Hara:

"F. 39241. Begins. Almost certainty of war: Germany, France, Russia against England. Three corps massing between Harfleur and Rouen, two upon Petersburg, transports at Havre. England undefended on sea. Ministry fallen. Toulon outfitting. Donald, Admiral. Ends.

Hogarth, with an all-gone gesture, handed the telegram to Loveday.

But with lightning energy he was at a desk, scribbling:

"F. 39242. Begins. To Donald, Admiral, Mahomet. Be in half-hourly communication with Beech's Bank, Paris and Petersburg branches. Send hourly bulletins of news. War to be averted by every means. Let Beech threaten. Warn Cattegat. Richard. Ends."

And "Quick, Quilter-Beckett", he cried, "send that! What is the speed of your quickest picket — ?"

"Fifteen knots—"

"Then, go yourself to the British Admiral. Make him fly back: he has years to attack me in, tell him — I'll write a dispatch—"

On which Quilter-Beckett telephoned up for a picket, took the dispatch, and was soon away, while Hogarth watched his flight over the Sea.

An anxious hour passed, and by then a line of ships had been sighted to the west — the Americans at last; ten minutes later, the picket, too, was seen returning.

“Well, now”, said Hogarth, watching her, “I wonder. The ships seem to be coming on just the same. You have no idea, John, how the mind of people in office becomes fixed, like hardened putty in a hole: I am sorry now I didn’t go myself”.

Some minutes more and Quilter-Beckett was pelting up the steps, his face pink as prickly-heat, blurting out: “My Lord King! I have been grossly insulted...!”

“Ha!” went Hogarth.

“I met a dispatch-boat coming to make summons of surrender, and, in spite of my white flag, they took me prisoner! How I restrained myself — and these people in the hollow of my hand! When I got at last to the Admiral — it is Yerburch on the Queen Mary — he ‘pirated’ me — but I have no time Yonder, you see, are the Americans. British won’t go back: I doubt if they believe— ‘under orders’, and so on. By the way, you shouldn’t stay there — no longer safe—”

He was away: for the moment was near, the Boodah now surrounded with a series of floating squares hanging deep torpedo-nets against submarines, on both horizons effusions of smoke, the ships no more visions, but middle-sized sea-things, seeming fixed in the thick of the sea, though steaming quickly. Hogarth watched them through a hand-glass, while Loveday, ghastly pallid, whispered: “Come, Richard, come”, but still lingered a little, seeing them grow up — like the infant, the lad, the hairy man — toiling at the bigness of the sea, looking stripped, prepared for tempest They were six miles away — five.

Mute lay the Boodah; and, surrounding her, perniciously moved the ships at forty-eight revolutions a minute, hardly a cable’s interval between the host of them, they seeming no more the playthings of the sea, but its masters, each a travelling throne of power; and as they pored so taciturn, with baleful aspect they trained their cannon upon the sea-fort in their midst: not a soul visible on fort or ships.

A long while it seems to last, that noonday stillness, a noonday breezy and oceanic, the sea sharp-edged, hard-looking, dark-blue, tossing spray along its ridges, not rough, but restless, shewing against the ships white foams a moment, which silently glide away.

But their Admiral is signalling: Let her have it! and in some moments more yonder to the far north the Florida breaks into quick-flashing ecstasy, like quick-winking Gorgon glances; and the north-east catches it in a single boom; and in ten seconds more it is as if Nature, with sudden yell, feels to her womb the birth-hour come and rueful throes: and where ships had been appears in one minute nothing but a ring of stagnant smoke, tugged into rays and out-sticking clouds, flushed with glares and rouges.

And no question of missing: the Boodah stationary and huge; every shell told. But, the deluge over, that thunder-marred visage again looked grimly forth, a face new-risen from smallpox, an apparition, roof-houses gone, lighthouse tops, one of her great 19.5 inchers in fragments, in her casemates seventeen dead.

But where now is the one-masted Hercules, which but a moment since went trembling at the bale of her own bellowing barbettes? The Hercules is in a Nessus-shirt of flame. And whither the Hercules is going, thither is the Idaho going, and the Dante gone, and gone the elongated length of the Invincible, and twenty destroyers, and the bow-works of the old Powerful, which stoops woefully there, screws in air, as the camel of the desert kneels and waits, while into her beam comes crashing the ram of the poopless Deutschland.

Yet the Boodah has not fired a gun!

But now she fires: as the broadsides drench her anew, she fires, the hulk — all round the horizon — lowing in travail: and as there is no question of missing on the one side, so on the other is assurance, the Boodah's broadsides of 19.5-inchers and 9.5-inchers, ninety-two in all, being fired by the hand of Quilter-Beckett, who sits at a table grim with knobs, buttons, dial-faces, in a cabinet near a saloon where Hogarth, Loveday, and five lieutenants are lunching; and where he sits he can hear the band in an alcove rendering for the eaters Beethoven's Ninth Symphony: hear, not heed: for two gunners in each casemate have sighted a ship through pivoted glasses, whose fixing, disturbing an electrical circuit, prints the ship's distance on an indicator before the Admiral: whereupon he touches a button — many buttons — in intense succession: the Boodah bawls: and the thrust-back of her resentment becomes intolerable, the ships just like fawns under the paws of an old lion whose grisly jaws drip gore; the sharks that infest her will fare well of her hand.

Of forty-three ships fixed, thirty-nine are hit, eleven founder: wreckage so vast and swift, that the Admiral, still afloat in a Queen Mary pierced above-belt, is like a man stung by the tarantulas of distraction: tries to signal flight — flags cannot be seen; fires coloured pistol-lights: "Retire!" — and soon, all round, the circle is in flight.

But hapless flight: the Boodah is an octopus whose feelers reach far, and they, within her toils, cannot escape her omnipresence. She sends after them no guns: yet they are blown to atoms; the sea becomes a death-trap thick with pitfalls and shipwreck; one by one they are caught, they fly aloft like startled fowl, or they succumb, and lean, and stoop, and sink: the sea, for mile on mile, proving a hell of torpedoes-dirigible, automobile, mine.

For in the matter of mines the Boodah had all the advantages of a shore, and as to dirigible torpedoes more than all.

Her mines, whose weight was adjusted to the specific gravity of salt water, sank till the pressure at ten fathoms arrested them, they, electrically connected with the forts, reaching out twenty miles; and the whole network, charted to an inch, was coordinated with the range-tables.

The ordinary 18-inch Whiteheads, moreover, were replaced by a longer design running 6,000 yards, the added length being occupied by the flask, whose compressed air runs the engine, they not sinking on finishing their course: so, if they missed, there they lay, a trap of 380 pounds of gun-cotton in the course of the numerous moving foe.

With these three forms of the same plague the Boodah hunted the fleeing ships, and drove them stumbling through complicated miseries, amazed and thunderstruck: so that seventy-three only, several of them half-wrecks, reached her twenty-five mile limit; and, there, over the mines of the Solon, reassembled.

Amid the throng on his ruined roof Hogarth watched their flight and the ever-coming boatloads of blue-jackets through a mist of smoke and the after-smell of war, while under the sea wide eyes in hosts were a-gaze at a windfall of 2,400 bodies.

About half-past four captains and commanders of the survivors were in the ward-room of the Second-in-Command on the Orion — the Queen Mary gone — when he, with splendid infatuation, proposed a return to the attack, with a change of tactics to concentration upon one side only of the Boodah; but the foreigners pointed out the obvious added dangers; and in the midst of a wrangle a dispatch-boat from the Solon, eleven miles south, arrived, demanding the usual sea-rent, by draft, if not in gold; so out, at this unlooked-for incident, broke a new quarrel, the British for a whole hour resisting the inexorable; till the Solon Lieutenant, his eyes moist with pleading, explained their helplessness, adding that war between the four Powers had been declared that day at noon from the Stock Exchange steps: and only then the Vice-Admiral, breaking into tears, yielded to destiny.

Hogarth, meanwhile, was like a wild man, imprisoned, till his yacht returned at dusk with her excursionists; and without delay he was on her, and away for England.

XXXVII. THE STRAITS

IN ENGLAND, MEANTIME, was nothing but dismay.

The Government, whose defeat was accidental, on being hurriedly patched up, threw itself passionately into the work of defence, calling up every enrolled man, while at regimental centres the enlistment of volunteers went forward, Weedon alone turning out 7,000 rifles a day.

But on the night of the Declaration the Under-secretary announced in the House that the Russians were moving down the Baltic, the French toward the Straits: and the next morning dawned with the dreariness of last mornings and days. However, soon after 1 P.M., the Lord of the Sea landed at Bristol, his yacht being one of the swiftest things afloat; there heard the known facts; and thence wired to Beech's London house, to the London Foreign Office, to Cadiz and to Frederikshavn, where he had wireless for the Mahomet at the Straits, and for the Truth in the Cattegat.

His wire to the Foreign Office was as follows:

"I have come to England hoping to avert European war by fiscal means, not knowing that the passage of ships into open water was of first importance. Since this is so, accept my assurance, there will be no war, except on the part of Britain, which I should much resent. British Government, I suggest, should forthwith allay national anxiety.

"RICHARD".

But the Foreign Office did not publish this telegram, not knowing what to make of it — unless Hogarth were vehemently the friend of England, while every British being regarded him not so much as the enemy of man, as the special Anti-Christ of England. And how came he to be in England, when he should be at the bottom of the Atlantic? The telegram was passed through the agitated departments, but kept dark....

So the afternoon passed without news: and tension grew to agony.

Hogarth spent the evening in his Berkeley Square house with the Manager of Beech's, examining office-books and specimens of some new Sea-coins, till near eleven, when, being alone, he put on a mackintosh, shaded his face well with hat and collar-flap, and went out into the drizzling night.

Even his Berkeley Square was peopled, and, as he strolled toward Pall Mall, he found it ever harder to advance, till he became jammed. Never had he seen such a crowd, all in the air a sound, vague and general, which was like a steam of thought-made-audible; till presently, while trying in vain to get away, he was startled by a tumult that travelled, a rumour of woe that noised and swelled, terrifying, the voice of the people, the voice of God: and though he did not know its meaning, it keenly afflicted him.

The fastest of the survivors from the battle with the Boodah had wirelessly: on that commonplace bulletin at the War Office the news stood written...

But the rumour of that despair had not yet attained its culmination, when another rumour roared after and over it, roar upon roar, like tempest poured through the multitudinous forest, joyance now overtaking sorrow, and a noise of roistering overwhelming lamentation. And all at once a great magnetic hysteria seized them all, and the many became as one, and the bursting bosom burst: men weeping like infants, laughing foolishly, grasping each other's hand, and one cried "Hurrah!", and another, catching it, cried "Hurrah!"

For the French, German, and Russian fleets, in attempting to pass the two narrows north and south of Europe, had been stopped by the two sea-forts there; and though they had been so eager to pass, that they had even offered to pay sea-rent, this, too, had been refused. They had then, at five and at five-thirty in the afternoon, offered battle to the islands: with the result that half their weight had been annihilated before they took to flight. So said the bulletin....

And Hogarth in the midst of the jubilee saw the man who jammed his left shoulder, a broker in spectacles, grip the hand of the man on his right, a ragamuffin, to cry out: “That scoundrel Hogarth! Isn’t there good in the damned thief, after all?”

And the other: “Aye, he knows how to give it ’em ‘ot, don’t ’e, after all! Thank God for that!”

Three weeks later peace was proclaimed by a procession at Temple Bar between England, Austro-Germany, France, Russia, and the Sea.

XXXVIII. THE MANIFESTO

THE LAST EFFORT of Europe to resist the Sea was made on the afternoon of the 14th of October, when the British Prime Minister refused to conclude a treaty of peace.

“Your master is only a pirate — on a large scale”, he said to a Minister of the Sea.

That was on the 14th.

On the 15th there was a stoppage of British trade nearly all the world over.

On the 20th England was in a state of Ã©meute resembling revolution.

On the 28th the Treaty of Peace was signed.

Its principal conditions were: (1) The undertaking by the Sea not to raise sea-rent on British ships without certain formalities of notice; and (2) The undertaking by Britain not to engage in the making of any railway or overland trade-route, or of any marine engine of war, without the consent of the Sea. And similar treaties were signed by the Sea with the other nations.

Then followed the rush of the Ambassadors to the Boodah, and the frivolous round of Court-life revolved, levÃ©e, audience, dinner, drawing-room, investiture; the Lord of the Sea descended from the throne before the Court to pin a cross upon the humble breast of his best shot and give him the title of PrÃ©cept, gave fanciful honours to emperors, received them of them — wore when throned a brow-band of gold with only one stone, the biggest of the meteor octahedrons, that glanced about his brow like an icicle in whose glass gallivanted a fairy clad in rags of the rainbow.

Now the old gaieties recommenced, but more Olympian in tone, as befitted the ruler of rulers, terrible now being the lifting of Hogarth's brows at the least lapse in ritual; and only the chastest-nurtured of the earth ever now stalked through gavotte or pavane in those halls of the sea.

The world now lay at his feet. The dependence upon him of England, of France, of that part of Austro-Germany called Germany, was obvious: he could starve them. But over Austria proper, Russia, Italy, his sway was no less omnipotent: for the panic cheapness of scrip which followed the destruction of the Kaiser had, of course, been foreseen, and used by him; Beech had bought up, easily ousting the Rothschilds from their old financial kingship: by tens of millions the process had gone on; and still it continued increasingly, for the wealth of Hogarth now, as compared with that of other rich men, was like a ship to a skiff. If he threw upon the market, the bankruptcy of several nations might follow: it was doubtful if the United States could survive; certainly, Austria, Russia, South America must go under.

Nor was the East less his slave: Japan a mercantile nation, China and Turkey in his fiscal net. So, looking round the globe toward the middle of November, he could observe scarcely a nation which he could not, by scribbling a telegram, crush out of recognition.

It was precisely then that Richard Hogarth revealed himself.

On the 15th of November appeared his Manifesto.

This Charter, which everlastingly must remain one of the Scriptures of our planet, simple as a baby's syllables, yet large like the arch of Heaven, has left its mark on the human soul.

On the morning of the 16th its twenty clauses occupied in pica a page of every newspaper, and it was posted up big in the streets of cities.

The document ran:

Richard, by the Will of God...I do hereby discern, declare, and lay down: That:

1. What is no good cannot be owned: only goods can be owned.

2. “Good” is well, or pleasant; goods is wellth (wealth) or pleasures: thus, a coal-mine, being no pleasure, cannot be owned.

3. Coal becomes goods after being moved, or taken. Moving does not make it good; its nature does not make it good: moving-plus-Nature makes it good, ownable. At the pit-head, already, it is a pleasure, fewer pains being now needed to move it to a fireplace. Thus, Nature apart from motion cannot be owned, being no good, as a cave is no good to a caveman outside it: rain is wetting him; if he takes it, moves in, it is good.

Animals and plants, by taking things from the planets presented to them, by moving things, raise Nature into wealth, and own things.

4. For Jack to own, have a thing for Jack’s own, Jack must by his own force have subdued Nature, must have taken the thing by moving the thing’s atoms, or moving something relatively to the thing, or, negatively, by not evading, but accepting, the thing in motion — a wind, tide, light-wave; else Jack must have taken something (by as much work) to purchase the thing from its (true) owner, or accepted it as a favour from Nature in motion, or from its (true) owner. To say “own” is to say “take”; to say “take” is to say “motion”, i.e., the doing of work: “work done” being FD, i.e., Force used into Distance moved-over. I cannot own the air: it is no good; I own the air in my lungs, having taken, moved, it, done FD on it: it is very good; and I own the air which, doing FD, moving to my face, I do not evade, but accept, take: it is very good.

I say to Jack “take a cigar”; he loudly says “yes!”, but does not move it to his mouth, nor moves his mouth to it; instead, he moves a pen to his mouth; this makes me laugh: he has not taken a cigar.

Jack is catching fish in a boat; Tom owns the boat: so Jack gives fish to Tom, until Jack's FD done on the fish is equivalent to Tom's FD done on the boat; and now Jack owns the boat. If "the law" says that Tom still owns the boat, this makes me laugh: for how can Tom come to own two boats' good by the FD done on one only?

Jack is ploughing the sea with a ship: just there he owns the sea, has taken, is moving, it for his good. He does not own the sea before, nor the sea behind, him: for the motions behind made by him have ceased to do good.

Jack is ploughing soil: he owns the soil ploughed, has taken it, and will own it while the motions he has made do good: so that, if Tom who has not moved it says "I own the soil, for 'the law' declares that I have taken it by moving a pen two inches", this makes me laugh. Or, if Jack says "I own it for ever", this makes me laugh. Or, if anyone says "I own both the soil and the site" (relative position), this makes me laugh: for what can one man move to make a relative position good? He can neither move a field toward anything nor move much toward a field. If many men move railways that way, or move things to rear towns round the field, this makes the site good, moving it from outside a community to inside a community; and the many who make it good own it.

5. The site is the field's chief good: so the plougher owes something to those who, making it good, own it, This something is named "rent".

6. Suppose that the plougher, or dweller-on, is an Englishman: he owes rent to the English. And, since the site of England is made good by movements made in America, he owes rent to the Americans.

7. This the mind readily describes to be true: it is a "truism", and is necessarily the Fundamental Principle of Society throughout the universe.

So that, summing up, we may define: “Rent” is “right”, based on truth when paid to those by whose movements a site is made good.

8. One might readily guess (if there were no example of it) that any violation of a Principle so fundamental would be avenged by Nature upon the planet which violated it.

9. Our planet is such an example: for here Two Separate Violations of the Principle appear; each great in itself; but one small in comparison.

10. Accordingly, for the small violation Nature has not failed to send upon Man a small penalty; and for the great violation great penalties.

11. The small violation consists in the claim by nations to have taken, without having moved, sites called “countries”.

12. For this Nature has sent upon man the small penalty of War.

13. To abolish War men must remove its cause.

Therefore let the site-rental of England (i.e., the excess of English goods over what English goods would be, if no other country existed) be handed over to a World Council; and the site-rental of America to the same; and the World Council shall disburse such funds for the majesty and joy of Man: and War shall terminate.

14. This way the Lord of the Sea indicates to the world, though with its initiation he is not personally concerned.

15. Beside the small violation of the Fundamental Principle of Society, there is a great on the earth.

16. The Great Violation consists in the claim by individuals to have taken, without having moved, sites and soils called “estates”, “domains”, “plots”: for, as rent tends to rightness when paid to the fifty millions of a nation, fifty-millionfold is its wrongness when paid to one; and as rent is right when paid to the thousand million inhabitants of a planet, a thousand-millionfold is its wrongness when paid to one.

17. For this Great Violation of the Fundamental Principle of Society Nature has sent upon Man great penalties: poverties, frenzies, depravities, horrors, sorrows, lowness, dulness.

18. Lowness, dulness: for by far the greatest of these penalties is a restraint on Man's development. Man is an animal, Man is a mind: and since the wing of mind is Pride, Assurance, or Self-esteem, and since the home of an animal is a Planet, and an animal without a home is a thing without Assurance or Pride, so Man without Earth is a mind without wing. Even so, a few, having Assurance, make what we call "Progress", i.e., the discovering of truth — a crawling which might become flight, had all minds but the wing of Pride to co-operate in discovering truth. But Man lacks assurance and foothold, founded home and domain: his sole heritage, though he is neither fish nor fowl, being sea and air.

19. This is a great violation.

20. And with this great violation of the Fundamental Principle of Society the Lord of the Sea is personally concerned. In the name of Heaven and of Earth he urges upon the nations of men to amend it in the month of the promulgation of this Manifesto: and this summons he strengthens with a threat of his resentment.

As the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, I will see to it.

RICHARD.

XXXIX. THE “BOODAH’S” LOCK-UP

THREE DAYS AFTER the Manifesto the marriage of Miss Stickney of New York with Lord Alfred Cown was to take place, this having been put off owing to the Kaiser tragedy; and so, on the day of the Manifesto, Baruch Frankl, the Jew, was crossing to a wedding which, even in the midst of great events, had stirred up a considerable rumour and sensation, since the American guests were to consist of the coterie known as the “Thirty-four”, all millionaires, while “the cake” was to weigh three-quarters of a ton, each guest’s grub to cost $500, and for that breakfast the Neva had been ravished for fish and Siamese crabs for nests.

Frankl, however, was never destined to taste those five hundred dollar mouthfuls. It happened in this way: as the Boodah’s searchlights, destroyed in the battle, were not yet repaired, in the interval some lawless ships took the chance on dark nights to skulk past with extinguished lights; now, the captain of Frankl’s chartered steamer had that bright idea (being of adventurous turn), when night fell forty knots east of the Boodah, so he came to Frankl, and broached the scheme.

“Not for Joe”, was Frankl’s answer: “pay the Pirate his taxes and be done”.

“It could be worked as sweet as a nut, sir!” persisted the skipper, with a watering mind.

“Well, so long as you take the risk, perhaps — but no, sir, I’d rather not”.

On which the skipper winked self-willed to himself, and, putting out nine miles from the Boodah his three lights, went dashing past.

And the attempt would have succeeded, had it not been for the fact that the night was pitch-dark, and that another ship was trying that very venture with extinguished lights. And these two ships met, bow to bow, with such an energy of adventurous smartness, that both sharply sank.

The sea, however, being smooth, all hands were saved; and now, since the boats lay forlorn on the vast, with nothing but the Boodah's swarm of moons to move to, for the Boodah they started, while Frankl cast twinkling fingers to the sky, and cursed that night, as the oars with slow wash journeyed through turgid murk toward the very den of the devil.

When they reached the Boodah they were conducted down to a police-court, and there shivered an hour in a dreary light, till three officials in peaked caps and frock-coats came, sat on a Bench, and, after hearing evidence, pronounced sentence of seven months against the captains, and one against Frankl.

These were led away by police blue-jackets, and Frankl groaned through the night in a box as cold as the cells of Colmoor.

The next morning Quilter-Beckett, making a report in Hogarth's salon, mentioned the incident, saying: "Here are the names, with the sentences; I shall send the sailors home..." and Hogarth's eyes, resting on the document, chanced to catch that name of Frankl.

At once he turned pale, for his first thought was: "Frankl must have been going to the wedding, in which case Someone Else may be with him".

But her name was not there....

He rose and paced; and he said low: "No one else on either of the ships?"

"No, my Lord King".

Then up lifted Hogarth's brow, alight with fun, and he muttered: "All right, Caps-and-tassels".

He said aloud: “Quilter-Beckett, this Frankl I know. Did you never hear anything about Caps-and-tassels at Westring? He is Caps-and-tassels. Now tell me, which is your biggest blue-jacket?”

“Man called Young, my Lord King”.

“Then, have a suit of Young’s sea-clothes put upon this Frankl, and let him be brought before me in the Throne Room this morning after the Audience. He was fond of liveries....”

Accordingly, by half-past eleven Frankl entered the Throne Room, where, as soon as its rosy translucency broke upon his gaze, an “Oh!” of admiration groaned from him, in spite of his weight of misery, he not walking, but being lifted forward in successive swings by his armpits — up the first steps to the outer circle of balustrade, forward to the second steps and the inner balustrade, within which shone the throne, and Hogarth, crowned and large in robes, on it.

The two warders, intent upon portering Frankl, and not noticing the cap which still covered his eyebrows, one now in sudden scare whispered: “Off with your cap, you...!” on which Frankl snatched it off, grasping through superabundant sleeves, he at the same moment a fury and a dazzled man, the throne before him incredible, like a dream which one knows to be a dream, in structure not unlike the Peacock Throne of Akbar, its length fourteen feet, seating thirteen persons in recesses, standing on a gold platform with three concave steps set with rings of sapphire, and consisting of a central part and two wings, the wings being supported on twisted legs (one had been broken), and made of fretted ivory mosaicked with cabochon emerald, ruby, topaz, turquoise, chrysoberyl, diamond, opal, the large central part, with its recesses, being also of ivory, gold-arabesqued, its mosque-shape canopy (of Hindoo enamel-work on the outside) being supported by eleven pillars of emerald; at the top of each pillar a dolphin (hence the name “Dolphin Throne”) made of turquoise, jasper, pearl, sardius, and at the bottom of each pillar a guldusta, or bouquet, of gems; the concave ceiling one mass of stones, representing a sea in which sailed three Dutch galleons, and seven dolphins sported.

But all that Frankl saw of it was its opulence: for his terror lest the warders should let him go occupied his mind.

And precisely the thing which he feared came upon him, for Hogarth said: “Warders, retire”.

And now Frankl, all unsupported, stood in unstable equilibrium, anon stooping to his finger-tips, then straining doubtfully forward with struggling arms from a too backward poise: for not only did the trousers lie a twisted emptiness far below his feet, but the feet themselves were lost in Young’s boots, so he stood like Scaramouch, a mere sack, a working of his chin wobbling down his beard, and there was a blaze in his stare which Hogarth, unfortunately, did not well estimate.

They faced each other, alone, save for the body-guard at the circumference of the room.

“Was it you that sent me to Colmoor?” Hogarth suddenly asked in a low voice, stooping forward.

“Me!” shrieked Baruch Frankl, pointing a hanging sleeve-end to his breast: “as Jehovah is my witness—”

“Were you about to swear? For ever the same? — tyrant and worm? It was you. Now tell it me right out: you have nothing to fear: for you cannot be vain enough to imagine that I would harbour enmity against you”.

“It wasn’t me, I say again, my Lord King!” — Frankl trampled a little backward, then stooped over-poised to his finger-tips: “with what motive? Oh, that’s hard — to be accused. They have already given me a month — my God! a month! And only because I am a Jew. But it wasn't me — that I'll swear to God—”

Hogarth rose to his height, descended, put his hand upon Frankl's shoulder. “Well, leave that. But — my sister!”

His hand felt the shoulder beneath it start like fits.

“Your sister!” Frankl screamed with a face of scare: “Why, what of her now?”

“Me? O, my Good God, what is this! Me, poor sinner, know where your sister is, my Lord King? Why, spare me! spare me, God of Hosts! Why, you've only got to ask yourself the question—”

“Listen to me, Frankl”, said Hogarth, bending his blazing brow low over the Jew: “I have searched for that woman through the world, and have not found her. All the time, mind you, I felt convinced that you know where she is; and you may wonder why — years ago — I did not have you seized. I will tell you why: it was because I had a sort of instinct that God, whom I serve continually with tears and prayers, would not fail in His day to show me her face: and to-day you are here. Do you suppose, Frankl, that you will go away without telling me where she is? And in order to hurry you, listen to what I say to your warders—”

He touched a button in the balustrade, and to the warders said: “If at any time this man should demand pencil and paper, supply them, and take to your Admiral what he writes. To-day his food shall be fare from your own table; to-morrow three loaves and water; from the third day one loaf and water; till further orders”.

Up shot Frankl's shivering arms, while Hogarth, training his ermines and purples, paced away.

That was on the day following the Manifesto.

XL — THE WEDDING

BY THE TIME Frankl's three loaves had become one, that amazement with which men received the Manifesto had commenced to give place to more coherent impressions.

He was not a "Monster"! that was the first realization — no pirate, nor lurid Anti-Christ, nor vainglorious Caesar! And in two days, the first astonishment over, there arose a noise in the world: for the Lord of the Sea had given to the nations one month only in which to do that thing: and the peoples took passionately to meetings.

In England Land Leagues, Chambers of Agriculture, Restoration Leagues, Nationalization Leagues, many Leagues, were organizing furiously, stretching the right arm of oratory; deputations, petitions in wagons, demonstrations en bloc, party cannonades, racket heaven-high. Sir Moses Cohen, the Jew-Liberal Leader, appealing to the strongest prejudice in Englishmen, spoke one night at Newcastle of "the interference of a foreign prince in the affairs of Britain"; used the word: "Never!", and on this cry secured an enormous following: so that, within a week, he was instrumental in forming the formidable League of Resistance — destined to prove so tragic for Hogarth, and for England.

It was in the midst of this world-turmoil that — on the third day — the marriage-morning of Miss Cecil Stickney dawned; and that same evening Rebekah Frankl, convalescent from influenza, was seated over a bedroom fire in Hanover Square, a cashmire round her shoulders, her sickness cured by herbs, her physician then hobbling with a stick down the stairs — Estrella of Lisbon — her back almost horizontal now with age.

And as Rebekah mused there, two newsboys below, whose shouts pursued each other, went proclaiming through November gloom as it were the day of doom, crying, even in that uproar of Europe, a private event:

MARRIAGE OF LORD ALFRED COWERN
AND MISS CECIL STICKNEY APPALLING TRAGEDY

And soon a girl ran in, gasping: “Miss Frank! — this is too awful — your father—”

The news, having been flashed to Paris by Mackay-Bennett cable, now appeared in detail after the New York Herald's French edition, and Rebekah's eyes ran wildly over details as to the “bevy of beauty”, daughters of “the Thirty-four”, and the church of waiting ladies, the carpeted path between palms and exotics, and how the ticket-holders heard the organ tell the Cantilenet Nuptiale and Bennett's Minuet; and then the multitudinous stir: behold the bridegroom cometh! — the little necessary bridegroom of no importance, and then the white entry of bride and bridal train, while the choir knelt to sing “O Perfect Love”.

Perfect love, however, was hardly the order of that day, but rather perfect hate: for in Madison Square — the church being at the upper end of Fifth Avenue — a mob was being harangued on the subject of this very wedding: and when they heard and realized the thing that was being done before their eyes they were swept as by a wind of fire, and under its impulse set out like some swollen Rhone with a rushing sound to pounce upon the church, full of perfect hate: and the choir sang “O perfect love”.

What happened now was described as a nightmare. The same elemental instincts of the Stone Age which had exhibited themselves in the $500-worth of food wrought in another form, but with no less savagery, in assassins as in victims: and a massacre ensued, bride and bridegroom passing away like bubbles, of “the Thirty-four” five only escaping. The report ended with the words: “The ringleaders have been arrested; quiet reigns through the city”; then a list of the guests, with asterisks indicating those killed.

Rebekah searched for her father’s name, and when she became certain that it was not there, her lips moved in thanksgiving.

But since Frankl was not at the wedding, where, then, was Frankl? She counted the days on her fingers: he could not have been late.

Unless there had been an accident to his ship....

Her brows knit a little; she peered into the fire: and thought of the Boodah....

It was possible that when her father’s steamer stopped to pay sea-rent, Hogarth might have heard, and seized him. That notion occurred to her.

And at once it threw her into an extraordinary fever, her bosom swelling like elastic in her heavings to catch breath, though she did not realize the wild thought that was working up to birth within her. She rose and paced, furiously fast.

If he was in the hands of Hogarth?

“He is a British subject”, she muttered: “Hogarth has not the right...Oh, he has not the right...!”

She was fearfully agitated! something fighting up and up within her, stifling her, working to burst into birth; she flung the cashmire from her shoulders, her bosom rowing like two oarsmen. “Because we are Jews...!” she went.

“If he dared do that — !”

What then? Say! Rebekah!

“I would go to him myself—”

All at once that thought was born, and she stood shockingly naked to her own eyes, her hands rushing to cover a face washed in shame. “But, surely”, she whispered, “I could never be so bold, good Heavens? Why, Never! Never — !”

However, an hour later, with flaming eyes, she was writing a letter to Frankl’s manager.

XLI. THE VISIT

FRANKL'S BANK WAS scanning the agents' yacht-lists for her, when Sir Moses Cohen, who was closely associated with Frankl, placed his own three-master at her disposal; and she set out from Bristol, with her being three Jewish ladies, Frankl's manager, and a snuffy Portuguese rabbi who resembled a Rembrandt portrait.

It was late at night, and Hogarth, who had lately acquired a passion for those Mathematics which touch upon Mysticism, was bent over Quaternions and the quirks of [Proofers note: checkmark symbol] (— i) in an alcove of his Boodah suite hardly fourteen feet square, cosy, rosy, and homely: he sitting at a sofa-head, and, lying on the sofa, Loveday, his head on Hogarth's thigh, escaped from office and frockcoat, in happy shirt-sleeves, between sleeping and waking.

Hogarth was interrupted by a telephone bell.

"Well?" he answered.

"My Lord King", from Quilter-Beckett, "Frankl has handed to his warder something written: will your Lordship's Majesty see it now?"

"Yes!" Then: "John! Frankl has yielded!"

Up Loveday started with "Thank God!" while Hogarth: "When does my yacht arrive?"

"At midnight" — from Quilter-Beckett.

"She starts back immediately for England with me and Mr. Loveday".

Now an officer entered to present an envelope, and the two looked together over these words:

“Your Lordship’s Majesty’s sister, Margaret Hogarth, is at No. 11, Market Street, Edgware Road, London. She goes under the name of Rachel Oppenheimer, I don’t know why. As God is my witness, I repent in ashes. Won’t your Lordship’s Majesty have mercy on a worm of the earth? I am an old man, getting on, and starved to madness. The ever devoted slave, from this day forth, of my Lord King.

“BARUGH FRANKL”.

Hogarth ‘phoned up: “Give Frankl food now, and put him where it is not cold....” and to Loveday he said, “Well, you see, she is there: ‘No. 11, Market Street’. And under the name of — what? ‘Rachel Oppenheimer’...John Loveday, do you fathom the meaning of that?”

“No — don’t bother me about meanings, but shout, like her, ‘O Happy Day!’ I say, Richard, you remember that singing? how we would hear her from the forge? All day, washing, cooking — melodious soul! There was ‘O Happy Day’, and there was — By God, how charmingly holy! how English! And, Richard, you remember — ?”

Another telephone bell: Hogarth turned to hear.

“Just arrived in the yacht, Tyre, my Lord King”, said Quilter-Beckett’s voice, “four Jewish ladies, a Jewish gentleman, and a rabbi, who request early audience to-morrow; they lie-to, and have sent a boat—”

“Rubbish! I shall not be here to-morrow, and even if I was — Who are they? By the way, no sign of the yacht?”

“Not yet. They are Miss Frankl—”

“Who?”

“Miss Rebekah Frankl—”

“God”, went Hogarth faintly, stabbed to the heart.

“Miss Agnes Friedrich, Mrs.—”

But the rest fell upon ears deaf as death, the teeth of Hogarth now chattering as with cold, that haggard, gaunt yellow, which was his pallor, overspreading his face. So long was he speechless, that Quilter-Beckett asked: “Are you there, my Lord King?”

“Quilter-Beckett!”

“Yes, my Lord King?”

“Will you go yourself — for me — to them? Make them sleep here, will you? This is most urgent, I assure you. And go quick, will you?”

That night did not the Lord of the Sea sleep: she under his roof...

Nor did he go that night to find Margaret — nor the next day, nor the next, though Loveday chafed: for, gyrating through the giddy air of a galaxy where Margaret was not, he forgot her.

XLII. REBEKAH TELLS

AT THAT TIME Hogarth, personally, was in close relation with the score of Embassies that inhabited the belly of the Boodah, these intriguing incessantly for half-hours at his ear, and in communication, meanwhile, with their Governments through O'Hara's Mahomet: so that Hogarth had to get up early, and his mornings sweated with audience and negotiation.

The German and Russian Emperors, with the Prince of Wales (then virtually Regent), had hurriedly met at Vienna — presumably for the discussion of the Manifesto; and immediately after it, the Prince, who had the reputation of being one of the most tactful of men-of-the-world, took a step which hinted that the Royal House, as often before, meant to come to the rescue of the country which loved it however the politicians might bungle: Hogarth was invited to accept the Garter.

He accepted: and the ceremony in the Boodah was witnessed, as it were, by Europe, King-at-Arms in a new tabard, with his suite, going to invest him, taking the Statute of the Chapter, with the Great Seal of England, and a set of habiliments — white-silk stockings, gold sword Spanish hat, stars, gloves. And the effect was speedy, the other rulers, dumbfounded before, said now: “England will comply with the Manifesto; and, if before us, the taxed sea opens to her...Yield, moreover, we must: let us make haste!”

But to consent was one thing: the how another: the mere suspicion of the willingness of Kaiser or Tsar shook their thrones. Whereupon Russia said to Hogarth: “Recently dispossessed, they cling dyingly now to their lands, so I will buy the land from them, and you will lend me the money”; to which Hogarth virtually replied: “It is too childish to talk of buying part of a heavenly body from a Russian: have you no sense of humour? You may give the Russian ‘nobles’ some money, if that pleases you: but without my help. If His Majesty the Tsar is more afraid of them than of me, my only way will be to prove myself more truly terrible than they”.

But high words hurl down no hundred-headed hydra: in France — fast, faster — with dizzy vertigo — millions were forming themselves into secret societies, while in England was One only — but stronger than the many of France.

By the date of Rebekah’s pilgrimage Hogarth had so far failed and yielded, as almost to decide that from the Boodah nothing could be done, unless he went to the extent of ruining and starving. The other alternative was the fixing upon one nation, becoming its recognized ruler, and there furnishing an example both of modus operandi, and of a subsequent state of happiness, which others could not long refrain from imitating.

But this modification was still in the air; and, meanwhile, he listened, weighed, revolved: using men, impressing, convincing, extracting for his use the wisdom of their experience, estimating the exact pressure of the Time, the timbre of its roar.

So on the morning after Rebekah’s arrival his Gold Stick became his rack from the moment of the bow from the throne till noon: name after name — cordons, orders, gold-lace, sashes, stars, tiaras; till enter the four Jewesses, the bank-manager, the rabbi, Hogarth’s pallor showing up his three moles and nose-freckles, adding a glare to his eyes, he suffering from the runaway drumming of his heart.

The ladies stoop through curtsies; the men do reverence; Hogarth bows.

There like a Begum of Bhopal stood Rebekah, floridly reflected in the glassy floor, sallow under the eyes, smiling at him, he at her; and very quickly now, she once in his sight, he recovered comparative calm, and the strength of his heart.

“Your first visit to the Boodah, I think?” — looking at her.

“Yes, my Lord King” — curtseying.

“Do you like her?”

“Why, yes: she is solid, and mighty, and rich. In my own, and the name of my friends, I beg to thank your Lordship’s Majesty for your Lordship’s Majesty’s kind and good hospitality to us”.

“Humbugging little beggar”, thought Hogarth, his mind slowly gathering tone, but rushing meanwhile into a species of frivolous assurance after those agitations, his hands still cold.

“Well”, he said, “but you have not seen her! I think I know her fairly well, and I propose to be myself your guide, if that will interest you—”

The Rabbi spoke with trembling voice: “It is gracious, my Lord King. We are here, however, humbly to present an urgent petition to your Lordship’s Majesty. Baruch Frankl, at present a prisoner in the Boodah, a man no longer young, and habituated to comfort—”

“Stay”, interrupted Hogarth: “if you have a petition the day and hour must be arranged by negotiation between yourself and my Chamberlain. But surely, meantime, I may consider you my guest? Miss Frankl and I — have met — in the world. Come, ladies — come, sirs — say yes!”

Rebekah, standing averted, flashed a look at him, reading his heart, and Jews and Jewesses laid heads together, whispering a little, until the Rabbi said, bowing: “We bend to your Lordship’s Majesty’s most gracious will”.

“Agreed, then, sir. We might now see the Boodah, and if you will luncheon with me — Mr. Chamberlain! direct Admiral Quilter-Beckett to meet me at once in the north corridor”.

He rose, master of his limbs now, descended, unrobed in an alcove, and in a corridor above the circular stair came upon Quilter-Beckett, who, acting as guide, Rebekah's hand now resting on Hogarth's arm, led them about the Boodah, now walking, now slipping in little trains over eighty-foot rails, rolled in one heat, laid down the vanishing length of dim-lit corridors floored with white tiles, their frieze of majolica, with rows of ceramics; and they saw the armouries, piles of rifles, cutlasses, pistols; ferneries grown by electric light; great cold-storage rooms that struck a chill, for preserving meats, butter, fruit; the doctors' environ, the dispensary, and roomy hospital; watched from a railing the working engines that fixed the Boodah's position, Hogarth here saying: "There you have a menagerie of gnome-land: observe those two black beetles, sedately nodding; and there is daddy-longlegs, working his legs gymnastically; and the three pairs of gallant grey stallions, galloping grandly neck to neck; and those two ridiculous beings, rubbing their palms together, round and round: each preoccupied, comically solemn, busied about its own quaint affairs — like a varied gnomeland".

And Rebekah said in a meek tone, like the hen submitting: "Yes, I see now you say it, my Lord King".

Up stairs and down, round semicircles, up lifts, through nooks, corridors: saw the guns, and how by hydraulics everything was done — the hoisting of ammunition, loading, training: guns intact, guns wrecked by the Dreadnoughts; and shimmering kitchens, which reeked a smell of heat, and the dairy-maids, and the line of kine, and the row of prison-doors, and the mechanism of ventilation, fans and blowers, the drainage-system, and the dynamos for lighting, for supplying power to motors, for heating, and for shimmering forth rich in the search-lights; and the central ballroom, the clothes store, the original one-ninety-sixth model, the Ambassador-region, the steaming laundry, and the roof, where Rebekah saw her initials on the breeze, and the vertical pop-guns under shields for dealing with aeroplane attack, and the cream theatre, and the paymaster's suite, and the bunkers, the Government-offices, and the tax-receiving rooms, the telephone system, and the lady-telegraphists — till all were tired, though half had not been seen. They luncheoned together; in the early afternoon there was an Investiture, and she was there; for "five-o'clock" there was a Gounod concert in the theatre, and she sat in his box; at night the Bulgarian Ambassador gave a ball, and she danced a gavotte with him.

When they parted a dying wind sighed his name: "Hogarth..."; and when Loveday before sleeping happened to ask: "When do we set out for London, Richard?" Hogarth with a laugh turned upon him, replying: "When do we set out for Arcturus and the Pleiades? Do give one time to look round him!"

The next morning Rebekah, led forward from a semicircle of courtiers by a backing Silver Stick, approached within four feet of the Throne, and after the protracted humiliation of her curtsy, said ruefully: "Our party have failed, my Lord King, to obtain audience for our humble petition till after four days".

"Is that too long?"

"We could not wait beyond to-night. Our good Rabbi, and my father's Manager — both must hurry back, and we others with them. This being so, I appeal to Your Lordship's Majesty ".

"A personal appeal?"

"Yes" — poutingly.

"Then, I grant an audience".

"Where?"

"Here".

"Who will be here?"

"Why — you and I."

“No” — very low, with pressed lips.

“I am so sorry”, says he: “it is the only chance I shall have; not for long — a few minutes — I am so busy. Otherwise, you will have to stay four days — and your poor father suffering—”

She seemed unsure now, and his hands in the uncertainty of that moment were moist like melting ice.

“So, then, you accept”, said he: “a little audience — you grant me? Or rather, I grant you”.

“When, my Lord King?”

“At three — No, what folly! At four. Will you? At four? And here? Say at four”.

He spoke leaning keenly forward; and she, with a curtesy of acquiescence, retired.

They were near again, and yet far, in the salle Ã manger at luncheon, a function of a hundred guests at small tables, with more of orchestra than of talk; and even as Hogarth and his train entered, and the crowd rose, she saw his eyes, by some power, prowl and find her.

Afterwards there were two hours to wait.

Such a heat of haste now possessed them both! Hogarth locked himself from his attendants into his bed-chamber, and, tumbling a chaos of clothes and uniforms upon the carpet, stumbled bitterly among them, hunting for a cravat whose effect he remembered; wished at the mirror that he had no moles and nose-freckles, or that his father had turned him out rather less black; and anon a delicious chill pang of mingled sugar and peppermint would gash his heart at the thought: “she consented!” He broke glass, dropped his watch to fragments, hissing “damn the thing!”; and about half-past three the hands of Rebekah, too, in her locked closet, were like the scattering sirocco among powder-boxes brushes, jewel-cases, and toilet-toys. What a hot haste was here! She too much blued her eyes, and bruised the skin in wiping, intense the contest between poudre blanche and poudre Rachel, violette and germandrÃ©e, she manoeuvring among mirrors to catch each angle of view, but with a blind impatience; and, if she wanted something, she tripped running, breathless: such a disease of flurry, an eruption and conflagration of haste — for nothing; yet, all the while, with a miserable sub-feeling of the penal creeping of time.

At four Hogarth in the Throne-room alone was now afraid that he would not be able to utter a syllable, and wished that she would not come; then, in a minute, began to fear that she would not, and wondered whether he was not a deluded fool ever to have dreamed it, he walking quick, or anon listening like a thief in that half-dark: for few lights were shining, the hall like the after-flush of sunset just before the dark.

At four past four he was aware of a rustling train's rush down the steps, and now was like a man with his neck on the block, awaiting the axe. A moment afterwards she was before him, and two moments afterwards he was collected and hot, and a man again.

"Dear", he whispered at her ear, leading her by the hand to an ottoman in a near alcove.

She, in self-defence, was repellent, breathlessly saying with galloping haste: "No — I will not sit: you sit, and I will stand here: do as I say, Hogarth — or I repent and go: I know you, and you know me — or you should. Our talk must be short. You say dear to me: that is very gentle, my friend; but it was not to bandy such words that I am here — alone — with you and your strength — Hogarth. I come as a suppliant, to implore you — firstly for the man who is my father — and secondly for yourself, to warn you. You are said to be about to become the sovereign of England—"

“I am?” — starting where he sat obediently before her, surprised that she should utter the purpose then forming in his mind: “witch — of Endor!”

“I am not the witch, but an old lady in whose predictions many Jews believe, who prophesies the return of the Jews to Palestine — through you. Be that as it may, if it is so that you are about to meddle with the institutions of England, oh beware, the resistance will be terrible!”

“With respect to England I am omnipotent”.

“Yes, you can starve it, but will you? You won’t. And listen to your friend: there is now in London a society, enormously powerful I believe, sworn to your destruction”.

“What can they do — assassinate me?”

“Ah! who knows?”

“That would be too childish: I have sown my seed in Time, and it will grow: two thousand little lords could hardly obliterate the ploughing of my wrist. But you know this?”

“Richard, my father is of them”.

“Ha! — I forgive him: his daughter seems to be on the other side—”

“Richard, you would not touch my hand? Ah, my friend, I warn you — ! Now — you have agitated — I have been ill — my father is of them. And who is one of the closest associates of my father — ?”

“Who?”

“The person known as Admiral Donald, whom I know very well to be Monsignor O’Hara. I think you might have been more — recondite — in your choice of an admiral, Richard!”

“Ah? — you surprise me”.

“But why? You once sent that man to me as a notebearer: certainly, a singular selection. You must have known that he had been a convict—”

“I thought him innocent then!”

“But you know now — ?”

“Yes”.

“And is it not extraordinary that your ensign bears my initials, while this man is one of your commanders?”

“I confess that I do not see the point—”

“Then you cannot know, I suppose, that it was against me that his offence was directed”.

“But my complaint is of the present: are you not aware of the scandal which the Mahomet is now creating in the world?”

“Scandal?”

“Thrice lately whispers have reached me of unnameable iniquities perpetrated there — Alexandria of the sixth century, Rome of the second! I believe the rumour is widely spread in London — no woman of the world now lands on the Mahomet”.

“It was you whom he assaulted...” Hogarth laughed and was pale at once.

“Yes, but observe that I must go now, my friend. I have spoken of the things which I had in my mind: there remains — my father”.

“He shall go with you”.

“I thank you, my Lord King; that must be in an hour: so I say, Richard, good-bye”.

“I do not suppose you can dream how dark—” he went woefully.

Of which she took no notice, but with rapid speech said: “How fair this hall is — one supposes that the art of impressions was lost with Solomon — like some chamber under a lake at set of sun, colour without substance, suspended, flushed — I cannot express—”

“Sad, say”.

“Ah, Richard”.

“Rebekah!”

“Well, Richard, my poor friend?”

“Have pity!”

“Poor Richard!”

“I can’t help it, you are all mixed up with my blood, don’t go from me. If you think it a sin — the Gentile — God will forgive the charity. Come for ever—”

Now he sobbed once, and, as he sobbed, she was on her knees, in pagan posture, at his knees. “Do not—” distractedly— “see, I kiss your hand-do you doubt that I pity my love — as a mother has compassion — ?”

Now were heaving breasts, a vehement fight for breaths, wild eyes, and a live brand in the marrow.

“You will not go! I have you! In God’s name, what a mad thing — !”

“My furious king — you kiss—” the short-winded mÃ©lÃ©e of whispers now suffocated in a passion of inarticulate breaths; but at that moment one of Rebekah’s chaperons, wandering out of time and place, stood at the alcove entrance, and they, smitten into two, sprang straight, awaked from trance, Rebekah with half a sob and half a laugh.

And two hours later Hogarth, from the roof, saw the Jewish yacht disappear to the East, on board being the four — and Frankl.

As he descended, he threw up his head with: “Ha! — O’Hara”; announced his immediate departure with only a secretary and two lords-in-waiting, left a mystical note for Loveday, saying that he had decided to go alone in quest of Margaret, and went almost secretly, only the salute informing the Boodah as he steamed away. In reality he was in haste to face O’Hara, and the yacht’s bows turned, not eastward, but southward, under forced draught, to arrive at the Mahomet in early afternoon. As her flags indicated the Lord of the Sea absent, there was no salute, and, landing in a panama and jacket, in the Collector's Office he gave the sign of mum, and, led only by a blue-jacket, went spying the depths of the Mahomet.

In many parts, noticing a singular odour, "What is it I smell?" he asked.

"Incense, my Lord King", the man answered.

On the fourth floor he entered the loveliest bijou chapel, the coenaculum gold-plated, altar flower-piled, frescoed roof, "stations" in oils, where a lonesome Moorish youth slothfully swung and swung a thurible ruby-studded: but in vestments of no enfant de choeur — of an ancient Phrygian.

Another descent and Hogarth reached a region of laugh and harping: whereupon, dismissing his guide, he tracked the music into a nook so rare, that he stood amazed — a Court of Love, or Mahommedan Heaven, or grot of Omar — anything old, lovely, and devil-sacred — the air chokingly odorous, near a fountain some brazen demon — Moloch or Baal — buried in roses, over everything roses, bounty of flowers, a very harvest-home of Chloris, Flora in revel; and smooth youths bearing cups for some twenty others, all garlanded, besides those on the marble stage; and on the stage itself a scene of dancing girls, Sevillian, Neapolitan, Algerian, mixed with masked Satyrs, which made Hogarth pale, while at a Herod's-table buried under fruits, wines, flowers and gold, reclined Pat O'Hara, tonsured now, crowned with ivy and violets, gowned in a violet toga; while under a pendulum whose swings left whiffs of incense behind lay Harris insensible.

As Hogarth descended into it, harp and dance ceased; some leapt to their feet: but O'Hara sat still, gazing in a dead silence through glairy eyes, while Hogarth, looking about, spied an electric button in a couch, touched it, and soon a man in uniform stood at a door above.

"Who are you?" asked Hogarth.

"John Souttar, head-telegraphist, may it please your Lordship's Majesty".

“Make haste: tell the First Lieutenant and the Chief Constable that the Lord of the Sea is here”.

By now all the revellers were on their feet; no sound: only, the clicking pendulum voyaged, landed an incense-whiff, and voyaged, like traders.

Then the Lieutenant appeared, mottled and panting, and immediately the Constable.

“Ah, Royds”, said Hogarth: “is it practicable to flood this room quickly with a hose?”

“I — should think so, my Lord King”.

“See to it. First set guards at the exits”.

He turned to the other: “Mr. Chief Constable, I give all present, except, of course, your Admiral, into custody, on a charge of misdemeanour on the high seas. The General Prosecutor will, in due course, forward the indictment to your Summary Court. Have your men here with handcuffs”.

Again silence, till, in four minutes, two men appeared on the steps, ball-nozzle in hand; upon which Hogarth said to O’Hara: “Follow me”, and as the two passed up, O’Hara tottery, care hanging on that ponderous nether-lip, Hogarth whispered the hose-bearers: “Drown the room well — man and woman — do not spare”.

To O’Hara he said: “Lead to your suite”, and, descending, they presently stood in a bed-temple, the bed surrounded with mirrors, and at the other end of the apartment an altar — pyx, six unflickering candles, and flowers, with rail and reredos, and maxims of St. Theresa.

Hogarth said: “Sleep two hours”, and went out, turning the key.

But in half an hour O’Hara had started awake, sober, and, clapping his palms over his face, burst into tears.

That Hogarth might be capable of impeachment before a Court of Admirals, followed by death on the block, he feared; and he rolled, groaning, tugging his tonsure-fringe, which, on the forehead, lay a thin grey forelock, thinking: “Guilty wretch that I am! putrid, unwholesome, hopeless, I have befouled the holiest: how richly do I deserve to die!”; and even as he groaned and smote, his secret mind weighed up the chances of Hogarth’s action.

He rose, listened, rushed to the door, found it locked, tossed up despairing hands, and tottered to the altar, at which he knelt, all sighs, and dying fish-eyes, and sideward-languishing face, and weary woe. Ah! how great the mountain of his iniquity: if he might be but once more spared, his evil remainder of days he would bury in some Carmelite retreat, with fastings and prayers; but no — he had too much tempted the Eternal patience, the sword was out against him. Yet he implored, he implored with groans: with half an eye, meanwhile, on the door; and, having with regard to Hogarth a piece of secret knowledge which he guarded deep for some possible emergency and use (the fact of Hogarth’s Jewish birth), as he prayed, his brain with complete detachment worked out the question whether he might now reveal this with advantage.

Hogarth found him kneeling, said “Get up”, and O’Hara stood, leaning upon the rail, too faint to stand unpropped, Hogarth contemplating him, tapping the toes.

“Well, sir! I know all: your whole past”.

“Red as crimson — !” went O’Hara faintly, with tossed hands.

“Red enough, Admiral. You are a bad old man: merit death”.

“Ah, God knows it, my Lord King! I do assure you, I am a leprous wretch: and I welcome death — I pray you, I pray Heaven, for it—”

“You should have it, if you were a better, or a younger, man: but I will not stain the Empire of which you were chosen to be a stay, and are the shame, with the blood of such as you. You are beneath judgment: and that clemency which is our scutcheon I extend to you. Live, therefore, and repent, O'Hara. I, however, you understand, now turn from you for ever. And I discharge you like a menial, sir. See to it that within six months you have your affairs regulated, and send in your resignation to the Government”.

He turned and went; and, as he disappeared, O'Hara straightened, coolly went “H'm!”, and took snuff. He lived, he lived: while there is life there is fun.

Fumbling about, searching for nothing, all relieved and rescued, yet stunned, he suddenly exclaimed: “What a noble fellow is my son Hogarth!”, and knelt again.

Hogarth in the same hour was away for England; and on the fourth evening thence, the street-lamps just lit, stood before No. 11 Market Street, Edgware Road, come for Margaret; his carriage waiting at a corner forty yards away; and though within the last hour he had realized vividly that his voyage to the Mahomet had given Frankl time to remove her, or accomplish any devilish device in his power with respect to her, he was now all prospect and expectancy.

The house was three-storied, mean, unlighted, with an “area”; from a neighbouring window a woman screaming down to some playing children; and under her a shop sending out that fishy fume which “drove Asmodeus back to hell”.

He rapped, received no answer, rapped again without reply, then stepped down and back, looking up: and suddenly, faintly, but distinctly, he heard her voice, high up — singing.

“O what a pretty place,
And what a graceful city,
Where the striplings are so gay,

And the ladies are so pretty “.

It was she! He ran and banged at the door: no reply.

Back again he stepped; and now a window on the top floor went up, and she, putting out her head, twice beckoned him — listlessly, it seemed, then drew in; and instantly — again — he heard her sing.

As once more he ran to the door, he discovered now that it was open, darted into darkness, up uncarpeted stairs, making for that upper room, vague light through grimy stair-windows guiding his impassioned dash; and on the third floor entered a room with two doors, beyond one of which was the room he sought: but that door was locked.

At it he pushed, fumbled, called: “Margaret!” No reply. And suddenly he heard her singing, not before, but behind him.

“Happy day! Happy day!

When Jesus washed my sins away “...

When he flew to the other door, and now found it, too, locked, gradually in that gloom all colour faded from his face; and the voice sang on: “Happy day! happy day”....

XLIII. THE LAND BILL

THE MANIFESTO'S "MONTH of grace" was passing, yet nothing had been done, second-rate Powers awaiting the Great, while the Great, appalled by the bigness of the demand, fussed and intrigued, consulted, fermented and proposed: but did nothing.

But at last, on the 3rd of December, the First Lord of the Treasury laid a Bill on the table of our Commons — at the end of an Autumn-session!

On the 3rd: and on the 1st the Lord of the Sea had been captured near Edgware Road, the probability being that this Bill was brought forward with a knowledge of that capture.

It consisted of three clauses and two schedules — called The Land Purchase Bill; and it had only to be published to produce the stormiest agitation ever known.

The Opposition was the Jew-Liberal-Labour party; and when the Labour Congress (met at Manchester) denounced the measure, there occurred a "split", a Liberal-Labour cave, the whole body of Jews, numbering 87, retiring to the Government ranks.

The Bill proposed the "purchase" of Britain from its "owners" by the British, the price fixed being 27 times the annual value, to be paid in settled annuities for entailed estates, and in consols for unentailed.

So, then, the Government would buy London alone for 1400 millions and Britain for 8000 millions — a bad lookout for England.

And the authors of the Bill chose a moment when Hogarth was living on bread and poisoned water in Market Street.

It rapidly passed to Committee, and then to the Lords.

But on that night a terrifying rumour for the first time pervaded England: that the Lord of the Sea, having come to London at the beginning of the month, was missing, and that his person had been claimed from our Government by the Sea under menaces.

In fact, when a week, two weeks, had passed, and not a whisper from Hogarth, apprehension had turned into certainty in the breasts of Quilter-Beckett, Loveday, and all: and at a hurried Council called in the Boodah on the 19th, when the date of Hogarth's landing at Southampton was determined, and his small train-in-waiting, his coachman, re-examined for the twentieth time, one certainty emerged: Frankl had had time to reach England before him; and the arrest of Frankl was demanded.

Now England in consternation almost forgot the Land Bill; Scotland Yard ransacked Market Street: not a trace of Hogarth; it dissected the country for Frankl: but Frankl was now in the Mahomet, safely conferring with O'Hara.

The popular tempest first directed itself against the League of Resistance: and at an attack upon its Offices in Victoria Street during the afternoon of the 21st Viscount Reid (the Secretary), and a girl, were killed by missiles; petitions signed by the nation raining meanwhile upon the Prince of Wales: for, apart from the wreck which threatened, Hogarth's popularity was at present considerable with the masses, whose instincts suspected those above them of knowing more of his disappearance than appeared.

On the night of the 22nd, when things had an air of revolution, fifty-three men met in a house in Adair Street, W. (This runs parallel to Market Street, the backs of the two house-rows facing.)

These were the warders of Hogarth: and the object of that night's meeting was to determine whether he should die, and when, and how; the Land Bill now awaiting the Royal Assent; and on the morrow British high-sea trade to be ruthlessly stopped, failing news of Hogarth.

The room was double, with an arch in the partition, through which ran a rough-board table surrounded with velvet arm-chairs; the floor richly carpeted, though paper peeled from the walls; down the table a procession of silver candlesticks and typewritten notice-papers and agenda; the windows boarded — a second floor; and in a room near, Hogarth, shackled hand and foot, he having been borne through a subterranean way, made for the purpose, from the cellar in Market Street to this Adair Street.

From eight o'clock men began to let themselves in at the two doors in both streets, and continued to arrive till nine, when a marquis at the table-head rose to speak, the others leaning back with downcast eyes, nearly all pale.

The point before them was plainly put by the speaker on the Question: viz., whether they had more to fear from the life, or from the death, of the Lord of the Sea.

“By a strange Providence”, he said, “this man is in our hands: and we have the right to become his executioners. My Lords and Gentlemen, the awful decision rests with you to-night”.

Then, one after another, they rose, they spoke: no two views identical; till at ten it was voted that the question be put, voting papers went round, and presently the ballot-result was announced amid a momentous stillness.

Twenty-eight had voted for the death, twenty-five against.

But in that minute a key was heard in the room door, and in rushed two flushed men: Frankl and O'Hara, just arrived in London from the sea; and Frankl burst into speech:

“I hope this is all right, my lords, my coming like this, and bringing into your very midst a gentleman who is not one of us. When I tell you that he is Admiral Donald of the Mahomet, turned away like a servant, how does that make your lordships feel? A house divided against itself can’t stand; and this gentleman has a scheme in his pocket — he will read it to your lordships — which will crack up the Empire of the Sea like an egg-shell! So I do hope, my lords, that you have not decided anything hasty about putting away Richard Hogarth: for unless he is liberated this night, it means sure and certain stoppage of everything tomorrow: and that means my ruin, and many another’s beside—”

Now the Master called him to order, and addressed himself to O’Hara, who, in admiral’s uniform and stars, all stately bows, grave smiles, in ten minutes had given guarantees, was a member, and in thirty had read a memorandum of a scheme of betrayal which everyone saw to be feasible.

Then the vote of death was annulled; and when the meeting broke up Hogarth was being lifted with bandaged eyes through the subterranean way to Market Street, where four men deposited him near the house-door, undid his ropes, said to him “You are free”, and there he remained twenty minutes without motion, deadly sick, then rose, and, on finding the door, went wildly with dragged feet, tottered into a cab, and leant brow on hand.

As he entered the porch of his Berkeley Square house, Loveday rushed out to his knees with adoring eyes, having hardly hoped to see again that face of Hogarth, while Hogarth patted the bowed head, saying: “Do get me a meal, and let me hear what has been going on....Oh, I am weary “.

And during the meal he heard all: of the Land Bill, the turmoil.

“Well, my God!” he exclaimed, “is there no drop of generous blood at all among those people? Never again do I trust them to make their own arrangements I When does this precious Bill have the Royal Assent?”

“To-morrow, it is supposed”.

“Really!” — he started: “and whereabouts is the Prince of Wales?”

“At Windsor to-night”.

“Order the motor quick. I’ll go”.

He was soon off, and Loveday, listening to the dark story of Margaret’s appearing and singing, and vanishing, accompanied him under a frosty moon, snow lying on village-street and hedge; but, travelling hard, they arrived shortly after one upon a Prince who, a wakeful man that night, sat conferring with Private Secretary and Attorney-General, he having assented to the introduction of the Land Bill, then been alarmed by the storm, and now was confronted with the responsibility of either giving His Majesty’s assent, and earning execration, or refusing it, and taking a step unheard-of since William III.

In that state of embarrassment he was, when the Lord of the Sea was announced, and “It is with heartiest pleasure that I offer to your Lordship’s Majesty my congratulations on this re-appearance”, he said, greatly and gladly surprised, without at all seeming so.

And the two conferred till three, when a secretary, at Hogarth’s dictation, wrote a document and its duplicate: a contract between Prince and King, giving pledges on each side, private, yet most momentous; and each, having signed both copies, retained one.

The next evening the Clerk in the Lords uttered those unusual words: “Le Roy s’avisera,” and the country was thrown into transport by the news of the Royal rejection of the Land Bill, processions singing the National Anthem, bells ringing: and for a month the mention of a Royal name in any assembly brought the people to their feet.

Ministers, of course, resigned; and, as the Liberals refused office, writs for a new House were made returnable for the end of January.

XLIV. THE REGENCY

DURING THE NEXT month England was in a general-election turmoil; at the same time a Land Bill in the French Chamber, and one in the Reichstag, was thrown out: whereupon a ukase from the Boodah announced the raising of sea-rent to 5s. on all ships over 2000 tons after the 1st February, the month of grace over, the “screw tightening”.

Already distress in England was great, coal being at three-and-sixpence, bread at nine pence; a cry had arisen for the Union of Britain with the Sea; and on the 27th of January a plebiscite among the Trade Unions resulted in an affirmative vote of five millions out of an electorate of nine.

Now, at this time the bulletins respecting His Majesty were of a settled depression: he lived, but languished; and it was understood that the new Ministry’s first act would be the appointment of a Regency.

Then appeared a rumour: alterations were going forward at Buckingham Palace on a scale of splendour new to Western mansions; the Prince of Wales had passed three days, from the 17th to the 19th, in the Boodah: and the saying went that, on the night of the rejection of the Land Bill, a compact had taken place between the Prince and the Sea for a three years’ Regency of the latter.

Excitement ensued, the matter becoming an election test: and 180 Labour Members, with 70 Liberals were returned pledged to support a Regency of the Sea.

A definite coalition, meantime, had been announced between the Jews and the Conservatives.

Never was election so rolled in dust and noise, in the result the Jews having the casting vote: and if ever race was looked at askance, it was they now by the British.

The session having been opened by Commission, a resolution passed Lords and Commons that the Prince of Wales be empowered to exercise the Royal Authority; whereupon the Prince at the palace, having heard the Address, read a reply, sufficiently startling to the country, though well foreknown to those present: he laid stress upon the new conditions of the world — that phlegmatic eye, which had seen so much, lifting a moment in punctuation to dwell coldly upon his hearers, then coldly reading again; the difficulties, he said, which he was called upon to face on behalf of His Majesty were not lightly to be undertaken, and his fuller answer would be contained in a proposal which he would make in the Lords as a peer of the realm.

The next night in a crowded House he read a speech distinguished by extraordinary dignity and severity: “My lords”, he said at one point, slapping the table, though those eyes remained royally null: “when will your lordships learn to recognize the facts of life?” and, having proposed His Lordship’s Majesty, the Lord of the Sea, to be Regent during His Majesty’s illness, such Regency not to exceed a period of three years, he recommended a plebiscite.

No plebiscite was taken: for within some days the sense of the constituencies was revealed, and the Leader in the Lords received stern hints from the Liberal Leader, which damped pride: so their lordships abstained from Westminster, their Resolution being passed by just a quorum.

The country wondered at the ease with which the whole went off — not knowing that those who might have led resistance had a thought, and a prospect, inspired by one Pat O'Hara, which comforted them.

And now a Deputation of Five took boat in the Prince George, to wait upon the Lord of the Sea in the Boodah Throne Room, where the Lord President read the information that they were a Committee appointed to attend His Lordship's Majesty with the Resolutions of the Houses.

"We are instructed", he read, "to express the hope which the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and the Commons, entertain, that His Lordship's Majesty, from his regard to the interests of His Majesty the King, will be ready to undertake the weighty and important trust proposed to be invested in His Lordship's Majesty, as soon as an Act of Parliament shall have been passed for carrying the same into effect".

He then read, and delivered, the Resolutions.

Hogarth replied, reading: "My Lords and Gentlemen, I receive the communication which your two Houses have instructed you to make to me with those sentiments of regard which I ever entertain for your two Houses. Deeply impressed with the necessity of tranquillizing the public mind throughout the world, I do not hesitate to accept the office and situation proposed to me".

So the Deputation departs; five days later twelve British battleships surround the Boodah, come to accompany the Lord of the Sea to England; and at eleven on the morning of the 9th, his yacht, borne in on the strong thunders of a royal salute, drops anchor in Southampton Water.

He had set so gorgeous a standard of luxury to Europe, that no one dreamed of making his entry into London an ordinary fête; and, as the procession traversed the triumphal arches of Piccadilly, he, swept to the gods in the lap of gallant sublimities, plumes, sabres, showering hoofs, squad-troops, outriders, showed to the Prince beside him and to the Czarowitz before him a miniature of Rebecca Frankl.

Some streets cheered — not all much: but during the illuminated night all London seemed to abandon itself to revelry.

The next morning Hogarth went in state to the Chapel Royal for certificate of Communion, attended by heralds, Sergeants-at-mace, sword-of-state, the Duke of York; and after “the service” communicated under a canopy at the hand of the Bishop of London.

Then, on the 14th, Lords and Commons had a final conference over the Regency Bill, when the Assistant of the Parliaments uttered the words: “Le Roy le Veult”; and on the 15th, the swearing-in day, a party of grenadiers with colours and fifes marched into the palace grounds, continuously to play “God Save the King”; while yeomen and ushers, together with servants-in-state of the Lord of the Sea, lined the great hall and staircase, life-guardsmen lining a vista of state-apartments ending in a Blue-velvet Room, recently decorated; by 2.30 P.M. Privy Councillors commenced to arrive, till at 3.45 P.M. the Lord of the Sea sent Admiral Quilter-Beckett to the President of the Council, ordering his presence; and presently was himself seen coming up the vista, accompanied by his own household-officers, to the Blue-velvet Room where he sat at the table-head, the Royal personages on each hand, his own officers ranged on each side of the entrance-arch; and now one by one entered the full-dressed Councillors, with bows which he returned, taking seat according to precedence — Canterbury, then the Lord Chancellor, then York; and last came and sat a certain Mr. Forrest, Keeper of the Records.

Hogarth then rose and said:

“My Lords: I understand that by the Act passed by your Parliament appointing me Regent of this Empire, I am required to take certain oaths, as prescribed by the said Act: I am now ready to take these oaths “.

Whereupon rose the Lord Privy Seal, made a reverence, approached, and read, while Hogarth pronounced after him:

“I sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George. So help me, God.

“I do solemnly promise and swear that I will truly and faithfully execute the Office of Regent of the King’s Empire according to an Act of Parliament entitled ‘an Act, etc.’, and that I will, etc. So help me, God”.

He then subscribed the two oaths, and after him the Privy Councillors, the Lord President first, as witnesses. It was then delivered to the Record Keeper, who deposited it in a box, while Hogarth presented his Lord’s-Supper certificate: whereupon the Lord President bent the knee and kissed his hand, then the Royal personages, then the Archbishops, advancing in order on both sides.

It was a week of Hope, the turning over of a new leaf, so the spirit of festival reigned, and was deepened when the evening papers that day announced that a ukase of the Sea had reduced rent on British ships by 1s. 9d. per ton, and was heightened when during that and the following nights Hogarth dispensed three millions in fÃ¢ting England: his illuminations having no resemblance to those sickly twinklings, tremulous at their own cost, previously deemed good enough for the jubilee-days of an empire; the people were astonished: ample and planetary his mind, his hand right royal, and London, bursting into light, flashed tidings of our earth to Mars. It was incredible then that any had ever wept, or would weep again; the bitterest foes of the Regent caught the contagion of world-gala; Europe flocked to London; theatres were gratis; the illusion of the comet of the final night was complete, her lurid rays sprawling 2000 feet aloft in stiff portentousness, prophesying Change, the parks all transfigured into universes of moons, crescents, stars, jerbs, Roman-candles, pots de brin, girandoles of rockets, pagodas, marquees, each tree a net of fireflies, while from five hundred and thirty balloons, with silent burst, snowed diverse fires.

The new reign opened with promise.

XLV. ESTRELLA, THE PROPHETESS

FOR THREE WEEKS a Provisional Ministry carried on the Government, confining itself to Supply; till, on the 3rd March, the Lord Regent succeeded in forming a Cabinet; and at 9 on the evening of the 5th for the first time addressed himself to the country in the House of Lords.

That night the world seemed hushed to listen, the peridom of Britain packing the Gallery with rainbow, and the peerdom those benches and cross-benches, red as massacre and the Scarlet Woman, where thronged 580, while to Charing Cross spread the crowd without. He, from the Throne, addressed them, and they, startled by the revelation of a caste chaster far than Vere de Vere, and a pride far more serenely throned than Hohenzollern, acknowledged him high-born... “Your lordships will not fail to perceive my will to invigorate some of our ancient epithets: thus, the First Estate of the Realm shall, during the present Regency, be veritably ‘First’, and in no case last”; anon he blew his bugle: “Let us play the man! — easy to say, hard to do: yet it was first said by an Englishman when the doing, I think, was hard enough, his martyr’s shroud already rapt aloft in flame: that was magnanimous, my lords, I declare! there was the British Lion”....

That same night a new Land Bill was introduced by Sir Robert Wortley, the Prime Minister — a bill drafted, criticized, and re-altered during two years by the legal experts of the Sea, proposing the “purchase” of Great Britain at a price of twice the annual value for inherited land, and seven times for land held by purchase: this to be paid in two and seven years respectively, without interest, lands yielding no revenue to become crown-lands from the date of the Bill, which was called: Land Department (Creation) Bill.

It passed first reading; but the question was: would the Jews vote for the second reading? Reluctant enough the Jewish members, but there were rumours that the Jewish electorate were instructing their representatives to repent and vote for.

And now spread far the League of Resistance, so did the Adair Street Society, its secret daughter, of which Admiral Donald (O'Hara) had now been elected Honorary Vice-Master, and whose Roll contained the names of an extraordinary number of Territorial officers.

The Society was busy: had building four yachts, all models of the Admiral's yacht attached to the Mahomet, which was called the Mahomet II; every dusk companies of 25 to 40 men drilled darkly in the back yard at Adair Street, some of them Territorial officers: in rotation they came, they drilled, over 1000; a top room piled with revolvers, swords, bowie-knives...

For the land-magnates laughed at the notion of submitting to the Bill: rather, said they, "rivers of blood". The mention by Hogarth of Ridley and Latimer they considered irrelevant; their fathers' heroic mood was a detail: not an entail.

In secret they met. Anarchists of the reddest hue.

One night when the Bill was approaching second-reading Frankl introduced Harris as a member; and wide-eyed stood Harris, though still cynical, with elegant walking-stick, hat cocked, and "I sye", he whispered, "are all these real, living lords?"

"Large as life", answered Frankl.

"Strike me dotty! The Lord said unto my lord, sit thou at my right hand"...the reason of this introduction of Harris being a relation which had arisen between the Army and the Lord Regent, who had been taking a startling interest in this branch of the services, had visited Aldershot, and held five reviews, flattering the soldier by private notice, shifting officers. By an Order in Council of the 3rd March, a reorganization was effected in the Army Board and Consultative Council, of the new men the Adjutant-General being General Sir Merrick Parr, uncle of Admiral Parr of the sea-fort Shakespeare, while the Commander-in-Chief and Inspector-General were the direct creations of the Regent, and the whole Headquarters Staff bound to follow him through thick and thin; and that “second reading” was near, which, if the Jews would vote against, well and good for Adair Street, but, if not, there remained either (1) the prompt execution of O’Hara’s scheme without waiting for the four yachts, copies of the Mahomet II, which were slow in building; or (2) the knife of Harris.

But, as to (1), when three delegates from the Society had waited upon O’Hara in the Mahomet to urge immediate action, O’Hara had replied: “No, my lords, I cannot enter into this undertaking until preparations are complete, since the troops we send would never be allowed to land on the forts, if they arrived in ships not apparently our own. Your lordships cannot be more anxious than I to rid the earth of a devouring lion like Richard Hogarth, I do assure you; but, tut, is there nothing else meanwhile? Just let me introduce to your lordships a little young man whom I know” — he had summoned Harris.

But when the three delegates had gone, he had struck his brow, exclaiming: “Wretch that I am! — that great and good fellow, the fairest of the sons of men!...what a black depravity must be in this heart—” he had underlooked in the mirror, and cut a face; “but ah, Hogarth! this heart is in your net; and I loved the mother, too”....

He had sought the altar, and that night had written piteously to Hogarth, appealing for fresh friendship and reconsideration of his sentence of dismissal.

So, at any rate, was Harris introduced to Adair Street, became its chief minister, and ten days before the second-reading debate had won, by O'Hara's recommendation, an entr e into the Palace as servant to a gentleman-usher-daily-waiter: and now he made bright the knife of the assassin, tending its edge as a gardener the tender sprout, the knife being his m tier and forte, he despising the noisy, mediate, uncertain pistol, nor could use it, his instincts belonging to the Stone Age. But the days passed, and he could by no means get near to Hogarth.

One night he boldly penetrated to the royal antechamber with the knife under his waist-band, having passed the stairs-guard by a specious official envelope. As it was late, he thought it must be about the Regent's bedtime, having the vaguest ideas as to royal ways and bedtimes, Hogarth being then in a consultation with three of the Cabinet destined to last till morning. And Harris: "Can I see the Lord Regent?" with that lifted brow of perpetual surprise and alertness.

"You? Who are you?" asked a gentleman-in-waiting.

"That's neither 'ere nor there, if it comes to that. I'm Captain Macnaghten's man, then".

"But what is it you want?"

"He told me to give the Regent this 'ere" — showing the envelope.

"Weally! then, give it to me".

"He said I was to give it to the Regent's self".

"Then, go to blazes quickly, will you? and let Captain Macnaghten know from me that he has been dwinking".

Harris could not penetrate the ten-fold barrier; but he lay in wait; watched from some coign every Royal exit and entrance, careful that Hogarth never saw his face; and he cherished the knife-edge.

One night, four days before the debate, he stood by the Green Park railings, listless, smoking, when — he started: saw a hurried figure come out — face muffled — Hogarth! — alone.

Hogarth walked a little, entered a cab; Harris, in another, shadowed him.

Down Piccadilly, the Hammersmith Road, into the Addison: Hogarth alighted; Harris followed.

Now, at this time Hogarth had a spy, who presented him reports of the doings of Rebekah Frankl — a species of literature which the Regent found agreeable; and, as for two days Rebekah had, for some reason, been at a villa of Addison Road, this escapade of the Lord Regent was motivated by his hope of catching there some glimpse of her, the house being small, he having seized his first chance of secret escape from state-affairs near midnight: and behind him, like the shadow of death, stole the assassin.

Hogarth, going soft up to the house, leaned aside from the frontage steps to peer; but Venetian blinds barred him from the least sight of the interior, though he could hear sounds, strange sounds, as of wailing; and, as the villa was in the midst of quite a spacious ground, well grown with trees and shrubberies, he stole round to the back, peered into an open door level with the garden, and within saw a doorway of twilight in the midst of darkness; had hoped to see a servant, who might talk gossip, or even contrive him sight of the Sacred Body; had ready bribe in hand: but nobody there. So, after some hesitation, he entered; and Harris, just then come to the house-corner on tiptoe, discerned him go in, ran on hot bricks to the door, and now distinctly saw Hogarth, who had passed through a kitchen, standing on three wooden steps before a doorway which framed a faint light in the room beyond.

On which a shivering of eagerness, quick as winking sheet-lightning, shook Harris' right knee.

Hogarth, meantime, having seen the chamber before him empty, in his headlong way had entered, and the guess now in Harris' mind was this: "It's a girl: a night out"....

He hesitated, Hogarth being once within the house and lost to him, but after some minutes dared to follow.

Hogarth, meantime, had seen that the light came from a death-taper, with which was a vessel of water for ceremonial purification, and a napkin, here being all the preparations for tahara (washing); and suddenly, in a near room, arose the clamorous dole of shivah (the seven mourning-days), Rachel weeping for her children, because they are not: a Jew was dead: "shema, Yisrael...": and this explained Rebekah's stay there, for the bereaved may not leave the house. A peer at the bed — a covered face — pierced him with a compunction like shame: here was kodesh, and he a desecrator with his earthy passion: so he turned to beat a retreat by the way he had come — when a faint sound that way, made by Harris; and, instead, he leapt lightly through a window five feet above the garden.

Some moments later Harris, entering on prowling all-fours, and seeing the bed-clothes hang immediately near, stole under; waited: no sound save the singsong lament; and "O Gawd", thought he, cynic even in his palest agitation, "there shall be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth"....But that Hogarth had not come to wail and gnash he felt convinced: if he heard no sound above him, that might be because of the sounds around; so he crawled barely out, and, kneeling, put up a most cautious groping hand, the bed being in the darkest part of the room; someone there: and swiftly as a dolphin twists to dart and snap, his knife was in a breast and instantly ready to strike its expected bedfellow.

But the breast was alone, the breast of Estrella, the Prophetess, four days dead.

Harris snatched off the face-cloth, peered upon a noble old visage, fixed now in trance, and said: "Well, I'm—"

Now he ran, but in the kitchen stopped wild-eyed. It I might be murder—he was not certain; at least it was out-rage, and he might be traced: there was the cabman who had brought him — his absence from the Palace—"Bah! it can't be proved...." But still, if he were even arrested, and Hogarth got to hear of his presence about the Court — that would spoil all. He listened: all that part of the house a settled solitude, the servants themselves sitting shivah; and back he ran, seized upon the little old body, not now stiff, rigor mortis having passed, saw that the sheet was unstained, and snatched her away out to the bottom of the garden where shrubbery and holly-hedge formed a jungle.

Now he set to dig with hissing haste; and, even as he hissed and digged, he talked without pause, envenomed, heaping her sanctity with insult: "Old cat you...dust to dust and ashes to ashes, it is....What you want to do that for? under you go in the cold, cold sod....Who arst you to put your little finger in the pie? There's another one for you, fair in the gullet! Now take her up tenderly, lift her with care-and down she goes"....

Such were Estrella's kaddish and "House of Life"....As he had only the knife, and the work was slow, and in the midst of it an outcry from the house, the body missed, he stopped, listening, but without acute fear, knowing it improbable that they could dream of seeking in the grounds, and as a matter of fact their minds were a mere paralysis of holy wonder; so presently he had the little body in a two-foot grave, arranged surface and dead leaves to naturalness, leapt a wall, and got away.

Never did act of assassin have result so momentous: for though the predictions of Estrella had lately spread far among upper-class Jews, it was only on the day after her burial by Harris that her fame reached to each Jew under the sun.

It was given out that divine confirmation had been vouchsafed to her prophecies by the snatching of her body, like Enoch's, into Heaven, or by its burial, like Moses', by Jahvah: for when no explanation but one is extant, the brain fastens upon that, and embraces it.

And as Estrella, who, in life, had guarded her hard sayings for the few, had left papers revealing for her whole race what she had dreamed, like wildfire now ran her message among the Chosen.

Now Temple and Synagogue were crowded: rabbi and pawnbroker and maggid, clothes-man and takif, were infected; and there spread the cry (for the most part meaningless): "To Zion!"

It may be that the Jewish electorate were now too agitated with the near probability of Shiloh to interest themselves in any mundane question: at all events, it was during that rage that the Government-whips announced the certainty that the Jewish members would vote against the Land Bill.

Hogarth first heard it pretty late at night from the Prime Minister; and "Ha!-the Jews", he went: "so they have dared, these men? I never thought that they would! May God deliver me from His ill-chosen people — !"

"And ill-choosing, it seems, my Lord King".

"Quite so! But, Sir Robert Wortley, is it supportable this thing?" — a brand now on his brow— "an alien race in Britain opposing thus daringly not my will only, but the plain will of the people? And have I the air of one who will support it? Rather, I assure you, would I govern without a Parliament! But stop — perhaps I shall be found capable of dealing with these mischievous children of Israel. Give me a night: and to-morrow at noon come, and hear. Of course, this second-reading business must be postponed “.

And deep and wide, in lonely vigil, wrought the Regent's thought that night, till morning: of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, of tendencies, histories, soils, ports, railways, possibilities, race-genius, analogies, destinies; of Rothschild and I Solomon; of Hirsch and Y'hudah Hanassi; of the Jewish Board of Guardians, Rab Asa, and the Targum on the Babylonish Talmud; of the Barbary Jews, the Samaritans, and Y'hudah Halevi; of the Colonial Bank, and the Karaite Jews....

When at dawn he threw himself dressed into bed, he had resolved upon a very great thing: their expulsion from England, Pole and Hungarian, Baron and coster, and the little child at the breast, ten millions.

His eyes had closed toward sleep when, with a start, he remembered a prophecy uttered one evening in the Boodah Throne-room, and these words: “Richard, deal gently with my people....”

Two nights later, with a retinue, he hurriedly left England-for Constantinople.

XLVI. THE ORDER IN COUNCIL

THREE DAYS BEFORE that setting-out, O'Hara's appeal for pardon had come under the Regent's notice: and as he had read, his eyes — once more — had softened, as he had thought: "It would be a great crime to forgive him the long list; but never mind — we will see"....

And he had meant to reply, but suddenly the Jews had swept O'Hara quite out of his mind.

He was away hardly two weeks: and when he returned, Palestine and western Armenia were his, all his acts of this period bearing resemblance in largeness and rage to the incredible forced-marches of Napoleon.

If one spreads apart the first two fingers, he sees exactly the country ordained by Hogarth for modern Israel: the first finger Palestine, looking upon the Mediterranean; between the fingers, the Syrian Desert; the second (longer) finger that Mesopotamia, "the cradle of our race" between the Euphrates and the Tigris, this opening upon the Persian Gulf, and the trade of the East.

The then population of this area was only 300,000 (Arabs, Turks, Jews, Greeks) in the Palestine finger, omitting Russian pilgrims to Jerusalem; while in the Mesopotamia finger — all that Hinterland of Palestine called "Turkish Armenia" — not 320,000 Armenians had been left by Khurdish rapine and Turkish atrocity: we may therefore say that the whole was an uninhabited land waiting for inhabitants.

The only things needed (according to modern notions) to make it immediately colonizable were roads and railways, and the Regent had not returned to Dover when both were making in Palestine, the Sultan, left thunderstruck with a chronic eye of scare by that visit, “lending his co-operation”, consoled meanwhile by a Conversion Loan of thirteen millions out of Sea-revenue; to which add a grant-in-aid of fifteen millions to the emigrants, and the remark of Hogarth’s Chancellor about this time becomes intelligible: “Your Lordship’s Majesty’s expenditure is exceeding revenue by 50 per cent”; so that Beech’s was soon realizing considerably in bonds over Europe, and Hogarth temporarily poor — had stubbornly refused any Parliament-grant for the Regent’s personal establishment.

And suddenly from the blue fell his bolt: at that same table of the Regent’s oath-of-office assembled eighty-seven Jewish lords and gentlemen at noon of the 24th March, the first day of the month Nisan in the Jewish year 5699, ordered, each by himself, to the Royal presence; and the Regent, with the gravest eyes, both palms pressed on the table, in an embarrassment of compunction, rose and spoke with them — Rothschild and merchant-prince, Chief Rabbi, Manchester Chief Minister, Heads of the Alliance Israëℓite, Anglo-Jewish Association, Jewish Board, Jewish philanthropists, writers; and they could not believe themselves awake.

He began by speaking of himself, the fact of his power, with such graciousness, that all were affected, not by the power, but by the gentleness which wielded it: Providence had given him the disposal of the earth, and it was for him to do his poor best — a lonesome, sorrowful post; so that talking could never alter in anything the main point; but it could modify details: and he had called them to invoke their great administrative gift and expert counsel; he told of the exodus which he designed, the home which he had prepared them; recommended a Sanhedrim of Chief Jews to form the Provisional Government of the new State, with the Chief Rabbi as its head under the title of Shophet (Judge); would offer a contribution of Â£

15,000,000 from his Exchequer toward an emigration and colonizing fund, and doubtless emigration bureaus would be at once established at principal centres; he would also hand over a Deed of Gift of this larger Judaea as between the Sea and the Jewish people to the Central Authority as soon as established; also, duplicates of the text of the Treaty as between the Sea and the Ottoman Empire. What he gave he gave, he assured them, with a free heart, without condition; except, of course, one: that no inch of the new land should ever “belong” to any particular Jew: for he gave, as Nature gave the earth, not to a hundred, but to all, living and to be born, occupiers to pay rent, not to any adventurer calling himself landlord, but to the Central Authority, representing all. This done, he would invoke with confidence upon their able race the blessing of Almighty God.

In tones so mellow did he utter himself, that for many minutes stillness reigned, every face pale.

Until a baron stood up with ashen under-lip, to say that such a scheme, it seemed to him, must remain for ever abortive, unless enforced by Act of Parliament —

But Hogarth checked him quick.

“No, my lord, not by Act of Parliament: the how your lordship may leave to me. I dare say you will see it in this evening’s papers”.

It was by an Order in Council!

* * * * *

“DECLARATION of the Court of Great Britain respecting the Order in Council.

“At the Court at Buckingham Palace, the 24th day of March, his Lordship’s Majesty, the Lord Regent, in Council.

“WHEREAS His Lordship’s Majesty was pleased to declare in the name and on behalf of His Majesty the King on the 23rd day of March: THAT if at any time, after the expiration of the three months following, any of the hereinafter mentioned trades, occupations, pursuits, or acts, shall be carried on or done within the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland by any person being a person coming within the sense of the term “Jew” as hereinafter defined, THEN and thereafter such person shall be liable to the pains and penalties hereinafter specified”.

* * * * *

No Jew might own or work land, or teach in any Cheder or school, or be entered at any Public School or University, or sign any stamped document, or carry on certain trades, or vote, or officiate at any public service, and so on: parentage, not religion, constituting a “Jew”. Through Britain this piece of Russian despotism sent a wave of quiet gladness, and an epidemic of jest broke out, in club, factory, “Lane”, and drawing-room: “You hurry up — to Jericho!” became the workman’s answer to a Jew; it was remarked that the chimney of train and steamship would furnish a new pillar of cloud by day, and pillar of fire by night, to go before the modern Exodus; they were little to be pitied, for even Heaven was their mortgagor in land, with promise to pay — the Promised Land; a syndicate would be formed to “pool” milk and honey, and either Sharon or Salem would become the new Get-O at any price; being a rather Peculiar People, they would call the new Temple “the ‘Ouse” (of Prey-ers), and make contango-day coincide with Passover....But let him laugh that is of a merry heart: as for Israel, with weary breast and hunted stare he sandalled his foot for the final Exodus: yet not as them without hope. Already — some days before the Order in Council — the disappearance of Estrella’s body, her daring prophecies, had led to the embarkation of 700 Jews for Palestine; and when the Regent's Edict gave startling confirmation of her prediction of "the Return", in many a million hearts thrilled the certainty: "the Day of the Lord is nigh!"

And with that their stoicism and organizing strength, they mutely turned to follow the finger of Destiny: their takifs (rich men), hard upon the unchosen, were, as usual, liberal to their own, the fund swelled, and a Committee left England for the accumulation of stores and implements; at the same time two Parliament Bills were passed in two sittings, empowering the purchase by Government of land "owned" by Jews on Land Bill terms, and quickening the machinery for the collection of debts due to Jews.

Whereupon, "You see", said the Chief Rabbi, "he drives us out: but he makes us aprons — if only of fig-leaves — to cover us. Let us bow to his rod, and thank him, and go: he is God's Minister".

So they went: the world's mercantile marine having been summoned, sea-ports were turned into caravansaries of gabardine and ear-lock: the Exodus began.

In the midst of which it came to the knowledge of the Regent that the house of Frankl was making ready for departure.

And now Hogarth rebelled against Heaven: self-forgetfully he did his best, and it returned and struck him dead: for what good, he thought, would his life do him, she always in Asia, he in Europe?

He wrote to her, a passionate hotch-potch of command and grovelling supplication: if she went, he would curse her; would go mad; would blaspheme God; would throw up everything; would die.

He had promised to go down to Oxford to receive a degree, and as up to the time of his departure she had not replied, he went half-unconscious of himself and those about him.

Now, upon Adair Street the Expulsion had brought despair, the second-reading now assured, the Jews' vote over, and new writs issued; the second-reading debate was actually in progress at that date of the Oxford visit; and though the four yachts, copies of the Mahomet II, were being rapidly put together, the Bill, if at all pressed, must get through before they could be ready; nor could the House of Lords long delay its passage.

There remained Harris, so far ineffectual, but not therefore hopeless: so he, spurred, went down to Oxford.

But what Harris could not do was to get near to Hogarth: his task was, as it were, to pluck Venus from the firmament; but he mused, he mused upon her, with musing astrologic eye, with grand patience, fascinated by her very splendours, not without hope. When at 8 P.M. a banquet was served to 250 guests in the Radcliffe Library, the upper gallery being open to a crawling public to see the lions feed, Harris, watching thence the unattainable under the blue of the canopy — blue always in honour of the Sea — thought within himself: "Ah, Mr. 76, you've got it all, ain't you? — for the time being. But 'ow'd you feel if I had a pistol now? Gawd! I can just see him nicely curl and kick. Worse luck, I can't shoot a bloomin' 'ouse".

But the opportunity was so exquisite, that he resolved to try — the exit reached, would run, get a pistol, and return; but at the door itself a hand touched his shoulder, and, with a twist of guilty scare, he saw — O'Hara.

"Good Gawd!" he whispered, "what you want to startle anybody like that for? Don't you know that the wicked flea pursueth every man, but the righteous shall escape his filthy snare?"

"What are you doing here, boy?" asked O'Hara.

"Thick-head! ain't I down 'ere after this precious Mr. 76?" — for Hogarth, if Monarch of the Sun, would have remained for Harris only a glorified 76, Colmoor being for him the reality of the universe, all else mirage, such stuff as dreams are made of.

“Well”, said O’Hara, “come with me: want to talk to you” — he just come from the Mahomet through Spain and France, drawn to Hogarth as moths to a candle, his petition for pardon not yet answered; and he assumed that Hogarth’s wrath still blazed, though, in fact, answer was only delayed by competition of greater interests, Hogarth having forgotten O’Hara; at any rate, O’Hara, with shrinking qualms, had come to Oxford, thinking: “I will try and get at him for one more talk — I am not afraid of your eyes, my son: tut! I’ve seen the great brow in a prison-cap. And the haughty beast still loves old Pat at bottom, I do declare. Be bold, be bold, but not too bold....Well, I will! And, if I perish, I perish, and he perishes, too, so help me, God”....

And to Harris, walking by the towing-path, he said: “No, boy, don’t you. Not now. Tut! — those lords: they are only making you their tool. Don’t you understand? Hogarth is robbing from them the land which they have robbed from the British people, and they naturally wish to murder him: but what have you, or I, to do with that? Let the thieves fight it out between them, while we enjoy ourselves, if we can. Weren’t we happy in the Mahomet, boy — we two? Didn’t you roll whole weeks drunk? That was better than Colmoor, eh, Alfie? And didn’t I have my incense, my grapes, my little Circassian, and ten thousand pounds in yellow gold a year? Wasn’t that all right? Well, we may have it again! — not in the Mahomet, perhaps, but somewhere. Do nothing — not yet: till I give the word. If you must kill, get a dog, or a horse, or an obscure old man, not the Regent of England—”

“Dirty old swine!” cried Harris, angry, “aven’t I forbid you again and again from making game of me? You’re doing it now! You just try that on, and go up thou bald-head, it is!”

“But is this understood between us?”

“Old duffer! you are one thing to-day, and another thing to-morrow: there’s no knowing how to tyke you. You’re such a sinful old ‘ypocrite, that you play-act before yourself, I do believe. What is it you do mean? You myke anyone sick of you; your incense and your burnt sacrifices are an offence unto me. This Mr. 76 once put a knife into me, and I mean to put another into him: ‘ow’s that?”

“Not now!”

“‘Ow about your sweet friend, Frankl? I’m under contract with him, ain’t I?”

“Better put the knife into Frankl”.

“Into the pair of you, it strikes me!”

“Well, if you make the least attempt upon Hogarth now, you get not another shilling—”.

“Bah! shut that — !”

But the threat won sullen consent; and when after the Banquet the Oxford guests had driven to see the illuminations, spoiled by boisterous Spring-winds, and when the Regent returned to his chambers, he caught sight of O’Hara amid the throng that lined the stair; upon which, after stepping up past, he stopped, twisted round, to say: “You, Admiral Donald?”

“If I might speak ten minutes with your Lordship’s Majesty—”

“What about?”

Those bold eyes of O’Hara dropped.

“Well”, said the Regent, “I will see. Come to-morrow — about five,” and went on up.

The next morning the Degree was conferred in the theatre, Doctor of Common Law— “an appropriate one”, the Master of Balliol remarked, “though ‘Surgeon’ would perhaps be the mot juste”; and thus at last Hogarth donned cap-and-tassel, though not Frankl’s — a livery which drew from Harris the reflection: “Sweet beauty! — in his mortarboard”. The nip upon the brow of the college-cap peak resembled the nip of the Scotch prison-cap, awaking memories: but the symbolism was different.

Meantime, the Regent’s eye wandered, madness and folly in his heart, and fear, till at four a letter came, he having left Loveday at Buckingham Palace with instructions to open letters and send the One.

She had written:

“What you can expect of me I am unable to conceive. Have you not expelled me? Let us be worthy of our long friendship, and ‘play the man’....’My exaltation to afflictions high’....With prayers for you, I say good-bye: and will remember.

“REBEKAH FRANKL”.

Loveday had added: “She left London at noon for Southampton. Purchas followed to spy. Machray’s other detective waits in Palace for instructions”.

As to the dinner in Christ Church Hall, and the Ball, which were to end the program of this last day, at four-thirty the news spread that the Regent had been taken ill.

“Have you not expelled me?”...Was she angry? Did she not know that he meant well? Hogarth, breaking into a rage, leapt up, with, “I swear to God that not one step does she move out of this country — !” and rushed to a bell: a gentleman-usher came.

“What about going?”

“All will be ready in fifteen minutes, my Lord King”.

“I feel bad: say ten minutes; tell the Lord Chamberlain”.

“Yes. I might mention — did your Lordship’s Majesty grant a ten minutes’ audience to Admiral Donald for this hour?”

“Who? Yes, I think — Just kick him down the stairs! Or no — say I may see him some day”.

This message, as the usher dashed through, was faithfully dropped at O’Hara’s consciousness; and O’Hara said: “Hoity-toity...!”

Bent-backed he descended to the Quadrangle, with a sense of defeat, rebuff, contumely, rage, but quite sprightly said to Harris, waiting beyond the Gateway: “Well, boy, how can we make a night of it? I feel that way”.

“Seen Mr. 76?”

“Tut, no. Sharpen up that knife for his throat, boy!”

And Harris exclaimed: “Another chynge! Strike me silly! — what did I sye? Give me a new ‘eart, O Lawd, it is — you grey-haired old duffer. Chopping and chynging, always the syme — to your old wife Jyne. I’d be ashamed of myself in your plyce. But sharpen up the knife, it is”.

XLVII. THE EMIGRANTS

LATE THE SAME night the Regent received at the Palace a telegram about Rebekah: She had travelled alone to Southampton, where a landau at the station had awaited her, in which she had driven to a country-house near the Itchen named “Silverfern”, two miles from Bitterne Manor, in which lived an elderly gentleman, Mr. Abrahams, ark-opener and scroll-bearer in the Synagogue, with his wife and two sons. The passage of these, and of Rebekah, was booked by the Calabria, Jewish emigrant-ship, to sail in four days.

Hogarth no sooner heard these tidings than he tumbled into crime: resolved to kidnap Rebekah; to break his own law for his own behoof: one of the basest acts of a King.

He had four days: and by the end of the second four men lay in wait round “Silverfern”, one a sea-fort sub-lieutenant, one a detective, and two others very rough customers: a cottage having been hired by them for the reception of Rebekah in a dell a mile higher up the Itchen.

But something infects the world; and gravity badgers the bullet’s trajectory; and a magnetic “H” disturbs the needle; and “impossible” roots turn up in the equation; and the finger of God is in every pie.

Hence, though the four ravishers lay in wait, and actually effected a seizure, the Regent did not get his girl.

None of the four had ever seen her: but as there was no young lady except her at “Silverfern”, that seemed of no importance, so she had been only described to them as dark and pretty.

But on the night after Rebekah's arrival, there came to "Silverfern" a new inmate: Margaret Hogarth.

Her passage, too, was booked to Palestine.

For Frankl had said: "In expelling the Jews, he shall expel his own sister. Oh, that's sweet, after all!"

At this time Frankl's interest in Land Bill and England was dead, two interests only remaining to him: so to realize his share in the Western world as to reach Jerusalem loaded with wealth; and also, not less intense, to hurt Hogarth, to outwit him, to cry quits at the last.

It was hard — Hogarth being set so high; but he invoked the help of the Holy One (blessed be He): and was not without resource.

Why had Hogarth never had him seized, racked? What restrained the Regent now? That was a question with Frankl. Hogarth might say, even to himself, that Frankl was vermin too small to be crushed, that he waited for his sister from God; but lately the real reason had grown upon Frankl: it was because Hogarth was afraid of him! afraid that Frankl, if persecuted beyond measure, might blurt out the Regent's convict past, and raise a sensation of horror through the world not pleasant to face. Harris, O'Hara, Rebekah and Frankl alone knew that past, and the motives for silence of the first three were obvious; nor had Frankl whispered that secret even to his own heart in his bed-chamber, conscious of his own guilt in the matter of the Arab Jew's death, fearing that, if the wit and power of Hogarth were given motive to move heaven and earth, the real facts might not be undiscoverable: then would Frankl be ground to fine powder by the grinders. But if he was going to Palestine, what mattered?

Also, there was Margaret: she should go out as a Jewess.

She arrived at "Silverfern" in the charge of a Jewish clerk, and the Abrahams received her as an afflicted orphan, committed to Frankl by her father; she, like Rebekah, to go under their care.

Well, the evening before the departure, Mr. and Mrs. Abrahams, their two sons, Rebekah and Margaret, all go for a stroll — about nine o'clock, that morning one of the four ravishers having been to the house on some pretence, seen Margaret with Mrs. Abrahams under the porch, and noted her well, her grey tailor-gown, her brooch, her singing; and now, as all walked out under the moon, they were watched, the watchers, surprised at the presence of two young ladies, concluding that the smaller — Rebekah — must have arrived later: so upon the large and shapely form of Margaret their gaze fastened, as the party passed near their hedge of concealment, Margaret then remarking: “My name is Rachel Oppenheimer—” and Mrs. Abrahams with gentle chiding answering her: “No, be good: your name is Ruth Levi”.

For during two years at the Jewish Asylum at Wroxham they had tilled into her shrieking brain, “Now, be good: your name is Rachel Oppenheimer”, and one day she had said: “My name is Rachel Oppenheimer”, and had been saying it ever since.

In fact, there was a real Rachel Oppenheimer, a dependent of Frankl's, at Yarmouth, who was rather mad, and when it had been necessary that Margaret should be out of the way in order to secure Hogarth's conviction, two doctors had examined this Rachel Oppenheimer, and given the legal certificates by means of which Frankl had put away Margaret; and she during two years of sanity in an atmosphere of lunacy had screamed for pity, till one morning she had shewed the stare, the unworldly rapture, and had started to sing her old songs.

After which, Frankl, hearing of it, and touched by some awe, had got her out, and kept her in one retreat or another.

But in all her madness was mixed some memory of his devilish heart, and every fresh sight of him inspired her with panic, she in his presence hanging upon his eyes, instant to obey his slightest hint: hence her beckoning down to Hogarth from that window in Market Street.

Now, on this last night of England the Abrahams party strolled far, two days like Summer days having come, on hedge and tree now tripping the shoots of Spring, the moon-haunted night of a mild mood: so from “Silverfern” lawns they passed up a steep field northward, down a path between village-houses, and idled within a pine-wood by the river-side.

The moon’s glow was like one luminous ghost: and buttercup, daisy, snowdrop, primrose gathered Margaret, vagrant, flighty, light to the winds that wafted her as fluff, and tossed them suddenly aloft, and back they came to be tangled in her bare hair; and now she was a tipsy bacchante, singing:

“Will you come to the wedding?

Will you come?

Bring you own bread and butter,

And your own tea and sugar,

And we’ll all pay a penny for the Rum”.

“Poor Ruth!” — from Rebekah, an arm about her waist.

“There is such a huge pool which is wheeling”, said Margaret, gazing at it with surprise, “and it goes hollow in the middle: my goodness, it does wheel! and there is a little grey duck in it ranging round and round with it, and this little grey duck is singing like an angel”.

“Do you know where we are going to?” asked Rebekah: “to the land of our fathers, Ruth, after all the exile in this ugly Western world; and it is he who sends us, the fierce-willed master of men”.

“My name”, said Margaret, “is Rachel Oppenheimer”; and immediately, wafted like a half-inflated balloon which leaps to descend a thousand feet away, she sang:

“Happy day! Happy day!

When Jesus washed my sins away...”

Then, woe-begone, she shook her head, and let fall her abandoned hand; and Rebekah, speaking more to herself: “Did you never hear of Hogarth, the King, Ruth? or see him in some dream in shining white, with a face like the face in the bush which burned and was not consumed?”

But now Margaret laughed, crying out: “Oh, there’s a man riding a shorthorn bull that has wings; white it is: and up they fly, the bull pawing and snorting, all among the stars. Oh, and now the man is falling! — my goodness—”

She stood still, gazing at that thing in heaven.

“Well, what has become of the man, dear?” asked Rebekah.

“I can’t make out....But I should like to marry that man”.

“Ah, if wishes were fathers, we should all have babies, Ruth, to say our kaddish”.

“Oh, look — !” cried Margaret.

A rabbit had rushed across a path ahead, and she ran that way beyond a bend....When Rebekah followed she had disappeared.

On Rebekah’s outcry all set to search wood, path, river — she was gone; but after five minutes a voice a long way off in the wood, singing:

“O what a pretty place,

And what a graceful city....”

on which the two youths flew toward the sound, and presently the rest, following, heard a shout, a cry, then silence, till one of the young men came running back, his face washed in blood: he had seen some forms, and, as he had approached, been struck on the brow, his brother felled. When all came to where the brother lay insensible, no sign of Margaret; nor could villagers and police, searching through the night, find her.

She had gone without surprise with her four captors, who had carried her to a cottage of boarded-up windows: and the same hour Hogarth had the news.

The next morning the four received detailed instructions at the village poste restante: the lady-attendant at the cottage was to ask the prisoner if she would go to London, try to persuade her, and, if she consented, make her sign pledge of honour (enclosed) to go without any attempt at escape during three days.

The men were surprised: for that Margaret was deranged they had seen at once, and supposed that the Regent must know it: what, then, could her pledge do? Their business, however, was to obey: and when Margaret was asked: “Will you go quietly to the Palace in London with us?” she answered: “Yes!” and sang:

“Here we go to London-town:
Tri-de-laddie! Tri-de-laddie!
See the King with his golden crown,
Tri-de-laddie, O!”

By noon the Abrahams and Rebekah were being tugged out of harbour, to the hand-wavings and god-speeds of seven emigrant-boats by the quay; but it was not till five that the Regent’s emissaries could obtain a special train on the thronged lines; and not till after seven did they arrive with Margaret at the Palace-gates.

Now, that night the Lord Regent and the Prince of Wales were attending a banquet at the Guildhall, given in honour of sea-rent reduction on British ships, and at the moment when Margaret arrived Hogarth, already en route, thinking of Rebekah, muttered: “By now she is here!”

But since Frankl, on getting news of the disappearance of Margaret, had at once conjectured the hand of Hogarth, as Margaret was being handed from the cab at the Palace-gates, she saw two terrible eyes, and, snatching her hand free, flew screaming down the street — eyes of Frankl, who, conjecturing that hither she would be brought, had taken stand there half the afternoon, knowing precisely the effect upon her of the sight of his face; and said he: “You see, you haven’t got her yet — though you shall have her to your heart’s content....”

As she could only run southward or northward, he had posted two motor-cars, one containing a clerk to south, the other Harris, to north, so that, as she ran, one or other should catch her, hustle her in, and dash away.

In fact, she ran north, right into the arms of Harris, her surprised guardians still ten yards behind; and “Quick!” hissed Harris, “come with me, or ‘e’ll ‘ave you!” and was off with her.

Upon which Frankl drove to the Market Street house, where he found Harris and Margaret; and again, with screams, she sought to fly, though her first terrors gave place to a quiet subservience after some minutes of his presence.

“Oh Lawd!” said Harris, “she started singing in the car, you know. Sing me songs of Araby, it is. Enough to give anybody the sick”.

“You see this gentleman here?” said Frankl to Margaret.

“Yes”, she whispered: “oh my!”

“Well, it so happens that very likely you are going to live in the same house as him — a big Palace with all gold and silver, where the King with his crown lives, and all. So while you are there, I want you to be his friend as if it was myself, and do everything he tells you, same as myself, in fact. Do you see?”

“Yes”, she whispered, her large form towering above Frankl’s, yet awe of him widening her eyes.

“What’s your name?” said he.

“My name is Rachel Oppenheimer”, said she.

“All right: come up and dress”.

She followed him up to a back room, where was a lamp, a glass, etc., and on an old settee evening-dress complete, shoes, roses, head-wrap.

“Now”, said Frankl, leaving her, he, too, in evening-dress, “I give you ten minutes to rig yourself out in that lot: a second more, and you catch it”.

And in fifteen minutes they two were in a cab, en route for the Guildhall, Frankl, who had invitations for himself and daughter, saying: “You understand? you keep your eye fixed upon me the whole time — never mind about eating — and when I hold up my finger so, you rise and give them a little song....”

It was a function intended to be memorable, the Lord Regent going in state, attended by 150 Yeomen, King-at-Arms, six heralds and all Heralds’ College, to be met at Temple Bar by my Lord Mayor, that day made a baronet, with his Sheriffs and Aldermen on horseback; the Guildhall in blue velvet, the platform at the east end bearing rows of squat gold chairs, while a canopy of deep-blue velvet, lined with light-blue sarcenet, dropped ponderous draperies, tied back with gold ropes, over the floor; on the canopy-front being Sword and Sceptre, the Royal Crown of Britain, and the Diadem of the Sea; the canopy table and the other looking like a short and a long wine-banquet of the Magi in Ophir: present being members of the British Royal House, Ambassadors to Britain and the Sea, the two Archbishops, Ministers, the Speaker, Officers, Fort-Admirals, the Regent's Household, the chief Nobility, the City personages.

Farthest from the short royal table, near the foot of the long, where the dishes were kosher for a Jewish colony, sat Frankl, and opposite him Margaret; and that face of Frankl was pinched and worn.

He prayed continually: "May God be my Rock and my High Tower; may the Almighty be my Shield this night...." while in two minutes Margaret had begun to be a wonder to her neighbours — heaved sighs, threw herself, beat plate with knife, hummed a little, yet conscious of wrong-doing, her eyes fixed upon Frankl.

"Oh, my!" her sigh heaved mortally, head tumbling dead on shoulder.

"Are you — unwell?" asked a startled neighbour, all shirt-front, eye-glass and delicacy.

"I see a long table with gold plates", she whined pitifully, "on every plate an eyeball dying...."

Frankl controlled her with a glance of anger.

And in the second course after turtle, with a fainting prayer to Jehovah, the Jew clandestinely held up a forefinger; upon which she, after some hesitation, remembered the signal, and like a dart shot to her feet.

Now every eye fastened upon her, from Regent's and Prince's to the bottom, those near her, who knew her now, feeling a miserable heart-shrinking of shame.

With sideward head she stood some seconds, smiling; and she sighed: "My name is Rachel—"

But soon, her mood now rushing into sprightliness, she stamped, and with an active alacrity of eye, sang:

"Will you come to the wedding?

Will you come?

Bring your own bread-and-butter,
And your own tea-and-sugar,
And we'll all pay a penny for the Rum,
Rum, Rum,
We'll all pay a penny for the Rum".

The Regent had risen, while Frankl, calm now in reaction, gazed sweetly upon his face: the vengeance of a Jew — nor was he half done with vengeance. Certainly, Hogarth was pale: he had sought her long, and found her so. "Why it is my own heart", he thought, "and they have made her mad".

One moment a stab of shame pierced him at the reflection: "Here!" but in the next his heart yearned upon her, and he rose nimbly and naturally far beyond Lord Mayor and Prince, and the rut of the world. After a perfectly deliberate bow, he left his place, and walked down the length of the hall to her, amid the gaping gods, Loveday, too, and three others, when he was half-way, following.

He had her hand, touched her temple lightly, yet compellingly, healingly....

"Dear, don't you know me? — Richard? — Dick?"

No, but at sight of Loveday some kind of recognition seemed to light, and die, in her eyes.

"Will you come, dear, and sit up yonder with me?" Hogarth asked, his face a mask of emotion.

Wearily she shook her head; and "John", said Hogarth, "take her home"; whereupon Loveday led her out, the Regent returning to the canopy.

Half an hour later he found it À propos of something to say to the Prince: "That lady who sang is my sister, Your Royal Highness — seems to have been subjected to gross cruelties, and has gone crazy".

The next morning everyone knew that she was the Regent's sister; and a man said to a man: "There is madness in the family, then...."

XLVIII. THE SEA-FORTS

THE SECOND-READING OF the Land Bill had passed by a 59 majority: and it would now have been easy work to hurry through its remaining stages in a couple of weeks; but the Regent had awaited the nation's verdict in the return of the 120 to fill the Jewish seats, sure of the result.

So the 23rd was a great night — the third-reading — the majority 115 at 8 P.M.; and the next day, which was marked by a very brilliant evening, the Bill was before the Lords.

This stage it might easily have reached four weeks before, but had been shelved for the election of the 120: and in those weeks the four copies of the Mahomet II. had been launched.

And suddenly — bad news from Palestine: news that there, too, after all the safeguards, the greed of a few was working to plant the old European wrong: for, the Sanhedrim being short of funds for a railway, a syndicate of five merchant-princes had offered to buy from it an estate between Jerusalem and the Jordan, and when the Chief Rabbi had pointed out that the offer was monstrous, in view of the terms of the Sea's Deed of Gift, a fierce discussion had ensued, a schism; and although the syndicate's offer had been rejected by 27, at the next session the defeated leader, like some warlike Maccabæus, had surged with his faction and a hundred Arabs into the Mosque of Omar where the Sanhedrim met, to cast those who did not escape by flight into prison in the Pasha's Palace. In the hands of his clique the Government remained.

Such was the news....

It was followed in three days by a Representation to the Regent, signed by 90,000 Jews in Palestine, the fourth name being Rebekah Frankl's, they imploring him for their sinking ship just launched, calling him "Father".

For though the Jews had been content to see that Europe which they contemned parcelled out among a few, while the mass of men hovered countryless — from this had arisen their lucre — their mental quality was too rich in business shrewdness to tolerate in their own case any such Bedlam: yet they stood helpless before the disaster, and only in the Regent was hope.

On that night of the arrival of their Petition, the Prime Minister and the Commander-in-Chief dined in the Palace, placid men at the moment when soup began, the Regent's sky quite clear, for, though a rumour whispered that the Lords were designedly lengthening discussion of the Bill, this gave no one any concern.

During entremets, however, a scribbled card was passed into the hand of the Commander-in-Chief, and, as he read, his eyebrows lifted. Craving permission, he hurried out, had some talk with his Director of Military Intelligence, and returned pale.

Afterwards, as they three sat on a balcony overlooking the lake, with cigars, the Regent said: "I have thought, Sir Robert Wortley, of sending out at once two thousand Tommies under, say, General Sir John Clough, to the help of those poor Jews...."

Here the Commander-in-Chief cleared his throat, and in a strained voice interfered: "That is, my Lord King, if we ourselves have not need of every soldier of the line within the next week".

The Regent deposited his ash with peering eyes, puzzled.

"What does your Lordship mean?"

“Your Lordship’s Majesty, I was summoned from dinner just now to talk with Major-General Sir Maurice Coppleston, who reports movements of armed men, just come to his knowledge, and now going forward on a considerable scale, all northward. He gathers that these can only consist of Territorials and Yeomanry Cavalry, of whom not less than twelve battalions of rifles and three batteries of artillery, officers and men, are now on the way to, or massed upon, York. How widely the movement may actually extend — God knows”.

Silence now: Sir Robert Wortley suddenly whitening to the lips. Then Hogarth, in a very low voice, said: “They do not know me”.

“If I may crave leave to retire at once—” from the Commander-in-Chief; and Hogarth gave consent.

Queer things, omens, doubtings, weird clouds, gathered about Hogarth that night. When at eleven he gave audience to Admiral Quilter-Beckett, arrived from the Boodah Quilter-Beckett said: “Strange the fine weather here: at sea it is quite rough, the Boodah well under foam, and that old Campania pitches so—”

“You have come, then, in the Campania?” — from Hogarth.

“Yes, my Lord King”.

“And what about the yacht?”

“Oh, the yacht: in her I have sent the two hundred men to the Mahomet”.

“Which two hundred men, Admiral?”

Quilter-Beckett stared.

“Your Lordship’s Majesty has forgotten: I had instructions that you desired some interchanges among the garrisons, and had ordered the sending of two hundred of my men to the Mahomet, I to receive in return two hundred from her”.

“And you have sent your two hundred?”

“Yes, my Lord King”.

“Have you received the two hundred from the Mahomet?”

“They had not arrived when I left the Boodah”.

“So that you left only one hundred men in the Boodah, with instructions to receive two hundred others?”

“That is so, my Lord King”.

There was silence.

“But suppose I tell you that I have given no such instructions: will your heart — leap?”

Hogarth clapped a sudden hand of horror upon Quilter-Beckett’s shoulder.

“My God — !” Quilter-Beckett started like a gun’s recoil.

“Be calm, Admiral: it may be only some mistake....From whence had you this order?”

“From — from the Mahomet, in the usual course—”

“Good night, Admiral; I would be alone”.

At that very hour a world-tragedy was being enacted over the dark and turbulent ocean, and the immensest of Empires was sinking into the sea.

Darkly, quietly, with no mighty and multitudinous tumult of man.

That midnight the night-glass of many a mystified merchantman searched the murk for those coruscations with which the crescent of forts had constellated the Atlantic, the mariner’s sea-rent waiting ready, with his ship’s-papers, in his cash box: but no galaxy of lights glanced that night.

To some, before this, they had appeared, but, as the ship approached, had vanished, and it was as though the swarm of the Pleiades had been caught from the skies before their eyes. Long before dawn ships separated by three thousand miles had gained the assurance that this or that sea-fort no longer rode the familiar spot-had been rapt to the stars, had sunk, had somehow passed from being. Before this monstrous marvel the mariner stood dumb, and it was afterwards said that that wild night the terminals of heaven and earth were lost, that the storm-winds were haunted, in all the air lamentation, sobbings as for swallowed orbs, and the whisper: “It is finished”.

Two days previously a telegram from Admiral O’Hara had gone to all the forts in European waters, commanding an interchange of 200 of their men with men of his own fort; and each officer in command, ignorant that the same instructions had gone to others, had complied: so that by the next morning, the 29th April, 1600 men from eight forts were converging in yachts upon the Mahomet. As the fort garrisons, originally numbering 500, had recently been reduced to 300, the others having been mostly drafted into the 2nd Division of the British Royal Marines, compliance with Admiral O’Hara’s order left a garrison of 100 only at each of eight forts.

Toward five in the afternoon of that day, the 29th, 700 men, to the bewilderment of her officers, were in the Mahomet two of the fort-yachts having arrived upon a troubled First Lieutenant who was in command, all attempts to see the Admiral since the morning having failed.

But near seven the Admiral summoned the Treasurer to his bureau near the bottom, he being in dressing-gown and slippers, very slovenly, seeming either drunk or sick, his mouth gaping to his pantings, and anon his languishing eye shot dyingly to heaven.

“Well, you see how I am, Mr. Treasurer”, he went, “seedy. Pain in this temple, trouble with the respiration, and a foul breath. Poor Admiral Donald, Mr. Treasurer, poor Admiral Donald. The fashion of this world passeth away, sir, and the Will of God be done! Sometimes, I pledge you my word, I almost wish that I was dead. There are things, sir, in this world — Ah, well, God help me; I feel very chippy. I wanted to ask you, sir, to let me see the books, and hand me over at once all unaudited and unsettled funds in your counting-house, though I'm not fit for affairs to-day, sir, God knows—"

"Sir!" cried the Treasurer, a hard-browed, bald-headed man with a fan-beard, savouring of banks and ledgers.

"Just pass them over, sir".

"Well, this is the most singular order I ever heard of!"

"Obey me promptly, sir, or, by God, I cashier you!" roared O'Hara, his raised lids laying nude the debauchery of those jaundiced juicy balls.

"Be it so, Admiral Donald" — the Treasurer bowed: "but on the understanding that I formally protest against the irregularity, and report it to the High Chancellor".

He retired, and in half an hour returned with two clerks who bore books, himself a carpet-bag containing in cash-boxes £850,000, paper and gold, which he deposited on the Admiral's bureau, and, after again protesting before the clerks, went away.

Not far off by now were some of the other six fort-yachts, converging with their 200 upon the Mahomet, and as the Admiral had no intention of being put into irons as a lunatic in his own fort, at eight o'clock he stole from his apartments, dressed now, not in uniform, but in priest's robes and a voluminous cloak, bearing in one hand the bag, in the other a key.

Those lower depths of the Mahomet were an utter solitude, lit with rare rays; yet the Admiral journeyed through and up peering, skulking, pausing, hurrying, and, if by chance a light caught his face, it showed a horror of convulsive flesh, his body a mass of trembling, like jelly.

Now, the forts had been built to fight; and (since nothing is impossible), if they fought, they might fall into an enemy's hand: to obviate which, there was in a little room on the third floor a handle which opened by hydraulics a door in the fort's side on the fifth floor below, the existence of this room being unknown save to each Admiral and to four of his lieutenants, and its key kept in a spot known to these. This key O'Hara now had in hand; and as he pushed it into the lock, his jaw jabbered like a baboon's.

Night was now come; the sea rough; Spain lost to sight; the two emptied yachts on the way back to their forts; yonder the lights of the Mahomet II. lying-to; two officers in oilskins walking arm in arm, to and fro, on the roof; and said one: "Look at those waves there all of a sudden: they rather seem to be breaking on the wrong side of us".

Then they resumed their talk; and to and fro they walked, arm in arm.

Till now one with sudden hiss: "But-good Christ-just look-why, the roof's leaning — !"

At that moment an outcry and runners from below, shouts, a trumpet-call, were borne on the winds to them: for the Admiral had rushed up to the manned parts of the fort, all hell alight in his eyeballs, bawling out, "The boats! The Mahomet is sinking!"

In spite of which many perished, the survivors afterwards declaring that the tragedy mesmerized their nerves with a certain awe not to be compared with the terrors felt on sinking ships, the Mahomet affecting them like a being of life, like behemoth slowly dying, or some doomed moon. She gave them, indeed, plenty of time, though when the steel portals on two of her sides were opened, the sea washed up the steps, making the launching very delicate feats, and near the last the leaning was so marked, that there was difficulty in standing; and still in patient distress she waited while the waves like multitudinous wolves, trooped to prey upon her.

As the Admiral ran to the outer Collector's Office to embark, he was faced by the Treasurer, revolver in hand, and "Hand me over that bag, Admiral", he said pretty coolly, "or I blow out your brains".

O'Hara's mouth worked: he could not speak.

"Will you?" said the Treasurer: "no doubt you mean to hand it over to the proper authorities, but I prefer to do that myself. Be quick, you old dog!"

Whereat O'Hara, having no weapon, dropped the bag, and trotted wide-eyed forward to the thronged scene of the launchings.

There were more than enough boats, and though on the lowest side of the fort nothing could long be done, all had gone off, when the fort, having settled very low, looking for some time like a brawling cauldron and area of breaking waves coloured by her hundred lights, went down, and was not.

Whereupon the yacht, over a hundred yards away, was caught in the traction of her strong enthrallment, and, like a planet, started into running round a region of sea which wheeled; while seven of the boats, rowing for life, were grasped, and dragged back, with a hundred and nine, into the deep.

"Toll for the brave...."

As to the other boats, they arrived at Tarifa the following evening, with 583; but the Admiral ordered the Mahomet II. to Cadiz, where soon after midnight he landed, and, by negotiation with a "Jefe", in an hour had a train for Madrid. As he was about to step in, the Treasurer touched his shoulder.

"What, Admiral, off by land?"

"Yes, sir, as you know", said O'Hara, "for you have been spying my movements for the last hour. How childish to imagine that I have anything to fear, or want to escape! Why, I am bound for England — my only object in the land journey being quickness. I even invite you to come with me."

"All right, Admiral, I will....If you be tempted to murder me en route, remember these" — a pair of pistols; and they set out at about the hour when the whole crescent of tragedies was over.

At six that evening a yacht, a copy of the Mahomet II., had come to the Cattegat sea-fort to land 200 men who wore the Empire's blue-jacket, the name "Mahomet" on their caps — nothing to show that they were not genuine Mahomet men, though some looked rather sea-sick; but in reality they were young lords, stock-brokers, Territorial Officers, men-about-town, park-keepers, undergraduates, secretly armed with knife and revolver, and knowing, too, where the armoury of the sea-fort lay.

Meantime, three other yachts, all named Mahomet II., were a-ply in the Atlantic, two containing 400 men each, one 600, each of the first two to land 200 at a fort at six, and her remaining 200 at the next fort by eight-thirty, serving four forts, the last to land 200 at each of three forts: so that by 10.30 P.M. each of eight forts, including the Cattegat, contained 200 enemies disguised as fort-men.

And punctually at eleven, in each, began perhaps the darkest massacre of history — no quarter given — and when the alarm went forth, whichever of the unarmed fort-men rushed to the dark armoury found the door fastened against him. Of two men in bed, talking together through an open door, one arose at the stroke of a clock and killed the other; some perished in sleep — all very quietly accomplished: a few shots, a few lost echoes in the vast castles, a few daubs of blood. And in no case did a single one, either massacred or assassin, escape alive: for, in every case, some one or other of the fort-officers — Admiral, Lieutenant, Commander — to prevent capture, opened the inlet to the flood in the very thick of the doom, went down with his muteness and his bubbling, and the sea, a secret in its bosom, rolled over the Sea.

XLIX. THE DEBACLE

ALL THE NEXT day, till near 9 P.M., not one syllable was definitely known of this tremendous fact by anyone in Britain: for though, early astir, the Regent telegraphed the Mahomet, all day he waited without reply.

At eleven the Prime Minister said to him: “Things, my Lord King, wear at this moment an aspect so threatening, that I see no escape from civil war, even if it be brief, except by the immediate forcing through of the Bill, and I stand ready — now — to propose you as new peers—”

“Wait”, answered the Regent: “pass to-night the Bill should, but I think I shall effect that by myself going to the Lords, and listening a little to the talk”.

A dark day, with an under-thought always, whatever the business, of one thing — the Sea....

About 5.30, as was his custom, he went up a stair to pass along two corridors to the little cream suite in which lived Margaret, for whom the doctors now promised sanity, her forehead daily seeming to drink-in peace from the contact of his palm, after which she would comb his hair, he lying on a sofa, or taking tea; and, “Well, dear”, he said, this last day of all, as her ladies retired to an inner salon, “how is the head?”

“I have seen you before”, she replied: “what is your name?”

“Dick Hogarth. Come to me, and let me lay my heavy head on you. The heart of your friend bodes to-day, bodes, bodes; but is not afraid: a tough heart, Madge. Do you like me to press my hand upon your head like that?”

Then, weary of his moaning heart that moaned that day like choruses of haunted winds through desolate halls, he fell to sleep even as he mumbled to her, she, seated near his sofa, playing with his hair, his arm around her, faint zephyrs from the window fanning his head, waving down the valenciennes.

But now she tossed the comb away, hummed, became restless, disengaged her shoulders, rose, strayed listlessly, with sighs, and on finding herself in the ante-chamber, opened the door, went out into a corridor, leant her back, eyeing the floor; and next with a great sigh set to gazing upward, droning two notes, one doh, one soh. All was silent. But now a sound of voices that drew her, she moving into another longer corridor, with balusters which overlooked a hall below, and yonder at the stair-foot were two men in altercation, one a guard, to whom the other was saying “But I tell you the lydy herself arst me to go to her; it’s an appointment, just like any other appointment. Do let a fellow pass!” and with mouth at ear he added: “It’s an affair of the ‘eart! ‘Ere’s a sov—” “Couldn’t, my friend, couldn’t”, the guardsman said.

But now Harris: “Why, there she is ‘erself, so ‘elp-! come out to meet me, as the Lord liveth!” — ran then toward where she looked over to send up the hoarse whisper: “I sye — didn’t you tell me yourself to come — ?”

On which she nodded amiably, smiling, touching a rose in her bosom.

“There you are! What more do you want?” he said to the guard, who now gave him passage: and like a dart he darted, like a freed lark, or unleashed hound, fleet on the feet, with lifted brow.

“I sye!” he whispered her, all active, brisk as a cat, ecstatic— “where’s ‘e?”

“Who?” — she still at her rose, a memory straying in her that here was a friend, whom the Terrible One had bid her obey.

“Mr. — the Regent”, he whispered.

“I don’t know him. What is your name? My name is—”

“Oh, you muddle-headed cat! Don’t you know the dark man with the black moles — quick!”

“Sh-h-h — he is sleeping”.

“Gawd! is he though? Come, show me! I’ve got a old appointment—”

She led the way: the two corridors — the door — the room, he treading on air, brow up, eyes on fire, knife bright and ready; and eight feet from the couch she put out her forefinger, pointing, smiling, Hogarth’s face toward them, his mouth pouting in sleep, bosom breathing, a breeze in his hair.

From the lips of Harris, in the faintest snake-hiss, proceeded, “Sleep, my little one-sleep, my pretty one — sleep—” and with a wrist as graceful as the spring of a tigress he had the knife buried in Hogarth’s left breast.

Some instinct must have pierced Hogarth’s sleep an instant before the actual blow, for while the knife was yet in him he had Harris’s wrist; and the assassin fled writhing, so brisk a trick had cracked his elbow.

And blanched and short-breathed sprang Hogarth, but at once tottered, Margaret, open-mouthed, regarding him, till he suddenly cried out “Ladies!”, and before they came had hurried out, drawing his coat over the place of blood.

In the second corridor he had to stop and lean, but then descended, striking all whom he passed with awe at his face, till he stumbled into his own drawing-room, and, as he fell, was caught by Sir Francis Yeames, the Private Secretary.

The wound had passed along the outer front surface of the second rib toward the scapula, injuring two of the branches of the axillary artery: so whispered the Resident Medical Attendant, while the council of doctors pronounced the condition “very grave”, but not “dangerous” — a case for “judicious pressure”; and after a long swoon he opened his eyes; in the deeply-recessed series of windows, narrow and round-topped, now dying the twilight; the insignificant bed lost in a chamber of frescoes and vast darksome oils of battles and loves. And, suddenly starting, he asked: “What’s the time?”

“Seven-thirty, my Lord King”, answered Sir Martin Phipps.

“Ah, I remember: I was stabbed. Who did it?”

“It can only be assumed from the evidence of a guardsman that it was a servant in the Palace, called Harris”.

“Aye, I think I saw his face. Does anyone know of the matter?”

“Very few persons so far....The police are after Harris”.

Now the Regent started, understanding that the condemnation of Harris would mean a revelation of the Colmoor-horror secret; and he said after a minute, “John, is that you? Will you go and have the whole thing quashed?....And now, doctor, the wound.”

“The wound is not what we call ‘dangerous’, my Lord King: ah, but believe me, it was a narrow shave”.

“I dare say, Sir Martin: the outcomes of this particular world do arrive by narrow shaves; but they arrive, and life is an escape. At any rate, doctor, I shall be able to go, as arranged, to the Lords—”

The doctor smiled. “No, never that”.

“I shall go”.

And at once he leapt from bed, staggering headlong in the effort, to strike his head against a window corner, while all ran, crying out, to catch him, the doctor thinking: “Those whom the gods destroy they first drive mad”.

So far not a whisper of the stab had reached even the Prime Minister or the Prince; but since the news of moving troops, and the reluctance of the Lords to pass the Bill, agitated all, London came out to watch his descent upon the Lords.

He went in precisely the spirit of a professor who steps to the chair, smiles, and takes the class; but as he drove down Whitehall, this thought pierced him with a keener point than the steel of Harris: "The Sea...!"

He did not know that at last a thousand transmitters, from Tarifa, from Frederikshavn, from many a ship, were thrilling the ether with messages as to the Sea.

Nor did he know that that day Frankl had whispered to some dozen people, with proofs and old newspapers, that convict past of the Regent.

And from his very first entering, when the Lord Chancellor rose, and the Regent made the bow, he was shocked by the scene of open insolence spread before him.

Everywhere the boldest eyes regarded him; he saw smiles of scorn, snarling visages, as, with reclining head and lowered lids, his eyes rested on the House: a hard gaze. Unfortunately, his pallor was perfectly obvious, and its significance, the stab being unknown, was misunderstood.

And up rose a young lord, who stammered unprofundities just below the region of lawn-sleeves to the right; and another with slow step, as if to music, came up the gangway, and spoke at the table; and another after him: and it needed sustained effort to understand what they said; the brain, as it were, would not close upon statement after statement so insignificant. But Hogarth would have endured till midnight, or longer, but for a growing doubt within him: "Am I bleeding? Shall I not certainly faint?"

And there was this other question: "To what greater daring of insolence will these impossible speeches rise?"

Suddenly, at five minutes to ten, in the very midst of a duke's speech, the Regent, with dizzy brain, was on his feet: there was a few moments' gasp and breathlessness; and then — all at once — it was as though a wind from hell swept through that House, whirling in its vehemence Regent, lords, Gallery, Black Rod, Clerk, Usher, and all; and every face was marble, and every eye a blaze.

The Regent cried: “Your lordships’ eloquence—”

And as he said “eloquence”, a voice that was a scream, a forward-straining form, a pointing finger: “Why, my lords, that man is only a common convict! — reprieved for murder — escaped from Colmoor. And all his forts are sunk!”

It happened that in the midst of this outcry, the Regent fell back afaint, the moles black, the face white.

Now, here seemed simple panic: and like a pack of dogs which rush to mangle a mongrel, they were at him pell-mell.

See now a shocking scrimmage, a rush and crush for precedence, surge upon surge of men jostling each other in a struggle to get near him, sticks reaching awkwardly over heads to inflict far forceless blows, and on his face the fists; a hundred roaring “Order!”, fighting against the tide; three hundred shrieking, “Kill him!” “Have him done with!” “Dash out his brains!”, and pressing to that job. Sergeant-at-Arms, meanwhile, Clerk-attending-the-Table, and the physician, had run to give the alarm; but it was by one of those miracles of wild minutes, when turbulent sprites appear to mix themselves in the business of men, worse — embroiling the embroiled, that through the throng in the street rushed the word that the Regent was being killed: and quick, before any fatal blow had been struck, the rabble were there in that chamber, having brushed away every barrier.

They imagined themselves come to save: in reality they came to kill — were, in fact, too many for the area of the room, so that men succumbed fast as by plague-stroke under trampling feet, and even after twenty minutes when sixty-seven lay mangled the scene of horror could not be said to be ended.

Early upon the irruption the physician, three policemen, a Reading Clerk, and the Bishop of Durham, had managed to extricate and drag the Regent out; and through the shouting of the outside crowd he was driven home unconscious.

L. THE DECISION

SOMEWHAT BEFORE THIS hour Admiral O'Hara had arrived at Croydon, a lust, a morbid curiosity, now working in this man — having committed the ineffable sin, to enjoy its fruit by hearing what Richard Hogarth now said, in what precise way he groaned, or raved, smiled, or wept, or stormed; for he was cruelly in love with Hogarth.

All the way had come with him the Mahomet's treasurer, with his bag of wealth — and two pistols.

So at Dieppe O'Harra had wired to Harris:

“Meet me at Croydon to-night, the 9.45 from Newhaven, as you love life. Most important. Shall expect wire from you at the London and Paris Hotel, Newhaven, not later than six, saying yes”.

But at Newhaven he had found no answer — Harris, in fact, not having received the telegram, having already inflicted his stab, and fled the Palace.

Whereupon O'Hara, in an agony of doubt, had telegraphed Frankl from Newhaven:

“For God's sake find Harris. Make him meet me at Croydon to-night in the 9.45 from Newhaven. Do not fail”.

Now, Frankl knew exactly where Harris was — hiding in the Market Street house. And he said to himself: “All right: it's got something to do with money, and a lot of it, too, with all this ‘God's sake’. Suppose we both go to Croydon?”

Hence Frankl missed the joy of seeing the Regent mobbed: for at 9.30 he was waiting with Harris on the Croydon up-platform.

And as the train stopped, they two hurried into the compartment where O'Hara sat alone.

"You, my friend?" said O'Hara to Frankl.

"Large as life", replied Frankl: "I and the boy have already made it up between us for a third each: you a third, I a third, Alfie a third: that's fair; I keep the police off the backs of the pair of you, and you pay me a third. What's the figure?"

In one moment of silence O'Hara plotted; then his tongue yielded to the temptation of the great words: "Eight-hundred-and-fifty thousand, sir".

So after three minutes' talk Harris got out, and, as the train started, sprang into a first-class compartment in which was one other occupant.

Now, it was natural that the treasurer, carrying such a sum, should scrutinize any stranger, but Harris disarmed suspicion: his right arm, twisted by Hogarth, was in a sling, and he threw himself aside, and seemed to sleep, between the peak of his cap and his muffler hardly an inch of interval: so the treasurer, too, worn with travel, settled into a half-drowse.

Harris, however, like many of his type, was perfectly ambidextrous, often using the left hand by preference; and as the train passed Bromley, he darted, plunged his knife, streaked with the Regent's blood, into the treasurer's heart, and huddled the body under the seat.

No stoppage till London Bridge, where, with the bag, Harris left the train, Frankl and O'Hara trotting after his burdened haste; and, after two changes of cabs, the three arrived at the Market Street house.

There Harris laid the bag on the floor of an empty back room, where through a broken window came a little light, and the three stood looking down upon the bag, solemnly as upon a body.

Then suddenly Harris: "Come, gentlemen of the jury, let's have my share of the dead meat: and 'ere's off out of it for this child — only this blooming arm of mine! it's going to get me nabbed as sure as sticks. Never mind — trot it out, Captain! and don't cheat an innocent orphan, lest the ravens of the valley pick out the yellow galls of some o' you".

Neither of the other two, however, seemed anxious for the division; and after a minute's silence Frankl said: "The third of 850, I believe, is 2, 8, 3; how are we going to carry away 283 thousand without something to put it in? I vote, Pat, that we leave the bag here, and come and divide at midnight sharp. How would that do?"

"Yes", said Harris, "I think I see old Pat leaving the lot with me — what O! You know 'ow I'd fondle it for you, and keep it out of the cold, cold world, till you came back, don't you, you bald-headed priest?"

"Shut your mouth, boy. We can't take it away without something, as Mr. Frankl very justly observes. Aren't there some safes, Frankl, in Adair Street?"

"Right you are: and one, as I happen to know, empty. Who'll keep the key?"

"You, if you like, my friend. I'll keep the keys of the room-doors. And Harris will stand guard".

"The very thing", remarked Frankl.

So it was agreed. Harris took the bag; they descended to the cellar; then, striking matches, down three marl steps to the subterranean way made for Hogarth; and along it, forty feet, they stumbled bent, Harris gripped by each sleeve.

Then in the Adair Street Board Room they lit a candle, and in the room next it found the safes, the largest of which admitting the bag, Frankl locked its door, took the key; O'Hara then locked the room door, took the key; and at the stair-bottom locked another door, took the key; so that Frankl could not now get at the bag without him, nor he without Frankl, nor Harris without both.

Two then went away, while Harris, sprawling cynically on a solitary chair down in the parlour with straight open legs, awaited the rendezvous at twelve.

He had not, however, sat very long, when the taper at his feet glared on a face of terror at a sound of ghosts in the tomb that the house was, and he started to his feet, prone, snatching his knife — thinking, as always, of the Only Reality, the police. But he had not prowled three ecstatic steps when O'Hara stood before him.

“Oh, damned fool!” he went with infinite contempt and reproach, “to frighten anybody like that! What's it you are after now? Frighten anybody like that....”

“Alfie!” — O'Hara whispered it breathfully as the hoarse sirocco, stepping daintily like the peacock. Tell it not in Gath! If Alfie rammed the knife into the marrow of Frankl's back at the moment when the safe was opened, then Alfie would have, not a third, but a half; and the thing was desirable for this reason: that a half is greater than a third...

Harris saw that: but he seemed reluctant, meditating upon the ground; then walking, hands in pockets.

“Why, boy, he is only an interloper”, said O'Hara: “I meant the money to be divided fairly between you and me. Why should this Jew come in?”

“All right”, said Harris: “I don't mind”.

“And I know a little castle in Granada, Alfie, which we'll buy—”

“All right: you go away. It's agreed”.

And O'Hara hurried away, took a cab, drove for the Palace; while Harris, left alone, sat serious, with sprawling straight legs, and presently muttered: “Blind me, I must be going dotty or something! p'raps it's this arm....”

He had not thought of killing Frankl, until it had been suggested! — some class-habit, or instinct, of honour among thieves (which, however, his reason despised)...But five minutes after O'Hara had gone he started alert, staring, with tight fist, and, "All right, you two", said he, "blood it is!"

He sat again: and again, after twenty minutes, the house gave a sound — Frankl, who had let himself in by the front door, each member possessing a key to that.

"Well, Alf", said he, "all alone? Then, we two can have a little chat between us little two".

And he stood and talked, while Harris sprawled and listened, Frankl's road to his end being more circuitous than O'Hara's, more hedged, too, with reasons, scruples, sanctions: but he reached it, pointing out that a half is greater than a third; also that O'Hara would be a continual witness against Harris' past, whereas he, Frankl, left England for Asia the next morning.

Alfie pretended aversion to bloodshed, but finally consented; upon which Frankl went away, and took cab for Scotland Yard: his idea being to have Harris arrested red-handed in the murder of O'Hara.

The streets through which he drove wore a singular aspect — of commotion, hurry, unrest, two dragoon-orderlies galloping past him at the Marble Arch, in Whitehall the tramp of some line-regiment battalion, and he said to himself: "He is going to fight it out with them, I suppose — Satan take the lot!"

At Scotland Yard he said to the Inspector in Charge, having given his card, that if two officers were placed at his disposition, he might be able to lead them to the arrest of a man long "wanted", who now premeditated another murder.

Meantime, O'Hara was in conversation with Loveday in the Regent's library, nearer the centre of which stood a group of four with their heads together — Prime Minister, First Lord, War Office Secretary, a Naval Lord; further still, a spurred General, cloaked over his out-stuck sword, writing, with a wet white brow; and, “I suppose he will want to see you”, said Loveday, “if you have anything to say. But the doctors have first to be reckoned with: I suppose you know that he has been stabbed and beaten”.

“Stabbed! by whom?”

“By Harris”.

“No! When?”

“This afternoon”.

“Ah! I did not know”.

“It was by your recommendation, it appears, that Harris became Captain Macnaghten’s servant”, said Loveday with his smile, looking very gaunt and bent-down.

“Tut, sir!” — from O’Hara— “you are not my judge: I am here to see the Lord of the Sea, my King”.

“Ah! — you still give him the title”.

And now O’Hara, drawing his chair nearer to ask: “How did he take it?” stretching back the waiting mouth to hear that thing.

“The Lord Regent? Well, at eight-thirty he went to the House of Lords, where they beat him nearly to death on the throne, the gentle hearts, and the doctors forbade me to speak to him of the Sea; but his eyes seemed to question me, so I leant over, and told him”.

“Yes — and whatever did he say?”

He said: ““What, old Pat?””

O’Hara rose to stand by a hearth, black-robed to the heels and tonsured, and at the angle of his jaw some sinews ribbed and moved: not a syllable now from him.

“I am going in now to him”, said Loveday: “if you care to wait here, I will see” — and passing through a palace pretty busy that night with feet and a thousand working purposes, went to sit at the sick bed, the doctors retiring.

“How is the pain?”

“The pain”, said the Regent very weakly, “is nonsense: I am not going to be bullied by doctors, but shall do exactly as I like”.

“And what is that, Richard?”

“There is a Normandy village, John, called Val- e-les-Noisettes — white houses with an extraordinary sound of forest about, one of Poussin’s landscapes, with a smithy under a chestnut precisely as in the poem; and the blacksmith is a charming man. I dare say someone will find me money enough to purchase a share of his smithy: and with him I shall work, starting for him before sunrise, with my sister”.

Loveday, wondering if he was delirious, said irrelevantly: “I have to tell you that by five A.M. there will be 15,000 additional infantry in London, with—”

“Ah, I wish they’d lend them me to send out to those poor Jews, John. But, for myself — I was mad when I gave that order. It won’t do! the world is addicted to its orbit, and relapses. I don’t say that it will be always so, but it is now. As against the Empire of the Sea arises — Pat O’Hara; as against the brushing aside of these rebels arise — Germany, Russia, the hostile world. Consider the rancour of the nations at Britain’s late advantages in sea-rent, try to conceive the scream of jubilation that rings to the sky tonight against her, and against me. Do you think I could now start a civil war in England? for the satisfaction of my own pride? I call God to witness that never for my own pride have I done aught, but that the Kingdom of God might come. I know that bitter tears will flow at the fall of the righteous man — many calling me ‘traitor’ for abandoning those ready to die for me. Yet it shall be. I never thought to fail, to fly, John Loveday, chased by such little fellows: but God has done it. Well, then, the smithy. You and all, therefore, will find enough to do to-night”.

Loveday lifted a face streaming with tears to say: “The man, O’Hara, waits to see you”.

“Really? Well, come, we will see him....” and in some minutes O’Hara was there by the bedside, the eyes of the two fixed together, over Hogarth’s face five oblongs of sticking-plaster, his head bandaged, and at a corner of O’Hara’s mouth a twitching.

“Pat, did you betray me?” asked Hogarth.

O’Hara nodded: “Yes”.

“Well, you may sit and tell me, and ease your poor heart”.

And a long time O’Hara sat, going into the mighty crime, torturing details, revelling in the vastness of the horror, the sickness of the self-inflicted filth, and pangs of the self-inflicted scalpel.

“And why did you do it, my friend?”

“Because I worship you....”

“Well, perhaps I understand you, crooked soul. But what will you do now?”

“We shall see. What will you?”

“I am going to France to live as a private person”.

“Tut, you remain as simple as a child: the earth’s not large enough to contain you, you couldn’t now remain a private person for three weeks. Come, I have discrowned you: I will give you another crown, though I shall never see you wear it. Why not go to your own people?”

“Which people?”

“The Jews”.

“Don’t talk that same madness”.

“My time with you is short, Raphael Spinoza” — O’Hara glanced at his watch— “in five minutes we part, never, I do assure you, to meet again. Listen, then, to me: you are a Jew. I knew your mother — the most intellectual woman, I suppose, who ever drew breath, the only one whom I have loved; and I should have known you merely from your resemblance to her at my first glance at you in Colmoor, though I had more precise data: the three moles, the bloodshot eye, for didn’t I baptize you? haven’t I rocked you in my arms? You know St. Hilda on the hill over Westring, which you found me examining that morning after our escape from the prison? I was priest there, three years, and twice I have confessed her — ah! and remember it! for when your foster-father wanted her to turn Methodist, she wouldn’t stand that, and since she must needs be a meshumad (apostate), became a Catholic. Well, now, I once saw at Thring, and once in the Boodah, an old goat-hair trunk of yours: what is become of it?”

“I have it—” Hogarth was shivering, his eyes wide, and in his memory a strange singsong crooning of t’hillim, heard ages before in some other world over a cradle.

“Did you know that that trunk has a false bottom?” asked O’Hara.

“Yes”.

“Oh, you knew...And have you never seen a bundle of papers under it?”

“Yes — I assumed them to be old farm-accounts....”

“They are all the proofs you need concerning your birth; it is my trunk by the way — Ah, I must go!”

At the door he fastened upon Hogarth a last reluctant gaze to say good-bye, but Hogarth, staring wildly afar, did not turn his eyes, and O’Hara, with a sigh, was gone.

He drove to Adair Street, and, as he passed by a mews, Frankl, waiting there with two detectives, saw him by a street-light, but made no remark.

When O'Hara entered the house, he looked about for Harris, but Harris had gone to the lodging of a woman in James Street near, to arrange a hiding-place for the bag, passing out through the Market Street house; and O'Hara, opening the two locked doors, entered the safe-room, where he stood waiting, his forehead low, resting on the steel top; and now a sob throbbed through his frame, and his lips let out "...so lovely...so great...."

Count a minute's stillness: and now the man's soul and being foundered in a storm of sorrow, and half-words borne on shivering puffs of breath, and choking groans, broke the stillness: "My Liege! Richard! my King!"

This died to silence; and now he roamed the room with furious steps, and lowering brow, and an out-pushed under-lip, until, deciding, he drew from his pocket a penknife, opened it, leant now one elbow on the safe-top, blade in hand, considered, considered, hesitating, then with lifted chin and the thinnest whimpering like a puppy, pretty pitiful, cut from under his left ear to the chin.

Certainly a hurt so shallow could never have killed, for the hand had been cherishingly restrained, and the thing was no sooner done than the priest, seeing that he did not die, ran horror-eyed, streaming with blood, shouting a hoarse whisper: "Help! help! help!"

But at that cry he sighed, fell back, and effectually died, his heart pierced by the knife of Harris.

And some moments later the face of Frankl, who bore a candle, looked in at the door.

"Is that all right, Alfie?" — in the weakest whisper.

"Come on in, and don't ask any questions", said Harris.

Frankl entered, peered upon the dead visage of the priest; then, the detectives being now behind the parlour-door below, with handcuffs, rose to run to summon them: but, to his horror, Harris was now before the door; he saw in the candlelight those eyes of Alfie fixed upon him: and he knew: before the least threat or movement by Harris, the Jew sent to Heaven a piercing shriek, his hour come....

“...dirty-livered Jew...” striking in the breast, and, as Frankl fell, he gave him one other in the temple, with “Down, down to hell, and sye I sent thee thither”; and to dead O’Hara near he gave one in the cheek, with “Go up, thou bald-head, it is”: all in two seconds’ space; and he was now about to turn anew to hack at Frankl, when his keen ear heard a creak; and he sprang up a spinning motionlessness — the Reality before him.

And instantly on the realization of that fact, he was submissive, reverent, as before the very Helmet of Pallas, goddess of Blue; and said he with sullen dejection, reverent of the Helmet, but easy with the man: “All right: you’ve beat me...I suppose it’s that Regent-stabbing affair brought you: it was I did it all right”.

When they went down, almost from the door a crowd gathered, pressing close, Harris’ hands and front all red from O’Hara’s throat; and when one policeman, big with the fact, whispered a gentleman: “You may have heard, sir, that the Regent was stabbed to-day — it’s been kept precious dark, but the fact’s so: this is the beauty as done it”, like loosened effluvia that news flew — but distorted, largened — the stains were Regent’s blood! — and beyond measure had the crowd spread ere it reached the Edgware Road.

There at the corner, as the officers looked about for a cab, and one blew a whistle, a man reached out and fiercely struck Harris on the face, while another shouted: “Lynch the beggar!”; and now arose a hustling, huddled impulses, and now in full vogue that grave noising of congregations when the voice of God jogs them; while Harris, excessively pallid, handcuffed, began to whistle; a number of other police now seeking the crowd's centre, but with difficulty; a cab, too, slowly making a way which closed like water round it: and when this had nearly reached him, Harris, in his eagerness to get in, sprang far toward it — and slipped. He never rose again: the crowd rolled over his last howl, and in the midst of a great row as of hounds, trampled him to a paste.

About that very time that better man whom he had stabbed, in tying up in bed a bundle of old papers, was saying: "Yes, I will go to my people"....

And by six A.M. he was up, in his study, dressed, looking quite owlish with his excess of eyes, which, however, danced at the first news of the morning — the arrival at Portsmouth of the Boodah II., which had raced like a carrier-bird since 8.30 P.M. of the 29th, full of the news of the vanished Mahomet: on her being 200 marines.

After that he spoke through the telephone with various Government-offices, early astir that morning, till the Private Secretary looked in with the announcement that his train would be ready in ten minutes.

His last act in the Palace was the sending to the Treasurer at Jerusalem, for Miss Frankl, the telegram:

"Be surprised, but believe: I am a Jew."

"RICHARD".

Of the Household some fifty, catching wind of what was toward, offered, even begged, to go with him; but in general he refused, and set out with a suite of only seven.

They reached Hastings at twenty minutes to ten, where, to the disgust of all, the region of Central Station was found crowded; whereupon Sir Francis Yeames held a consultation with a local rector, and a dash was made to a private hotel near the pier.

There, looking from behind window curtains at eleven, Hogarth saw before a paper-shop:

FLIGHT OF THE REGENT

A minute afterwards he started backward from the splintered window.

Everything was known:

LIFE-HISTORY OF THE CONVICT HOGARTH MARVELLOUS DETAILS

The street, to its two vanishing-points, was one scene of hats, mixed with upturned faces: and it was an aggressive crowd that gave out a sound.

Not till noon did the Boodah II. arrive; and then there was no setting out — all the front windows of the house now broken, and in the town a row like the feeding-time of lions, which uttered “coward”, “murderer”, “convict”, “traitor”. Hogarth had been put to bed, the two ladies were in a state of scare, Margaret anon crying on Loveday’s shoulder, declaring that “He” (meaning Frankl) was in the crowd, and coming, coming, boring his way: she had seen him.

At last, near four P.M., a portion of the yard-wall at the back was broken down by the party, Hogarth was raised and dressed, and through the breach the party passed into another back-yard, then made beachward, Hogarth leaning on the arm of Sir Martin Phipps; but they had no sooner come to the Esplanade than they were surrounded, and when, on their attaining the pier, the pier-turnstile was closed against the mob, it was impossible to conceive whence so many missiles came. Once Hogarth stopped, faced round, looked at them, but now a pebble bruised his left temple, and he dropped, fainting.

Caught up by Sir Martin, Loveday, Sir Francis Yeames, and Colonel Lord Hallett of the body-guard, he was hurried, a hanging concave with abandoned head, to the long-waiting boat, and it was in a scurry of escape, out of stroke, that the oarsmen rowed away.

Yonder lay the yacht with her fires banked, and was soon under weigh.

She had started, when a harbour-master's motor-boat was observed giving chase, in her an officer from Scotland Yard who bore a bag, found by means of the key in Frankl's pocket in the Adair Street safe; on its clasp the name "Mahomet", and it contained £850,000: so that the yacht went wealthy on her way.

LI. THE MODEL

THE VOYAGE TO Palestine was marked by two events: one the stoppage at Tarifa, where the five hundred from the Mahomet were, these, when taken on board the Boodah II., making an armed force of 700; and then, toward sunset of the fifth day, a steamer exchanged signals with the Boodah II., enquired after the whereabouts of the Lord of the Sea, received the reply “on board”, and when she stopped it turned out that she had on board a Jewish Petition urging upon Spinoza to come and throw in his lot with them. And here again was that name of Rebekah, spelled now Ribkah.

For the news of his fall — the fact that he was a Jew — had created a mighty stirring in Israel, of wonder, of the pride of race.

By the seventh day the yacht was off the Palestine coast, and Joppa, seated on her cliffs, appeared over a foaming roadstead. But when a landing was effected, they were to hear that there had been a collision on the Jerusalem-Joppa railway, the line blocked, travel suspended; so, as the filthy town was congested, the Royal party took refuge in a great restaurant-tent, set up by a Polish Jew in gaberdine and fur cap, who vociferated invitation at the door. All was mud, beggary, narrowness, chaos, picturesque woe. Yet work had commenced: between the upper and the nether millstone a woman ground corn at a doorway; the camel passed loaded; the dragoman went with quicker step. In the afternoon Spinoza, wandering beyond the outskirts of the town, saw in an orange-grove, sitting before a roofless hut, six diligent two-handed Jews exhaustively drawing the cord of the cobbler; further still, and saw what could only have been a Petticoat-Lane Jew ploughing with a little cow and a camel: and he smiled, thanking God, and taking courage — had always loved this land.

The next morning he procured a number of clumsy waggons, with horses, asses, camels, and provisions; and his caravan set out, to travel all day over a plain, a “goodly land,” the almond-tree in blossom, orange and olive, everywhere lilies, the scarlet anemone, he considering himself so familiar with the way, that he was their only guide, though the morning was misty; and through the plain of Sharon they wended over the worst roads in existence, until, passing into a country of rocks, they made out afar the mountains of Judāʾa, whose patches of white stone look like snow in sunshine, on the roads streams of wayfarers, tending all eastward to Jerusalem, lines of camels and waggons, pedestrians with wine-skins, mother and sucking child on the solitary ass, and the Bedouin troop; but Spinoza was all solitary among fastnesses on the third forenoon when he muttered nervously: “I must certainly have lost the way”.

Thereupon he called halt, and the caravan turned back to re-find the road, Spinoza prying on camel-back foremost, clad now in the caftan and white robes of the Orient.

But all day the caravan wandered out of the track in a white sea of mist: no farmstead, nor cot, but the wild vine, and the wild fig, and twice a telegraph-tree, still with its bark on, and the abandoned hold of a bandit-sheik. Finally, near six P.M., Spinoza, finding himself in a valley-bottom, sent out the order to pitch camp: upon which the tents were fixed near a brook, waggons grouped around, and animals picketed to grass. Spinoza, the two ladies, and Loveday, then ate together at the door of one tent; after which he rose and strolled away, thinking how best to handle this crab of Israel.

He noticed that the mist was lifting a little; and suddenly, as he strolled, he stood still, listening: for remote tones of singing or mourning seemed to meet his ear — from the west: and in some moments more he saw the Mount of Olives — to the west, not, as he believed that it must be, to the east, he having, in fact, in losing his way from the coast, passed by Jerusalem to the north; and on the other side of the Mount of Olives, from its foot to the Brook Kedron, spread at that moment over the Valley of Jehosophat an innumerable multitude, covered in praying-shawls, many prostrate, many with the keen and stressful face of supplication lifted in appeal to God, that He would visit His people, and turn again in this latter day to His lost and helpless flock. Every child of Israel who could contrive it, at whatever cost, was there, since it was the prophesied day of— “the Coming”.

But a bold woman, summoning her fainting strength, bracing her trembling knee, stepped a little up the hillside to fling high her hand as a sign — Rebecca Frankl, celebrated now through Israel as the elect of the sibyl Estrella; and at that signal the congregation, gazing keenly into heaven, lifted up their voice in meek song, singing the sibyl’s “Hymn to the Messiah”:

“The oceans trudge and tire their soul, desiring Thee; and night-winds homeless roam with dole, reproaching Thee; the clouds aspire, and find no goal, and gush for Thee, reproaching Thee.”

“Thou scrawled’st ‘I mean’ in rocks and men, in trends and streams; the prophets raved, to sages’ ken Thou shewed’st dreams; Thou shrouded’st dark the How and When in starry schemes, and trends and streams.”

“The jungles blare, the glebe-lands low and bleat for Thee; the generations rage and go, agaze for Thee; creation travaileth in woe, with groans for Thee, agaze for Thee.”

“Adonai, come! with crashing rattle of chariots come; or moonlight-mild, alone, afloat, Messussah, come; with floods of lutes, or thundering throat, but come! O, come! Messussah come.”

“The Arctics hawk-up their haunted heart, and raucous, spue; and north-winds, wawling calls, outstart, to droop anew; the clouds like scouts updart, depart, and truceless do, and droop anew.”

“How long! They breeds have waited fain what sibyls ween; Thou scribbled’st in their secret brain ‘I scheme; I mean’; the constellations stray and strain: Break out! be seen what sibyls ween”.

“The pampas stamp and, nomad, low, reposeless, lone; raging the generations trow, and drudge, and drown; a anguished glance this latter woe throws to Thy Throne, reposeless, lone”...

Before them, above them, as they sang stood — a man.

Hard by a wall of that Moslem mosque, once a chapel which marked the supposed spot of “the Ascension”, he stood, in an attitude of suspense, astonishment, his body half-twisted — Spinoza.

An instant, and he was aware of Jerusalem lying “as a city that is compact” before him — not to the east — to the west! Yet another instant, and he realized that the whole tract of humanity — man, woman, child — was on its face before him.

A faintness overcame him, shame, dismay; then, his blood now rushing to his brow, his mouth sent out the passionate shout:

“Not to me! Not to me! I am the Lord of the Sea....!”

But when the people heard this, saw him, knew him, they remained in adoration....

By a special ship they had sent him a petition to come; here he was weeks sooner than ship or airship could have conveyed him: and they took him as the answer to their supplication, the answer which Heaven willed, in the sure and certain faith that he would cure their ache, and the ache of the world.

An acclamation like the voice of many waters arose and rolled below him, and on the bosom of that tumult he moved among them into the Holy City, as darkness covered all.

* * * * *

He took the title of Shophet, or Judge, and for sixty years ruled over Israel.

It has been said that the initial “pull” over other nations possessed by Israel (in respect of the sea-forts remaining in the Gulf of Aden, Yellow Sea, Western Pacific) was the cause of his rise as of some thrice-ardent Star of the Morning and asterisk dancing in the dawn’s dark: for the other nations, timorous of one another, made never an attempt to build; but, for our share, we insist that anyway JudĀ’la was bound to become what she became — indeed, sea-rent after the Regency collapse was decreased at the three forts, and suddenly in the twelfth year of his judgeship Spinoza ordered its stoppage.

By which period the University of Jerusalem had become the chief nerve-centre of the world’s research and upward effort: for in creating a “civilized State”— “proud and happy” — Spinoza did it with that spinning rapidity of the modernization of Japan, so that in whatever respects it was not a question of months, it was a question of not many years.

For, as in the soul of the Jewish people abode as before that genius for righteousness which wrote the Bible, and as the soul of righteousness lies even in this; Thou shalt not steal, therefore Israel with some little pain attained to this: whereupon with startling emphasis was brought to pass that statement: “Righteousness exalteth a nation”.

For the promise says: “I will put a new spirit within them”; and this — very rapidly — found fulfilment.

Whereupon others fast, faster, found fulfilment, so that a stale and bitter word was in Pall Mall, saying: “The lot of them seem to have formed themselves into a syndicate to run the prophecies”.

Again the promise has it: “I shall be with them”; and again: “They shall be a cleansed nation”; and again: “They shall fear Him”.

The transformation was rapid for the reason that it was natural, seeing that it had been Europe only that, like a Circe, had bewitched them into bestial shapes, “sharks”, and “bulls”, and “bears”, medieval Jews, for example, having been debarred from every pursuit save commerce: so that Shylock was obliged to turn into a Venetian; and, in ceasing to be a Hebrew, became more Venetian than the Venetians, for the reason that he had more brains, ready to beat them at any game they cared to mention; but the genuine self of Shylock was a vine-dresser or sandal-maker, as Hillel was a wood-chopper, David a shepherd, Amos a fig-gatherer, Saul an ass-driver, Rabbi Ben Zakkai a sail-maker, Paul a tent-maker: so that the return to simplicity and honesty was quickly accomplished.

And now, that done, behold a wonder: at the whirling of a wand the swine of Circe converted back to biped man; whereupon without fail whatsoever he does it shall astonishingly prosper: that succession of wits, seers, savants, Heines, Einsteins, inspired mouths, pens of iridium, brushes from the archangel’s plumage, discoveries, new Americas, elations, sensations — in therapeutics — in aero-nautics-beyond-the-atmosphere — in the powers involved in sub-atoms — in the powers, latent till now, involved in soul...for now each of millions was free to think, free to manifest his own particular luck and knack in discovery, having a country, foothold, not hovering like Noah’s dove, urging still the purposeless wing not to pitch into nowhere: for the promise says: “Ye shall not sow and another reap, ye shall not plant and another garner”, but in a land of gentlemen ye shall live, as it were to swellings of music, while a noble height grows upon your smooth foreheads, and the sum-total of the blending movements of your bodies and brains shall, as seen from heaven, appear the minuet of a people.

Within forty years mighty works had been done: forts, irrigation of deserts, reclamation of the Dead Sea, passionate temples clapped to the lower clouds about the perpetual lamp, and that baroque Art of the Orient which at the Judges progresses in Summer through the country would draw multitudes of foreigners to gape at so great pomp, at Corinthian cities full of grace and riches which had arisen to crown with many crowns that plain of Mesopotamia, and where desolate Tyre had mourned her purples, and old Tadmor in the Wilderness (Palmyra) had sat in dirt; to gape, too, at a Jerusalem which in twenty years had crossed the Valley of Jehosophat, and might really then be called “the Golden”, a purged Babylon, a London burnt to ashes and rebuilt somewhere else: for the Shophet proved true Duke and Leader, born mountaineer, climbing from pinnacle to wild pinnacle, becking his people after him with many a meaningful gesture skyward and suggesting smile; and Israel followed his thrilling way, hearing always the Excelsior of his calling as it were the voice direct of Heaven. What no merits of his could give, the land which he had chosen gave, Mesopotamia pretty soon proving herself a treasury of mineral riches: here is bdellium and the onyx-stone; and where the streaming Pison, dawdling, draws his twine of waters over that happy valley of Havilah, there is gold — hoard stored from before the Eozoic, as misers bury for their heirs, in mine and friable quarry, rollick rain: “and the gold of that land is good”.

Here was not merely progress, but progress at increasing speed — acceleration — finally resembling flight, as of eagle or phoenix, eye fixed on the sun: Tyre by the fiftieth year having grown into the biggest of ports, her quays unloading 6,700,000 tons a year, mart of tangled masts, felucca, galiot, junk, cargoes of Tarshish and the Isles, Levantine stuffs, spice from the Southern Sea; while Jerusalem had grown into the recognized school of the wealthier youth of Europe, Asia and America.

For it says: “The Kings of the earth shall bring their honour and glory unto her”; and again: “She shall reign gloriously”.

And not Israel alone reaped the fruits of his own fine weather, but his dew fell wide. For it says: “They shall be as dew from the Lord”; and again: “They shall fill the face of the earth with fruit”; and again: “All nations shall call them blessed”.

And so it was: for the example of Israel, his suasive charm, proved compelling as sunshine to shoots, so that that heart of Spinoza lived to see the spectacle of a whole world deserting the gory path of Rome to go up into those uplands of mildness and gleefulness whither invites the smile of that lily Galilean.

The mission of “unbelieving” Israel was to convert Christendom to Christianity: and this he did.

We watch the Judge coming down the Mount of Olives in the midst of a jubilant throng all involved in a noise of timbrels and instruments of music: for his life was simple and one with the life of his people. It is evening, all the west yonder a bewitched Kingdom charm-embathed, wherein a barge of Venus bethronged with loves and roses voyages on a sea of dalliance en route for the last Beatific — the last, the seventh, Heaven — whitherward gads all a pilgrim-swarm of enraptured spirits, all, all thitherward, Paul caught up with clothes aflaut, and soaring eagle, Enoch transfigured, green hippogriff, hop of squatted frog; and thitherward trots with blinkings, bleating, the Ram of the Golden Fleece, the flagrant flamingos flap and go.

The Judge, hoary-headed now, in a robe of cloth-of-silver which rippled, had but now got home from a Pilgrimage; and the time was Simcath Torah, the Rejoicing of the Law, and the carrying of Candles, in the month. Tishri: silver his robe and silver his hair that hung round a brown and puckered skin, but silvery, too, his every tooth still, and his vigour good; and, as down the Mount of Olives he stepped, he saw Mount Sion and that Temple that he had piled, across whose roughened frontispiece of gold glowed in a bow, bold like the rainbow's, in characters of blazing sapphire and chrysoprase, that inscription:

“Y’HOVAH B’KOKMAR YSAD ARETS, CONEN SHAMAIM

and, as he saw it, lo, buoyancy caught the old man's feet: for the cymballing and music had grown very fiercely hot, so that all the congregation reeled in dance; and as the lasso drops round the astonished prairie-horse and draws asprawl, so dancing caught and drew his foot, and he danced.

And his wife Rebecca, mother of many sons, prying from a window-lattice, writhed odd the eyebrows of the cynic, one beyond the other: for not with foot alone he danced, but his wrung belly laboured in that travail of Orient dancing; and she turned and smiled to Margaret Loveday a turned-down smile, implying shrug, implying girding, her eyelids lowered, yet indulgent of his nature's rage.

And not with foot and abdomen alone he danced, but his two balancing palms danced to the beat of the heat of the music's heart; and with heel and toe he danced. And as he danced, he sang, all apant, filling up with nonsense-sounds when the rhythm's imperative tramp outran his improvisation; and singing he danced, and dancing sang: with abdomen and arms he danced, and with toe and heel he danced.

And dancing he sang:

My hands,

be dancing to God,

your Guide,

And peal my pipes,

and riot my feet,

and writhe to His Heat,

my tripes.

So fair!

With Rum-te-te-Tum

te Tum,

And Rum and Tum,

and Rum-te-te-Tum,

and Rum-te-te-Tum,

te Tum.

So fair!

This freehold for seraphs free!

That flame! those skies!

and Blest is Her Name, and blest are my eyes,

that see.

I'll dance,

I'll dance like a ram,

for fun,

I'll smack the sun,

I'll dance at the breeze

I'll dance till I breed a son.

For Thou!

Thou bringest Thine ends to pass:

This hump so high,
this lump and her sigh,
Thou lead'st through the Needle's Eye.

'Tis well
the saurians sprawled, and roared!

'Tis well Thou art! and well that Thou wast, and well when at last they soared!

And well,
O well that Thou art to be

When seraph hearts will laugh by this brook, and break for the love of Thee.

Thy years shall still by increase te Tum,

And dance and dance,
With Rum-te-te-Tum....

so, singing, he danced, and, dancing, sang; and their sounds grew faint; and they entered into the City of Glory, and their sounds failed....

They took him for the Sent of Heaven, nor did the results of his glorious reign gainsay such a notion: the good Loveday, indeed, had the agreeable fancy that our greatest are really One, who eternally runs the circle of incarnation after incarnation from hoary old ages till now — the Ancient of Days, his hair white like wool, quietly turning up anew when the time yearns, and men are near to yield to the enemy: Proteus his name, and ever the shape he takes is strange, unexpected, yet ever sharing the same three traits of vision, rage and generousness — the Slayer of the Giant — Arthur come back — the Messenger of the Covenant — the genius of our species — Jesus the Oft-Born.

The Purple Cloud first appeared between January and June 1901 as a serial in The Royal Magazine, a highly successful monthly literary magazine established in 1898 by Sir Arthur Pearson. The novel was published in book form by Chatto and Windus in September of that year; it was a longer version of the novel than the one released in serialisation. Shiel would alter the text once more in the 1920's, not changing the plot, but making the language more concise. The novel is the author's best known and most critically acclaimed work; it is part of the first series of 'future history' science fiction works published in English and it was greatly admired by H. G. Wells.

The Purple Cloud is a 'last man' apocalyptic novel, which imagines the destruction of civilisation on earth with the exception of one man. The man in question is Adam Jeffson, who goes on an expedition to the North Pole, despite a prophesy predicting that this will result in a terrible fate. He soon discovers death everywhere and sees a mysterious purple cloud engulfing the sky. Jeffson begins to descend into madness, wishing to destroy the last remnants of human endeavour or decency. However, when he stumbles upon what appears to be another survivor of the apocalypse, he begins to view himself and his responsibilities in a new light.

The novel went on to inspire the 1959 American doomsday film, The World, the Flesh and the Devil, directed by Ranald MacDougall and starring Harry Belafonte and Inger Stevens. It was commercially and critically unsuccessful and resulted in a financial loss for the studio and investors.

INTRODUCTION

ABOUT THREE MONTHS ago — that is to say, toward the end of May of this year of 1900 — the writer whose name appears on the title-page received as noteworthy a letter, and packet of papers, as it has been his lot to examine. They came from a very good friend of mine, whose name there is no reason that I should now conceal — Dr. Arthur Lister Browne, M.A. (Oxon.), F.R.C.P. It happened that for two years I had been spending most of my time in France, and as Browne had a Norfolk practice, I had not seen him during my visits to London. Moreover, though our friendship was of the most intimate kind, we were both atrocious correspondents: so that only two notes passed between us during those years.

Till, last May, there reached me the letter — and the packet — to which I refer. The packet consisted of four note-books, quite crowded throughout with those giddy shapes of Pitman's shorthand, whose ensemble so resembles startled swarms hovering in flighty poses on the wing. They were scribbled in pencil, with little distinction between thick and thin strokes, few vowels: so that their slow deciphering, I can assure the reader, has been no holiday. The letter also was pencilled in shorthand; and this letter, together with the second of the note-books which I have deciphered (it was marked 'III.'), I now publish.

[I must say, however, that in some five instances there will occur sentences rather crutched by my own guess-work; and in two instances the characters were so impossibly mystical, that I had to abandon the passage with a head-ache. But all this will be found immaterial to the general narrative.]

The following is Browne's letter:

'DEAR OLD SHIEL, — I have just been lying thinking of you, and wishing that you were here to give one a last squeeze of the hand before I—"go": for, by all appearance, "going" I am. Four days ago, I began to feel a soreness in the throat, and passing by old Johnson's surgery at Selbridge, went in and asked him to have a look at me. He muttered something about membranous laryngitis which made me smile, but by the time I reached home I was hoarse, and not smiling: before night I had dyspnoca and laryngeal stridor. I at once telegraphed to London for Morgan, and, between him and Johnson, they have been opening my trachea, and burning my inside with chromic acid and the galvanic cautery. The difficulty as to breathing has subsided, and it is wonderful how little I suffer: but I am much too old a hand not to know what's what: the bronchi are involved — too far involved — and as a matter of absolute fact, there isn't any hope. Morgan is still, I believe, fondly dwelling upon the possibility of adding me to his successful-tracheotomy statistics, but prognosis was always my strong point, and I say No. The very small consolation of my death will be the beating of a specialist in his own line. So we shall see.

'I have been arranging some of my affairs this morning, and remembered these notebooks. I intended letting you have them months ago, but my habit of putting things off, and the fact that the lady was alive from whom I took down the words, prevented me. Now she is dead, and as a literary man, and a student of life, you should be interested, if you can manage to read them. You may even find them valuable.

'I am under a little morphia at present, propped up in a nice little state of languor, and as I am able to write without much effort, I will tell you in the old Pitman's something about her. Her name was Miss Mary Wilson; she was about thirty when I met her, forty-five when she died, and I knew her intimately all those fifteen years. Do you know anything about the philosophy of the hypnotic trance? Well, that was the relation between us — hypnotist and subject. She had been under another man before my time, but no one was ever so successful with her as I. She suffered from tic douloureux of the fifth nerve. She had had most of her teeth drawn before I saw her, and an attempt had been made to wrench out the nerve on the left side by the external scission. But it made no difference: all the clocks in hell tick-tacked in that poor woman's jaw, and it was the mercy of Providence that ever she came across me. My organisation was found to have almost complete, and quite easy, control over hers, and with a few passes I could expel her Legion.

‘Well, you never saw anyone so singular in personal appearance as my friend, Miss Wilson. Medicine-man as I am, I could never behold her suddenly without a sensation of shock: she suggested so inevitably what we call “the other world,” one detecting about her some odour of the worm, with the feeling that here was rather ghost than woman. And yet I can hardly convey to you the why of this, except by dry details as to the contours of her lofty brow, meagre lips, pointed chin, and ashen cheeks. She was tall and deplorably emaciated, her whole skeleton, except the thigh-bones, being quite visible. Her eyes were of the bluish hue of cigarette smoke, and had in them the strangest, feeble, unearthly gaze; while at thirty-five her paltry wisp of hair was quite white.

‘She was well-to-do, and lived alone in old Wooding Manor-house, five miles from Ash Thomas. As you know, I was “beginning” in these parts at the time, and soon took up my residence at the manor. She insisted that I should devote myself to her alone; and that one patient constituted the most lucrative practice which I ever had.

‘Well, I quickly found that, in the state of trance, Miss Wilson possessed very remarkable powers: remarkable, I mean, not, of course, because peculiar to herself in kind, but because they were so constant, reliable, exact, and far-reaching, in degree. The veriest fledgling in psychical science will now sit and discourse finically to you about the reporting powers of the mind in its trance state — just as though it was something quite new! This simple fact, I assure you, which the Psychical Research Society, only after endless investigation, admits to be scientific, has been perfectly well known to every old crone since the Middle Ages, and, I assume, long previously. What an unnecessary air of discovery! The certainty that someone in trance in Manchester can tell you what is going on in London, or in Pekin, was not, of course, left to the acumen of an office in Fleet Street; and the society, in establishing the fact beyond doubt for the general public, has not gone one step toward explaining it. They have, in fact, revealed nothing that many of us did not, with absolute assurance, know before.

‘But talking of poor Miss Wilson, I say that her powers were remarkable, because, though not exceptional in genre, they were so special in quantity, — so “constant,” and “far-reaching.” I believe it to be a fact that, in general, the powers of trance manifest themselves more particularly with regard to space, as distinct from time: the spirit roams in the present — it travels over a plain — it does not usually attract the interest of observers by great ascents, or by great descents. I fancy that is so. But Miss Wilson’s gift was special to this extent, that she travelled in every direction, and easily in all but one, north and south, up and down, in the past, the present, and the future.

This I discovered, not at once, but gradually. She would emit a stream of sounds in the trance state — I can hardly call it speech, so murmurous, yet guttural, was the utterance, mixed with puffy breath-sounds at the languid lips. This state was accompanied by an intense contraction of the pupils, absence of the knee-jerk, considerable rigor, and a rapt and arrant expression. I got into the habit of sitting long hours at her bed-side, quite fascinated by her, trying to catch the import of that opiate and visionary language which came puffing and fluttering in deliberate monotone from her lips. Gradually, in the course of months, my ear learned to detect the words; “the veil was rent” for me also; and I was able to follow somewhat the course of her musing and wandering spirit.

At the end of six months I heard her one day repeat some words which were familiar to me. They were these: “Such were the arts by which the Romans extended their conquests, and attained the palm of victory; and the concurring testimony of different authors enables us to describe them with precision...” I was startled: they are part of Gibbon’s “Decline and Fall,” which I easily guessed that she had never read.

I said in a stern voice: “Where are you?”

She replied, “Us are in a room, eight hundred and eleven miles above. A man is writing. Us are reading.”

I may tell you two things: first, that in trance she never spoke of herself as “I,” nor even as “we,” but, for some unknown reason, in the objective way, as “us”: “us are,” she would say— “us will,” “us went”; though, of course, she was an educated lady, and I don’t think ever lived in the West of England, where they say “us” in that way; secondly, when wandering in the past, she always represented herself as being “above” (the earth?), and higher the further back in time she went; in describing present events she appears to have felt herself on (the earth); while, as regards the future, she invariably declared that “us” were so many miles “within” (the earth).

To her excursions in this last direction, however, there seemed to exist certain fixed limits: I say seemed, for I cannot be sure, and only mean that, in spite of my efforts, she never, in fact, went far in this direction. Three, four thousand “miles” were common figures on her lips in describing her distance “above”; but her distance “within” never got beyond sixty-three. Usually, she would say twenty, twenty-five. She appeared, in relation to the future, to resemble a diver in the deep sea, who, the deeper he strives, finds a more resistant pressure, till, at no great depth, resistance becomes prohibition, and he can no further strive.

‘I am afraid I can’t go on: though I had a good deal to tell you about this lady. During fifteen years, off and on, I sat listening by her dim bed-side to her murmuring trances! At last my expert ear could detect the sense of her faintest sigh. I heard the “Decline and Fall” from beginning to end. Some of her reports were the most frivolous nonsense: over others I have hung in a horror of interest. Certainly, my friend, I have heard some amazing words proceed from those wan lips of Mary Wilson. Sometimes I could hitch her repeatedly to any scene or subject that I chose by the mere exercise of my will; at others, the flighty waywardness of her spirit eluded and baffled me: she resisted — she disobeyed: otherwise I might have sent you, not four note-books, but twenty, or forty. About the fifth year it struck me that it would be well to jot down her more connected utterances, since I knew shorthand.

The note-book marked “I.,” which seems to me the most curious, belongs to the seventh year. Its history, like those of the other three, is this: I heard her one afternoon murmuring in the intonation used when reading; the matter interested me; I asked her where she was. She replied: “Us are forty-five miles within: us read, and another writes”]; from which I concluded that she was some fifteen to thirty years in the future, perusing an as yet unpublished work. After that, during some weeks, I managed to keep her to the same subject, and finally, I fancy, won pretty well the whole work. I believe you would find it striking, and hope you will be able to read my notes.

[The present writer may add that Dr. Browne’s prognosis of his own case proved correct, for he passed away two days after writing the above. My transcription of the shorthand book marked ‘III.’ I now proceed to give without comment, merely reminding the reader that the words form the substance of a book or document to be written, or to be motived (according to Miss Wilson) in that Future, which, no less than the Past, substantively exists in the Present — though, like the Past, we see it not. I need only add that the title, division into paragraphs, &c., have been arbitrarily contrived by myself for the sake of form and convenience.]

[This I intend to publish under the title of ‘The Last Miracle; ‘II.’ will bear that of ‘The Lord of the Sea’; the present book is marked ‘III.’ The perusal of ‘IV.’ I have yet finished, but so far do not consider it suitable for publication.]

(Here begins the note-book marked ‘III.’)

THE PURPLE CLOUD

WELL, THE MEMORY seems to be getting rather impaired now, rather weak. What, for instance, was the name of that parson who preached, just before the Boreal set out, about the wickedness of any further attempt to reach the North Pole? I have forgotten! Yet four years ago it was familiar to me as my own name.

Things which took place before the voyage seem to be getting a little cloudy in the memory now. I have sat here, in the loggia of this Cornish villa, to write down some sort of account of what has happened — God knows why, since no eye can ever read it — and at the very beginning I cannot remember the parson's name.

He was a strange sort of man surely, a Scotchman from Ayrshire, big and gaunt, with tawny hair. He used to go about London streets in shough and rough-spun clothes, a plaid flung from one shoulder. Once I saw him in Holborn with his rather wild stalk, frowning and muttering to himself. He had no sooner come to London, and opened chapel (I think in Fetter Lane), than the little room began to be crowded; and when, some years afterwards, he moved to a big establishment in Kensington, all sorts of men, even from America and Australia, flocked to hear the thunderstorms that he talked, though certainly it was not an age apt to fly into enthusiasms over that species of pulpit prophets and prophecies. But this particular man undoubtedly did wake the strong dark feelings that sleep in the heart; his eyes were very singular and powerful; his voice from a whisper ran gathering, like snow-balls, and crashed, as I have heard the pack-ice in commotion far yonder in the North; while his gestures were as uncouth and gawky as some wild man's of the primitive ages.

Well, this man — what was his name? — Macintosh? Mackay? I think — yes, that was it! Mackay. Mackay saw fit to take offence at the new attempt to reach the Pole in the Boreal; and for three Sundays, when the preparations were nearing completion, stormed against it at Kensington.

The excitement of the world with regard to the North Pole had at this date reached a pitch which can only be described as fevered, though that word hardly expresses the strange ecstasy and unrest which prevailed: for the abstract interest which mankind, in mere desire for knowledge, had always felt in this unknown region, was now, suddenly, a thousand and a thousand times intensified by a new, concrete interest — a tremendous money interest.

And the new zeal had ceased to be healthy in its tone as the old zeal was: for now the fierce demon Mammon was making his voice heard in this matter.

Within the ten years preceding the Boreal expedition, no less than twenty-seven expeditions had set out, and failed.

The secret of this new rage lay in the last will and testament of Mr. Charles P. Stickney of Chicago, that king of faddists, supposed to be the richest individual who ever lived: he, just ten years before the Boreal undertaking, had died, bequeathing 175 million dollars to the man, of whatever nationality, who first reached the Pole.

Such was the actual wording of the will— 'the man who first reached': and from this loose method of designating the person intended had immediately burst forth a prolonged heat of controversy in Europe and America as to whether or no the testator meant the Chief of the first expedition which reached: but it was finally decided, on the highest legal authority, that, in any case, the actual wording of the document held good: and that it was the individual, whatever his station in the expedition, whose foot first reached the 90th degree of north latitude, who would have title to the fortune.

At all events, the public ferment had risen, as I say, to a pitch of positive fever; and as to the Boreal in particular, the daily progress of her preparations was minutely discussed in the newspapers, everyone was an authority on her fitting, and she was in every mouth a bet, a hope, a jest, or a sneer: for now, at last, it was felt that success was probable. So this Mackay had an acutely interested audience, if a somewhat startled, and a somewhat cynical, one.

A truly lion-hearted man this must have been, after all, to dare proclaim a point-of-view so at variance with the spirit of his age! One against four hundred millions, they bent one way, he the opposite, saying that they were wrong, all wrong! People used to call him 'John the Baptist Redivivus': and without doubt he did suggest something of that sort. I suppose that at the time when he had the face to denounce the Boreal there was not a sovereign on any throne in Europe who, but for shame, would have been glad of a subordinate post on board.

On the third Sunday night of his denunciation I was there in that Kensington chapel, and I heard him. And the wild talk he talked! He seemed like a man delirious with inspiration.

The people sat quite spell-bound, while Mackay's prophesying voice ranged up and down through all the modulations of thunder, from the hurrying mutter to the reverberant shock and climax: and those who came to scoff remained to wonder.

Put simply, what he said was this: That there was undoubtedly some sort of Fate, or Doom, connected with the Poles of the earth in reference to the human race: that man's continued failure, in spite of continual efforts, to reach them, abundantly and super-abundantly proved this; and that this failure constituted a lesson — and a warning — which the race disregarded at its peril.

The North Pole, he said, was not so very far away, and the difficulties in the way of reaching it were not, on the face of them, so very great: human ingenuity had achieved a thousand things a thousand times more difficult; yet in spite of over half-a-dozen well-planned efforts in the nineteenth century, and thirty-one in the twentieth, man had never reached: always he had been baulked, baulked, by some seeming chance — some restraining Hand: and herein lay the lesson — herein the warning. Wonderfully — really wonderfully — like the Tree of Knowledge in Eden, he said, was that Pole: all the rest of earth lying open and offered to man — but That persistently veiled and 'forbidden.' It was as when a father lays a hand upon his son, with: 'Not here, my child; wheresoever you will — but not here.'

But human beings, he said, were free agents, with power to stop their ears, and turn a callous consciousness to the whispers and warning indications of Heaven; and he believed, he said, that the time was now come when man would find it absolutely in his power to stand on that 90th of latitude, and plant an impious right foot on the head of the earth — just as it had been given into the absolute power of Adam to stretch an impious right hand, and pluck of the Fruit of Knowledge; but, said he — his voice pealing now into one long proclamation of awful augury — just as the abuse of that power had been followed in the one case by catastrophe swift and universal, so, in the other, he warned the entire race to look out thenceforth for nothing from God but a lowering sky, and thundery weather.

The man's frantic earnestness, authoritative voice, and savage gestures, could not but have their effect upon all; as for me, I declare, I sat as though a messenger from Heaven addressed me. But I believe that I had not yet reached home, when the whole impression of the discourse had passed from me like water from a duck's back. The Prophet in the twentieth century was not a success. John Baptist himself, camel-skin and all, would, have met with only tolerant shrugs. I dismissed Mackay from my mind with the thought: 'He is behind his age, I suppose.'

But haven't I thought differently of Mackay since, my God...?

Three weeks — it was about that — before that Sunday night discourse, I was visited by Clark, the chief of the coming expedition — a mere visit of friendship. I had then been established about a year at No. II, Harley Street, and, though under twenty-five, had, I suppose, as élite a practice as any doctor in Europe.

Élite — but small. I was able to maintain my state, and move among the great: but now and again I would feel the secret pinch of moneylessness. Just about that time, in fact, I was only saved from considerable embarrassment by the success of my book, 'Applications of Science to the Arts.'

In the course of conversation that afternoon, Clark said to me in his light hap-hazard way:

'Do you know what I dreamed about you last night, Adam Jeffson? I dreamed that you were with us on the expedition.'

I think he must have seen my start: on the same night I had myself dreamed the same thing; but not a word said I about it now. There was a stammer in my tongue when I answered:

'Who? I? — on the expedition? — I would not go, if I were asked.'

'Oh, you would.'

'I wouldn't. You forget that I am about to be married.'

‘Well, we need not discuss the point, as Peters is not going to die,’ said he. ‘Still, if anything did happen to him, you know, it is you I should come straight to, Adam Jeffson.’

‘Clark, you jest,’ I said: ‘I know really very little of astronomy, or magnetic phenomena. Besides, I am about to be married....’

‘But what about your botany, my friend? There’s what we should be wanting from you: and as for nautical astronomy, poh, a man with your scientific habit would pick all that up in no time.’

‘You discuss the matter as gravely as though it were a possibility, Clark,’ I said, smiling. ‘Such a thought would never enter my head: there is, first of all, my fiancée — —’

‘Ah, the all-important Countess, eh? — Well, but she, as far as I know the lady, would be the first to force you to go. The chance of stamping one’s foot on the North Pole does not occur to a man every day, my son.’

‘Do talk of something else!’ I said. ‘There is Peters....’

‘Well, of course, there is Peters. But believe me, the dream I had was so clear — —’

‘Let me alone with your dreams, and your Poles!’ I laughed.

Yes, I remember: I pretended to laugh loud! But my secret heart knew, even then, that one of those crises was occurring in my life which, from my youth, has made it the most extraordinary which any creature of earth ever lived. And I knew that this was so, firstly, because of the two dreams, and secondly, because, when Clark was gone, and I was drawing on my gloves to go to see my fiancée, I heard distinctly the old two Voices talk within me: and One said: ‘Go not to see her now!’ and the Other: ‘Yes, go, go!’

The two Voices of my life! An ordinary person reading my words would undoubtedly imagine that I mean only two ordinary contradictory impulses — or else that I rave: for what modern man could comprehend how real-seeming were those voices, how loud, and how, ever and again, I heard them contend within me, with a nearness ‘nearer than breathing,’ as it says in the poem, and ‘closer than hands and feet.’

About the age of seven it happened first to me. I was playing one summer evening in a pine-wood of my father’s; half a mile away was a quarry-cliff; and as I played, it suddenly seemed as if someone said to me, inside of me: ‘Just take a walk toward the cliff’; and as if someone else said: ‘Don’t go that way at all’ — mere whispers then, which gradually, as I grew up, seemed to swell into cries of wrathful contention! I did go toward the cliff: it was steep, thirty feet high, and I fell. Some weeks later, on recovering speech, I told my astonished mother that ‘someone had pushed me’ over the edge, and that someone else ‘had caught me’ at the bottom!

One night, soon after my eleventh birthday, lying in bed, the thought struck me that my life must be of great importance to some thing or things which I could not see; that two Powers, which hated each other, must be continually after me, one wishing for some reason to kill me, and the other for some reason to keep me alive, one wishing me to do so and so, and the other to do the opposite; that I was not a boy like other boys, but a creature separate, special, marked for — something. Already I had notions, touches of mood, passing instincts, as occult and primitive, I verily believe, as those of the first man that stepped; so that such Biblical expressions as ‘The Lord spake to So-and-so, saying’ have hardly ever suggested any question in my mind as to how the Voice was heard: I did not find it so very difficult to comprehend that originally man had more ears than two; nor should have been surprised to know that I, in these latter days, more or less resembled those primeval ones.

But not a creature, except perhaps my mother, has ever dreamed me what I here state that I was. I seemed the ordinary youth of my time, bow in my ‘Varsity eight, cramming for exams., dawdling in clubs. When I had to decide as to a profession, who could have suspected the conflict that transacted itself in my soul, while my brain was indifferent to the matter — that agony of strife with which the brawling voices shouted, the one: ‘Be a scientist — a doctor,’ and the other: ‘Be a lawyer, an engineer, an artist — be anything but a doctor!’

A doctor I became, and went to what had grown into the greatest of medical schools — Cambridge; and there it was that I came across a man, named Scotland, who had a rather odd view of the world. He had rooms, I remember, in the New Court at Trinity, and a set of us were generally there. He was always talking about certain ‘Black’ and ‘White Powers, till it became absurd, and the men used to call him ‘black-and-white-mystery-man,’ because, one day, when someone said something about ‘the black mystery of the universe,’ Scotland interrupted him with the words: ‘the black-and-white mystery.’

Quite well I remember Scotland now — the sweetest, gentle soul he was, with a passion for cats, and Sappho, and the Anthology, very short in stature, with a Roman nose, continually making the effort to keep his neck straight, and draw his paunch in. He used to say that the universe was being frantically contended for by two Powers: a White and a Black; that the White was the stronger, but did not find the conditions on our particular planet very favourable to his success; that he had got the best of it up to the Middle Ages in Europe, but since then had been slowly and stubbornly giving way before the Black; and that finally the Black would win — not everywhere perhaps, but here — and would carry off, if no other earth, at least this one, for his prize.

This was Scotland’s doctrine, which he never tired of repeating; and while others heard him with mere toleration, little could they divine with what agony of inward interest, I, cynically smiling there, drank in his words. Most profound, most profound, was the impression they made upon me.

But I was saying that when Clark left me, I was drawing on my gloves to go to see my fiancée, the Countess Clodagh, when I heard the two voices most clearly.

Sometimes the urgency of one or other impulse is so overpowering, that there is no resisting it: and it was so then with the one that bid me go.

I had to traverse the distance between Harley Street and Hanover Square, and all the time it was as though something shouted at my physical ear: ‘Since you go, breathe no word of the Boreal, and Clark’s visit’; and another shout: ‘Tell, tell, hide nothing!’

It seemed to last a month: yet it was only some minutes before I was in Hanover Square, and Clodagh in my arms.

She was, in my opinion, the most superb of creatures, Clodagh — that haughty neck which seemed always scorning something just behind her left shoulder. Superb! but ah — I know it now — a godless woman, Clodagh, a bitter heart.

Clodagh once confessed to me that her favourite character in history was Lucrezia Borgia, and when she saw my horror, immediately added: ‘Well, no, I am only joking!’ Such was her duplicity: for I see now that she lived in the constant effort to hide her heinous heart from me. Yet, now I think of it, how completely did Clodagh enthrall me!

Our proposed marriage was opposed by both my family and hers: by mine, because her father and grandfather had died in lunatic asylums; and by hers, because, forsooth, I was neither a rich nor a noble match. A sister of hers, much older than herself, had married a common country doctor, Peters of Taunton, and this so-called mésalliance made the so-called mésalliance with me doubly detestable in the eyes of her relatives. But Clodagh's extraordinary passion for me was to be stemmed neither by their threats nor prayers. What a flame, after all, was Clodagh! Sometimes she frightened me.

She was at this date no longer young, being by five years my senior, as also, by five years, the senior of her nephew, born from the marriage of her sister with Peters of Taunton. This nephew was Peter Peters, who was to accompany the Boreal expedition as doctor, botanist, and meteorological assistant.

On that day of Clark's visit to me I had not been seated five minutes with Clodagh, when I said:

'Dr. Clark — ha! ha! ha! — has been talking to me about the Expedition. He says that if anything happened to Peters, I should be the first man he would run to. He has had an absurd dream...'

The consciousness that filled me as I uttered these words was the wickedness of me — the crooked wickedness. But I could no more help it than I could fly.

Clodagh was standing at a window holding a rose at her face. For quite a minute she made no reply. I saw her sharp-cut, florid face in profile, steadily bent and smelling. She said presently in her cold, rapid way:

'The man who first plants his foot on the North Pole will certainly be ennobled. I say nothing of the many millions... I only wish that I was a man!'

'I don't know that I have any special ambition that way,' I rejoined. 'I am very happy in my warm Eden with my Clodagh. I don't like the outer Cold.'

'Don't let me think little of you!' she answered pettishly.

‘Why should you, Clodagh? I am not bound to desire to go to the North Pole, am I?’

‘But you would go, I suppose, if you could?’

‘I might — I — doubt it. There is our marriage....’

‘Marriage indeed! It is the one thing to transform our marriage from a sneaking difficulty to a ten times triumphant event.’

‘You mean if I personally were the first to stand at the Pole. But there are many in an expedition. It is very unlikely that I, personally—’

‘For me you will, Adam—’ she began.

‘“Will,” Clodagh?’ I cried. ‘You say “will”? there is not even the slightest shadow of a probability — !’

‘But why? There are still three weeks before the start. They say...’

She stopped, she stopped.

‘They say what?’

Her voice dropped:

‘That Peter takes atropine.’

Ah, I started then. She moved from the window, sat in a rocking-chair, and turned the leaves of a book, without reading. We were silent, she and I; I standing, looking at her, she drawing the thumb across the leaf-edges, and beginning again, contemplatively. Then she laughed dryly a little — a dry, mad laugh.

‘Why did you start when I said that?’ she asked, reading now at random.

‘I! I did not start, Clodagh! What made you think that I started? I did not start! Who told you, Clodagh, that Peters takes atropine?’

‘He is my nephew: I should know. But don’t look dumbfounded in that absurd fashion: I have no intention of poisoning him in order to see you a multimillionaire, and a Peer of the Realm....’

‘My dearest Clodagh!’

‘I easily might, however. He will be here presently. He is bringing Mr. Wilson for the evening.’ (Wilson was going as electrician of the expedition.)

‘Clodagh.’ I said, ‘believe me, you jest in a manner which does not please me.’

‘Do I really?’ she answered with that haughty, stiff half-turn of her throat: ‘then I must be more exquisite. But, thank Heaven, it is only a jest. Women are no longer admired for doing such things.’

‘Ha! ha! ha! — no — no longer admired, Clodagh! Oh, my good Lord! let us change this talk....’

But now she could talk of nothing else. She got from me that afternoon the history of all the Polar expeditions of late years, how far they reached, by what aids, and why they failed. Her eyes shone; she listened eagerly. Before this time, indeed, she had been interested in the Boreal, knew the details of her outfitting, and was acquainted with several members of the expedition. But now, suddenly, her mind seemed wholly possessed, my mention of Clark’s visit apparently setting her well a-burn with the Pole-fever.

The passion of her kiss as I tore myself from her embrace that day I shall not forget. I went home with a pretty heavy heart.

The house of Dr. Peter Peters was three doors from mine, on the opposite side of the street. Toward one that night, his footman ran to knock me up with the news that Peters was very ill. I hurried to his bed-side, and knew by the first glance at his deliriums and his staring pupils that he was poisoned with atropine. Wilson, the electrician, who had passed the evening with him at Clodagh’s in Hanover Square, was there.

‘What on earth is the matter?’ he said to me.

‘Poisoned,’ I answered.

‘Good God! what with?’

‘Atropine.’

‘Good Heavens!’

‘Don’t be frightened: I think he will recover.’

‘Is that certain?’

‘Yes, I think — that is, if he leaves off taking the drug, Wilson.’

‘What! it is he who has poisoned himself?’

I hesitated, I hesitated. But I said:

‘He is in the habit of taking atropine, Wilson.’

Three hours I remained there, and, God knows, toiled hard for his life: and when I left him in the dark of the fore-day, my mind was at rest: he would recover.

I slept till 11 A.M., and then hurried over again to Peters. In the room were my two nurses, and Clodagh.

My beloved put her forefinger to her lips, whispering:

‘Sh-h-h! he is asleep....’

She came closer to my ear, saying:

‘I heard the news early. I am come to stay with him, till — the last....’

We looked at each other some time — eye to eye, steadily, she and I: but mine dropped before Clodagh’s. A word was on my mouth to say, but I said nothing.

The recovery of Peters was not so steady as I had expected. At the end of the first week he was still prostrate. It was then that I said to Clodagh:

‘Clodagh, your presence at the bed-side here somehow does not please me. It is so unnecessary.’

‘Unnecessary certainly,’ she replied: ‘but I always had a genius for nursing, and a passion for watching the battles of the body. Since no one objects, why should you?’

‘Ah!... I don’t know. This is a case that I dislike. I have half a mind to throw it to the devil.’

‘Then do so.’

‘And you, too — go home, go home, Clodagh!’

‘But why? — if one does no harm. In these days of “the corruption of the upper classes,” and Roman decadence of everything, shouldn’t every innocent whim be encouraged by you upright ones who strive against the tide? Whims are the brakes of crimes: and this is mine. I find a sensuous pleasure, almost a sensual, in dabbling in delicate drugs — like Helen, for that matter, and Medea, and Calypso, and the great antique women, who were all excellent chymists. To study the human ship in a gale, and the slow drama of its foundering — isn’t that a quite thrilling distraction? And I want you to get into the habit at once of letting me have my little way — —’

Now she touched my hair with a lofty playfulness that soothed me: but even then I looked upon the rumpled bed, and saw that the man there was really very sick.

I have still a nausea to write about it! Lucrezia Borgia in her own age may have been heroic: but Lucrezia in this late century! One could retch up the heart...

The man grew sick on that bed, I say. The second week passed, and only ten days remained before the start of the expedition.

At the end of that second week, Wilson, the electrician, was one evening sitting by Peter’s bedside when I entered.

At the moment, Clodagh was about to administer a dose to Peters; but seeing me, she put down the medicine-glass on the night table, and came toward me; and as she came, I saw a sight which stabbed me: for Wilson took up the deposited medicine-glass, elevated it, looked at it, smelled into it: and he did it with a kind of hurried, light-fingered stealth; and he did it with an under-look, and a meaningfulness of expression which, I thought, proved mistrust....

Meantime, Clark came each day. He had himself a medical degree, and about this time I called him in professionally, together with Alleyne of Cavendish Square, to consultation over Peters. The patient lay in a semi-coma broken by passionate vomitings, and his condition puzzled us all. I formally stated that he took atropine — had been originally poisoned by atropine: but we saw that his present symptoms were not atropine symptoms, but, it almost seemed, of some other vegetable poison, which we could not precisely name.

‘Mysterious thing,’ said Clark to me, when we were alone.

‘I don’t understand it,’ I said.

‘Who are the two nurses?’

‘Oh, highly recommended people of my own.’

‘At any rate, my dream about you comes true, Jeffson. It is clear that Peters is out of the running now.’

I shrugged.

‘I now formally invite you to join the expedition,’ said Clark: ‘do you consent?’

I shrugged again.

‘Well, if that means consent,’ he said, ‘let me remind you that you have only eight days, and all the world to do in them.’

This conversation occurred in the dining-room of Peters’ house: and as we passed through the door, I saw Clodagh gliding down the passage outside — rapidly — away from us.

Not a word I said to her that day about Clark’s invitation. Yet I asked myself repeatedly: Did she not know of it? Had she not listened, and heard?

However that was, about midnight, to my great surprise, Peters opened his eyes, and smiled. By noon the next day, his fine vitality, which so fitted him for an Arctic expedition, had re-asserted itself. He was then leaning on an elbow, talking to Wilson, and except his pallor, and strong stomach-pains, there was now hardly a trace of his late approach to death. For the pains I prescribed some quarter-grain tablets of sulphate of morphia, and went away.

Now, David Wilson and I never greatly loved each other, and that very day he brought about a painful situation as between Peters and me, by telling Peters that I had taken his place in the expedition. Peters, a touchy fellow, at once dictated a letter of protest to Clark; and Clark sent Peters' letter to me, marked with a big note of interrogation in blue pencil.

Now, all Peters' preparations were made, mine not; and he had six days in which to recover himself. I therefore wrote to Clark, saying that the changed circumstances of course annulled my acceptance of his offer, though I had already incurred the inconvenience of negotiating with a locum tenens.

This decided it: Peters was to go, I stay. The fifth day before the departure dawned. It was a Friday, the 15th June. Peters was now in an arm-chair. He was cheerful, but with a fevered pulse, and still the stomach-pains. I was giving him three quarter-grains of morphia a day. That Friday night, at 11 P.M., I visited him, and found Clodagh there, talking to him. Peters was smoking a cigar.

'Ah,' Clodagh said, 'I was waiting for you, Adam. I didn't know whether I was to inject anything to-night. Is it Yes or No?'

'What do you think, Peters?' I said: 'any more pains?'

'Well, perhaps you had better give us another quarter,' he answered: 'there's still some trouble in the tummy off and on.'

‘A quarter-grain, then, Clodagh, ‘I said.

As she opened the syringe-box, she remarked with a pout:

‘Our patient has been naughty! He has taken some more atropine.’

I became angry at once.

‘Peters,’ I cried, ‘you know you have no right to be doing things like that without consulting me! Do that once more, and I swear I have nothing further to do with you!’

‘Rubbish,’ said Peters: ‘why all this unnecessary heat? It was a mere flea-bite. I felt that I needed it.’

‘He injected it with his own hand...’ remarked Clodagh.

She was now standing at the mantel-piece, having lifted the syringe-box from the night-table, taken from its velvet lining both the syringe and the vial containing the morphia tablets, and gone to the mantel-piece to melt one of the tablets in a little of the distilled water there. Her back was turned upon us, and she was a long time. I was standing; Peters in his arm-chair, smoking. Clodagh then began to talk about a Charity Bazaar which she had visited that afternoon.

She was long, she was long. The crazy thought passed through some dim region of my soul: ‘Why is she so long?’

‘Ah, that was a pain!’ went Peters: ‘never mind the bazaar, aunt — think of the morphia.’

Suddenly an irresistible impulse seized me — to rush upon her, to dash syringe, tabloids, glass, and all, from her hands. I must have obeyed it — I was on the tip-top point of obeying — my body already leant prone: but at that instant a voice at the opened door behind me said:

‘Well, how is everything?’

It was Wilson, the electrician, who stood there. With lightning swiftness I remembered an under-look of mistrust which I had once seen on his face.

Oh, well, I would not, and could not! — she was my love — I stood like marble...

Clodagh went to meet Wilson with frank right hand, in the left being the fragile glass containing the injection. My eyes were fastened on her face: it was full of reassurance, of free innocence. I said to myself: 'I must surely be mad!'

An ordinary chat began, while Clodagh turned up Peters' sleeve, and, kneeling there, injected his fore-arm. As she rose, laughing at something said by Wilson, the drug-glass dropped from her hand, and her heel, by an apparent accident, trod on it. She put the syringe among a number of others on the mantel-piece.

'Your friend has been naughty, Mr. Wilson,' she said again with that same pout: 'he has been taking more atropine.'

'Not really?' said Wilson.

'Let me alone, the whole of you,' answered Peters: 'I ain't a child.'

These were the last intelligible words he ever spoke. He died shortly before 1 A.M. He had been poisoned by a powerful dose of atropine.

From that moment to the moment when the Boreal bore me down the Thames, all the world was a mere tumbling nightmare to me, of which hardly any detail remains in my memory. Only I remember the inquest, and how I was called upon to prove that Peters had himself injected himself with atropine. This was corroborated by Wilson, and by Clodagh: and the verdict was in accordance.

And in all that chaotic hurry of preparation, three other things only, but those with clear distinctness now, I remember.

The first — and chief — is that tempest of words which I heard at Kensington from that big-mouthed Mackay on the Sunday night. What was it that led me, busy as I was, to that chapel that night? Well, perhaps I know.

There I sat, and heard him: and most strangely have those words of his peroration planted themselves in my brain, when, rising to a passion of prophecy, he shouted: ‘And as in the one case, transgression was followed by catastrophe swift and universal, so, in the other, I warn the entire race to look out thenceforth for nothing from God but a lowering sky, and thundery weather.’

And this second thing I remember: that on reaching home, I walked into my disordered library (for I had had to hunt out some books), where I met my housekeeper in the act of rearranging things. She had apparently lifted an old Bible by the front cover to fling it on the table, for as I threw myself into a chair my eye fell upon the open print near the beginning. The print was very large, and a shaded lamp cast a light upon it. I had been hearing Mackay’s wild comparison of the Pole with the tree of Eden, and that no doubt was the reason why such a start convulsed me: for my listless eyes had chanced to rest upon some words.

‘The woman gave me of the tree, and I did eat....’

And a third thing I remember in all that turmoil of doubt and flurry: that as the ship moved down with the afternoon tide a telegram was put into my hand; it was a last word from Clodagh; and she said only this:

‘Be first — for Me.’

The Boreal left St. Katherine’s Docks in beautiful weather on the afternoon of the 19th June, full of good hope, bound for the Pole.

All about the docks was one region of heads stretched far in innumerable vagueness, and down the river to Woolwich a continuous dull roar and murmur of bees droned from both banks to cheer our departure.

The expedition was partly a national affair, subvented by Government: and if ever ship was well-found it was the Boreal. She had a frame tougher far than any battle-ship's, capable of ramming some ten yards of drift-ice; and she was stuffed with sufficient pemmican, codroe, fish-meal, and so on, to last us not less than six years.

We were seventeen, all told, the five Heads (so to speak) of the undertaking being Clark (our Chief), John Mew (commander), Aubrey Maitland (meteorologist), Wilson (electrician), and myself (doctor, botanist, and assistant meteorologist).

The idea was to get as far east as the 100°, or the 120°, of longitude; to catch there the northern current; to push and drift our way northward; and when the ship could no further penetrate, to leave her (either three, or else four, of us, on ski), and with sledges drawn by dogs and reindeer make a dash for the Pole.

This had also been the plan of the last expedition — that of the Nix — and of several others. The Boreal only differed from the Nix, and others, in that she was a thing of nicer design, and of more exquisite forethought.

Our voyage was without incident up to the end of July, when we encountered a drift of ice-floes. On the 1st August we were at Kabarova, where we met our coal-ship, and took in a little coal for emergency, liquid air being our proper motor; also forty-three dogs, four reindeer, and a quantity of reindeer-moss; and two days later we turned our bows finally northward and eastward, passing through heavy 'slack' ice under sail and liquid air in crisp weather, till, on the 27th August, we lay moored to a floe off the desolate island of Taimur.

The first thing which we saw here was a bear on the shore, watching for young white-fish: and promptly Clark, Mew, and Lamburn (engineer) went on shore in the launch, I and Maitland following in the pram, each party with three dogs.

It was while climbing away inland that Maitland said to me:

‘When Clark leaves the ship for the dash to the Pole, it is three, not two, of us, after all, that he is going to take with him, making a party of four.’

I: ‘Is that so? Who knows?’

Maitland: ‘Wilson does. Clark has let it out in conversation with Wilson.’

I: ‘Well, the more the merrier. Who will be the three?’

Maitland: ‘Wilson is sure to be in it, and there may be Mew, making the third. As to the fourth, I suppose I shall get left out in the cold.’

I: ‘More likely I.’

Maitland: ‘Well, the race is between us four: Wilson, Mew, you and I. It is a question of physical fitness combined with special knowledge. You are too lucky a dog to get left out, Jeffson.’

I: ‘Well, what does it matter, so long as the expedition as a whole is successful? That is the main thing.’

Maitland: ‘Oh yes, that’s all very fine talk, Jeffson! But is it quite sincere? Isn’t it rather a pose to affect to despise $175,000,000? I want to be in at the death, and I mean to be, if I can. We are all more or less self-interested.’

‘Look,’ I whispered— ‘a bear.’

It was a mother and cub: and with determined trudge she came wagging her low head, having no doubt smelled the dogs. We separated on the instant, doubling different ways behind ice-boulders, wanting her to go on nearer the shore, before killing; but, passing close, she spied, and bore down at a trot upon me. I fired into her neck, and at once, with a roar, she turned tail, making now straight in Maitland’s direction. I saw him run out from cover some hundred yards away, aiming his long-gun: but no report followed: and in half a minute he was under her fore-paws, she striking out slaps at the barking, shrinking dogs. Maitland roared for my help: and at that moment, I, poor wretch, in far worse plight than he, stood shivering in ague: for suddenly one of those wrangles of the voices of my destiny was filling my bosom with loud commotion, one urging me to fly to Maitland's aid, one passionately commanding me be still. But it lasted, I believe, some seconds only: I ran and got a shot into the bear's brain, and Maitland leapt up with a rent down his face.

But singular destiny! Whatever I did — if I did evil, if I did good — the result was the same: tragedy dark and sinister! Poor Maitland was doomed that voyage, and my rescue of his life was the means employed to make his death the more certain.

I think that I have already written, some pages back, about a man called Scotland, whom I met at Cambridge. He was always talking about certain 'Black' and 'White' beings, and their contention for the earth. We others used to call him the black-and-white mystery-man, because, one day — but that is no matter now. Well, with regard to all that, I have a fancy, a whim of the mind — quite wide of the truth, no doubt — but I have it here in my brain, and I will write it down now. It is this: that there may have been some sort of arrangement, or understanding, between Black and White, as in the case of Adam and the fruit, that, should mankind force his way to the Pole and the old forbidden secret bidding there, then some mishap should not fail to overtake the race of man; that the White, being kindly disposed to mankind, did not wish this to occur, and intended, for the sake of the race, to destroy our entire expedition before it reached; and that the Black, knowing that the White meant to do this, and by what means, used me — me! — to outwit this design, first of all working that I should be one of the party of four to leave the ship on ski.

But the childish attempt, my God, to read the immense riddle of the world! I could laugh loud at myself, and at poor Black-and-White Scotland, too. The thing can't be so simple.

Well, we left Taimur the same day, and good-bye now to both land and open sea. Till we passed the latitude of Cape Chelyuskin (which we did not sight), it was one succession of ice-belts, with Mew in the crow's-nest tormenting the electric bell to the engine-room, the anchor hanging ready to drop, and Clark taking soundings. Progress was slow, and the Polar night gathered round us apace, as we stole still onward and onward into that blue and glimmering land of eternal frore. We now left off bed-coverings of reindeer-skin and took to sleeping-bags. Eight of the dogs had died by the 25th September, when we were experiencing 19° of frost. In the darkest part of our night, the Northern Light spread its silent solemn banner over us, quivering round the heavens in a million fickle gauds.

The relations between the members of our little crew were excellent — with one exception: David Wilson and I were not good friends.

There was a something — a tone — in the evidence which he had given at the inquest on Peters, which made me mad every time I thought of it. He had heard Peters admit just before death that he, Peters, had administered atropine to himself: and he had had to give evidence of that fact. But he had given it in a most half-hearted way, so much so, that the coroner had asked him: 'What, sir, are you hiding from me?' Wilson had replied: 'Nothing. I have nothing to tell.'

And from that day he and I had hardly exchanged ten words, in spite of our constant companionship in the vessel; and one day, standing alone on a floe, I found myself hissing with clenched fist: 'If he dared suspect Clodagh of poisoning Peters, I could kill him!'

Up to 78° of latitude the weather had been superb, but on the night of the 7th October — well I remember it — we experienced a great storm. Our tub of a ship rolled like a swing, drenching the whimpering dogs at every lurch, and hurling everything on board into confusion. The petroleum-launch was washed from the davits; down at one time to 40° below zero sank the thermometer; while a high aurora was whiffed into a dishevelled chaos of hues, resembling the smeared palette of some turbulent painter of the skies, or mixed battle of long-robed seraphim, and looking the very symbol of tribulation, tempest, wreck, and distraction. I, for the first time, was sick.

It was with a dizzy brain, therefore, that I went off watch to my bunk. Soon, indeed, I fell asleep: but the rolls and shocks of the ship, combined with the heavy Greenland anorak which I had on, and the state of my body, together produced a fearful nightmare, in which I was conscious of a vain struggle to move, a vain fight for breath, for the sleeping-bag turned to an iceberg on my bosom. Of Clodagh was my gasping dream. I dreamed that she let fall, drop by drop, a liquid, coloured like pomegranate-seeds, into a glass of water; and she presented the glass to Peters. The draught, I knew, was poisonous as death: and in a last effort to break the bands of that dark slumber, I was conscious, as I jerked myself upright, of screaming aloud:

‘Clodagh! Clodagh! Spare the man...!’

My eyes, starting with horror, opened to waking; the electric light was shining in the cabin; and there stood David Wilson looking at me.

Wilson was a big man, with a massively-built, long face, made longer by a beard, and he had little nervous contractions of the flesh at the cheek-bones, and plenty of big freckles. His clinging pose, his smile of disgust, his whole air, as he stood crouching and lurching there, I can shut my eyes, and see now.

What he was doing in my cabin I did not know. To think, my good God, that he should have been led there just then! This was one of the four-men starboard berths: his was a-port: yet there he was! But he explained at once.

‘Sorry to interrupt your innocent dreams, says he: ‘the mercury in Maitland’s thermometer is frozen, and he asked me to hand him his spirits-of-wine one from his bunk...’

I did not answer. A hatred was in my heart against this man.

The next day the storm died away, and either three or four days later the slush-ice between the floes froze definitely. The Boreal’s way was thus blocked. We warped her with ice-anchors and the capstan into the position in which she should lay up for her winter’s drift. This was in about 79° 20’ N. The sun had now totally vanished from our bleak sky, not to reappear till the following year.

Well, there was sledging with the dogs, and bear-hunting among the hummocks, as the months, one by one, went by. One day Wilson, by far our best shot, got a walrus-bull; Clark followed the traditional pursuit of a Chief, examining Crustacea; Maitland and I were in a relation of close friendship, and I assisted his meteorological observations in a snow-hut built near the ship. Often, through the twenty-four hours, a clear blue moon, very spectral, very fair, suffused all our dim and livid clime.

It was five days before Christmas that Clark made the great announcement: he had determined, he said, if our splendid northward drift continued, to leave the ship about the middle of next March for the dash to the Pole. He would take with him the four reindeer, all the dogs, four sledges, four kayaks, and three companions. The companions whom he had decided to invite were: Wilson, Mew, and Maitland.

He said it at dinner; and as he said it, David Wilson glanced at my wan face with a smile of pleased malice: for I was left out.

I remember well: the aurora that night was in the sky, and at its edge floated a moon surrounded by a ring, with two mock-moons. But all shone very vaguely and far, and a fog, which had already lasted some days, made the ship's bows indistinct to me, as I paced the bridge on my watch, two hours after Clark's announcement.

For a long time all was very still, save for the occasional whine of a dog. I was alone, and it grew toward the end of my watch, when Maitland would succeed me. My slow tread tolled like a passing-bell, and the mountainous ice lay vague and white around me, its sheeted ghastliness not less dreadfully silent than eternity itself.

Presently, several of the dogs began barking together, left off, and began again.

I said to myself; 'There is a bear about somewhere.'

And after some five minutes I saw — I thought that I saw — it. The fog had, if anything thickened; and it was now very near the end of my watch.

It had entered the ship, I concluded, by the boards which slanted from an opening in the port bulwarks down to the ice. Once before, in November, a bear, having smelled the dogs, had ventured on board at midnight: but then there had resulted a perfect hubbub among the dogs. Now, even in the midst of my excitement, I wondered at their quietness, though some whimpered — with fear, I thought. I saw the creature steal forward from the hatchway toward the kennels a-port; and I ran noiselessly, and seized the watch-gun which stood always loaded by the companionway.

By this time, the form had passed the kennels, reached the bows, and now was making toward me on the starboard side. I took aim. Never, I thought, had I seen so huge a bear — though I made allowance for the magnifying effect of the fog.

My finger was on the trigger: and at that moment a deathly shivering sickness took me, the wrangling voices shouted at me, with 'Shoot!' 'Shoot not!' 'Shoot!' Ah well, that latter shout was irresistible. I drew the trigger. The report hooted through the Polar night.

The creature dropped; both Wilson and Clark were up at once: and we three hurried to the spot.

But the very first near glance showed a singular kind of bear. Wilson put his hand to the head, and a lax skin came away at his touch.... It was Aubrey Maitland who was underneath it, and I had shot him dead.

For the past few days he had been cleaning skins, among them the skin of the bear from which I had saved him at Taimur. Now, Maitland was a born pantomimist, continually inventing practical jokes; and perhaps to startle me with a false alarm in the very skin of the old Bruin which had so nearly done for him, he had thrown it round him on finishing its cleaning, and so, in mere wanton fun, had crept on deck at the hour of his watch. The head of the bear-skin, and the fog, must have prevented him from seeing me taking aim.

This tragedy made me ill for weeks. I saw that the hand of Fate was upon me. When I rose from bed, poor Maitland was lying in the ice behind the great camel-shaped hummock near us.

By the end of January we had drifted to 80° 55'; and it was then that Clark, in the presence of Wilson, asked me if I would make the fourth man, in the place of poor Maitland, for the dash in the spring. As I said 'Yes, I am willing,' David Wilson spat with a disgusted emphasis. A minute later he sighed, with 'Ah, poor Maitland...' and drew in his breath with a tut! tut!

God knows, I had an impulse to spring then and there at his throat, and strangle him: but I curbed myself.

There remained now hardly a month before the dash, and all hands set to work with a will, measuring the dogs, making harness and seal-skin shoes for them, overhauling sledges and kayaks, and cutting every possible ounce of weight. But we were not destined, after all, to set out that year. About the 20th February, the ice began to pack, and the ship was subjected to an appalling pressure. We found it necessary to make trumpets of our hands to shout into one another's ears, for the whole ice-continent was crashing, popping, thundering everywhere in terrific upheaval. Expecting every moment to see the Boreal crushed to splinters, we had to set about unpacking provisions, and placing sledges, kayaks, dogs and everything in a position for instant flight. It lasted five days, and was accompanied by a tempest from the north, which, by the end of February, had driven us back south into latitude 79° 40'. Clark, of course, then abandoned the thought of the Pole for that summer.

And immediately afterwards we made a startling discovery: our stock of reindeer-moss was found to be somehow ridiculously small. Egan, our second mate, was blamed; but that did not help matters: the sad fact remained. Clark was advised to kill one or two of the deer, but he pig-headedly refused: and by the beginning of summer they were all dead.

Well, our northward drift recommenced. Toward the middle of February we saw a mirage of the coming sun above the horizon; there were flights of Arctic petrels and snow-buntings; and spring was with us. In an ice-pack of big hummocks and narrow lanes we made good progress all the summer.

When the last of the deer died, my heart sank; and when the dogs killed two of their number, and a bear crushed a third, I was fully expecting what actually came; it was this: Clark announced that he could now take only two companions with him in the spring: and they were Wilson and Mew. So once more I saw David Wilson's pleased smile of malice.

We settled into our second winter-quarters. Again came December, and all our drear sunless gloom, made worse by the fact that the windmill would not work, leaving us without the electric light.

Ah me, none but those who have felt it could dream of one half the mental depression of that long Arctic night; how the soul takes on the hue of the world; and without and within is nothing but gloom, gloom, and the reign of the Power of Darkness.

Not one of us but was in a melancholic, dismal and dire mood; and on the 13th December Lamburn, the engineer, stabbed Cartwright, the old harpooner, in the arm.

Three days before Christmas a bear came close to the ship, and then turned tail. Mew, Wilson, I and Meredith (a general hand) set out in pursuit. After a pretty long chase we lost him, and then scattered different ways. It was very dim, and after yet an hour's search, I was returning weary and disgusted to the ship, when I saw some shadow like a bear sailing away on my left, and at the same time sighted a man — I did not know whom — running like a handicapped ghost some little distance to the right. So I shouted out:

‘There he is — come on! This way!’

The man quickly joined me, but as soon as ever he recognised me, stopped dead. The devil must have suddenly got into him, for he said:

‘No, thanks, Jeffson: alone with you I am in danger of my life....’

It was Wilson. And I, too, forgetting at once all about the bear, stopped and faced him.

‘I see,’ said I. ‘But, Wilson, you are going to explain to me now what you mean, you hear? What do you mean, Wilson?’

‘What I say,’ he answered deliberately, eyeing me up and down: ‘alone with you I am in danger of my life. Just as poor Maitland was, and just as poor Peters was. Certainly, you are a deadly beast.’

Fury leapt, my God, in my heart. Black as the tenebrous Arctic night was my soul.

‘Do you mean,’ said I, ‘that I want to put you out of the way in order to go in your place to the Pole? Is that your meaning, man?’

‘That’s about my meaning, Jeffson,’ says he: ‘you are a deadly beast, you know.’

‘Stop!’ I said, with blazing eye. ‘I am going to kill you, Wilson — as sure as God lives: but I want to hear first. Who told you that I killed Peters?’

‘Your lover killed him — with your collusion. Why, I heard you, man, in your beastly sleep, calling the whole thing out. And I was pretty sure of it before, only I had no proofs. By God, I should enjoy putting a bullet into you, Jeffson!’

‘You wrong me — you, you wrong me!’ I shrieked, my eyes staring with ravenous lust for his blood; ‘and now I am going to pay you well for it. Look out, you!’

I aimed my gun for his heart, and I touched the trigger. He held up his left hand.

‘Stop,’ he said, ‘stop.’ (He was one of the coolest of men ordinarily.) ‘There is no gallows on the Boreal, but Clark could easily rig one for you. I want to kill you, too, because there are no criminal courts up here, and it would be doing a good action for my country. But not here — not now. Listen to me — don’t shoot. Later we can meet, when all is ready, so that no one may be the wiser, and fight it all out.’

As he spoke I let the gun drop. It was better so. I knew that he was much the best shot on the ship, and I an indifferent one: but I did not care, I did not care, if I was killed.

It is a dim, inclement land, God knows: and the spirit of darkness and distraction is there.

Twenty hours later we met behind the great saddle-shaped hummock, some six miles to the S.E. of the ship. We had set out at different times, so that no one might suspect. And each brought a ship’s-lantern.

Wilson had dug an ice-grave near the hummock, leaving at its edge a heap of brash-ice and snow to fill it. We stood separated by an interval of perhaps seventy yards, the grave between us, each with a lantern at his feet.

Even so we were mere shadowy apparitions one to the other. The air glowered very drearily, and present in my inmost soul were the frills of cold. A chill moon, a mere abstraction of light, seemed to hang far outside the universe. The temperature was at 55° below zero, so that we had on wind-clothes over our anoraks, and heavy foot-bandages under our Lap boots. Nothing but a weird morgue seemed the world, haunted with despondent madness; and exactly like that world about us were the minds of us two poor men, full of macabre, bleak, and funereal feelings.

Between us yawned an early grave for one or other of our bodies.

I heard Wilson cry out:

‘Are you ready, Jeffson?’

‘Aye, Wilson!’ cried I.

‘Then here goes!’ cries he.

Even as he spoke, he fired. Surely, the man was in deadly earnest to kill me.

But his shot passed harmlessly by me: as indeed was only likely: we were mere shadows one to the other.

I fired perhaps ten seconds later than he: but in those ten seconds he stood perfectly revealed to me in clear, lavender light.

An Arctic fire-ball had traversed the sky, showering abroad, a sulphurous glamour over the snow-landscape. Before the intenser blue of its momentary shine had passed away, I saw Wilson stagger forward, and drop. And him and his lantern I buried deep there under the rubble ice.

On the 13th March, nearly three months later, Clark, Mew and I left the Boreal in latitude 85° 15'.

We had with us thirty-two dogs, three sledges, three kayaks, human provisions for 112 days, and dog provisions for 40. Being now about 340 miles from the Pole, we hoped to reach it in 43 days, then, turning south, and feeding living dogs with dead, make either Franz Josef Land or Spitzbergen, at which latter place we should very likely come up with a whaler.

Well, during the first days, progress was very slow, the ice being rough and laney, and the dogs behaving most badly, stopping dead at every difficulty, and leaping over the traces. Clark had had the excellent idea of attaching a gold-beater's-skin balloon, with a lifting power of 35 pounds, to each sledge, and we had with us a supply of zinc and sulphuric-acid to repair the hydrogen-waste from the bags; but on the third day Mew over-filled and burst his balloon, and I and Clark had to cut ours loose in order to equalise weights, for we could neither leave him behind, turn back to the ship, nor mend the bag. So it happened that at the end of the fourth day out, we had made only nineteen miles, and could still from a hummock discern afar the leaning masts of the old Boreal. Clark led on ski, captaining a sledge with 400 lbs. of instruments, ammunition, pemmican, aleuronate bread; Mew followed, his sledge containing provisions only; and last came I, with a mixed freight. But on the third day Clark had an attack of snow-blindness, and Mew took his place.

Pretty soon our sufferings commenced, and they were bitter enough. The sun, though constantly visible day and night, gave no heat. Our sleeping-bags (Clark and Mew slept together in one, I in another) were soaking wet all the night, being thawed by our warmth; and our fingers, under wrappings of senne-grass and wolf-skin, were always bleeding. Sometimes our frail bamboo-cane kayaks, lying across the sledges, would crash perilously against an ice-ridge — and they were our one hope of reaching land. But the dogs were the great difficulty: we lost six mortal hours a day in harnessing and tending them. On the twelfth day Clark took a single-altitude observation, and found that we were only in latitude $86^{\circ} 45'$; but the next day we passed beyond the furthest point yet reached by man, viz. $86^{\circ} 53'$, attained by the Nix explorers four years previously.

Our one secret thought now was food, food — our day-long lust for the eating-time. Mew suffered from ‘Arctic thirst.

Under these conditions, man becomes in a few days, not a savage only, but a mere beast, hardly a grade above the bear and walrus. Ah, the ice! A long and sordid nightmare was that, God knows.

On we pressed, crawling our little way across the Vast, upon whose hoar silence, from Eternity until then, Bootes only, and that Great Bear, had watched.

After the eleventh day our rate of march improved: all lanes disappeared, and ridges became much less frequent. By the fifteenth day I was leaving behind the ice-grave of David Wilson at the rate of ten to thirteen miles a day.

Yet, as it were, his arm reached out and touched me, even there.

His disappearance had been explained by a hundred different guesses on the ship — all plausible enough. I had no idea that anyone connected me in any way with his death.

But on our twenty-second day of march, 140 miles from our goal, he caused a conflagration of rage and hate to break out among us three.

It was at the end of a march, when our stomachs were hollow, our frames ready to drop, and our mood ravenous and inflamed. One of Mew's dogs was sick: it was necessary to kill it: he asked me to do it.

'Oh,' said I, 'you kill your own dog, of course.'

'Well, I don't know,' he replied, catching fire at once, 'you ought to be used to killing, Jeffson.'

'How do you mean, Mew?' said I with a mad start, for madness and the flames of Hell were instant and uppermost in us all: 'you mean because my profession — —'

'Profession! damn it, no,' he snarled like a dog: 'go and dig up David Wilson — I dare say you know where to find him — and he will tell you my meaning, right enough.'

I rushed at once to Clark, who was stooping among the dogs, unharnessing: and savagely pushing his shoulder, I exclaimed:

'That beast accuses me of murdering David Wilson!'

'Well?' said Clark.

'I'd split his skull as clean —— !'

'Go away, Adam Jeffson, and let me be!' snarled Clark.

'Is that all you've got to say about it, then — you?'

'To the devil with you, man, say I, and let me be!' cried he: 'you know your own conscience best, I suppose.'

Before this insult I stood with grinding teeth, but impotent. However, from that moment a deeper mood of brooding malice occupied my spirit. Indeed the humour of us all was one of dangerous, even murderous, fierceness. In that pursuit of riches into that region of cold, we had become almost like the beasts that perish.

On the 10th April we passed the 89th parallel of latitude, and though sick to death, both in spirit and body, pressed still on. Like the lower animals, we were stricken now with dumbness, and hardly once in a week spoke a word one to the other, but in selfish brutishness on through a real hell of cold we moved. It is a cursed region — beyond doubt cursed — not meant to be penetrated by man: and rapid and awful was the degeneration of our souls. As for me, never could I have conceived that savagery so heinous could brood in a human bosom as now I felt it brood in mine. If men could enter into a country specially set apart for the habitation of devils, and there become possessed of evil, as we were so would they be.

As we advanced, the ice every day became smoother; so that, from four miles a day, our rate increased to fifteen, and finally (as the sledges lightened) to twenty.

It was now that we began to encounter a succession of strange-looking objects lying scattered over the ice, whose number continually increased as we proceeded. They had the appearance of rocks, or pieces of iron, incrustated with glass-fragments of various colours, and they were of every size. Their incrustations we soon determined to be diamonds, and other precious stones. On our first twenty-mile day Mew picked up a diamond-crystal as large as a child's foot, and such objects soon became common. We thus found the riches which we sought, beyond all dream; but as the bear and the walrus find them: for ourselves we had lost; and it was a loss of riches barren as ashes, for all those millions we would not have given an ounce of fish-meal. Clark grumbled something about their being meteor-stones, whose ferruginous substance had been lured by the magnetic Pole, and kept from frictional burning in their fall by the frigidity of the air: and they quickly ceased to interest our sluggish minds, except in so far as they obstructed our way.

We had all along had good weather: till, suddenly, on the morning of the 13th April, we were overtaken by a tempest from the S.W., of such mighty and solemn volume that the heart quailed beneath it. It lasted in its full power only an hour, but during that time snatched two of our sledges long distances, and compelled us to lie face-downward. We had travelled all the sun-lit night, and were gasping with fatigue; so as soon as the wind allowed us to huddle together our scattered things, we crawled into the sleeping-bags, and instantly slept.

We knew that the ice was in awful upheaval around us; we heard, as our eyelids sweetly closed, the slow booming of distant guns, and brittle cracklings of artillery. This may have been a result of the tempest stirring up the ocean beneath the ice. Whatever it was, we did not care: we slept deep.

We were within ten miles of the Pole.

In my sleep it was as though someone suddenly shook my shoulder with urgent 'Up! up!' It was neither Clark nor Mew, but a dream merely: for Clark and Mew, when I started up, I saw lying still in their sleeping-bag.

I suppose it must have been about noon. I sat staring a minute, and my first numb thought was somehow this: that the Countess Clodagh had prayed me 'Be first' — for her. Wondrous little now cared I for the Countess Clodagh in her far unreal world of warmth — precious little for the fortune which she coveted: millions on millions of fortunes lay unregarded around me. But that thought, Be first! was deeply suggested in my brain, as if whispered there. Instinctively, brutishly, as the Gadarean swine rushed down a steep place, I, rubbing my daft eyes, arose.

The first thing which my mind opened to perceive was that, while the tempest was less strong, the ice was now in extraordinary agitation. I looked abroad upon a vast plain, stretched out to a circular, but waving horizon, and varied by many hillocks, boulders, and sparkling meteor-stones that everywhere tinselled the blinding white, some big as houses, most small as limbs. And this great plain was now rearranging itself in a widespread drama of havoc, withdrawing in ravines like mutual backing curtsies, then surging to clap together in passionate mountain-peaks, else jostling like the Symplegades, fluent and inconstant as billows of the sea, grinding itself, piling itself, pouring itself in cataracts of powdered ice, while here and there I saw the meteor-stones leap spasmodically, in dusts and heaps, like geysers or spurting froths in a steamer's wake, a tremendous uproar, meantime, filling all the air. As I stood, I plunged and staggered, and I found the dogs sprawling, with whimperings, on the heaving floor.

I did not care. Instinctively, daftly, brutishly, I harnessed ten of them to my sledge; put on Canadian snow-shoes: and was away northward — alone.

The sun shone with a clear, benign, but heatless shining: a ghostly, remote, yet quite limpid light, which seemed designed for the lighting of other planets and systems, and to strike here by happy chance. A great wind from the S.W., meantime, sent thin snow-sweepings flying northward past me.

The odometer which I had with me had not yet measured four miles, when I began to notice two things: first that the jewelled meteor-stones were now accumulating beyond all limit, filling my range of vision to the northern horizon with a dazzling glister: in mounds, and parterres, and scattered disconnection they lay, like largesse of autumn leaves, spread out over those Elysian fields and fairy uplands of wealth, trillions of billions, so that I had need to steer my twining way among them. Now, too, I noticed that, but for these stones, all roughness had disappeared, not a trace of the upheaval going on a little further south being here, for the ice lay positively as smooth as a table before me. It is my belief that this stretch of smooth ice has never, never felt one shock, or stir, or throe, and reaches right down to the bottom of the deep.

And now with a wild hilarity I flew. Gradually, a dizziness, a lunacy, had seized upon me, till finally, up-buoyed on air, and dancing mad, I sped, I spun, with grinning teeth that chattered and gibbered, and eyeballs of distraction: for a Fear, too — most cold and dreadful — had its hand of ice upon my heart, I being so alone in that place, face to face with the Ineffable: but still with a giddy levity, and a fatal joy, and a blind hilarity, on I sped, I spun.

The odometer measured nine miles from my start. I was in the immediate neighbourhood of the Pole.

I cannot say when it began, but now I was conscious of a sound in my ears, distinct and near, a steady sound of splashing, or fluttering, resembling the noising of a cascade or brook: and it grew. Forty more steps I took (slide I could not now for the meteorites) — perhaps sixty — perhaps eighty: and now, to my sudden horror, I stood by a circular clean-cut lake.

One minute only, swaying and nodding there, I stood: and then I dropped down flat in swoon.

In a hundred years, I suppose, I should never succeed in analysing why I swooned: but my consciousness still retains the impression of that horrid thrill. I saw nothing distinctly, for my whole being reeled and toppled drunken, like a spinning-top in desperate death-struggle at the moment when it flags, and wobbles dissolutely to fall; but the very instant that my eyes met what was before me, I knew, I knew, that here was the Sanctity of Sanctities, the old eternal inner secret of the Life of this Earth, which it was a most burning shame for a man to see. The lake, I fancy, must be a mile across, and in its middle is a pillar of ice, very low and broad; and I had the clear impression, or dream, or notion, that there was a name, or word, graven all round in the ice of the pillar in characters which I could never read; and under the name a long date; and the fluid of the lake seemed to me to be wheeling with a shivering ecstasy, splashing and fluttering, round the pillar, always from west to east, in the direction of the spinning of the earth; and it was borne in upon me — I can't at all say how — that this fluid was the substance of a living creature; and I had the distinct fancy, as my senses failed, that it was a creature with many dull and anguished eyes, and that, as it wheeled for ever round in fluttering lust, it kept its eyes always turned upon the name and the date graven in the pillar. But this must be my madness....

It must have been not less than an hour before a sense of life returned to me; and when the thought stabbed my brain that a long, long time I had lain there in the presence of those gloomy orbs, my spirit seemed to groan and die within me.

In some minutes, however, I had scrambled to my feet, clutched at a dog's harness, and without one backward glance, was flying from that place.

Half-way to the halting-place, I waited Clark and Mew, being very sick and doddering, and unable to advance. But they did not come.

Later on, when I gathered force to go further, I found that they had perished in the upheaval of the ice. One only of the sledges, half buried, I saw near the spot of our bivouac.

Alone that same day I began my way southward, and for five days made good progress. On the eighth day I noticed, stretched right across the southeastern horizon, a region of purple vapour which luridly obscured the face of the sun: and day after day I saw it steadily brooding there. But what it could be I did not understand.

Well, onward through the desert ice I continued my lonely way, with a baleful shrinking terror in my heart; for very stupendous, alas! is the burden of that Arctic solitude upon one poor human soul.

Sometimes on a halt I have lain and listened long to the hollow silence, recoiling, crushed by it, hoping that at least one of the dogs might whine. I have even crept shivering from the thawed sleeping-bag to flog a dog, so that I might hear a sound.

I had started from the Pole with a well-filled sledge, and the sixteen dogs left alive from the ice-packing which buried my comrades. This was on the evening of the 13th April. I had saved from the wreck of our things most of the whey-powder, pemmican, &c., as well as the theodolite, compass, chronometer, train-oil lamp for cooking, and other implements: I was therefore in no doubt as to my course, and I had provisions for ninety days. But ten days from the start my supply of dog-food failed, and I had to begin to slaughter my only companions, one by one.

Well, in the third week the ice became horribly rough, and with moil and toil enough to wear a bear to death, I did only five miles a day. After the day's work I would crawl with a dying sigh into the sleeping-bag, clad still in the load of skins which stuck to me a mere filth of grease, to sleep the sleep of a swine, indifferent if I never woke.

Always — day after day — on the south-eastern horizon, brooded sullenly that curious stretched-out region of purple vapour, like the smoke of the conflagration of the world. And I noticed that its length constantly reached out and out, and silently grew.

Once I had a very pleasant dream. I dreamed that I was in a garden — an Arabian paradise — so sweet was the perfume. All the time, however, I had a sub-consciousness of the gale which was actually blowing from the S.E. over the ice, and, at the moment when I awoke, was half-wittedly droning to myself; ‘It is a Garden of Peaches; but I am not really in the garden: I am really on the ice; only, the S.E. storm is wafting to me the aroma of this Garden of Peaches.’

I opened my eyes — I started — I sprang to my feet! For, of all the miracles! — I could not doubt — an actual aroma like peach-blossom was in the algid air about me!

Before I could collect my astonished senses, I began to vomit pretty violently, and at the same time saw some of the dogs, mere skeletons as they were, vomiting, too. For a long time I lay very sick in a kind of daze, and, on rising, found two of the dogs dead, and all very queer. The wind had now changed to the north.

Well, on I staggered, fighting every inch of my deplorably weary way. This odour of peach-blossom, my sickness, and the death of the two dogs, remained a wonder to me.

Two days later, to my extreme mystification (and joy), I came across a bear and its cub lying dead at the foot of a hummock. I could not believe my eyes. There she lay on her right side, a spot of dirty-white in a disordered patch of snow, with one little eye open, and her fierce-looking mouth also; and the cub lay across her haunch, biting into her rough fur. I set to work upon her, and allowed the dogs a glorious feed on the blubber, while I myself had a great banquet on the fresh meat. I had to leave the greater part of the two carcasses, and I can feel again now the hankering reluctance — quite unnecessary, as it turned out — with which I trudged onwards. Again and again I found myself asking: ‘Now, what could have killed those two bears?’

With brutish stolidness I plodded ever on, almost like a walking machine, sometimes nodding in sleep while I helped the dogs, or manouvred the sledge over an ice-ridge, pushing or pulling. On the 3rd June, a month and a half from my start, I took an observation with the theodolite, and found that I was not yet 400 miles from the Pole, in latitude 84° 50’. It was just as though some Will, some Will, was obstructing and retarding me.

However, the intolerable cold was over, and soon my clothes no longer hung stark on me like armour. Pools began to appear in the ice, and presently, what was worse, my God, long lanes, across which, somehow, I had to get the sledge. But about the same time all fear of starvation passed away: for on the 6th June I came across another dead bear, on the 7th three, and thenceforth, in rapidly growing numbers, I met not bears only, but fulmars, guillemots, snipes, Ross’s gulls, little awks — all, all, lying dead on the ice. And never anywhere a living thing, save me, and the two remaining dogs.

If ever a poor man stood shocked before a mystery, it was I now. I had a big fear on my heart.

On the 2nd July the ice began packing dangerously, and soon another storm broke loose upon me from the S.W. I left off my trek, and put up the silk tent on a five-acre square of ice surrounded by lanes: and again — for the second time — as I lay down, I smelled that delightful strange odour of peach-blossom, a mere whiff of it, and presently afterwards was taken sick. However, it passed off this time in a couple of hours.

Now it was all lanes, lanes, alas! yet no open water, and such was the difficulty and woe of my life, that sometimes I would drop flat on the ice, and sob: 'Oh, no more, no more, my God: here let me die.' The crossing of a lane might occupy ten or twelve entire hours, and then, on the other side I might find another one opening right before me. Moreover, on the 8th July, one of the dogs, after a feed on blubber, suddenly died; and there was left me only 'Reinhardt,' a white-haired Siberian dog, with little pert up-sticking ears, like a cat's. Him, too, I had to kill on coming to open water.

This did not happen till the 3rd August, nearly four months from the Pole.

I can't think, my God, that any heart of man ever tholed the appalling nightmare and black abysm of sensations in which, during those four long desert months, I weltered: for though I was as a brute, I had a man's heart to feel. What I had seen, or dreamed, at the Pole followed and followed me; and if I shut my poor weary eyes to sleep, those others yonder seemed to watch me still with their distraught and gloomy gaze, and in my spinning dark dreams spun that eternal ecstasy of the lake.

However, by the 28th July I knew from the look of the sky, and the absence of fresh-water ice, that the sea could not be far; so I set to work, and spent two days in putting to rights the now battered kayak. This done, I had no sooner resumed my way than I sighted far off a streaky haze, which I knew to be the basalt cliffs of Franz Josef Land; and in a craziness of joy I stood there, waving my ski-staff about my head, with the senile cheers of a very old man.

In four days this land was visibly nearer, sheer basaltic cliffs mixed with glacier, forming apparently a great bay, with two small islands in the mid-distance; and at fore-day of the 3rd August I arrived at the definite edge of the pack-ice in moderate weather at about the freezing-point.

I at once, but with great reluctance, shot Reinhardt, and set to work to get the last of the provisions, and the most necessary of the implements, into the kayak, making haste to put out to the toilless luxury of being borne on the water, after all the weary trudge. Within fourteen hours I was coasting, with my little lug-sail spread, along the shore-ice of that land. It was midnight of a calm Sabbath, and low on the horizon smoked the drowsing red sun-ball, as my canvas skiff lightly chopped her little way through this silent sea. Silent, silent: for neither snort of walrus, nor yelp of fox, nor cry of startled kittiwake, did I hear: but all was still as the jet-black shadow of the cliffs and glacier on the tranquil sea: and many bodies of dead things strewn the surface of the water.

When I found a little fjord, I went up it to the end where stood a stretch of basalt columns, looking like a shattered temple of Antediluvians; and when my foot at last touched land, I sat down there a long, long time in the rubbly snow, and silently wept. My eyes that night were like a fountain of tears. For the firm land is health and sanity, and dear to the life of man; but I say that the great ungenial ice is a nightmare, and a blasphemy, and a madness, and the realm of the Power of Darkness.

I knew that I was at Franz Josef Land, somewhere or other in the neighbourhood of C. Fligely (about 82° N.), and though it was so late, and getting cold, I still had the hope of reaching Spitzbergen that year, by alternately sailing all open water, and dragging the kayak over the slack drift-ice. All the ice which I saw was good flat fjord-ice, and the plan seemed feasible enough; so after coasting about a little, and then three days' good rest in the tent at the bottom of a ravine of columnar basalt opening upon the shore, I packed some bear and walrus flesh, with what artificial food was left, into the kayak, and I set out early in the morning, coasting the shore-ice with sail and paddle. In the afternoon I managed to climb a little way up an iceberg, and made out that I was in a bay whose terminating headlands were invisible. I accordingly decided to make S.W. by W. to cross it, but, in doing so, I was hardly out of sight of land, when a northern storm overtook me toward midnight; before I could think, the little sail was all but whiffed away, and the kayak upset. I only saved it by the happy chance of being near a floe with an ice-foot, which, projecting under the water, gave me foot-hold; and I lay on the floe in a mooning state the whole night under the storm, for I was half drowned.

And at once, on recovering myself, I abandoned all thought of whalers and of Europe for that year. Happily, my instruments, &c., had been saved by the kayak-deck when she capsized.

A hundred yards inland from the shore-rim, in a circular place where there was some moss and soil, I built myself a semi-subterranean Eskimo den for the long Polar night. The spot was quite surrounded by high sloping walls of basalt, except to the west, where they opened in a three-foot cleft to the shore, and the ground was strewn with slabs and boulders of granite and basalt. I found there a dead she-bear, two well-grown cubs, and a fox, the latter having evidently fallen from the cliffs; in three places the snow was quite red, overgrown with a red lichen, which at first I took for blood. I did not even yet feel secure from possible bears, and took care to make my den fairly tight, a work which occupied me nearly four weeks, for I had no tools, save a hatchet, knife, and metal-shod ski-staff. I dug a passage in the ground two feet wide, two deep, and ten long, with perpendicular sides, and at its north end a circular space, twelve feet across, also with perpendicular sides, which I lined with stones; the whole excavation I covered with inch-thick walrus-hide, skinned during a whole bitter week from four of a number that lay about the shore-ice; for ridge-pole I used a thin pointed rock which I found near, though, even so, the roof remained nearly flat. This, when it was finished, I stocked well, putting in everything, except the kayak, blubber to serve both for fuel and occasional light, and foods of several sorts, which I procured by merely stretching out the hand. The roof of both circular part and passage was soon buried under snow and ice, and hardly distinguishable from the general level of the white-clad ground. Through the passage, if I passed in or out, I crawled flat, on hands and knees: but that was rare: and in the little round interior, mostly sitting in a cowering attitude, I wintered, harkening to the large and windy ravings of darkling December storms above me.

All those months the burden of a thought bowed me; and an unanswered question, like the slow turning of a mechanism, revolved in my gloomy spirit: for everywhere around me lay bears, walruses, foxes, thousands upon thousands of little awks, kittiwakes, snow-owls, eider-ducks, gulls-dead, dead. Almost the only living things which I saw were some walruses on the drift-floes: but very few compared with the number which I expected. It was clear to me that some inconceivable catastrophe had overtaken the island during the summer, destroying all life about it, except some few of the amphibia, cetacea, and crustacea.

On the 5th December, having crept out from the den during a southern storm, I had, for the third time, a distant whiff of that self-same odour of peach-blossom: but now without any after-effects.

Well, again came Christmas, the New Year — Spring: and on the 22nd May I set out with a well-stocked kayak. The water was fairly open, and the ice so good, that at one place I could sail the kayak over it, the wind sending me sliding at a fine pace. Being on the west coast of Franz Josef Land, I was in as favourable a situation as possible, and I turned my bow southward with much hope, keeping a good many days just in sight of land. Toward the evening of my third day out I noticed a large flat floe, presenting far-off a singular and lovely sight, for it seemed freighted thick with a profusion of pink and white roses, showing in its clear crystal the empurpled reflection. On getting near I saw that it was covered with millions of Ross's gulls, all dead, whose pretty rosy bosoms had given it that appearance.

Up to the 29th June I made good progress southward and westward (the weather being mostly excellent), sometimes meeting dead bears, floating away on floes, sometimes dead or living walrus-herds, with troop after troop of dead kittiwakes, glaucous and ivory gulls, skuas, and every kind of Arctic fowl. On that last day — the 29th June — I was about to encamp on a floe soon after midnight, when, happening to look toward the sun, my eye fell, far away south across the ocean of floes, upon something — the masts of a ship.

A phantom ship, or a real ship: it was all one; real, I must have instantly felt, it could not be: but at a sight so incredible my heart set to beating in my bosom as though I must surely die, and feebly waving the cane oar about my head, I staggered to my knees, and thence with wry mouth toppled flat.

So overpoweringly sweet was the thought of springing once more, like the beasts of Circe, from a walrus into a man. At this time I was tearing my bear's-meat just like a bear; I was washing my hands in walrus-blood to produce a glairy sort of pink cleanliness, in place of the black grease which chronically coated them.

Worn as I was, I made little delay to set out for that ship; and I had not travelled over water and ice four hours when, to my in-describable joy, I made out from the top of a steep floe that she was the Boreal. It seemed most strange that she should be anywhere hereabouts: I could only conclude that she must have forced and drifted her way thus far westward out of the ice-block in which our party had left her, and perhaps now was loitering here in the hope of picking us up on our way to Spitzbergen.

In any case, wild was the haste with which I fought my way to be at her, my gasping mouth all the time drawn back in a rictus of laughter at the anticipation of their gladness to see me, their excitement to hear the grand tidings of the Pole attained. Anon I waved the paddle, though I knew that they could not yet see me, and then I dug deep at the whitish water. What astonished me was her main-sail and fore-mast square-sail — set that calm morning; and her screws were still, for she moved not at all. The sun was abroad like a cold spirit of light, touching the great ocean-room of floes with dazzling spots, and a tint almost of rose was on the world, as it were of a just-dead bride in her spangles and white array. The Boreal was the one little distant jet-black spot in all this purity: and upon her, as though she were Heaven, I paddled, I panted. But she was in a queerish state: by 9 A.M. I could see that. Two of the windmill arms were not there, and half lowered down her starboard beam a boat hung askew; moreover, soon after 10 I could clearly see that her main-sail had a long rent down the middle.

I could not at all make her out. She was not anchored, though a sheet-anchor hung over at the starboard cathead; she was not moored; and two small ice-floes, one on each side, were sluggishly bombarding her bows.

I began now to wave the paddle, battling for my breath, ecstatic, crazy with excitement, each second like a year to me. Very soon I could make out someone at the bows, leaning well over, looking my way. Something put it into my head that it was Sallitt, and I began an impassioned shouting. ‘Hi! Sallitt! Hallo! Hi!’ I called.

I did not see him move: I was still a good way off: but there he stood, leaning steadily over, looking my way. Between me and the ship now was all navigable water among the floes, and the sight of him so visibly near put into me such a shivering eagerness, that I was nothing else but a madman for the time, sending the kayak flying with venomous digs in quick-repeated spurts, and mixing with the diggings my crazy wavings, and with both the daft shoutings of ‘Hallo! Hi! Bravo! I have been to the Pole!’

Well, vanity, vanity. Nearer still I drew: it was broad morning, going on toward noon: I was half a mile away, I was fifty yards. But on board the Boreal, though now they must have heard me, seen me, I observed no movement of welcome, but all, all was still as death that still Arctic morning, my God. Only, the ragged sail flapped a little, and — one on each side — two ice-floes sluggishly bombarded the bows, with hollow sounds.

I was certain now that Sallitt it was who looked across the ice: but when the ship swung a little round, I noticed that the direction of his gaze was carried with her movement, he no longer looking my way.

‘Why, Sallitt!’ I shouted reproachfully: ‘why, Sallitt, man...!’ I whined.

But even as I shouted and whined, a perfect wild certainty was in my heart: for an aroma like peach, my God, had been suddenly wafted from the ship upon me, and I must have very well known then that that watchful outlook of Sallitt saw nothing, and on the Boreal were dead men all; indeed, very soon I saw one of his eyes looking like a glass eye which has slid askew, and glares distraught. And now again my wretched body failed, and my head dropped forward, where I sat, upon the kayak-deck.

Well, after a long time, I lifted myself to look again at that forlorn and wandering craft. There she lay, quiet, tragic, as it were culpable of the dark secret she bore; and Sallitt, who had been such good friends with me, would not cease his stare. I knew quite well why he was there: he had leant over to vomit, and had leant ever since, his forearms pressed on the bulwark-beam, his left knee against the boards, and his left shoulder propped on the cathead. When I came quite near, I saw that with every bump of the two floes against the bows, his face shook in response, and nodded a little; strange to say, he had no covering on his head, and I noted the play of the faint breezes in his uncut hair. After a time I would approach no more, for I was afraid; I did not dare, the silence of the ship seemed so sacred and awful; and till late afternoon I sat there, watching the black and massive hull. Above her water-line emerged all round a half-floating fringe of fresh-green sea-weed, proving old neglect; an abortive attempt had apparently been made to lower, or take in, the larch-wood pram, for there she hung by a jammed davit-rope, stern up, bow in the water; the only two arms of the windmill moved this way and that, through some three degrees, with an andante creaking sing-song; some washed clothes, tied on the bow-sprit rigging to dry, were still there; the iron casing all round the bluff bows was red and rough with rust; at several points the rigging was in considerable tangle; occasionally the boom moved a little with a tortured skirling cadence; and the sail, rotten, I presume, from exposure — for she had certainly encountered no bad weather — gave out anon a heavy languid flap at a rent down the middle. Besides Sallitt, looking out there where he had jammed himself, I saw no one.

By a paddle-stroke now, and another presently, I had closely approached her about four in the afternoon, though my awe of the ship was complicated by that perfume of hers, whose fearful effects I knew. My tentative approach, however, proved to me, when I remained unaffected, that, here and now, whatever danger there had been was past; and finally, by a hanging rope, with a thumping desperation of heart, I clambered up her beam.

They had died, it seemed, very suddenly, for nearly all the twelve were in poses of activity. Egan was in the very act of ascending the companion-way; Lamburn was sitting against the chart-room door, apparently cleaning two carbines; Odling at the bottom of the engine-room stair seemed to be drawing on a pair of reindeer komagar; and Cartwright, who was often in liquor, had his arms frozen tight round the neck of Martin, whom he seemed to be kissing, they two lying stark at the foot of the mizzen-mast.

Over all — over men, decks, rope-coils — in the cabin, in the engine-room — between skylight leaves — on every shelf, in every cranny — lay a purplish ash or dust, very impalpably fine. And steadily reigning throughout the ship, like the very spirit of death, was that aroma of peach-blossom.

Here it had reigned, as I could see from the log-dates, from the rust on the machinery, from the look of the bodies, from a hundred indications, during something over a year. It was, therefore, mainly by the random workings of winds and currents that this fragrant ship of death had been brought hither to me.

And this was the first direct intimation which I had that the Unseen Powers (whoever and whatever they may be), who through the history of the world had been so very, very careful to conceal their Hand from the eyes of men, hardly any longer intended to be at the pains to conceal their Hand from me. It was just as though the Boreal had been openly presented to me by a spiritual agency, which, though I could not see it, I could readily apprehend.

The dust, though very thin and flighty above-decks, lay thickly deposited below, and after having made a tour of investigation throughout the ship, the first thing which I did was to examine that — though I had tasted nothing all day, and was exhausted to death. I found my own microscope where I had left it in the box in my berth to starboard, though I had to lift up Egan to get at it, and to step over Lamburn to enter the chart-room; but there, toward evening, I sat at the table and bent to see if I could make anything of the dust, while it seemed to me as if all the myriad spirits of men that have sojourned on the earth, and angel and devil, and all Time and all Eternity, hung silent round for my decision; and such an ague had me, that for a long time my wandering finger-tips, all ataxic with agitation, eluded every delicate effort which I made, and I could nothing do. Of course, I know that an odour of peach-blossom in the air, resulting in death, could only be associated with some vaporous effluvium of cyanogen, or of hydrocyanic ('prussic') acid, or of both; and when I at last managed to examine some of the dust under the microscope, I was not therefore surprised to find, among the general mass of purplish ash, a number of bright-yellow particles, which could only be minute crystals of potassic ferrocyanide. What potassic ferrocyanide was doing on board the Boreal I did not know, and I had neither the means, nor the force of mind, alas! to dive then further into the mystery; I understood only that by some extraordinary means the air of the region just south of the Polar environ had been impregnated with a vapour which was either cyanogen, or some product of cyanogen; also, that this deadly vapour, which is very soluble, had by now either been dissolved by the sea, or else dispersed into space (probably the latter), leaving only its faint after-perfume; and seeing this, I let my poor abandoned head drop again on the table, and long hours I sat there staring mad, for I had a suspicion, my God, and a fear, in my breast.

The Boreal, I found, contained sufficient provisions, untouched by the dust, in cases, casks, &c., to last me, probably, fifty years. After two days, when I had partially scrubbed and boiled the filth of fifteen months from my skin, and solaced myself with better food, I overhauled her thoroughly, and spent three more days in oiling and cleaning the engine. Then, all being ready, I dragged my twelve dead and laid them together in two rows on the chart-room floor; and I hoisted for love the poor little kayak which had served me through so many tribulations. At nine in the morning of the 6th July, a week from my first sighting of the Boreal, I descended to the engine-room to set out.

The screws, like those of most quite modern ships, were driven by the simple contrivance of a constant stream of liquid air, contained in very powerful tanks, exploding through capillary tubes into non-expansion slide-valve chests, much as in the ordinary way with steam: a motor which gave her, in spite of her bluff hulk, a speed of sixteen knots. It is, therefore, the simplest thing for one man to take these ships round the world, since their movement, or stopping, depend upon nothing but the depressing or raising of a steel handle, provided that one does not get blown to the sky meantime, as liquid air, in spite of its thousand advantages, occasionally blows people. At any rate, I had tanks of air sufficient to last me through twelve years' voyaging; and there was the ordinary machine on board for making it, with forty tons of coal, in case of need, in the bunkers, and two excellent Belleville boilers: so I was well supplied with motors at least.

The ice here was quite slack, and I do not think I ever saw Arctic weather so bright and gay, the temperature at 41°. I found that I was midway between Franz Josef and Spitzbergen, in latitude 79° 23' N. and longitude 39° E.; my way was perfectly clear; and something almost like a mournful hopefulness was in me as the engines slid into their clanking turmoil, and those long-silent screws began to churn the Arctic sea. I ran up with alacrity and took my stand at the wheel; and the bows of my eventful Argo turned southward and westward.

When I needed food or sleep, the ship slept, too: when I awoke, she continued her way.

Sixteen hours a day sometimes I stood sentinel at that wheel, overlooking the varied monotony of the ice-sea, till my knees would give, and I wondered why a wheel at which one might sit was not contrived, rather delicate steering being often required among the floes and bergs. By now, however, I was less weighted with my ball of Polar clothes, and stood almost slim in a Lap great-coat, a round Siberian fur cap on my head.

At midnight when I threw myself into my old berth, it was just as though the engines, subsided now into silence, were a dead thing, and had a ghost which haunted me; for I heard them still, and yet not them, but the silence of their ghost.

Sometimes I would startle from sleep, horrified to the heart at some sound of exploding iceberg, or bumping floe, noising far through that white mystery of quietude, where the floes and bergs were as floating tombs, and the world a liquid cemetery. Never could I describe the strange Doom's-day shock with which such a sound would recall me from far depths of chaos to recollection of myself: for often-times, both waking and in nightmare, I did not know on which planet I was, nor in which Age, but felt myself adrift in the great gulf of time and space and circumstance, without bottom for my consciousness to stand upon; and the world was all mirage and a new show to me; and the boundaries of dream and waking lost.

Well, the weather was most fair all the time, and the sea like a pond. During the morning of the fifth day, the 11th July, I entered, and went moving down, an extraordinary long avenue of snow-bergs and floes, most regularly placed, half a mile across and miles long, like a Titanic double-procession of statues, or the Ming Tombs, but rising and sinking on the cadenced swell; many towering high, throwing placid shadows on the aisle between; some being of a lucid emerald tint; and three or four pouring down cascades that gave a far and chaunting sound. The sea between was of a strange thick bluishness, almost like raw egg-white; while, as always here, some snow-clouds, white and woolly, floated in the pale sky. Down this avenue, which produced a mysterious impression of Cyclopean cathedrals and odd sequesteredness, I had not passed a mile, when I sighted a black object at the end.

I rushed to the shrouds, and very soon made out a whaler.

Again the same panting agitations, mad rage to be at her, at once possessed me; I flew to the indicator, turned the lever to full, then back to give the wheel a spin, then up the main-mast ratlins, waving a long foot-bandage of vadmél tweed picked up at random, and by the time I was within five hundred yards of her, had worked myself to such a pitch, that I was again shouting that futile madness: ‘Hullo! Hi! Bravo! I have been to the Pole!’

And those twelve dead that I had in the chart-room there must have heard me, and the men on the whaler must have heard me, and smiled their smile.

For, as to that whaler, I should have known better at once, if I had not been crazy, since she looked like a ship of death, her boom slamming to port and starboard on the gentle heave of the sea, and her fore-sail reefed that serene morning. Only when I was quite near her, and hurrying down to stop the engines, did the real truth, with perfect suddenness, drench my heated brain; and I almost ran into her, I was so stunned.

However, I stopped the Boreal in time, and later on lowered the kayak, and boarded the other.

This ship had evidently been stricken silent in the midst of a perfect drama of activity, for I saw not one of her crew of sixty-two who was not busy, except one boy. I found her a good-sized thing of 500 odd tons, ship-rigged, with auxiliary engine of seventy horse-power, and pretty heavily armour-plated round the bows. There was no part of her which I did not over-haul, and I could see that they had had a great time with whales, for a mighty carcass, attached to the outside of the ship by the powerful cant-purchase tackle, had been in process of flensing and cutting-in, and on the deck two great blankets of blubber, looking each a ton-weight, surrounded by twenty-seven men in many attitudes, some terrifying to see, some disgusting, several grotesque, all so unhuman, the whale dead, and the men dead, too, and death was there, and the rank-flourishing germs of Inanity, and a mesmerism, and a silence, whose dominion was established, and its reign was growing old. Four of them, who had been removing the gums from a mass of stratified whalebone at the mizzen-mast foot, were quite imbedded in whale-flesh; also, in a barrel lashed to the top of the main top-gallant masthead was visible the head of a man with a long pointed beard, looking steadily out over the sea to the S.W., which made me notice that five only of the probable eight or nine boats were on board; and after visiting the 'tween-decks, where I saw considerable quantities of stowed whalebone plates, and about fifty or sixty iron oil-tanks, and cut-up blubber; and after visiting cabin, engine-room, fo'cas'le, where I saw a lonely boy of fourteen with his hand grasping a bottle of rum under all the turned-up clothes in a chest, he, at the moment of death, being evidently intent upon hiding it; and after two hours' search of the ship, I got back to my own, and half an hour later came upon all the three missing whale-boats about a mile apart, and steered zig-zag near to each. They contained five men each and a steerer, and one had the harpoon-gun fired, with the loose line coiled round and round the head and upper part of the stroke line-manager; and in the others hundreds of fathoms of coiled rope, with toggle-irons, whale-lances, hand-harpoons, and dropped heads, and grins, and lazy abandon, and eyes that stared, and eyes that dozed, and eyes that winked.

After this I began to sight ships not infrequently, and used regularly to have the three lights burning all night. On the 12th July I met one, on the 15th two, on the 16th one, on the 17th three, on the 18th two — all Greenlanders, I think: but, of the nine, I boarded only three, the glass quite clearly showing me, when yet far off, that on the others was no life; and on the three which I boarded were dead men; so that that suspicion which I had, and that fear, grew very heavy upon me.

I went on southward, day after day southward, sentinel there at my wheel; clear sunshine by day, when the calm pale sea sometimes seemed mixed with regions of milk, and at night the immense desolation of a world lit by a sun that was long dead, and by a light that was gloom. It was like Night blanched in death then; and wan as the very kingdom of death and Hades I have seen it, most terrifying, that neuter state and limbo of nothingness, when unreal sea and spectral sky, all boundaries lost, mingled in a vast shadowy void of ghastly phantasmagoria, pale to utter huelessness, at whose centre I, as if annihilated, seemed to swoon in immensity of space.

Into this disembodied world would come anon waftures of that peachy scent which I knew: and their frequency rapidly grew. But still the Boreal moved, traversing, as it were, bottomless Eternity: and I reached latitude 72°, not far now from Northern Europe.

And now, as to that blossomy peach-scent — even while some floes were yet around me — I was just like some fantastic mariner, who, having set out to search for Eden and the Blessed Islands, finds them, and balmy gales from their gardens come out, while he is yet afar, to meet him with their perfumes of almond and champac, cornel and jasmin and lotus. For I had now reached a zone where the peach-aroma was constant; all the world seemed embalmed in its spicy fragrance; and I could easily imagine myself voyaging beyond the world toward some clime of perpetual and enchanting Spring.

Well, I saw at last what whalers used to call ‘the blink of the ice’; that is to say, its bright apparition or reflection in the sky when it is left behind, or not yet come-to. By this time I was in a region where a good many craft of various sorts were to be seen; I was continually meeting them; and not one did I omit to investigate, while many I boarded in the kayak or the larch-wood pram. Just below latitude 70° I came upon a good large fleet of what I supposed to be Lafoden cod and herring fishers, which must have drifted somewhat on a northward current. They had had a great season, for the boats were well laden with curing fish. I went from one to the other on a zig-zag course, they being widely scattered, some mere dots to the glass on the horizon. The evening was still and clear with that astral Arctic clearness, the sun just beginning his low-couched nightly drowse. These sturdy-looking brown boats stood rocking gently there with slow-creaking noises, as of things whining in slumber, without the least damage, awaiting the appalling storms of the winter months on that tenebrous sea, when a dark doom, and a deep grave, would not fail them. The fishers were braw carles, wearing, many of them, fringes of beard well back from the chin-point, with hanging woollen caps. In every case I found below-decks a number of cruses of corn-brandy, marked aquavit, two of which I took into the pram. In one of the smacks an elderly fisher was kneeling in a forward sprawling pose, clasping the lug-mast with his arms, the two knees wide apart, head thrown back, and the yellow eye-balls with their islands of grey iris staring straight up the mast-pole. At another of them, instead of boarding in the pram, I shut off the Boreal's liquid air at such a point that, by delicate steering, she slackened down to a stoppage just a-beam of the smack, upon whose deck I was thus able to jump down. After looking around I descended the three steps aft into the dark and garrety below-decks, and with stooping back went calling in an awful whisper: 'Anyone? Anyone?' Nothing answered me: and when I went up again, the Boreal had drifted three yards beyond my reach. There being a dead calm, I had to plunge into the water, and in that half-minute there a sudden cold throng of unaccountable terrors beset me, and I can feel again now that abysmal desolation of loneliness, and sense of a hostile and malign universe bent upon eating me up: for the ocean seemed to me nothing but a great ghost.

Two mornings later I came upon another school, rather larger boats these, which I found to be Brittany cod-fishers. Most of these, too, I boarded. In every below-decks was a wooden or earthenware image of the Virgin, painted in gaudy faded colours; and in one case I found a boy who had been kneeling before the statue, but was toppled sideways now, his knees still bent, and the cross of Christ in his hand. These stalwart blue woollen blouses and tarpaulin sou'-westers lay in every pose of death, every detail of feature and expression still perfectly preserved. The sloops were all the same, all, all: with sing-song creaks they rocked a little, nonchalantly: each, as it were, with a certain sub-consciousness of its own personality, and callous unconsciousness of all the others round it: yet each a copy of the others: the same hooks and lines, disembowelling-knives, barrels of salt and pickle, piles and casks of opened cod, kegs of biscuit, and low-creaking rockings, and a bilgy smell, and dead men. The next day, about eighty miles south of the latitude of Mount Hekla, I sighted a big ship, which turned out to be the French cruiser Lazare Tréport. I boarded and overhauled her during three hours, her upper, main, and armoured deck, deck by deck, to her lowest black depths, even childishly spying up the tubes of her two big, rusted turret-guns. Three men in the engine-room had been much mangled, after death, I presume, by a burst boiler; floating about 800 yards to the north-east lay a long-boat of hers, low in the water, crammed with marines, one oar still there, jammed between the row-lock and the rower's forced-back chin; on the ship's starboard deck, in the long stretch of space between the two masts, the blue-jackets had evidently been piped up, for they lay there in a sort of serried disorder, to the number of two hundred and seventy-five. Nothing could be of suggestion more tragic than the wasted and helpless power of this poor wandering vessel, around whose stolid mass myriads of wavelets, busy as aspen-leaves, bickered with a continual weltering splash that was quite loud to hear. I sat a good time that afternoon in one of her steely port main-deck casemates on a gun-carriage, my head sunken on my breast, furtively eyeing the bluish turned-up feet, all shrunk, exsanguined, of a sailor who lay on his back before me; his soles were all that I could see, the rest of him lying head-downwards beyond the steel door-sill.

Drenched in seas of lugubrious reverie I sat, till, with a shuddering start, I awoke, paddled back to the Boreal, and, till sleep conquered me, went on my way. At ten the next morning, coming on deck, I spied to the west a group of craft, and turned my course upon them. They turned out to be eight Shetland sixerns, which must have drifted north-eastward hither. I examined them well, but they were as the long list of the others: for all the men, and all the boys, and all the dogs on them were dead.

I could have come to land a long time before I did: but I would not: I was so afraid. For I was used to the silence of the ice: and I was used to the silence of the sea: but, God knows it, I was afraid of the silence of the land.

Once, on the 15th July, I had seen a whale, or thought I did, spouting very remotely afar on the S.E. horizon; and on the 19th I distinctly saw a shoal of porpoises vaulting the sea-surface, in their swift-successive manner, northward: and seeing them, I had said pitifully to myself: ‘Well, I am not quite alone in the world, then, my good God — not quite alone.’

Moreover, some days later, the Boreal had found herself in a bank of cod making away northward, millions of fish, for I saw them, and one afternoon caught three, hand-running, with the hook.

So the sea, at least, had its tribes to be my mates.

But if I should find the land as still as the sea, without even the spouting whale, or school of tumbling sea-hogs — if Paris were dumber than the eternal ice — what then, I asked myself, should I do?

I could have made short work, and landed at Shetland, for I found myself as far westward as longitude 11° 23’ W.: but I would not: I was so afraid. The shrinking within me to face that vague suspicion which I had, turned me first to a foreign land.

I made for Norway, and on the first night of this definite intention, at about nine o'clock, the weather being gusty, the sky lowering, the air sombrous, and the sea hard-looking, dark, and ridged, I was steaming along at a good rate, holding the wheel, my poor port and starboard lights still burning there, when, without the least notice, I received the roughest physical shock of my life, being shot bodily right over the wheel, thence, as from a cannon, twenty feet to the cabin-door, through it head-foremost down the companion-way, and still beyond some six yards along the passage. I had crashed into some dark and dead ship, probably of large size, though I never saw her, nor any sign of her; and all that night, and the next day till four in the afternoon, the Boreal went driving alone over the sea, whither she would: for I lay unconscious. When I woke, I found that I had received really very small injuries, considering: but I sat there on the floor a long time in a sulky, morose, disgusted, and bitter mood; and when I rose, pettishly stopped the ship's engines, seeing my twelve dead all huddled and disfigured. Now I was afraid to steam by night, and even in the daytime I would not go on for three days: for I was childishly angry with I know not what, and inclined to quarrel with Those whom I could not see.

However, on the fourth day, a rough swell which knocked the ship about, and made me very uncomfortable, coaxed me into moving; and I did so with bows turned eastward and southward.

I sighted the Norway coast four days later, in latitude 63° 19', at noon of the 11th August, and pricked off my course to follow it; but it was with a slow and dawdling reluctance that I went, at much less than half-speed. In some eight hours, as I knew from the chart, I ought to sight the lighthouse light on Smølen Island; and when quiet night came, the black water being branded with trails of still moonlight, I passed quite close to it, between ten and twelve, almost under the shadow of the mighty hills: but, oh my God, no light was there. And all the way down I marked the rugged sea-board slumber darkling, afar or near, with never, alas! one friendly light.

Well, on the 15th August I had another of those maniac raptures, whose passing away would have left an elephant racked and prostrate. During four days I had seen not one sign of present life on the Norway coast, only hills, hills, dead and dark, and floating craft, all dead and dark; and my eyes now, I found, had acquired a crazy fixity of stare into the very bottom of the vacant abyss of nothingness, while I remained unconscious of being, save of one point, rainbow-blue, far down in the infinite, which passed slowly from left to right before my consciousness a little way, then vanished, came back, and passed slowly again, from left to right continually; till some prick, or voice, in my brain would startle me into the consciousness that I was staring, whispering the profound confidential warning: You must not stare so, or it is over with you! Well, lost in a blank trance of this sort, I was leaning over the wheel during the afternoon of the 15th, when it was as if some instinct or premonition in my soul leapt up, and said aloud: ‘If you look just yonder, you will see...!’ I started, and in one instant had surged up from all that depth of reverie to reality: I glanced to the right: and there, at last, my God, I saw something human which moved, rapidly moved: at last! — and it came to me.

That sense of recovery, of waking, of new solidity, of the comfortable usual, a million-fold too intense for words — how sweetly consoling it was! Again now, as I write, I can fancy and feel it — the rocky solidity, the adamant ordinary, on which to base the feet, and live. From the day when I stood at the Pole, and saw there the dizzy thing that made me swoon, there had come into my way not one sign or trace that other beings like myself were alive on the earth with me: till now, suddenly, I had the sweet indubitable proof: for on the south-western sea, not four knots away, I saw a large, swift ship: and her bows, which were sharp as a hatchet, were steadily chipping through the smooth sea at a pretty high pace, throwing out profuse ribbony foams that went wide-vawering, with outward undulations, far behind her length, as she ran the sea in haste, straight northward.

At the moment, I was steering about S.E. by S., fifteen miles out from a shadowy-blue series of Norway mountains; and just giving the wheel one frantic spin to starboard to bring me down upon her, I flew to the bridge, leant my back on the main-mast, which passed through it, put a foot on the white iron rail before me, and there at once felt all the mocking devils of distracted revelry possess me, as I caught the cap from my long hairs, and commenced to wave and wave and wave, red-faced maniac that I was: for at the second nearer glance, I saw that she was flying an ensign at the main, and a long pennant at the main-top, and I did not know what she was flying those flags there for: and I was embittered and driven mad.

With distinct minuteness did she print herself upon my consciousness in that five minutes' interval: she was painted a dull and cholera yellow, like many Russian ships, and there was a faded pink space at her bows under the line where the yellow ceased: the ensign at her main I made out to be the blue-and-white saltire, and she was clearly a Russian passenger-liner, two-masted, two-funnelled, though from her funnels came no trace of smoke, and the position of her steam-cones was anywhere. All about her course the sea was spotted with wobbling splendours of the low sun, large coarse blots of glory near the eye, but lessening to a smaller pattern in the distance, and at the horizon refined to a homogeneous band of livid silver.

The double speed of the Boreal and the other, hastening opposite ways, must have been thirty-eight or forty knots, and the meeting was accomplished in certainly less than five minutes: yet into that time I crowded years of life. I was shouting passionately at her, my eyes starting from my head, my face all inflamed with rage the most prone, loud and urgent. For she did not stop, nor signal, nor make sign of seeing me, but came furrowing down upon me like Juggernaut, with steadfast run. I lost reason, thought, memory, purpose, sense of relation, in that access of delirium which transported me, and can only remember now that in the midst of my shouting, a word, uttered by the fiends who used my throat to express their frenzy, set me laughing high and madly: for I was crying: 'Hi! Bravo! Why don't you stop? Madmen! I have been to the Pole!'

That instant an odour arose, and came, and struck upon my brain, most detestable, most execrable; and while one might count ten, I was aware of her near-sounding engines, and that cursed charnel went tearing past me on her maenad way, not fifteen yards from my eyes and nostrils. She was a thing, my God, from which the vulture and the jackal, prowling for offal, would fly with shrieks of loathing. I had a glimpse of decks piled thick with her festered dead.

In big black letters on the round retreating yellow stern my eye-corner caught the word Yaroslav, as I bent over the rail to retch and cough and vomit at her. She was a horrid thing.

This ship had certainly been pretty far south in tropical or sub-tropical latitudes with her great crowd of dead: for all the bodies which I had seen till then, so far from smelling ill, seemed to give out a certain perfume of the peach. She was evidently one of those many ships of late years which have substituted liquid air for steam, yet retained their old steam-funnels, &c., in case of emergency: for air, I believe, was still looked at askance by several builders, on account of the terrible accidents which it sometimes caused. The Boreal herself is a similar instance of both motors. This vessel, the Yaroslav, must have been left with working engines when her crew were overtaken by death, and, her air-tanks being still unexhausted, must have been ranging the ocean with impunity ever since, during I knew not how many months, or, it might be, years.

Well, I coasted Norway for nearly a hundred and sixty miles without once going nearer land than two or three miles: for something held me back. But passing the fjord-mouth where I knew that Aadheim was, I suddenly turned the helm to port, almost before I knew that I was doing it, and made for land.

In half an hour I was moving up an opening in the land with mountains on either hand, streaky crags at their summit, umbrageous bosage below; and the whole softened, as it were, by veils woven of the rainbow.

This arm of water lies curved about like a thread which one drops, only the curves are much more pointed, so that every few minutes the scene was changed, though the vessel just crawled her way up, and I could see behind me nothing of what was passed, or only a land-locked gleam like a lake.

I never saw water so polished and glassy, like clarid polished marble, reflecting everything quite clean-cut in its lucid abysm, over which hardly the faintest zephyr breathed that still sun-down; it wimpled about the bluff Boreal, which seemed to move as if careful not to bruise it, in rich wrinkles and creases, like glycerine, or dewy-trickling lotus-oil; yet it was only the sea: and the spectacle yonder was only crags, and autumn-foliage and mountain-slope: yet all seemed caught-up and chaste, rapt in a trance of rose and purple, and made of the stuff of dreams and bubbles, of pollen-of-flowers, and rinds of the peach.

I saw it not only with delight, but with complete astonishment: having forgotten, as was too natural in all that long barrenness of ice and sea, that anything could be so ethereally fair: yet homely, too, human, familiar, and consoling. The air here was richly spiced with that peachy scent, and there was a Sabbath and a nepenthe and a charm in that place at that hour, as it were of those gardens of Hesperus, and fields of asphodel, reserved for the spirits of the just.

Alas! but I had the glass at my side, and for me nepenthe was mixed with a despair immense as the vault of heaven, my good God: for anon I would take it up to spy some perched hut of the peasant, or burg of the ‘bonder,’ on the peaks: and I saw no one there; and to the left, at the third marked bend of the fjord, where there is one of those watch-towers that these people used for watching in-coming fish, I spied, lying on a craggy slope just before the tower, a body which looked as if it must surely tumble head-long, but did not. And when I saw that, I felt definitely, for the first time, that shoreless despair which I alone of men have felt, high beyond the stars, and deep as hell; and I fell to staring again that blank stare of Nirvana and the lunacy of Nothingness, wherein Time merges in Eternity, and all being, like one drop of water, flies scattered to fill the bottomless void of space, and is lost.

The Boreal's bow walking over a little empty fishing-boat roused me, and a minute later, just before I came to a new promontory and bend, I saw two people. The shore there is some three feet above the water, and edged with boulders of rock, about which grows a fringe of shrubs and small trees: behind this fringe is a path, curving upward through a sombre wooded little gorge; and on the path, near the water, I saw a driver of one of those Norwegian sulkies that were called karjolers: he, on the high front seat, was dead, lying sideways and backwards, with low head resting on the wheel; and on a trunk strapped to a frame on the axle behind was a boy, his head, too, resting sideways on the wheel, near the other's; and the little pony was dead, pitched forward on its head and fore-knees, tilting the shafts downward; and some distance from them on the water floated an empty skiff.

When I turned the next fore-land, I all at once began to see a number of craft, which increased as I advanced, most of them small boats, with some schooners, sloops, and larger craft, the majority a-ground: and suddenly now I was conscious that, mingling with that delicious odour of spring-blossoms — profoundly modifying, yet not destroying it — was another odour, wafted to me on the wings of the very faint land-breeze: and ‘Man,’ I said, ‘is decomposing’: for I knew it well: it was the odour of human corruption.

The fjord opened finally in a somewhat wider basin, shut-in by quite steep, high-towering mountains, which reflected themselves in the water to their last cloudy crag: and, at the end of this I saw ships, a quay, and a modest, homely old town.

Not a sound, not one: only the languidly-working engines of the Boreal. Here, it was clear, the Angel of Silence had passed, and his scythe mown.

I ran and stopped the engines, and, without anchoring, got down into an empty boat that lay at the ship’s side when she stopped; and I paddled twenty yards toward the little quay. There was a brigantine with all her courses set, three jibs, stay-sails, square-sails, main and fore-sails, and gaff-top-sail, looking hanging and listless in that calm place, and wedded to a still copy of herself, mast-downward, in the water; there were three lumber-schooners, a forty-ton steam-boat, a tiny barque, five Norway herring-fishers, and ten or twelve shallops: and the sailing-craft had all fore-and-aft sails set, and about each, as I passed among them, brooded an odour that was both sweet and abhorrent, an odour more suggestive of the very genius of mortality — the inner mind and meaning of Azrael — than aught that I could have conceived: for all, as I soon saw, were crowded with dead.

Well, I went up the old mossed steps, in that strange dazed state in which one notices frivolous things: I remember, for instance, feeling the lightness of my new clothes: for the weather was quite mild, and the day before I had changed to Summer things, having on now only a common undyed woollen shirt, the sleeves rolled up, and cord trousers, with a belt, and a cloth cap over my long hair, and an old pair of yellow shoes, without laces, and without socks. And I stood on the unhewn stones of the edge of the quay, and looked abroad over a largish piece of unpaved ground, which lay between the first house-row and the quay.

What I saw was not only most woeful, but wildly startling: woeful, because a great crowd of people had assembled, and lay dead, there; and wildly startling, because something in their tout ensemble told me in one minute why they were there in such number.

They were there in the hope, and with the thought, to fly westward by boat.

And the something which told me this was a certain foreign air about that field of the dead as the eye rested on it, something un-northern, southern, and Oriental.

Two yards from my feet, as I stepped to the top, lay a group of three: one a Norway peasant-girl in skirt of olive-green, scarlet stomacher, embroidered bodice, Scotch bonnet trimmed with silver lace, and big silver shoe-buckles; the second was an old Norway man in knee-breeches, and eighteenth-century small-clothes, and red worsted cap; and the third was, I decided, an old Jew of the Polish Pale, in gaberdine and skull-cap, with ear-locks.

I went nearer to where they lay thick as reaped stubble between the quay and a little stone fountain in the middle of the space, and I saw among those northern dead two dark-skinned women in costly dress, either Spanish or Italian, and the yellower mortality of a Mongolian, probably a Magyar, and a big negro in zouave dress, and some twenty-five obvious French, and two Morocco fezes, and the green turban of a shereef, and the white of an Ulema.

And I asked myself this question: 'How came these foreign stragglers here in this obscure northern town?'

And my wild heart answered: 'There has been an impassioned stampede, northward and westward, of all the tribes of Man. And this that I, Adam Jeffson, here see is but the far-tossed spray of that monstrous, infuriate flood.'

Well, I passed up a street before me, careful, careful where I trod. It was not utterly silent, nor was the quay-square, but haunted by a pretty dense cloud of mosquitoes, and dreamy twinges of music, like the drawing of the violin-bow in elf-land. The street was narrow, paved, steep, and dark; and the sensations with which I, poor bent man, passed through that dead town, only Atlas, fabled to bear the burden of this Earth, could divine.

I thought to myself: If now a wave from the Deep has washed over this planetary ship of earth, and I, who alone happened to be in the extreme bows, am the sole survivor of that crew?... What then, my God, shall I do?

I felt, I felt, that in this townlet, save the water-gnats of Norway, was no living thing; that the hum and the savour of Eternity filled, and wrapped, and embalmed it.

The houses are mostly of wood, some of them fairly large, with a porte-cochère leading into a semi-circular yard, around which the building stands, very steep-roofed, and shingled, in view of the heavy snow-masses of winter. Glancing into one open casement near the ground, I saw an aged woman, stout and capped, lie on her face before a very large porcelain stove; but I paced on without stoppage, traversed several streets, and came out, as it became dark, upon a piece of grass-land leading downward to a mountain-gorge. It was some distance along this gorge that I found myself sitting the next morning: and how, and in what trance, I passed that whole blank night is obliterated from my consciousness. When I looked about with the return of light I saw majestic fir-grown mountains on either hand, almost meeting overhead at some points, deeply shading the mossy gorge. I rose, and careless of direction, went still onward, and walked and walked for hours, unconscious of hunger; there was a profusion of wild mountain-strawberries, very tiny, which must grow almost into winter, a few of which I ate; there were blue gentianellas, and lilies-of-the-valley, and luxuriance of verdure, and a noise of waters. Occasionally, I saw little cataracts on high, fluttering like white wild rags, for they broke in the mid-fall, and were caught away, and scattered; patches also of reaped hay and barley, hung up, in a singular way, on stakes six feet high, I suppose to dry; there were perched huts, and a seemingly inaccessible small castle or burg, but none of these did I enter: and five bodies only I saw in the gorge, a woman with a babe, and a man with two small oxen.

About three in the afternoon I was startled to find myself there, and turned back. It was dark when I again passed through those gloomy streets of Aadheim, making for the quay, and now I felt both my hunger and a dropping weariness. I had no thought of entering any house, but as I passed by one open porte-cochère, something, I know not what, made me turn sharply in, for my mind had become as fluff on the winds, not working of its own action, but the sport of impulses that seemed external. I went across the yard, and ascended a wooden spiral stair by a twilight which just enabled me to pick my way among five or six vague forms fallen there. In that confined place fantastic qualms beset me; I mounted to the first landing, and tried the door, but it was locked; I mounted to the second: the door was open, and with a chill reluctance I took a step inward where all was pitch darkness, the window-stores being drawn. I hesitated: it was very dark. I tried to utter that word of mine, but it came in a whisper inaudible to my ears: I tried again, and this time heard myself say: ‘anyone?’ At the same time I had made another step forward, and trodden upon a soft abdomen; and at that contact terrors the most cold and ghastly thrilled me through and through, for it was as though I saw in that darkness the sudden eyeballs of Hell and frenzy glare upon me, and with a low gurgle of affright I was gone, helter-skelter down the stairs, treading upon flesh, across the yard, and down the street, with pelting feet, and open arms, and sobbing bosom, for I thought that all Aadheim was after me; nor was my horrid haste appeased till I was on board the Boreal, and moving down the fjord.

Out to sea, then, I went again; and within the next few days I visited Bergen, and put in at Stavanger. And I saw that Bergen and Stavanger were dead.

It was then, on the 19th August, that I turned my bow toward my native land.

From Stavanger I steered a straight course for the Humber.

I had no sooner left behind me the Norway coast than I began to meet the ships, the ships — ship after ship; and by the time I entered the zone of the ordinary alternation of sunny day and sunless night, I was moving through the midst of an incredible number of craft, a mighty and wide-spread fleet.

Over all that great expanse of the North Sea, where, in its most populous days of trade, the sailor might perhaps sight a sail or two, I had now at every moment at least ten or twelve within scope of the glass, oftentimes as many as forty, forty-five.

And very still they lay on a still sea, itself a dead thing, livid as the lips of death; and there was an intensity in the calm that was appalling: for the ocean seemed weighted, and the air drugged.

Extremely slow was my advance, for at first I would not leave any ship, however remotely small, without approaching sufficiently to investigate her, at least with the spy-glass: and a strange multitudinous mixture of species they were, trawlers in hosts, war-ships of every nation, used, it seemed, as passenger-boats, smacks, feluccas, liners, steam-barges, great four-masters with sails, Channel boats, luggers, a Venetian burchiello, colliers, yachts, remorqueurs, training ships, dredgers, two dahabeeahs with curving gaffs, Marseilles fishers, a Maltese speronare, American off-shore sail, Mississippi steam-boats, Sorrento lug-schooners, Rhine punts, yawls, old frigates and three-deckers, called to novel use, Stromboli caiques, Yarmouth tubs, xebecs, Rotterdam flat-bottoms, floats, mere gunwaled rafts — anything from anywhere that could bear a human freight on water had come, and was here: and all, I knew, had been making westward, or northward, or both; and all, I knew, were crowded; and all were tombs, listlessly wandering, my God, on the wandering sea with their dead.

And so fair was the world about them, too: the brightest suavest autumn weather; all the still air aromatic with that vernal perfume of peach: yet not so utterly still, but if I passed close to the lee of any floating thing, the spicy stirrings of morning or evening wafted me faint puffs of the odour of mortality over-ripe for the grave.

So abominable and accursed did this become to me, such a plague and a hissing, vague as was the offence, that I began to shun rather than seek the ships, and also I now dropped my twelve, whom I had kept to be my companions all the way from the Far North, one by one, into the sea: for now I had definitely passed into a zone of settled warmth.

I was convinced, however, that the poison, whatever it might be, had some embalming, or antiseptic, effect upon the bodies: at Aadheim, Bergen and Stavanger, for instance, where the temperature permitted me to go without a jacket, only the merest hints and whiffs of the processes of dissolution had troubled me.

Very benign, I say, and pleasant to see, was sky and sea during all that voyage: but it was at sun-set that my sense of the wondrously beautiful was roused and excited, in spite of that great burden which I carried. Certainly, I never saw sun-sets resembling those, nor could have conceived of aught so flamboyant, extravagant, and bewitched: for the whole heaven seemed turned into an arena for warring Hierarchies, warring for the universe, or it was like the wild countenance of God defeated, and flying marred and bloody from His enemies. But many evenings I watched with unintelligent awe, believing it but a portent of the un-sheathed sword of the Almighty; till, one morning, a thought pricked me like a sword, for I suddenly remembered the great sun-sets of the later nineteenth century, witnessed in Europe, America, and, I believe, over the world, after the eruption of the volcano of Krakatoa.

And whereas I had before said to myself: 'If now a wave from the Deep has washed over this planetary ship of earth...', I said now: 'A wave — but not from the Deep: a wave rather which she had reserved, and has spouted, from her own un-motherly entrails...'

I had some knowledge of Morse telegraphy, and of the manipulation of tape-machines, telegraphic typing-machines, and the ordinary wireless transmitter and coherer, as of most little things of that sort which came within the outskirts of the interest of a man of science; I had collaborated with Professor Stanistreet in the production of a text-book called 'Applications of Science to the Arts,' which had brought us some notoriety; and, on the whole, the minutiae of modern things were still pretty fresh in my memory. I could therefore have wired from Bergen or Stavanger, supposing the batteries not run down, to somewhere: but I would not: I was so afraid; afraid lest for ever from nowhere should come one answering click, or flash, or stirring....

I could have made short work, and landed at Hull: but I would not: I was so afraid. For I was used to the silence of the ice: and I was used to the silence of the sea: but I was afraid of the silence of England.

I came in sight of the coast on the morning of the 26th August, somewhere about Hornsea, but did not see any town, for I put the helm to port, and went on further south, no longer bothering with the instruments, but coasting at hap-hazard, now in sight of land, and now in the centre of a circle of sea; not admitting to myself the motive of this loitering slowness, nor thinking at all, but ignoring the deep-buried fear of the to-morrow which I shirked, and instinctively hiding myself in to-day. I passed the Wash, I passed Yarmouth, Felixstowe. By now the things that floated motionless on the sea were beyond numbering, for I could hardly lower my eyes ten minutes and lift them, without seeing yet another there: so that soon after dusk I, too, had to lie still among them all, till morning: for they lay dark, and to move at any pace would have been to drown the already dead.

Well, I came to the Thames-mouth, and lay pretty well in among the Flats and Pan Sands towards eight one evening, not seven miles from Sheppey and the North Kent coast: and I did not see any Nore Light, nor Girdler Light: and all along the coast I had seen no light: but as to that I said not one word to myself, not admitting it, nor letting my heart know what my brain thought, nor my brain know what my heart surmised; but with a daft and mock-mistrustful under-look I would regard the darkling land, holding it a sentient thing that would be playing a prank upon a poor man like me.

And the next morning, when I moved again, my furtive eye-corners were very well aware of the Prince's Channel light-ship, and also the Tongue ship, for there they were: but I would not look at them at all, nor go near them: for I did not wish to have anything to do with whatever might have happened beyond my own ken, and it was better to look straight before, seeing nothing, and concerning one's-self with one's-self.

The next evening, after having gone out to sea again, I was in a little to the E. by S. of the North Foreland: and I saw no light there, nor any Sandhead light; but over the sea vast signs of wreckage, and the coasts were strewn with old wrecked fleets. I turned about S.E., very slowly moving — for anywhere hereabouts hundreds upon hundreds of craft lay dead within a ten-mile circle of sea — and by two in the fore-day had wandered up well in sight of the French cliffs: for I had said: 'I will go and see the light-beam of the great revolving-drum on Calais pier that nightly beams half-way over-sea to England.' And the moon shone clear in the southern heaven that morning, like a great old dying queen whose Court swarms distantly from around her, diffident, pale, and tremulous, the paler the nearer; and I could see the mountain-shadows on her spotty full-face, and her misty aureole, and her lights on the sea, as it were kisses stolen in the kingdom of sleep; and all among the quiet ships mysterious white trails and powderings of light, like palace-corridors in some fairy-land forlorn, full of breathless wan whispers, scandals, and runnings-to-and-fro, with leers, and agitated last embraces, and flight of the princess, and death-bed of the king; and on the N.E. horizon a bank of brown cloud that seemed to have no relation with the world; and yonder, not far, the white coast-cliffs, not so low as at Calais near, but arranged in masses separated by vales of sward, each with its wreck: but no light of any revolving-drum I saw.

I could not sleep that night: for all the operations of my mind and body seemed in abeyance. Mechanically I turned the ship westward again; and when the sun came up, there, hardly two miles from me, were the cliffs of Dover; and on the crenulated summit of the Castle I spied the Union Jack hang motionless.

I heard eight, nine o'clock strike in the cabin, and I was still at sea. But some mad, audacious whisper was at my brain: and at 10.30, the 2nd September, immediately opposite the Cross Wall Custom House, the Boreal's anchor-chain, after a voyage of three years, two months, and fourteen days, ran thundering, thundering, through the starboard hawse-hole.

Ah heaven! but I must have been stark mad to let the anchor go! for the effect upon me of that shocking obstreperous hubbub, breaking in upon all that cemetery repose that blessed morning, and lasting it seemed a year, was most appalling; and at the sudden racket I stood excruciated, with shivering knees and flinching heart, God knows: for not less terrifically uproarious than the clatter of the last Trump it raged and raged, and I thought that all the billion dead could not fail to start, and rise, at alarum so excessive, and question me with their eyes....

On the top of the Cross Wall near I saw a grey crab fearlessly crawl; at the end where the street begins, I saw a single gas-light palely burn that broad day, and at its foot a black man lay on his face, clad only in a shirt and one boot; the harbour was almost packed with every sort of craft, and on a Calais-Dover boat, eight yards from my stern, which must have left Calais crowded to suffocation, I saw the rotted dead lie heaped, she being unmoored, and continually grinding against an anchored green brig.

And when I saw that, I dropped down upon my knees at the capstan, and my poor heart sobbed out the frail cry: 'Well, Lord God, Thou hast destroyed the work of Thy hand...'

After a time I got up, went below in a state of somnambulism, took a packet of pemmican cakes, leapt to land, and went following the railway that runs from the Admiralty Pier. In an enclosed passage ten yards long, with railway masonry on one side, I saw five dead lie, and could not believe that I was in England, for all were dark-skinned people, three gaudily dressed, and two in flowing white robes. It was the same when I turned into a long street, leading northward, for here were a hundred, or more, and never saw I, except in Constantinople, where I once lived eighteen months, so variegated a mixture of races, black, brunette, brown, yellow, white, in all the shades, some emaciated like people dead from hunger, and, overlooking them all, one English boy with a clean Eton collar sitting on a bicycle, supported by a lamp-post which his arms clasped, he proving clearly the extraordinary suddenness of the death which had overtaken them all.

I did not know whither, nor why, I went, nor had I the least idea whether all this was visually seen by me in the world which I had known, or in some other, or was all phantasy of my disembodied spirit — for I had the thought that I, too, might be dead since old ages, and my spirit wandering now through the universe of space, in which there is neither north nor south, nor up nor down, nor measure nor relation, nor aught whatever, save an uneasy consciousness of a dream about bottomlessness. Of grief or pain, I think, I felt nothing; though I have a sort of memory now that some sound, resembling a sob or groan, though it was neither, came at regular clockwork intervals from my bosom during three or four days. Meantime, my brain registered like a tape-machine details the most frivolous, the most ludicrous — the name of a street, Strond Street, Snargate Street; the round fur cap — black fur for the side, white ermine for the top — of a portly Karaite priest on his back, whose robes had been blown to his spread knees, as if lifted and neatly folded there; a violin-bow gripped between the thick, irregular teeth of a little Spaniard with brushed-back hair and mad-looking eyes; odd shoes on the foot of a French girl, one black, one brown. They lay in the street about as numerous as gunners who fall round their carriage, at intervals of five to ten feet, the majority — as was the case also in Norway, and on the ships — in poses of distraction, with spread arms, or wildly distorted limbs, like men who, the instant before death, called upon the rocks and hills to cover them.

On the left I came to an opening in the land, called, I believe, ‘The Shaft,’ and into this I turned, climbing a very great number of steps, almost covered at one point with dead: the steps I began to count, but left off, then the dead, and left off. Finally, at the top, which must be even higher than the Castle, I came to a great open space laid out with gravel-walks, and saw fortifications, barracks, a citadel. I did not know the town, except by passings-through, and was surprised at the breadth of view. Between me and the Castle to the east lay the district of crowding houses, brick and ragstone, mixed in the distance with vague azure haze; and to the right the harbour, the sea, with their ships; and visible around me on the heights seven or eight dead, biting the dust; the sun now high and warm, with hardly a cloud in the sky; and yonder a mist, which was the coast of France.

It seemed too big for one poor man.

My head nodded. I sat on a bench, black-painted and hard, the seat and back of horizontal boards, with intervals; and as I looked, I nodded, heavy-headed and weary: for it was too big for me. And as I nodded, with forehead propped on my left hand, and the packet of pemmican cakes in my right, there was in my head, somehow, an old street-song of my childhood: and I groaned it sleepily, like coronachs and drear funereal nenias, dirging; and the packet beat time in my right hand, falling and raising, falling heavily and rising, in time.

Ting, ting,

Won't we be happy?

Ting, ting,

That shall be it:

So maundering, I fell forward upon my face, and for twenty-three hours, the living undistinguished from the dead, I slept there.

I was awakened by drizzle, leapt up, looked at a silver chronometer which, attached by a leather to my belt, I carried in my breeches-pocket, and saw that it was 10 A.M. The sky was dark, and a moaning wind — almost a new thing now to me — had arisen.

I ate some pemmican, for I had a reluctance — needless as it turned out — to touch any of the thousand luxuries here, sufficient no doubt, in a town like Dover alone, to last me five or six hundred years, if I could live so long; and, having eaten, I descended The Shaft, and spent the whole day, though it rained and blustered continually, in wandering about. Reasoning, in my numb way, from the number of ships on the sea, I expected to find the town over-crowded with dead: but this was not so; and I should say, at a venture, that not a thousand English, nor fifteen thousand foreigners, were in it: for that westward rage and stampede must have operated here also, leaving the town empty but for the ever new-coming hosts.

The first thing which I did was to go into an open grocer's shop, which was also a post and telegraph office, with the notion, I suppose, to get a message through to London. In the shop a single gas-light was burning its last, and this, with that near the pier, were the only two that I saw: and ghastly enough they looked, transparently wannish, and as it were ashamed, like blinking night-things overtaken by the glare of day. I conjectured that they had so burned and watched during months, or years: for they were now blazing diminished, with streaks and rays in the flame, as if by effort, and if these were the only two, they must have needed time to all-but exhaust the works. Before the counter lay a fashionably-dressed negro with a number of tied parcels scattered about him, and on the counter an empty till, and behind it a tall thin woman with her face resting sideways in the till, fingers clutching the outer counter-rim, and such an expression of frantic terror as I never saw. I got over the counter to a table behind a wire-gauze, and, like a numb fool, went over the Morse alphabet in my mind before touching the transmitting key, though I knew no code-words, and there, big enough to be seen, was the ABC dial, and who was to answer my message I did not ask myself: for habit was still strong upon me, and my mind refused to reason from what I saw to what I did not see; but the moment I touched the key, and peered greedily at the galvanometer-needle at my right, I saw that it did not move, for no current was passing; and with a kind of fright, I was up, leapt, and got away from the place, though there was a great number of telegrams about the receiver which, if I had been in my senses, I would have stopped and read.

Turning the corner of the next street, I saw wide-open the door of a substantial large house, and went in. From bottom to top there was no one there, except one English girl, sitting back in an easy-chair in the drawing-room, which was richly furnished with Valenciennes curtains and azure-satin things. She was a girl of the lowest class, hardly clad in black rags, and there she lay with hanging jaw, in a very crooked and awkward pose, a jemmy at her feet, in her left hand a roll of bank-notes, and in her lap three watches. In fact, the bodies which I saw here were, in general, either those of new-come foreigners, or else of the very poor, the very old, or the very young.

But what made me remember this house was that I found here on one of the sofas a newspaper: The Kent Express; and sitting unconscious of my dead neighbour, I pored a long while over what was written there.

It said in a passage which I tore out and kept:

‘Telegraphic communication with Tilsit, Insterburg, Warsaw, Cracow, Przemysl, Gross Wardein, Karlsburg, and many smaller towns lying immediately eastward of the 21st parallel of longitude has ceased during the night. In some at least of them there must have been operators still at their duty, undrawn into the great westward-rushing torrent: but as all messages from Western Europe have been answered only by that dread mysterious silence which, just three months and two days since, astounded the world in the case of Eastern New Zealand, we can only assume that these towns, too, have been added to the long and mournful list; indeed, after last evening’s Paris telegrams we might have prophesied with some certainty, not merely their overthrow, but even the hour of it: for the rate-uniformity of the slow-riding vapour which is touring our globe is no longer doubtful, and has even been definitely fixed by Professor Craven at 100-1/2 miles per day, or 4 miles 330 yards per hour. Its nature, its origin, remains, of course, nothing but matter of conjecture: for it leaves no living thing behind it: nor, God knows, is that of any moment now to us who remain. The rumour that it is associated with an odour of almonds is declared, on high authority, to be improbable; but the morose purple of its impending gloom has been attested by tardy fugitives from the face of its rolling and smoky march.

‘Is this the end? We do not, and cannot, believe it. Will the pure sky which we to-day see above us be invaded in nine days, or less, by this smoke of the Pit of Darkness? In spite of the assurances of the scientists, we still doubt. For, if so, to what purpose that long drama of History, in which we seem to see the Hand of the Dramaturgist? Surely, the end of a Fifth Act should be obvious, satisfying to one’s sense of the complete: but History, so far, long as it has been, resembles rather a Prologue than a Fifth Act. Can it be that the Manager, utterly dissatisfied, would sweep all off, and ‘hang up’ the piece for ever? Certainly, the sins of mankind have been as scarlet: and if the fair earth which he has turned into Hell, send forth now upon him the smoke of Hell, little the wonder. But we cannot yet believe. There is a sparing strain in nature, and through the world, as a thread, is spun a silence which smiles, and on the end of events we find placarded large the words: "Why were ye afraid?" A dignified Hope, therefore — even now, when we cower beneath this worldwide shadow of the wings of the Condor of Death — becomes us: and, indeed, we see such an attitude among some of the humblest of our people, from whose heart ascends the cry: "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Here, therefore, O Lord! O Lord, look down, and save!

‘But even as we thus write of hope, Reason, if we would hear her, whispers us “fool”: and inclement is the sky of earth. No more ships can New York Harbour contain, and whereas among us men die weekly of privations by the hundred thousand, yonder across the sea they perish by the million: for where the rich are pinched, how can the poor live? Already 700 out of the 1000 millions of our race have perished, and the empires of civilisation have crumbled like sand-castles in a horror of anarchy. Thousands upon thousands of unburied dead, anticipating the more deliberate doom that comes and smokes, and rides and comes and comes, and does not fail, encumber the streets of London, Manchester, Liverpool. The guides of the nation have fled; the father stabs his child, and the wife her husband, for a morsel of food; the fields lie waste; wanton crowds carouse in our churches, universities, palaces, banks and hospitals; we understand that late last night three territorial regiments, the Munster Fusiliers, and the Lotian and East Lancashire Regiments, riotously disbanded themselves, shooting two officers; infectious diseases, as we all know, have spread beyond limit; in several towns the police seem to have disappeared, and, in nearly all, every vestige of decency; the results following upon the sudden release of the convicts appear to be monstrous in the respective districts; and within three short months Hell seems to have acquired this entire planet, sending forth Horror, like a rabid wolf, and Despair, like a disastrous sky, to devour and confound her. Hear, therefore, O Lord, and forgive our iniquities! O Lord, we beseech Thee! Look down, O Lord, and spare!’

When I had read this, and the rest of the paper, which had one whole sheet-side blank, I sat a long hour there, eyeing a little patch of the purple ash on a waxed board near the corner where the girl sat with her time-pieces, so useless in her Eternity; and there was not a feeling in me, except a pricking of curiosity, which afterwards became morbid and ravenous, to know something more of that cloud, or smoke, of which this man spoke, of its dates, its origin, its nature, its minute details. Afterwards, I went down, and entered several houses, searching for more papers, but did not find any; then I found a paper-shop which was open, with boards outside, but either it had been deserted, or printing must have stopped about the date of the paper which I had read, for the only three news-papers there were dated long prior, and I did not read them.

Now it was raining, and a blustering autumn day it was, distributing the odours of the world, and bringing me continual mixed whiffs of flowers and the hateful stench of decay. But I would not mind it much.

I wandered and wandered, till I was tired of spahi and bashi-bazouk, of Greek and Catalan, of Russian ‘pope’ and Coptic abuna, of dragoman and Calmuck, of Egyptian maulawi and Afghan mullah, Neapolitan and sheik, and the nightmare of wild poses, colours, stuffs and garbs, the yellow-green keffie of the Bedouin, shawl-turbans of Baghdad, the voluminous rose-silk tob of women, and face-veils, and stark distorted nakedness, and sashes of figured muslin, and the workman's cords, and the red tarboosh. About four, for very weariness, I was sitting on a door-steep, bent beneath the rain; but soon was up again, fascinated no doubt by this changing bazaar of sameness, its chance combinations and permutations, and novelty in monotony. About five I was at a station, marked Harbour Station, in and about which lay a considerable crowd, but not one train. I sat again, and rested, rose and roamed again; soon after six I found myself at another station, called 'Priory'; and here I saw two long trains, both crowded, one on a siding, and one at the up-platform.

I examined both engines, and found them of the old boiler steam-type with manholes, heaters, autoclaves, feed-pump, &c., now rare in western countries, except England. In one there was no water, but in that at the platform, the float-lever, barely tilted toward the float, showed that there was some in the boiler. Of this one I overhauled all the machinery, and found it good, though rusted. There was plenty of fuel, and oil, which I supplemented from a near shop: and during ninety minutes my brain and hands worked with an intelligence as it were automatic, of their own motion. After three journeys across the station and street, I saw the fire blaze well, and the manometer move; when the lever of the safety-valve, whose load I lightened by half an atmosphere, lifted, I jumped down, and tried to disconnect the long string of carriages from the engine: but failed, the coupling being an automatic arrangement new to me; nor did I care. It was now very dark; but there was still oil for bull's-eye and lantern, and I lit them. I forgot nothing. I rolled driver and stoker — the guard was absent — one to the platform, one upon the rails: and I took their place there. At about 8.30 I ran out from Dover, my throttle-valve pealing high a long falsetto through the bleak and desolate night.

My aim was London. But even as I set out, my heart smote me: I knew nothing of the metals, their junctions, facing-points, sidings, shuntings, and complexities. Even as to whether I was going toward, or away from, London, I was not sure. But just in proportion as my first timorousness of the engine hardened into familiarity and self-sureness, I quickened speed, wilfully, with an obstinacy deaf and blind.

Finally, from a mere crawl at first, I was flying at a shocking velocity, while something, tongue in cheek, seemed to whisper me: 'There must be other trains blocking the lines, at stations, in yards, and everywhere — it is a maniac's ride, a ride of death, and Flying Dutchman's frenzy: remember your dark five-deep brigade of passengers, who rock and bump together, and will suffer in a collision.' But with mulish stubbornness I thought: 'They wished to go to London'; and on I raged, not wildly exhilarated, so far as I can remember, nor lunatic, but feeling the dull glow of a wicked and morose Unreason urge in my bosom, while I stoked all blackened at the fire, or saw the vague mass of dead horse or cow, running trees and fields, and dark homestead and deep-slumbering farm, flit ghostly athwart the murky air, as the half-blind saw 'men like trees walking.'

Long, however, it did not last: I could not have been twenty miles from Dover when, on a long reach of straight lines, I made out before me a tarpaulined mass opposite a signal-point: and at once callousness changed to terror within me. But even as I plied the brake, I felt that it was too late: I rushed to the gangway to make a wild leap down an embankment to the right, but was thrown backward by a quick series of rough bumps, caused by eight or ten cattle which lay there across the lines: and when I picked myself up, and leapt, some seconds before the impact, the speed must have considerably slackened, for I received no fracture, but lay in semi-coma in a patch of yellow-flowered whin on level ground, and was even conscious of a fire on the lines forty yards away, and, all the night, of vague thunder sounding from somewhere.

About five, or half-past, in the morning I was sitting up, rubbing my eyes, in a dim light mixed with drizzle. I could see that the train of my last night's debauch was a huddled-up chaos of fallen carriages and disfigured bodies. A five-barred gate on my left opened into a hedge, and swung with creaks: two yards from my feet lay a little shaggy pony with swollen wan abdomen, the very picture of death, and also about me a number of dead wet birds.

I picked myself up, passed through the gate, and walked up a row of trees to a house at their end. I found it to be a little country-tavern with a barn, forming one house, the barn part much larger than the tavern part. I went into the tavern by a small side-door — behind the bar — into a parlour — up a little stair — into two rooms: but no one was there. I then went round into the barn, which was paved with cobble-stones, and there lay a dead mare and foal, some fowls, with two cows. A ladder-stair led to a closed trap-door in the floor above. I went up, and in the middle of a wilderness of hay saw nine people — labourers, no doubt — five men and four women, huddled together, and with them a tin-pail containing the last of some spirit; so that these had died merry.

I slept three hours among them, and afterwards went back to the tavern, and had some biscuits of which I opened a new tin, with some ham, jam and apples, of which I made a good meal, for my pemmican was gone.

Afterwards I went following the rail-track on foot, for the engines of both the collided trains were smashed. I knew northward from southward by the position of the sun: and after a good many stoppages at houses, and by railway-banks, I came, at about eleven in the night, to a great and populous town.

By the Dane John and the Cathedral, I immediately recognised it as Canterbury, which I knew quite well. And I walked up Castle Street to the High Street, conscious for the first time of that regularly-repeated sound, like a sob or groan, which was proceeding from my throat. As there was no visible moon, and these old streets very dim, I had to pick my way, lest I should desecrate the dead with my foot, and they all should rise with hue and cry to hunt me. However, the bodies here were not numerous, most, as before, being foreigners: and these, scattered about this strict old English burg that mourning dark night, presented such a scene of the baneful wrath of God, and all abomination of desolation, as broke me quite down at one place, where I stood in travail with jeremiads and sore sobbings and lamentations, crying out upon it all, God knows.

Only when I stood at the west entrance of the Cathedral I could discern, spreading up the dark nave, to the lantern, to the choir, a phantasmagorical mass of forms: I went a little inward, and striking three matches, peered nearer: the two transepts, too, seemed crowded — the cloister-doorway was blocked — the southwest porch thronged, so that a great congregation must have flocked hither shortly before their fate overtook them.

Here it was that I became definitely certain that the after-odour of the poison was not simply lingering in the air, but was being more or less given off by the bodies: for the blossomy odour of this church actually overcame that other odour, the whole rather giving the scent of old mouldy linens long embalmed in cedars.

Well, away with stealthy trot I ran from the abysmal silence of that place, and in Palace Street near made one of those sudden immoderate rackets that seemed to outrage the universe, and left me so woefully faint, decrepit, and gasping for life (the noise of the train was different, for there I was flying, but here a captive, and which way I ran was capture). Passing in Palace Street, I saw a little lampshop, and wanting a lantern, tried to get in, but the door was locked; so, after going a few steps, and kicking against a policeman's truncheon, I returned to break the window-glass. I knew that it would make a fearful noise, and for some fifteen or twenty minutes stood hesitating: but never could I have dreamed, my good God, of such a noise, so passionate, so dominant, so divulgent, and, O Heaven, so long-lasting: for I seemed to have struck upon the weak spot of some planet, which came suddenly tumbling, with protracted bellowing and débâcle, about my ears. It was a good hour before I would climb in; but then quickly found what I wanted, and some big oil-cans; and till one or two in the morning, the innovating flicker of my lantern went peering at random into the gloomy nooks of the town.

Under a deep old Gothic arch that spanned a paved alley, I saw the little window of a little house of rubble, and between the two diamond-paned sashes rags tightly beaten in, the idea evidently being to make the place air-tight against the poison. When I went in I found the door of that room open, though it, too, apparently, had been stuffed at the edges; and on the threshold an old man and woman lay low. I conjectured that, thus protected, they had remained shut in, till either hunger, or the lack of oxygen in the used-up air, drove them forth, whereupon the poison, still active, must have instantly ended them. I found afterwards that this expedient of making air-tight had been widely resorted to; and it might well have proved successful, if both the supply of inclosed air, and of food, had been anywhere commensurate with the durability of the poisonous state.

Weary, weary as I grew, some morbid persistence sustained me, and I would not rest. About four in the morning I was at a station again, industriously bending, poor wretch, at the sooty task of getting another engine ready for travel. This time, when steam was up, I succeeded in uncoupling the carriages from the engine, and by the time morning broke, I was lightly gliding away over the country, whither I did not know, but making for London.

Now I went with more intelligence and caution, and got on very well, travelling seven days, never at night, except it was very clear, never at more than twenty or twenty-five miles, and crawling through tunnels. I do not know the maze into which the train took me, for very soon after leaving Canterbury it must have gone down some branch-line, and though the names were marked at stations, that hardly helped me, for of their situation relatively to London I was seldom sure. Moreover, again and again was my progress impeded by trains on the metals, when I would have to run back to a shunting-point or a siding, and, in two instances, these being far behind, changed from my own to the impeding engine. On the first day I travelled unhindered till noon, when I stopped in open country that seemed uninhabited for ages, only that half a mile to the left, on a shaded sward, was a large stone house of artistic design, coated with tinted harling, the roof of red Ruabon tiles, and timbered gables. I walked to it after another row with putting out the fire and arranging for a new one, the day being bright and mild, with great masses of white cloud in the sky. The house had an outer and an inner hall, three reception rooms, fine oil-paintings, a kind of museum, and a large kitchen. In a bed-room above-stairs I found three women with servants' caps, and a footman, arranged in a strange symmetrical way, head to head, like rays of a star. As I stood looking at them, I could have sworn, my good God, that I heard someone coming up the stairs. But it was some slight creaking of the breeze in the house, augmented a hundredfold to my inflamed and fevered hearing: for, used for years now to this silence of Eternity, it is as though I hear all sounds through an ear-trumpet. I went down, and after eating, and drinking some clary-water, made of brandy, sugar, cinnamon, and rose water, which I found in plenty, I lay down on a sofa in the inner hall, and slept a quiet sleep until near midnight.

I went out then, still possessed with the foolish greed to reach London, and after getting the engine to rights, went off under a clear black sky thronged with worlds and far-sown spawn, some of them, I thought, perhaps like this of mine, whelmed and drowned in oceans of silence, with one only inhabitant to see it, and hear its silence. And all the long night I travelled, stopping twice only, once to get the coal from an engine which had impeded me, and once to drink some water, which I took care, as always, should be running water. When I felt my head nod, and my eyes close about 5 A.M., I threw myself, just outside the arch of a tunnel upon a grassy bank, pretty thick with stalks and flowers, the workings of early dawn being then in the east: and there, till near eleven, slept.

On waking, I noticed that the country now seemed more like Surrey than Kent: there was that regular swell and sinking of the land; but, in fact, though it must have been either, it looked like neither, for already all had an aspect of return to a state of wild nature, and I could see that for a year at the least no hand had tended the soil. Near before me was a stretch of lucerne of such extraordinary growth, that I was led during that day and the succeeding one to examine the condition of vegetation with some minuteness, and nearly everywhere I detected a certain hypertrophie tendency in stamens, calycles, pericarps, and pistils, in every sort of bulbiferous growth that I looked at, in the rushes, above all, the fronds, mosses, lichens, and all cryptogamia, and in the trefoils, clover especially, and some creepers. Many crop-fields, it was clear, had been prepared, but not sown; some had not been reaped: and in both cases I was struck with their appearance of rankness, as I was also when in Norway, and was all the more surprised that this should be the case at a time when a poison, whose action is the arrest of oxidation, had traversed the earth; I could only conclude that its presence in large volumes in the lower strata of the atmosphere had been more or less temporary, and that the tendency to exuberance which I observed was due to some principle by which Nature acts with freer energy and larger scope in the absence of man.

Two yards from the rails I saw, when I got up, a little rill beside a rotten piece of fence, barely oozing itself onward under masses of foul and stagnant fungoids: and here there was a sudden splash, and life: and I caught sight of the hind legs of a diving young frog. I went and lay on my belly, poring over the clear dulcet little water, and presently saw two tiny bleaks, or ablets, go gliding low among the swaying moss-hair of the bottom-rocks, and thought how gladly would I be one of them, with my home so thatched and shady, and my life drowned in their wide-eyed reverie. At any rate, these little creatures are alive, the batrachians also, and, as I found the next day, pupae and chrysales of one sort or another, for, to my deep emotion, I saw a little white butterfly staggering in the air over the flower-garden of a rustic station named Butley.

It was while I was lying there, poring upon that streamlet, that a thought came into my head: for I said to myself: 'If now I be here alone, alone, alone... alone, alone... one on the earth... and my girth have a spread of 25,000 miles... what will happen to my mind? Into what kind of creature shall I writhe and change? I may live two years so! What will have happened then? I may live five years — ten! What will have happened after the five? the ten? I may live twenty, thirty, forty...’

Already, already, there are things that peep and sprout within me...!

I wanted food and fresh running water, and walked from the engine half a mile through fields of lucerne whose luxuriance quite hid the foot-paths, and reached my shoulder. After turning the brow of a hill, I came to a park, passing through which I saw some dead deer and three persons, and emerged upon a terraced lawn, at the end of which stood an Early English house of pale brick with copings, plinths, stringcourses of limestone, and spandrels of carved marble; and some distance from the porch a long table, or series of tables, in the open air, still spread with cloths that were like shrouds after a month of burial; and the table had old foods on it, and some lamps; and all around it, and all on the lawn, were dead peasants. I seemed to know the house, probably from some print which I may have seen, but I could not make out the escutcheon, though I saw from its simplicity that it must be very ancient. Right across the façade spread still some of the letters in evergreens of the motto: ‘Many happy returns of the day,’ so that someone must have come of age, or something, for inside all was gala, and it was clear that these people had defied a fate which they, of course, foreknew. I went nearly throughout the whole spacious place of thick-carpeted halls, marbles, and famous oils, antlers and arras, and gilt saloons, and placid large bed-chambers: and it took me an hour. There were here not less than a hundred and eighty people. In the first of a vista of three large reception-rooms lay what could only have been a number of quadrille parties, for to the coup d’oeil they presented a two-and-two appearance, made very repulsive by their jewels and evening-dress. I had to steel my heart to go through this house, for I did not know if these people were looking at me as soon as my back was turned. Once I was on the very point of flying, for I was going up the great central stairway, and there came a pelt of dead leaves against a window-pane in a corridor just above on the first floor, which thrilled me to the inmost soul. But I thought that if I once fled, they would all be at me from behind, and I should be gibbering mad long, long before I reached the outer hall, and so stood my ground, even defiantly advancing. In a small dark bedroom in the north wing on the second floor — that is to say, at the top of the house — I saw a tall young lady and a groom, or wood-man, to judge by his clothes, horribly riveted in an embrace on a settee, she with a light coronet on her head in low-necked dress, and their lipless teeth still fiercely pressed together. I collected in a bag a few delicacies from the under-regions of this house, Lyons sausages, salami, mortadel, apples, roes, raisins, artichokes, biscuits, a few wines, a ham, bottled fruit, pickles, coffee, and so on, with a gold plate, tin-opener, cork-screw, fork, &c., and dragged them all the long way back to the engine before I could eat.

My brain was in such a way, that it was several days before the perfectly obvious means of finding my way to London, since I wished to go there, at all occurred to me; and the engine went wandering the intricate railway-system of the south country, I having twice to water her with a coal-bucket from a pool, for the injector was giving no water from the tank under the coals, and I did not know where to find any near tank-sheds. On the fifth evening, instead of into London, I ran into Guildford.

That night, from eleven till the next day, there was a great storm over England: let me note it down. And ten days later, on the 17th of the month came another; and on the 23rd another; and I should be put to it to count the great number since. And they do not resemble English storms, but rather Arctic ones, in a certain very suggestive something of personalness, and a carousing malice, and a Tartarus gloom, which I cannot quite describe. That night at Guildford, after wandering about, and becoming very weary, I threw myself upon a cushioned pew in an old Norman church with two east apses, called St. Mary's, using a Bible-cushion for pillow, and placing some distance away a little tin lamp turned low, whose ray served me for veilleuse through the night. Happily I had taken care to close up everything, or, I feel sure, the roof must have gone. Only one dead, an old lady in a chapel on the north side of the chancel, whom I rather mistrusted, was there with me: and there I lay listening: for, after all, I could not sleep a wink, while outside vogued the immense tempest. And I communed with myself, thinking: 'I, poor man, lost in this conflux of infinitudes and vortex of the world, what can become of me, my God? For dark, ah dark, is the waste void into which from solid ground I am now plunged a million fathoms deep, the sport of all the whirlwinds: and it were better for me to have died with the dead, and never to have seen the wrath and turbulence of the Ineffable, nor to have heard the thrilling bleakness of the winds of Eternity, when they pine, and long, and whimper, and when they vociferate and blaspheme, and when they expostulate and intrigue and implore, and when they despair and die, which ear of man should never hear. For they mean to eat me up, I know, these Titanic darknesses: and soon like a whiff I shall pass away, and leave the world to them.' So till next morning I lay mumping, with shivers and cowerings: for the shocks of the storm pervaded the locked church to my very heart; and there were thunders that night, my God, like callings and laughs and banterings, exchanged between distant hill-tops in Hell.

‘Well, the next morning I went down the steep High Street, and found a young nun at the bottom whom I had left the previous evening with a number of girls in uniform opposite the Guildhall — half-way up the street. She must have been spun down, arm over arm, for the wind was westerly, and whereas I had left her completely dressed to her wimple and beads, she was now nearly stripped, and her little flock scattered. And branches of trees, and wrecked houses, and reeling clouds of dead leaves were everywhere that wild morning.

This town of Guildford appeared to be the junction of an extraordinary number of railway-lines, and before again setting out in the afternoon, when the wind had lulled, having got an A B C guide, and a railway-map, I decided upon my line, and upon a new engine, feeling pretty sure now of making London, only thirty miles away. I then set out, and about five o’clock was at Surbiton, near my aim; I kept on, expecting every few minutes to see the great city, till darkness fell, and still, at considerable risk, I went, as I thought, forward: but no London was there. I had, in fact, been on a loop-line, and at Surbiton gone wrong again; for the next evening I found myself at Wokingham, farther away than ever.

I slept on a rug in the passage of an inn called The Rose, for there was a wild, Russian-looking man, with projecting top-teeth, on a bed in the house, whose appearance I did not like, and it was late, and I too tired to walk further; and the next morning pretty early I set out again, and at 10 A.M. was at Reading.

The notion of navigating the land by precisely the same means as the sea, simple and natural as it was, had not at all occurred to me: but at the first accidental sight of a compass in a little shop-window near the river at Reading, my difficulties as to getting to any desired place in the world vanished once and for all: for a good chart or map, the compass, a pair of compasses, and, in the case of longer distances, a quadrant, sextant or theodolite, with a piece of paper and pencil, were all that were necessary to turn an engine into a land-ship, one choosing the lines that ran nearest the direction of one's course, whenever they did not run precisely.

Thus provided, I ran out from Reading about seven in the evening, while there was still some light, having spent there some nine hours. This was the town where I first observed that shocking crush of humanity, which I afterwards met in every large town west of London. Here, I should say, the English were quite equal in number to the foreigners: and there were enough of both, God knows: for London must have poured many here. There were houses, in every room of which, and on the stairs, the dead actually overlay each other, and in the streets before them were points where only on flesh, or under carriages, was it possible to walk. I went into the great County Gaol, from which, as I had read, the prisoners had been released two weeks before-hand, and there I found the same pressed condition, cells occupied by ten or twelve, the galleries continuously rough-paved with faces, heads, and old-clothes-shops of robes; and in the parade-ground, against one wall, a mass of human stuff, like tough grey clay mixed with rags and trickling black gore, where a crush as of hydraulic power must have acted. At a corner between a gate and a wall near the biscuit-factory of this town I saw a boy, whom I believe to have been blind, standing jammed, at his wrist a chain-ring, and, at the end of the chain, a dog; from his hap-hazard posture I conjectured that he, and chain, and dog had been lifted from the street, and placed so, by the storm of the 7th of the month; and what made it very curious was that his right arm pointed a little outward just over the dog, so that, at the moment when I first sighted him, he seemed a drunken fellow setting his dog at me. In fact, all the dead I found much mauled and stripped and huddled: and the earth seemed to be making an abortive effort to sweep her streets.

Well, some little distance from Reading I saw a big flower-seed farm, looking dead in some plots, and in others quite rank: and here again, fluttering quite near the engine, two little winged aurelians in the quiet evening air. I went on, passing a great number of crowded trains on the down-line, two of them in collision, and very broken up, and one exploded engine; even the fields and cuttings on either hand of the line had a rather populous look, as if people, when trains and vehicles failed, had set to trudging westward in caravans and streams. When I came to a long tunnel near Slough, I saw round the foot of the arch an extraordinary quantity of wooden débris, and as I went very slowly through, was alarmed by the continuous bumping of the train, which, I knew, was passing over bodies; at the other end were more débris; and I easily guessed that a company of desperate people had made the tunnel air-tight at the two arches, and provisioned themselves, with the hope to live there till the day of destiny was passed; whereupon their barricades must have been crashed through by some up-train and themselves crushed, or else, other crowds, mad to share their cave of refuge, had stormed the boardings. This latter, as I afterwards found, was a very usual event.

I should very soon have got to London now, but, as my bad luck would have it, I met a long up-train on the metals, with not one creature in any part of it. There was nothing to do but to tranship, with all my things, to its engine, which I found in good condition with plenty of coal and water, and to set it going, a hateful labour: I being already jet-black from hair to toes. However, by half-past ten I found myself stopped by another train only a quarter of a mile from Paddington, and walked the rest of the way among trains in which the standing dead still stood, propped by their neighbours, and over metals where bodies were as ordinary and cheap as waves on the sea, or twigs in a forest. I believe that wild crowds had given chase on foot to moving trains, or fore-run them in the frenzied hope of inducing them to stop.

I came to the great shed of glass and girders which is the station, the night being perfectly soundless, moonless, starless, and the hour about eleven.

I found later that all the electric generating-stations, or all that I visited, were intact; that is to say, must have been shut down before the arrival of the doom; also that the gas-works had almost certainly been abandoned some time previously: so that this city of dreadful night, in which, at the moment when Silence choked it, not less than forty to sixty millions swarmed and droned, must have more resembled Tartarus and the foul shades of Hell than aught to which my fancy can liken it.

For, coming nearer the platforms, I saw that trains, in order to move at all, must have moved through a slough of bodies pushed from behind, and forming a packed homogeneous mass on the metals: and I knew that they had moved. Nor could I now move, unless I decided to wade: for flesh was everywhere, on the roofs of trains, cramming the interval between them, on the platforms, splashing the pillars like spray, piled on trucks and lorries, a carnal quagmire; and outside, it filled the space between a great host of vehicles, carpeting all that region of London. And all here that odour of blossoms, which nowhere yet, save on one vile ship, had failed, was now wholly overcome by another: and the thought was in my head, my God, that if the soul of man had sent up to Heaven the odour which his body gave to me, then it was not so strange that things were as they were.

I got out from the station, with ears, God knows, that still awaited the accustomed noising of this accursed town, habituated as I now was to all the dumb and absent void of Soundlessness; and I was overwhelmed in a new awe, and lost in a wilder woesomeness, when, instead of lights and business, I saw the long street which I knew brood darker than Babylons long desolate, and in place of its ancient noising, heard, my God, a shocking silence, rising higher than I had ever heard it, and blending with the silence of the inane, eternal stars in heaven.

I could not get into any vehicle for some time, for all thereabouts was practically a mere block; but near the Park, which I attained by stooping among wheels, and selecting my foul steps, I overhauled a Daimler car, found in it two cylinders of petrol, lit the ignition-lamp, removed with averted abhorrence three bodies, mounted, and broke that populous stillness. And through streets nowhere empty of bodies I went urging eastward my jolting, and spattered, and humming way.

That I should have persisted, with so much pains, to come to this unbounded catacomb, seems now singular to me: for by that time I could not have been sufficiently daft to expect to find another being like myself on the earth, though I cherished, I remember, the irrational hope of yet somewhere finding dog, or cat, or horse, to be with me, and would anon think bitterly of Reinhardt, my Arctic dog, which my own hand had shot. But, in reality, a morbid curiosity must have been within me all the time to read the real truth of what had happened, so far as it was known, or guessed, and to gloat upon all that drama, and cup of trembling, and pouring out of the vials of the wrath of God, which must have preceded the actual advent of the end of Time. This inquisitiveness had, at every town which I reached, made the search for newspapers uppermost in my mind; but, by bad luck, I had found only four, all of them ante-dated to the one which I had read at Dover, though their dates gave me some idea of the period when printing must have ceased, viz. soon after the 17th July — about three months subsequent to my arrival at the Pole — for none I found later than this date; and these contained nothing scientific, but only orisons and despairings. On arriving, therefore, at London, I made straight for the office of the Times, only stopping at a chemist's in Oxford Street for a bottle of antiseptic to hold near my nose, though, having once left the neighbourhood of Paddington, I had hardly much need of this.

I made my way to the square where the paper was printed, to find that, even there, the ground was closely strewn with calpac and pugaree, black abayah and fringed praying-shawl, hob-nail and sandal, figured lungi and striped silk, all very muddled and mauled. Through the dark square to the twice-dark building I passed, and found open the door of an advertisement-office; but on striking a match, saw that it had been lighted by electricity, and had therefore to retrace my stumbling steps, till I came to a shop of lamps in a near alley, walking meantime with timid cares that I might hurt no one — for in this enclosed neighbourhood I began to feel strange tremors, and kept striking matches, which, so still was the black air, hardly flickered.

When I returned to the building with a little lighted lamp, I at once saw a file on a table, and since there were a number of dead there, and I wished to be alone, I took the heavy mass of paper between my left arm and side, and the lamp in my right hand; passed then behind a counter; and then, to the right, up a stair which led me into a very great building and complexity of wooden steps and corridors, where I went peering, the lamp visibly trembling in my hand, for here also were the dead. Finally, I entered a good-sized carpeted room with a baize-covered table in the middle, and large smooth chairs, and on the table many manuscripts impregnated with purple dust, and around were books in shelves. This room had been locked upon a single man, a tall man in a frock-coat, with a pointed grey beard, who at the last moment had decided to fly from it, for he lay at the threshold, apparently fallen dead the moment he opened the door. Him, by drawing his feet aside, I removed, locked the door upon myself, sat at the table before the dusty file, and, with the little lamp near, began to search.

I searched and read till far into the morning. But God knows, He alone....

I had not properly filled the little reservoir with oil, and at about three in the fore-day, it began to burn sullenly lower, letting sparks, and turning the glass grey: and in my deepest chilly heart was the question: 'Suppose the lamp goes out before the daylight....'

I knew the Pole, and cold, I knew them well: but to be frozen by panic, my God! I read, I say, I searched, I would not stop: but I read that night racked by terrors such as have never yet entered into the heart of man to conceive. My flesh moved and crawled like a lake which, here and there, the breeze ruffles. Sometimes for two, three, four minutes, the profound interest of what I read would fix my mind, and then I would peruse an entire column, or two, without consciousness of the meaning of one single word, my brain all drawn away to the innumerable host of the wan dead that camped about me, pierced with horror lest they should start, and stand, and accuse me: for the grave and the worm was the world; and in the air a sickening stirring of cerements and shrouds; and the taste of the pale and insubstantial grey of ghosts seemed to infect my throat, and faint odours of the loathsome tomb my nostrils, and the toll of deep-toned passing-bells my ears; finally the lamp smouldered very low, and my charnel fancy teemed with the screwing-down of coffins, lych-gates and sextons, and the grating of ropes that lower down the dead, and the first sound of the earth upon the lid of that strait and gloomy home of the mortal; that lethal look of cold dead fingers I seemed to see before me, the insipidness of dead tongues, the pout of the drowned, and the vapid froths that ridge their lips, till my flesh was moist as with the stale washing-waters of morgues and mortuaries, and with such sweats as corpses sweat, and the mawkish tear that lies on dead men's cheeks; for what is one poor insignificant man in his flesh against a whole world of the disembodied, he alone with them, and nowhere, nowhere another of his kind, to whom to appeal against them? I read, and I searched: but God, God knows ... If a leaf of the paper, which I slowly, warily, stealingly turned, made but one faintest rustle, how did that reveille boom in echoes through the vacant and haunted chambers of my poor aching heart, my God! and there was a cough in my throat which for a cruelly long time I would not cough, till it burst in horrid clamour from my lips, sending crinkles of cold through my inmost blood. For with the words which I read were all mixed up visions of crawling hearses, wails, and lugubrious crape, and piercing shrieks of madness in strange earthy vaults, and all the mournfulness of the black Vale of Death, and the tragedy of corruption. Twice during the ghostly hours of that night the absolute and undeniable certainty that some presence — some most gashly silent being — stood at my right elbow, so thrilled me, that I leapt to my feet to confront it with clenched fists, and hairs that bristled stiff in horror and frenzy. After that second time I must have fainted; for when it was broad day, I found my dropped head over the file of papers, supported on my arms. And I resolved then never again after sunset to remain in any house: for that night was enough to kill a horse, my good God; and that this is a haunted planet I know.

What I read in the Times was not very definite, for how could it be? but in the main it confirmed inferences which I had myself drawn, and fairly satisfied my mind.

There had been a battle royal in the paper between my old collaborator Professor Stanistreet and Dr. Martin Rogers, and never could I have conceived such an indecorous piece of business, men like them calling one another ‘tyro,’ ‘dreamer,’ and in one place ‘block-head.’ Stanistreet denied that the perfumed odour of almonds attributed to the advancing cloud could be due to anything but the excited fancy of the reporting fugitives, because, said he, it was unknown that either Cn, HCn, or K_4FeCn_6 had been given out by volcanoes, and the destructiveness to life of the travelling cloud could only be owing to CO and CO₂. To this Rogers, in an article characterised by extraordinary heat, replied that he could not understand how even a ‘tyro’(!) in chemical and geological phenomena would venture to rush into print with the statement that HCn had not commonly been given out by volcanoes: that it had been, he said, was perfectly certain; though whether it had been or not could not affect the decision of a reasoning mind as to whether it was being: for that cyanogen, as a matter of fact, was not rare in nature, though not directly occurring, being one of the products of the common distillation of pit-coal, and found in roots, peaches, almonds, and many tropical flora; also that it had been actually pointed out as probable by more than one thinker that some salt or salts of Cn, the potassic, or the potassic ferrocyanide, or both, must exist in considerable stores in the earth at volcanic depths. In reply to this, Stanistreet in a two-column article used the word ‘dreamer,’ and Rogers, when Berlin had been already silenced, finally replied with his amazing ‘block-head.’ But, in my opinion, by far the most learned and lucid of the scientific dicta was from the rather unexpected source of Sloggett, of the Dublin Science and Art Department: he, without fuss, accepted the statements of the fugitive eye-witnesses, down to the assertion that the cloud, as it rolled travelling, seemed mixed from its base to the clouds with languid tongues of purple flame, rose-coloured at their edges. This, Sloggett explained, was the characteristic flame of both cyanogen and hydrocyanic acid vapour, which, being inflammable, may have become locally ignited in the passage over cities, and only burned in that limited and languid way on account of the ponderous volumes of carbonic anhydride with which they must, of course, be mixed: the dark empurpled colour was due to the presence of large quantities of the scoriae of the trappean rocks: basalts, green-stone, trachytes, and the various porphyries. This article was most remarkable for its clear divination, because written so early — not long, in fact, after the cessation of telegraphic communication with Australia and China; and at a date so early Sloggett stated that the character of the devastation not only proved an eruption — another, but far greater Krakatoa — probably in some South Sea region, but indicated that its most active product must be, not CO, but potassic ferrocyanide (K_4FeCn_6), which, undergoing distillation with the products of sulphur in the heat of eruption, produced hydrocyanic acid (HCn); and this volatile acid, he said, remaining in a vaporous state in all climates above a temperature of $26.5^{\circ} C.$, might involve the entire earth, if the eruption proved sufficiently powerful, travelling chiefly in a direction contrary to the earth's west-to-east motion, the only regions which would certainly be exempt being the colder regions of the Arctic circles, where the vapour of the acid would assume the liquid state, and fall as rain. He did not anticipate that vegetation would be permanently affected, unless the eruption were of inconceivable duration and activity, for though the poisonous quality of hydrocyanic acid consisted in its sudden and complete arrest of oxidation, vegetation had two sources of life — the soil as well as the air; with this exception, all life, down to the lowest evolutionary forms, would disappear (here was the one point in which he was somewhat at fault), until the earth reproduced them. For the rest, he fixed the rate of the on-coming cloud at from 100 to 105 miles a day; and the date of eruption, either the 14th, 15th, or 16th of April — which was either one, two, or three days after the arrival of the Boreal party at the Pole; and he concluded by saying that, if the facts were as he had stated them, then he could suggest no hiding-place for the race of man, unless such places as mines and tunnels could be made air-tight; nor could even they be of use to any considerable number, except in the event of the poisonous state of the air being of very short duration.

I had thought of mines before: but in a very languid way, till this article, and other things that I read, as it were struck my brain a slap with the notion. For ‘there,’ I said, ‘if anywhere, shall I find a man....’

I went out from that building that morning feeling like a man bowed down with age, for the depths of unutterable horror into which I had had glimpses during that one night made me very feeble, and my steps tottered, and my brain reeled.

I got out into Farringdon Street, and at the near Circus, where four streets meet, had under my furthest range of vision nothing but four fields of bodies, bodies, clad in a rag-shop of every faded colour, or half-clad, or not clad at all, actually, in many cases, over-lying one another, as I had seen at Reading, but here with a markedly more skeleton appearance: for I saw the swollen-looking shoulders, sharp hips, hollow abdomens, and stiff bony limbs of people dead from famine, the whole having the grotesque air of some macabre battle-field of fallen marionettes. Mixed with these was an extraordinary number of vehicles of all sorts, so that I saw that driving among them would be impracticable, whereas the street which I had taken during the night was fairly clear. I thought a minute what I should do: then went by a parallel back-street, and came out to a shop in the Strand, where I hoped to find all the information which I needed about the excavations of the country. The shutters were up, and I did not wish to make any noise among these people, though the morning was bright, it being about ten o'clock, and it was easy to effect entrance, for I saw a crow-bar in a big covered furniture-van near. I, therefore, went northward, till I came to the British Museum, the cataloguing-system of which I knew well, and passed in. There was no one at the library-door to bid me stop, and in the great round reading-room not a soul, except one old man with a bag of goître hung at his neck, and spectacles, he lying up a book-ladder near the shelves, a 'reader' to the last. I got to the printed catalogues, and for an hour was upstairs among the dim sacred galleries of this still place, and at the sight of certain Greek and Coptic papyri, charters, seals, had such a dream of this ancient earth, my good God, as even an angel's pen could not half express on paper. Afterwards, I went away loaded with a good hundred-weight of Ordnance-maps, which I had stuffed into a bag found in the cloak-room, with three topographical books; I then, at an instrument-maker's in Holborn, got a sextant and theodolite, and at a grocer's near the river put into a sack-bag provisions to last me a week or two; at Blackfriars Bridge wharf-station I found a little sharp white steamer of a few tons, which happily was driven by liquid air, so that I had no troublesome fire to light: and by noon I was cutting my solitary way up the Thames, which flowed as before the ancient Britons were born, and saw it, and built mud-huts there amid the primæval forest; and afterwards the Romans came, and saw it, and called it Tamesis, or Thamesis.

That night, as I lay asleep on the cabin-cushions of my little boat under the lee of an island at Richmond, I had a clear dream, in which something, or someone, came to me, and asked me a question: for it said: 'Why do you go seeking another man? — that you may fall upon him, and kiss him? or that you may fall upon him, and murder him?' And I answered sullenly in my dream: 'I would not murder him. I do not wish to murder anyone.'

What was essential to me was to know, with certainty, whether I was really alone: for some instinct began to whisper me: 'Find that out: be sure, be sure: for without the assurance you can never be — yourself.'

I passed into the great Midland Canal, and went northward, leisurely advancing, for I was in no hurry. The weather remained very warm, and great part of the country was still dressed in autumn leaves. I have written, I think, of the terrific character of the tempests witnessed in England since my return: well, the calms were just as intense and novel. This observation was forced upon me: and I could not but be surprised. There seemed no middle course now: if there was a wind, it was a storm: if there was not a storm, no leaf stirred, not a roughening zephyr ran the water. I was reminded of maniacs that laugh now, and rave now — but never smile, and never sigh.

On the fourth afternoon I passed by Leicester, and the next morning left my pleasant boat, carrying maps and compass, and at a small station took engine, bound for Yorkshire, where I loitered and idled away two foolish months, sometimes travelling by steam-engine, sometimes by automobile, sometimes by bicycle, and sometimes on foot, till the autumn was quite over.

There were two houses in London to which especially I had thought to go: one in Harley Street, and one in Hanover Square: but when it came to the point, I would not; and there was a little embowered home in Yorkshire, where I was born, to which I thought to go: but I would not, confining myself for many days to the eastern half of the county.

One morning, while passing on foot along the coast-wall from Bridlington to Flambro', on turning my eyes from the sea, I was confronted by a thing which for a moment or two struck me with the most profound astonishment. I had come to a mansion, surrounded by trees, three hundred yards from the cliffs: and there, on a path at the bottom of the domain, right before me, was a board marked: 'Trespassers will be Prosecuted.' At once a mad desire — the first which I had had — to laugh, to roar with laughter, to send wild echoes of merriment clapping among the chalk gullies, and abroad on the morning air, seized upon me: but I kept it under, though I could not help smiling at this poor man, with his little delusion that a part of the earth was his.

Here the cliffs are, I should say, seventy feet high, broken by frequent slips in the upper stratum of clay, and, as I proceeded, climbing always, I encountered some rather formidable gullies in the chalk, down and then up which I had to scramble, till I came to a great mound or barrier, stretching right across the great promontory, and backed by a natural ravine, this, no doubt, having been raised as a rampart by some of those old invading pirate-peoples, who had their hot life-scuffle, and are done now, like the rest. Going on, I came to a bay in the cliff, with a great number of boats lodged on the slopes, some quite high, though the declivities are steep; toward the inner slopes is a lime-kiln which I explored, but found no one there. When I came out on the other side, I saw the village, with an old tower at one end, on a bare stretch of land; and thence, after an hour's rest in the kitchen of a little inn, went out to the coast-guard station, and the lighthouse.

Looking across the sea eastward, the light-keepers here must have seen that thick cloud of convolving browns and purples, perhaps mixed with small tongues of fire, slowly walking the water, its roof in the clouds, upon them: for this headland is in precisely the same longitude as London; and, reckoning from the hour when, as recorded in the Times, the cloud was seen from Dover over Calais, London and Flambro' must have been overtaken soon after three o'clock on the Sunday afternoon, the 25th July. At sight in open daylight of a doom so gloomy — prophesied, but perhaps hoped against to the last, and now come — the light-keepers must have fled howling, supposing them to have so long remained faithful to duty: for here was no one, and in the village very few. In this lighthouse, which is a circular white tower, eighty feet high, on the edge of the cliff, is a book for visitors to sign their names: and I will write something down here in black and white: for the secret is between God only, and me: After reading a few of the names, I took my pencil, and I wrote my name there.

The reef before the Head stretches out a quarter of a mile, looking bold in the dead low-water that then was, and showing to what extent the sea has pushed back this coast, three wrecks impaled on them, and a big steamer quite near, waiting for the first movements of the already strewn sea to perish. All along the cliff-wall to the bluff crowned by Scarborough Castle northward, and to the low vanishing coast of Holderness southward, appeared those cracks and caves which had brought me here, though there seemed no attempts at barricades; however, I got down a rough slope on the south side to a rude wild beach, strewn with wave-worn masses of chalk: and never did I feel so paltry and short a thing as there, with far-outstretched bays of crags about me, their bluffs encrusted at the base with stale old leprosies of shells and barnacles, and crass algae-beards, and, higher up, the white cliff all stained and weather-spoiled, the rock in some parts looking quite chalky, and elsewhere gleaming hard and dull like dirty marbles, while in the huge withdrawals of the coast yawn darksome gullies and caverns. Here, in that morning's walk, I saw three little hermit-crabs, a limpet, and two ninnycocks in a pool of weeds under a bearded rock. What astonished me here, and, indeed, above, and everywhere, in London even, and other towns, was the incredible number of birds that strewed the ground, at some points resembling a real rain, birds of nearly every sort, including tropic specimens: so that I had to conclude that they, too, had fled before the cloud from country to country, till conquered by weariness and grief, and then by death.

By climbing over rocks thick with periwinkles, and splashing through great sloppy stretches of crinkled sea-weed, which give a raw stench of brine, I entered the first of the gullies: a narrow, long, winding one, with sides polished by the sea-wash, and the floor rising inwards. In the dark interior I struck matches, able still to hear from outside the ponderous spasmodic rush and jostle of the sea between the crags of the reef, but now quite faintly. Here, I knew, I could meet only dead men, but urged by some curiosity, I searched to the end, wading in the middle through a three-foot depth of sea-weed twine: but there was no one; and only belemnites and fossils in the chalk. I searched several to the south of the headland, and then went northward past it toward another opening and place of perched boats, called in the map North Landing: where, even now, a distinct smell of fish, left by the old crabbers and herring-fishers, was perceptible. A number of coves and bays opened as I proceeded; a faded green turf comes down in curves at some parts on the cliff-brows, like wings of a young soldier's hair, parted in the middle, and plastered on his brow; isolated chalk-masses are numerous, obelisks, top-heavy columns, bastions; at one point no less than eight headlands stretched to the end of the world before me, each pierced by its arch, Norman or Gothic, in whole or in half; and here again caves, in one of which I found a carpet-bag stuffed with a wet pulp like bread, and, stuck to the rock, a Turkish tarboosh; also, under a limestone quarry, five dead asses: but no man. The east coast had evidently been shunned. Finally, in the afternoon I reached Filey, very tired, and there slept.

I went onward by train-engine all along the coast to a region of iron-ore, alum, and jet-excavations round Whitby and Middlesborough. By by-ways near the small place of Goldsborough I got down to the shore at Kettleness, and reached the middle of a bay in which is a cave called the Hob-Hole, with excavations all around, none of great depth, made by jet-diggers and quarrymen. In the cave lay a small herd of cattle, though for what purpose put there I cannot guess; and in the jet-excavations I found nothing. A little further south is the chief alum-region, as at Sandsend, but as soon as I saw a works, and the great gap in the ground like a crater, where the lias is quarried, containing only heaps of alum-shale, brushwood-stacks, and piles of cement-nodules extracted from the lias, I concluded that here could have been found no hiding; nor did I purposely visit the others, though I saw two later. From round Whitby, and those rough moors, I went on to Darlington, not far now from my home: but I would not continue that way, and after two days' indecisive lounging, started for Richmond and the lead mines about Arkengarth Dale, near Reeth. Here begins a region of mountain, various with glens, fells, screes, scars, swards, becks, passes, villages, river-heads, and dales. Some of the faces which I saw in it almost seemed to speak to me in a broad dialect which I knew. But they were not numerous in proportion: for all this country-side must have had its population multiplied by at least some hundreds; and the villages had rather the air of Danube, Levant, or Spanish villages. In one, named Marrick, I saw that the street had become the scene either of a great battle or a great massacre; and soon I was everywhere coming upon men and women, English and foreign, dead from violence: cracked heads, wounds, unhung jaws, broken limbs, and so on. Instead of going direct to the mines from Reeth, that waywardness which now rules my mind, as squalls an abandoned boat, took me somewhat further south-west to the village of Thwaite, which I actually could not enter, so occupied with dead was every spot on which the eye rested a hundred yards about it. Not far from here I turned up, on foot now, a very steep, stony road to the right, which leads over the Buttertubs Pass into Wensleydale, the day being very warm and bright, with large clouds that looked like lakes of molten silver giving off grey fumes in their centre, casting moody shadows over the swardy dale, which below Thwaite expands, showing Muker two miles off, the largest village of Upper Swaledale. Soon, climbing, I could look down upon miles of Swaledale and the hills beyond, a rustic panorama of glens and grass, river and cloudshadow, and there was something of lightness in my step that fair day, for I had left all my maps and things, except one, at Reeth, to which I meant to return, and the earth, which is very good, was — mine. The ascent was rough, and also long: but if I paused and looked behind — I saw, I saw. Man's notion of a Heaven, a Paradise, reserved for the spirits of the good, clearly arose from impressions which the earth made upon his mind: for no Paradise can be fairer than this; just as his notion of a Hell arose from the squalid mess into which his own foolish habits of thought and action turned this Paradise. At least, so it struck me then: and, thinking it, there was a hiss in my breath, as I went up into what more and more acquired the character of a mountain pass, with points of almost Alpine savagery: for after I had skirted the edge of a deep glen on the left, the slopes changed in character, heather was on the mountain-sides, a fretting beck sent up its noise, then screes, and scars, and a considerable waterfall, and a landscape of crags; and lastly a broad and rather desolate summit, palpably nearer the clouds.

Two days later I was at the mines: and here I first saw that wide-spread scene of horror with which I have since become familiar. The story of six out of ten of them all is the same, and short: selfish 'owners,' an ousted world, an easy bombardment, and the destruction of all concerned, before the arrival of the cloud in many cases. About some of the Durham pit-mouths I have been given the impression that the human race lay collected there; and that the notion of hiding himself in a mine must have occurred to every man alive, and sent him thither.

In these lead mines, as in most vein-mining, there are more shafts than in collieries, and hardly any attempt at artificial ventilation, except at rises, winzes and cul-de-sacs. I found accordingly that, though their depth does not exceed three hundred feet, suffocation must often have anticipated the other dreaded death. In nearly every shaft, both up-take and down-take, was a ladder, either of the mine, or of the fugitives, and I was able to descend without difficulty, having dressed myself in a house at the village in a check flannel shirt, a pair of two-buttoned trousers with circles of leather at the knees, thick boots, and a miner's hat, having a leather socket attached to it, into which fitted a straight handle from a cylindrical candlestick; with this light, and also a Davy-lamp, which I carried about with me for a good many months, I lived for the most part in the deeps of the earth, searching for the treasure of a life, to find everywhere, in English duckies and guggs, Pomeranian women in gaudy stiff cloaks, the Walachian, the Mameluk, the Khirgiz, the Bonze, the Imaum, and almost every type of man.

One most brilliant Autumn day I walked by the village market-cross at Barnard, come at last, but with a tenderness in my heart, and a reluctance, to where I was born; for I said I would go and see my sister Ada, and — the other old one. I leaned and loitered a long time on the bridge, gazing up to the craggy height, which is heavy with waving wood, and crowned by the Castle-tower, the Tees sweeping round the mountain-base, smooth here and sunlit, but a mile down, where I wished to go, but would not, brawling bedraggled and lacerated, like a sweet strumpet, all shallow among rocks under reaches of shadow — the shadow of Rokeby Woods. I climbed very leisurely up the hill-side, having in my hand a bag with a meal, and up the stair in the wall to the top I went, where there is no parapet, but a massiveness of wall that precludes danger; and here in my miner's attire I sat three hours, brooding sleepily upon the scene of lush umbrageous old wood that marks the long way the river takes, from Marwood Chase up above, and where the rapid Balder bickers in, down to bowery Rokeby, touched now with autumn; the thickness of trees lessening away toward the uplands, where there are far etherealized stretches of fields within hedgerows, and in the sunny mirage of the farthest azure remoteness hints of lonesome moorland. It was not till near three that I went down along the river, then, near Rokeby, traversing the old meadow, and ascending the old hill: and there, as of old, was the little black square with yellow letters on the gate-wall:

HUNT HILL HOUSE.

No part, no house, I believe, of this country-side was empty of strange corpses: and they were in Hunt Hill, too. I saw three in the weedy plot to the right of the garden-path, where once the hawthorn and lilac tree had grown from well-rollered grass, and in the little bush-wilderness to the left, which was always a wilderness, one more: and in the breakfast-room, to the right of the hall, three; and in the new wooden clinker-built attachment opening upon the breakfast-room, two, half under the billiard-table; and in her room overlooking the porch on the first floor, the long thin form of my mother on her bed, with crushed-in left temple, and at the foot of the bed, face-downward on the floor, black-haired Ada in a night-dress.

Of all the men and women who died, they two alone had burying. For I dugged a hole with the stable-spade under the front lilac; and I wound them in the sheets, foot and form and head; and, not without throes and qualms, I bore and buried them there.

Some time passed after this before the long, multitudinous, and perplexing task of visiting the mine-regions again claimed me. I found myself at a place called Ingleborough, which is a big table-mountain, with a top of fifteen to twenty acres, from which the sea is visible across Lancashire to the west; and in the sides of this strange hill are a number of caves which I searched during three days, sleeping in a garden-shed at a very rural and flower-embowered village, for every room in it was thronged, a place marked Clapham in the chart, in Clapdale, which latter is a dale penetrating the slopes of the mountain: and there I found by far the greatest of the caves which I saw, having ascended a path from the village to a hollow between two grass slopes, where there is a beck, and so entering an arch to the left, screened by trees, into the limestone cliff. The passage narrows pretty rapidly inwards, and I had not proceeded two yards before I saw the clear traces of a great battle here. All this region had, in fact, been invaded, for the cave must have been famous, though I did not remember it myself, and for some miles round the dead were pretty frequent, making the immediate approach to the cave a matter for care, if the foot was to be saved from pollution. It is clear that there had been an iron gate across the entrance, that within this a wall had been built across, shutting in I do not know how many, perhaps one or two, perhaps hundreds: and both gate and wall had been stormed and broken down, for there still were the sledges and rocks which, without doubt, had done it. I had a lamp, and at my forehead the lighted candle, and I went on quickly, seeing it useless now to choose my steps where there was no choice, through a passage incrustated, roof and sides, with a scabrous petrified lichen, the roof low for some ninety yards, covered with down-looking cones, like an inverted forest of children's toy-trees. I then came to a round hole, apparently artificial, opening through a curtain of stalagmitic formation into a great cavern beyond, which was quite animated and festal with flashes, sparkles, and diamond-lustres, hung in their myriads upon a movement of the eye, these being produced by large numbers of snowy wet stalagmites, very large and high, down the centre of which ran a continuous long lane of clothes and hats and faces; with hasty reluctant feet I somehow passed over them, the cave all the time widening, thousands of stalactites appearing on the roof of every size, from virgin's breast to giant's club, and now everywhere the wet drip, drip, as it were a populous busy bazaar of perspiring brows and hurrying feet, in which the only business is to drip. Where stalactite meets stalagmite there are pillars: where stalactite meets stalactite in fissures long or short there are elegances, flimsy draperies, delicate fantasies; there were also pools of water in which hung heads and feet, and there were vacant spots at outlying spaces, where the arched roof, which continually heightened itself, was reflected in the chill gleam of the floor. Suddenly, the roof came down, the floor went up, and they seemed to meet before me; but looking, I found a low opening, through which, drawing myself on the belly over slime for some yards in repulsive proximity to dead personalities, I came out upon a floor of sand and pebbles under a long dry tunnel, arched and narrow, grim and dull, without stalactites, suggestive of monks, and catacomb-vaults, and the route to the grave; and here the dead were much fewer, proving either that the general mob had not had time to penetrate so far inward, or else that those within, if they were numerous, had gone out to defend, or to harken to, the storm of their citadel. This passage led me into an open space, the grandest of all, loftily vaulted, full of genie riches and buried treasures of light, the million-fold ensemble of lustres dancing schottische with the eye, as it moved or was still: this place, I should guess, being quite half a mile from the entrance. My prying lantern showed me here only nineteen dead, men of various nations, and at the far end two holes in the floor, large enough to admit the body, through which from below came up a sound of falling water. Both of these holes, I could see, had been filled with cement concrete — wisely, I fancy, for a current of air from somewhere seemed to be now passing through them: and this would have resulted in the death of the hidiers. Both, however, of the fillings had been broken through, one partially, the other wholly, by the ignorant, I presume, who thought to hide in a secret place yet beyond, where they may have believed, on seeing the artificial work, that others were. I had my ear a long time at one of these openings, listening to that mysterious chant down below in a darkness most murky and dismal; and afterwards, spurred by the stubborn will which I had to be thorough, I went back, took a number of outer robes from the bodies, tied them well together, then one end round the nearest pillar, and having put my mouth to the hole, calling: ‘Anyone? Anyone?’ let myself down by the rope of garments, the candle at my head: I had not, however, descended far into those mournful shades, when my right foot plunged into water: and instantly the feeling of terror pierced me that all the evil things in the universe were at my leg to drag me down to Hell: and I was up quicker than

I went down: nor did my flight cease till, with a sigh of deliverance, I found myself in open air.

After this, seeing that the autumn warmth was passing away, I set myself with more system to my task, and within the next six months worked with steadfast will, and strenuous assiduity, seeking, not indeed for a man in a mine, but for some evidence of the possibility that a man might be alive, visiting in that time Northumberland and Durham, Fife and Kinross, South Wales and Monmouthshire, Cornwall and the Midlands, the lead mines of Derbyshire, of Allandale and other parts of Northumberland, of Alston Moor and other parts of Cumberland, of Arkendale and other parts of Yorkshire, of the western part of Durham, of Salop, of Cornwall, of the Mendip Hills of Somersetshire, of Flint, Cardigan, and Montgomery, of Lanark and Argyll, of the Isle of Man, of Waterford and Down; I have gone down the 360-ft. Grand Pipe iron ladder of the abandoned graphite-mine at Barrowdale in Cumberland, half-way up a mountain 2,000 feet high; and visited where cobalt and manganese ore is mined in pockets at the Foel Hiraeddog mine near Rhyl in Flintshire, and the lead and copper Newton Stewart workings in Galloway; the Bristol coal-fields, and mines of South Staffordshire, where, as in Somerset, Gloucester, and Shropshire, the veins are thin, and the mining-system is the 'long-wall,' whereas in the North, and Wales, the system is the 'pillar-and stall'; I have visited the open workings for iron ores of Northamptonshire, and the underground stone-quarries, and the underground slate-quarries, with their alternate pillars and chambers, in the Festiniog district of North Wales; also the rock-salt workings; the tin, copper and cobalt workings of Cornwall; and where the minerals were brought to the surface on the backs of men, and where they were brought by adit-levels provided with rail-roads, and where, as in old Cornish mines, there are two ladders in the shaft, moved up and down alternately, see-saw, and by skipping from one to the other at right moments you ascended or descended, and where the drawing-up is by a gin or horse-whinn, with vertical drum; the Tisbury and Chilmark quarries in Wiltshire, the Spinkwell and Cliffwood quarries in Yorkshire; and every tunnel, and every recorded hole: for something urged within me, saying: ‘You must be sure first, or you can never be — yourself.’

At the Farnbrook Coal-field, in the Red Colt Pit, my inexperience nearly ended my life: for though I had a minute theoretical knowledge of all British workings, I was, in my practical relation to them, like a man who has learnt seamanship on shore. At this place the dead were accumulated, I think beyond precedent, the dark plain around for at least three miles being as strewn as a reaped field with stacks, and, near the bank, much more strewn than stack-fields, filling the only house within sight of the pit-mouth — the small place provided for the company's officials — and even lying over the great mountain-heap of wark, composed of the shale and débris of the working. Here I arrived on the morning of the 15th December, to find that, unlike the others, there was here no rope-ladder or other contrivance fixed by the fugitives in the ventilating-shaft, which, usually, is not very deep, being also the pumping-shaft, containing a plug-rod at one end of the beam-engine which works the pumps; but looking down the shaft, I discerned a vague mass of clothes, and afterwards a thing that could only be a rope-ladder, which a batch of the fugitives, by hanging to it their united weight, must have dragged down upon themselves, to prevent the descent of yet others. My only way of going down, therefore, was by the pit-mouth, and as this was an important place, after some hesitation I decided, very rashly. First I provided for my coming up again by getting a great coil of half-inch rope, which I found in the bailiff's office, probably 130 fathoms long, rope at most mines being so plentiful, that it almost seemed as if each fugitive had provided himself in that way. This length of rope I threw over the beam of the beam-engine in the bite where it sustains the rod, and paid one end down the shaft, till both were at the bottom: in this way I could come up, by tying one rope-end to the rope-ladder, hoisting it, fastening the other end below, and climbing the ladder; and I then set to work to light the pit-mouth engine-fire to effect my descent. This done, I started the engine, and brought up the cage from the bottom, the 300 yards of wire-rope winding with a quaint deliberateness round the drum, reminding me of a camel's nonchalant leisurely obedience. When I saw the four meeting chains of the cage-roof emerge, the pointed roof, and two-sided frame, I stopped the ascent, and next attached to the knock-off gear a long piece of twine which I had provided; carried the other end to the cage, in which I had five companions; lit my hat-candle, which was my test for choke-damp, and the Davy; and without the least reflection, pulled the string. That hole was 900 feet deep. First the cage gave a little up-leap, and then began to descend — quite normally, I thought, though the candle at once went out — nor had I the least fear; a strong current of air, indeed, blew up the shaft: but that happens in shafts. This current, however, soon became too vehemently boisterous for anything: I saw the lamp-light struggle, the dead cheeks quiver, I heard the cage-shoes go singing down the wire-rope guides, and quicker we went, and quicker, that facile descent of Avernus, slipping lightly, then raging, with sparks at the shoes and guides, and a hurricane in my ears and eyes and mouth. When we bumped upon the 'dogs' at the bottom, I was tossed a foot upwards with the stern-faced others, and then lay among them in the eight-foot space without consciousness.

It was only when I sat, an hour later, disgustedly reflecting on this incident, that I remembered that there was always some 'hand-working' of the engine during the cage-descents, an engineman reversing the action by a handle at every stroke of the piston, to prevent bumping. However, the only permanent injury was to the lamp: and I found many others inside.

I got out into the coal-hole, a large black hall 70 feet square by 15 high, the floor paved with iron sheets; there were some little holes round the wall, dug for some purpose which I never could discover, some waggons full of coal and shale standing about, and all among the waggons, and on them, and under them, bodies, clothes. I got a new lamp, pouring in my own oil, and went down a long steep ducky-road, very rough, with numerous rollers, over which ran a rope to the pit-mouth for drawing up the waggons; and in the sides here, at regular intervals, man-holes, within which to rescue one's self from down-tearing waggons; and within these man-holes, here and there, a dead, and in others every sort of food, and at one place on the right a high dead heap, and the air here hot at 64 or 65 degrees, and getting hotter with the descent.

The ducky led me down into a standing — a space with a turn-table — of unusual size, which I made my base of operations for exploring. Here was a very considerable number of punt-shaped putts on carriages, and also waggons, such as took the new-mined coal from putt to pit-mouth; and raying out from this open standing, several avenues, some ascending as guggs, some descending as dipples, and the dead here all arranged in groups, the heads of this group pointing up this gugg, of that group toward that twin-way, of that other down that dipple, and the central space, where weighing was done, almost empty: and the darksome silence of this deep place, with all these multitudes, I found extremely gravitating and hypnotic, drawing me, too, into their great Passion of Silence in which they lay, all, all, so fixed and veteran; and at one time I fell a-staring, nearer perhaps to death and the empty Gulf than I knew; but I said I would be strong, and not sink into their habit of stillness, but let them keep to their own way, and follow their own fashion, and I would keep to my own way, and follow my own fashion, nor yield to them, though I was but one against many; and I roused myself with a shudder; and setting to work, caught hold of the drum-chain of a long gugg, and planting my feet in the chogg-holes in which rested the wheels of the putt-carriages that used to come roaring down the gugg, I got up, stooping under a roof only three feet high, till I came, near the end of the ascent, upon the scene of another battle: for in this gugg about fifteen of the mine-hands had clubbed to wall themselves in, and had done it, and I saw them lie there all by themselves through the broken cement, with their bare feet, trousers, naked bodies all black, visage all fierce and wild, the grime still streaked with sweat-furrows, the candle in their rimless hats, and, outside, their own 'getting' mattocks and boring-irons to besiege them. From the bottom of this gugg I went along a very undulating twin-way, into which, every thirty yards or so, opened one of those steep putt-ways which they called topples, the twin-ways having plates of about 2-1/2 ft. gauge for the putts from the headings, or workings, above to come down upon, full of coal and shale: and all about here, in twin-way and topples, were ends and corners, and not one had been left without its walling-in, and only one was then intact, some, I fancied, having been broken open by their own builders at the spur of suffocation, or hunger; and the one intact I broke into with a mattock — it was only a thin cake of plaster, but air-tight — and in a space not seven feet long behind it I found the very ill-smelling corpse of a carting-boy, with guss and tugger at his feet, and the pad which protected his head in pushing the putts, and a great heap of loaves, sardines, and bottled beer against the walls, and five or six mice that suddenly pitched screaming through the opening which I made, greatly startling me, there being of dead mice an extraordinary number in all this mine-region. I went back to the standing, and at one point in the ground, where there was a windlass and chain, lowered myself down a 'cut' — a small pit sunk perpendicularly to a lower coal-stratum, and here, almost thinking I could hear the perpetual rat-tat of notice once exchanged between the putt-boys below and the windlass-boys above, I proceeded down a dipple to another place like a standing, for in this mine there were six, or perhaps seven, veins: and there immediately I came upon the acme of the horrible drama of this Tartarus, for all here was not merely crowded, but, at some points, a packed congestion of flesh, giving out a strong smell of the peach, curiously mixed with the stale coal-odour of the pit, for here ventilation must have been very limited; and a large number of these masses had been shot down by only three hands, as I found: for through three hermetical holes in a plaster-wall, built across a large gugg, projected a little the muzzles of three rifles, which must have glutted themselves with slaughter; and when, after a horror of disgust, having swum as it were through a dead sea, I got to the wall, I peeped from a small clear space before it through a hole, and made out a man, two youths in their teens, two women, three girls, and piles of cartridges and provisions; the hole had no doubt been broken from within at the spur of suffocation, when the poison must have entered; and I conjectured that here must be the mine-owner, director, manager, or something of that sort, with his family. In another dipple-region, when I had re-ascended to a higher level, I nearly fainted before I could retire from the commencement of a region of after-damp, where there had been an explosion, the bodies lying all hairless, devastated, and grotesque. But I did not desist from searching every other quarter, no momentary work, for not till near six did I go up by the pumping-shaft rope-ladder.

One day, standing in that wild region of bare rock and sea, called Cornwall Point, whence one can see the crags and postillion wild rocks where Land's End dashes out into the sea, and all the wild blue sea between, and not a house in sight, save the chimney of some little mill-like place peeping between the rocks inland — on that day I finished what I may call my official search.

In going away from that place, walking northward, I came upon a lonely house by the sea, a very beautiful house, made, it was clear, by an artist, of the bungalow type, with an exquisitely sea-side expression. I went to it, and found its special feature a spacious loggia or verandah, sheltered by the overhanging upper story. Up to the first floor, the exterior is of stone in rough-hewn blocks with a distinct batter, while extra protection from weather is afforded by green slating above. The roofs, of low pitch, are also covered with green slates, and a feeling of strength and repose is heightened by the very long horizontal lines. At one end of the loggia is a hexagonal turret, opening upon the loggia, containing a study or nook. In front, the garden slopes down to the sea, surrounded by an architectural sea-wall; and in this place I lived three weeks. It was the house of the poet Machen, whose name, when I saw it, I remembered very well, and he had married a very beautiful young girl of eighteen, obviously Spanish, who lay on the bed in the large bright bedroom to the right of the loggia, on her left exposed breast being a baby with an india-rubber comforter in its mouth, both mother and child wonderfully preserved, she still quite lovely, white brow under low curves of black hair. The poet, strange to say, had not died with them, but sat in the sitting-room behind the bedroom in a long loose silky-grey jacket, at his desk — actually writing a poem! writing, I could see, furiously fast, the place all littered with the written leaves — at three o'clock in the morning, when, as I knew, the cloud overtook this end of Cornwall, and stopped him, and put his head to rest on the desk; and the poor little wife must have got sleepy, waiting for it to come, perhaps sleepless for many long nights before, and gone to bed, he perhaps promising to follow in a minute to die with her, but bent upon finishing that poem, and writing feverishly on, running a race with the cloud, thinking, no doubt, 'just two couplets more,' till the thing came, and put his head to rest on the desk, poor carle: and I do not know that I ever encountered aught so complimentary to my race as this dead poet Machen, and his race with the cloud: for it is clear now that the better kind of those poet men did not write to please the vague inferior tribes who might read them, but to deliver themselves of the divine warmth that thronged in their bosom; and if all the readers were dead, still they would have written; and for God to read they wrote. At any rate, I was so pleased with these poor people, that I stayed with them three weeks, sleeping under blankets on a couch in the drawing-room, a place full of lovely pictures and faded flowers, like all the house: for I would not touch the young mother to remove her. And finding on Machen's desk a big note-book with soft covers, dappled red and yellow, not yet written in, I took it, and a pencil, and in the little turret-nook wrote day after day for hours this account of what has happened, nearly as far as it has now gone. And I think that I may continue to write it, for I find in it a strange consolation, and companionship.

In the Severn Valley, somewhere in the plain between Gloucester and Cheltenham, in a rather lonely spot, I at that time travelling on a tricycle-motor, I spied a curious erection, and went to it. I found it of considerable size, perhaps fifty feet square, and thirty high, made of pressed bricks, the perfectly flat roof, too, of brick, and not one window, and only one door: this door, which I found open, was rimmed all round its slanting rims with india-rubber, and when closed must have been perfectly air-tight. Just inside I came upon fifteen English people of the dressed class, except two, who were evidently bricklayers: six ladies, and nine men: and at the further end, two more, men, who had their throats cut; along one wall, from end to end were provisions; and I saw a chest full of mixed potassic chlorate and black oxide of manganese, with an apparatus for heating it, and producing oxygen — a foolish thing, for additional oxygen could not alter the quantity of breathed carbonic anhydride, which is a direct narcotic poison. Whether the two with cut throats had sacrificed themselves for the others when breathing difficulties commenced, or been killed by the others, was not clear. When they could bear it no longer, they must have finally opened the door, hoping that by then, after the passage of many days perhaps, the outer air would be harmless, and so met their death. I believe that this erection must have been run up by their own hands under the direction of the two bricklayers, for they could not, I suppose, have got workmen, except on the condition of the workmen's admission: on which condition they would naturally employ as few as possible.

In general, I remarked that the rich must have been more urgent and earnest in seeking escape than the others: for the poor realised only the near and visible, lived in to-day, and cherished the always-false notion that to-morrow would be just like to-day. In an out-patients' waiting-room, for instance, in the Gloucester infirmary, I chanced to see an astonishing thing: five bodies of poor old women in shawls, come to have their ailments seen-to on the day of doom; and these, I concluded, had been unable to realise that anything would really happen to the daily old earth which they knew, and had walked with assurance on: for if everybody was to die, they must have thought, who would preach in the Cathedral on Sunday evenings? — so they could not have believed. In an adjoining room sat an old doctor at a table, the stethoscope-tips still clinging in his ears: a woman with bared chest before him; and I thought to myself: 'Well, this old man, too, died doing his work....'

In this same infirmary there was one surgical ward — for in a listless mood I went over it — where the patients had died, not of the poison, nor of suffocation, but of hunger: for the doctors, or someone, had made the long room air-tight, double-boarding the windows, felting the doors, and then locking them outside; they themselves may have perished before their precautions for the imprisoned patients were complete: for I found a heap of maimed shapes, mere skeletons, crowded round the door within. I knew very well that they had not died of the cloud-poison, for the pestilence of the ward was unmixed with that odour of peach which did not fail to have more or less embalming effects upon the bodies which it saturated. I rushed stifling from that place; and thinking it a pity, and a danger, that such a horror should be, I at once set to work to gather combustibles to burn the building to the ground.

It was while I sat in an arm-chair in the street the next afternoon, smoking, and watching the flames of this structure, that something was suddenly born in me, something from the lowest Hell: and I smiled a smile that never yet man smiled. And I said: ‘I will burn, I will burn: I will return to London....’

While I was on this Eastward journey, stopping for the night at the town of Swindon, I had a dream: for I dreamed that a little brown bald old man, with a bent back, whose beard ran in one thin streamlet of silver from his chin to trail along the ground, said to me: ‘You think that you are alone on the earth, its sole Despot: well, have your fling: but as sure as God lives, as God lives, as God lives’ — he repeated it six times— ‘sooner or later, later or sooner, you will meet another....’

And I started from that frightful sleep with the brow of a corpse, wet with sweat....

I returned to London on the 29th of March, arriving within a hundred yards of the Northern Station one windy dark evening about eight, where I alighted, and walked to Euston Road, then eastward along it, till I came to a shop which I knew to be a jeweller's, though it was too dark to see any painted words. The door, to my annoyance, was locked, like nearly all the shop-doors in London: I therefore went looking near the ground, and into a cart, for something heavy, very soon saw a labourer's ponderous boots, cut one from the shrivelled foot, and set to beat at the glass till it came raining; then knocked away the bottom splinters, and entered.

No horrors now at that clatter of broken glass; no sick qualms; my pulse steady; my head high; my step royal; my eye cold and calm.

Eight months previously, I had left London a poor burdened, cowering wight. I could scream with laughter now at that folly! But it did not last long. I returned to it — the Sultan.

No private palace being near, I was going to that great hotel in Bloomsbury: but though I knew that numbers of candle-sticks would be there, I was not sure that I should find sufficient: for I had acquired the habit within the past few months of sleeping with at least sixty lighted about me, and their form, pattern, style, age, and material was of no small importance I selected ten from the broken shop, eight gold and silver, and two of old ecclesiastical brass, and having made a bundle, went out, found a bicycle at the Metropolitan Station, pumped it, tied my bundle to the handle-bar, and set off riding. But since I was too lazy to walk, I should certainly have procured some other means of travelling, for I had not gone ten jolted and creaking yards, when something went snap — it was a front fork — and I found myself half on the ground, and half across the bare knees of a Highland soldier. I flew with a shower of kicks upon the foolish thing: but that bootied nothing; and this was my last attempt in that way in London, the streets being in an unsuitable condition.

All that dismal night it blew great guns: and during nearly three weeks, till London was no more, there was a storm, with hardly a lull, that seemed to behowl her destruction.

I slept in a room on the second-floor of a Bloomsbury hotel that night; and waking the next day at ten, ate with accursed shiverings in the cold banqueting-room; went out then, and under drear low skies walked a long way to the West district, accompanied all the time by a sound of flapping flags — fluttering robes and rags — and grotesquely grim glimpses of decay. It was pretty cold, and though I was warmly clad, the base bizarrierie of the European clothes which I wore had become a perpetual offence and mockery in my eyes: at the first moment, therefore, I set out whither I knew that I should find such clothes as a man might wear: to the Turkish Embassy in Bryanston Square.

I found it open, and all the house, like most other houses, almost carpeted with dead forms. I had been acquainted with Redouza Pasha, and cast an eye about for him amid that invasion of veiled hanums, fierce-looking Caucasians in skins of beasts, a Sheik-ul-Islam in green cloak, a khalifa, three emirs in cashmere turbans, two tziganes, their gaudy brown mortality more glaringly abominable than even the Western's. I could recognise no Redouza here: but the stair was fairly clear, and I soon came to one of those boudoirs which sweetly recall the deep-buried inner seclusion and dim sanctity of the Eastern home: a door encrusted with mother-of-pearl, sculptured ceiling, candles clustered in tulips and roses of opal, a brazen brasero, and, all in disarray, the silken chemise, the long winter-cafetan doubled with furs, costly cabinets, sachets of aromas, babooshes, stuffs of silk. When, after two hours, I went from the house, I was bathed, anointed, combed, scented, and robed.

I have said to myself: 'I will ravage and riot in my Kingdoms. I will rage like the Caesars, and be a withering blight where I pass like Sennacherib, and wallow in soft delights like Sardanapalus. I will build me a palace, vast as a city, in which to strut and parade my Monarchy before the Heavens, with stones of pure molten gold, and rough frontispiece of diamond, and cupola of amethyst, and pillars of pearl. For there were many men to the eye: but there was One only, really: and I was he. And always I knew it: — some faintest secret whisper which whispered me: "You are the Arch-one, the motif of the world, Adam, and the rest of men not much." And they are gone — all! all! — as no doubt they deserved: and I, as was meet, remain. And there are wines, and opiums, and haschish; and there are oils, and spices, fruits and bivalves, and soft-breathing Cyclades, and scarlet luxurious Orients. I will be restless and turbulent in my territories: and again, I will be languishing and fond. I will say to my soul: "Be Full."'

I watch my mind, as in the old days I would watch a new precipitate in a test-tube, to see into what sediment it would settle.

I am very averse to trouble of any sort, so that the necessity for the simplest manual operations will rouse me to indignation: but if a thing will contribute largely to my ever-growing voluptuousness, I will undergo a considerable amount of labour to accomplish it, though without steady effort, being liable to side-winds and whims, and purposeless relaxations.

In the country I became very irritable at the need which confronted me of occasionally cooking some green vegetable — the only item of food which it was necessary to take some trouble over: for all meats, and many fish, some quite delicious, I find already prepared in forms which will remain good probably a century after my death, should I ever die. In Gloucester, however, I found peas, asparagus, olives, and other greens, already prepared to be eaten without base cares: and these, I now see, exist everywhere in stores so vast comparatively to the needs of a single man, that they may be called infinite. Everything, in fact, is infinite compared with my needs. I take my meals, therefore, without more trouble than a man who had to carve his joint, or chicken: though even that little I sometimes find most irksome. There remains the detestable degradation of lighting fires for warmth, which I have occasionally to do: for the fire at the hotel invariably goes out while I sleep. But that is an inconvenience of this vile northern island only, to which I shall soon bid eternal glad farewells.

During the afternoon of my second day in London, I sought out a strong petrol motor in Holborn, overhauled and oiled it a little, and set off over Blackfriars Bridge, making for Woolwich through that other more putrid London on the south river-side. One after the other, I connected, as I came upon them, two drays, a cab, and a private carriage, to my motor in line behind, having cut away the withered horses, and using the reins, chain-harness, &c., as impromptu couplings. And with this novel train, I rumbled eastward.

Half-way I happened to look at my old silver chronometer of Boreal-days, which I have kept carefully wound — and how I can be still thrown into these sudden frantic agitations by a nothing, a nothing, my good God! I do not know. This time it was only the simple fact that the hands chanced to point to 3.10 P.M., the precise moment at which all the clocks of London had stopped — for each town has its thousand weird fore-fingers, pointing, pointing still, to the moment of doom. In London it was 3.10 on a Sunday afternoon. I first noticed it going up the river on the face of the ‘Big Ben’ of the Parliament-house, and I now find that they all, all, have this 3.10 mania, time-keepers still, but keepers of the end of Time, fixedly noting for ever and ever that one moment. The cloud-mass of fine penetrating scoriae must have instantly stopped their works, and they had fallen silent with man. But in their insistence upon this particular minute I had found something so hideously solemn, yet mock-solemn, personal, and as it were addressed to me, that when my own watch dared to point to the same moment, I was thrown into one of those sudden, paroxysmal, panting turmoils of mind, half rage, half horror, which have hardly once visited me since I left the Boreal. On the morrow, alas, another awaited me; and again on the second morrow after.

My train was execrably slow, and not until after five did I arrive at the entrance-gates of the Woolwich Royal Arsenal; and seeing that it was too late to work, I uncoupled the motor, and leaving the others there, turned back; but overtaken by lassitude, I procured candles, stopped at the Greenwich Observatory, and in that old dark pile, remained for the night, listening to a furious storm. But, a-stir by eight the next morning, I got back by ten to the Arsenal, and proceeded to analyse that vast and multiple entity. Many parts of it seemed to have been abandoned in undisciplined haste, and in the Cap Factory, which I first entered, I found tools by which to effect entry into any desired part. My first search was for time-fuses of good type, of which I needed two or three thousand, and after a wearily long time found a great number symmetrically arranged in rows in a range of buildings called the Ordnance Store Department. I then descended, walked back to the wharf, brought up my train, and began to lower the fuses in bag-fulls by ropes through a shoot, letting go each rope as the fuses reached the cart. However, on winding one fuse, I found that the mechanism would not go, choked with scoriae; and I had to resign myself to the task of opening and dusting every one: a wretched labour in which I spent that day, like a workman. But about four I threw them to the devil, having done two hundred odd, and then hummed back in the motor to London.

That same evening at six I paid, for the first time, a visit to my old self in Harley Street. It was getting dark, and a bleak storm that hooted like whooping-cough swept the world. At once I saw that even I had been invaded: for my door swung open, banging, a lowered catch preventing it from slamming; in the passage the car-lamp shewed me a young man who seemed a Jew, sitting as if in sleep with dropped head, a back-tilted silk-hat pressed down upon his head to the ears; and lying on face, or back, or side, six more, one a girl with Arlesienne head-dress, one a negress, one a Deal lifeboat's-man, and three of uncertain race; the first room — the waiting-room — is much more numerously occupied, though there still, on the table, lies the volume of Punch, the Gentlewoman, and the book of London views in heliograph. Behind this, descending two steps, is the study and consulting-room, and there, as ever, the revolving-cover oak writing-desk: but on my little shabby-red sofa, a large lady much too big for it, in shimmering brown silk, round her left wrist a trousseau of massive gold trinkets, her head dropped right back, almost severed by an infernal gash from the throat. Here were two old silver candle-sticks, which I lit, and went upstairs: in the drawing-room sat my old house-keeper, placidly dead in a rocking-chair, her left hand pressing down a batch of the open piano-keys, among many strangers. But she was very good: she had locked my bedroom against intrusion; and as the door stands across a corner behind a green-baize curtain, it had not been seen, or, at least, not forced. I did not know where the key might be, but a few thumps with my back drove it open: and there lay my bed intact, and everything tidy. This was a strange coming-back to it, Adam.

But what intensely interested me in that room was a big thing standing at the maroon-and-gold wall between wardrobe and dressing-table — that gilt frame — and that man painted within it there. It was myself in oils, done by — I forget his name now: a towering celebrity he was, and rather a close friend of mine at one time. In a studio in St. John's Wood, I remember, he did it; and many people said that it was quite a great work of art. I suppose I was standing before it quite thirty minutes that night, holding up the bits of candle, lost in wonder, in amused contempt at that thing there. It is I, certainly: that I must admit. There is the high-curving brow — really a King's brow, after all, it strikes me now — and that vacillating look about the eyes and mouth which used to make my sister Ada say: 'Adam is weak and luxurious.' Yes, that is wonderfully done, the eyes, that dear, vacillating look of mine; for although it is rather a staring look, yet one can almost see the dark pupils stir from side to side: very well done. And there is the longish face; and the rather thin, stuck-out moustache, shewing both lips which pout a bit; and there is the nearly black hair; and there is the rather visible paunch; and there is, oh good Heaven, the neat pink cravat — ah, it must have been that — the cravat — that made me burst out into laughter so loud, mocking, and uncontrollable the moment my eye rested there! 'Adam Jeffson,' I muttered reproachfully when it was over, 'could that poor thing in the frame have been you?'

I cannot quite state why the tendency toward Orientalism — Oriental dress — all the manner of an Oriental monarch — has taken full possession of me: but so it is: for surely I am hardly any longer a Western, 'modern' mind, but a primitive and Eastern one. Certainly, that cravat in the frame has receded a million, million leagues, ten thousand forgotten aeons, from me! Whether this is a result due to my own personality, of old acquainted with Eastern notions, or whether, perhaps, it is the natural accident to any mind wholly freed from trammels, I do not know. But I seem to have gone right back to the very beginnings, and resemblance with man in his first, simple, gaudy conditions. My hair, as I sit here writing, already hangs a black, oiled string down my back; my scented beard sweeps in two opening whisks to my ribs; I have on the izar, a pair of drawers of yomani cloth like cotton, but with yellow stripes; over this a soft shirt, or quamis, of white silk, reaching to my calves; over this a short vest of gold-embroidered crimson, the sudeyree; over this a khaftan of green-striped silk, reaching to the ankles, with wide, long sleeves divided at the wrist, and bound at the waist with a voluminous gaudy shawl of Cashmere for girdle; over this a warm wide-flowing torrent of white drapery, lined with ermine. On my head is the skull-cap, covered by a high crimson cap with deep-blue tassel; and on my feet is a pair of thin yellow-morocco shoes, covered over with thick red-morocco babooshes. My ankles — my ten fingers — my wrists — are heavy with gold and silver ornaments; and in my ears, which, with considerable pain, I bored three days since, are two needle-splinters, to prepare the holes for rings.

O Liberty! I am free....

While I was going to visit my old home in Harley Street that night, at the very moment when I turned from Oxford Street into Cavendish Square, this thought, fiercely hissed into my ears, was all of a sudden seething in me: ‘If now I should lift my eyes, and see a man walking yonder — just yonder — at the corner there — turning from Harewood Place into Oxford Street — what, my good God, should I do? — I without even a knife to run and plunge into his heart?’

And I turned my eyes — ogling, suspicious eyes of furtive horror — reluctantly, lingeringly turned — and I peered deeply with lowered brows across the murky winds at that same spot: but no man was there.

Hideously frequent is this nonsense now become with me — in streets of towns — in deep nooks of the country: the invincible assurance that, if I but turn the head, and glance there — at a certain fixed spot — I shall surely see — I must see — a man. And glance I must, glance I must, though I perish: and when I glance, though my hairs creep and stiffen like stirring amobse, yet in my eyes, I know, is monarch indignation against the intruder, and my neck stands stiff as sovereignty itself, and on my brow sits more than all the lordship of Persepolis and Iraz.

To what point of wantonness this arrogance of royalty may lead me, I do not know: I will watch, and see. It is written: ‘It is not good for man to be alone!’ But good or no, the arrangement of One planet, One inhabitant, already seems to me, not merely a natural and proper, but the only natural and proper, condition; so much so, that any other arrangement has now, to my mind, a certain improbable, wild, and far-fetched unreality, like the Utopian schemes of dreamers and faddists. That the whole world should have been made for me alone — that London should have been built only in order that I might enjoy the vast heroic spectacle of its burning — that all history, and all civilisation should have existed only in order to accumulate for my pleasures its inventions and facilities, its stores of purple and wine, of spices and gold — no more extraordinary does it all seem to me than to some little unreflecting Duke of my former days seemed the possessing of lands which his remote forefathers seized, and slew the occupiers: nor, in reality, is it even so extraordinary, I being alone. But what sometimes strikes me with some surprise is, not that the present condition of the world, with one sole master, should seem the common-place and natural condition, but that it should have come to seem so common-place and natural — in nine months. The mind of Adam Jeffson is adaptable.

I sat a long time thinking such things by my bed that night, till finally I was disposed to sleep there. But I had no considerable number of candle-sticks, nor was even sure of candles. I remembered, however, that Peter Peters, three doors away on the other side of the street, had had four handsome silver candelabra in his drawing-room, each containing six stems; and I said to myself: ‘I will search for candles in the kitchen, and if I find any, I will go and get Peter Peters’ candelabra, and sleep here.’

I took then the two lights which I had, my good God; went down to the passage; then down to the basement; and there had no difficulty in finding three packets of large candles, the fact being, I suppose, that the cessation of gas-lighting had compelled everyone to provide themselves in this way, for there were a great many wherever I looked. With these I re-ascended, went into a little alcove on the second-floor where I had kept some drugs, got a bottle of carbolic oil, and for ten minutes went dashing all the corpses in the house. I then left the two lighted bits of candle on the waiting-room table, and, with the car-lamp, passed along the passage to the front-door, which was very violently banging. I stepped out to find that the storm had increased to a mighty turbulence (though it was dry), which at once caught my clothes, and whirled them into a flapping cloud about and above me; also, I had not crossed the street when my lamp was out. I persisted, however, half blinded, to Peters door. It was locked: but immediately near the pavement was a window, the lower sash up, into which, with little trouble, I lifted myself and passed. My foot, as I lowered it, stood on a body: and this made me angry and restless. I hissed a curse, and passed on, scraping the carpet with my soles, that I might hurt no one: for I did not wish to hurt any one. Even in the almost darkness of the room I recognised Peters' furniture, as I expected: for the house was his on a long lease, and I knew that his mother had had the intention to occupy it after his death. But as I passed into the passage, all was mere blank darkness, and I, depending upon the lamp, had left the matches in the other house. I groped my way to the stairs, and had my foot on the first step, when I was stopped by a vicious shaking of the front-door, which someone seemed to be at with hustlings and the most urgent poundings: I stood with peering stern brows two or three minutes, for I knew that if I once yielded to the flinching at my heart, no mercy would be shown me in this house of tragedy, and thrilling shrieks would of themselves arise and ring through its haunted chambers. The rattling continued an inordinate time, and so instant and imperative, that it seemed as if it could not fail to force the door. But, though horrified, I whispered to my heart that it could only be the storm which was struggling at it like the grasp of a man, and after a time went on, feeling my way by the broad rail, in my brain somehow the thought of a dream which I had had in the Boreal of the woman Clodagh, how she let drop a fluid like pomegranate-seeds into water, and tendered it to Peter Peters: and it was a mortal purging draught; but I would not stop, but step by step went up, though I suffered very much, my brows peering at the utter darkness, and my heart shocked at its own rashness. I got to the first landing, and as I turned to ascend the second part of the stair, my left hand touched something icily cold: I made some quick instinctive movement of terror, and, doing so, my foot struck against something, and I stumbled, half falling over what seemed a small table there. Immediately a horrible row followed, for something fell to the ground: and at that instant, ah, I heard something — a voice — a human voice, which uttered words close to my ear — the voice of Clodagh, for I knew it: yet not the voice of Clodagh in the flesh, but her voice clogged with clay and worms, and full of effort, and thick-tongued: and in that ghastly speech of the grave I distinctly heard the words:

‘Things being as they are in the matter of the death of Peter ...’

And there it stopped dead, leaving me so sick, my God, so sick, that I could hardly snatch my robes about me to fly, fly, fly, soft-footed, murmuring in pain, down the steps, down like a sneaking thief, but quick, snatching myself away, then wrestling with the cruel catch of the door which she would not let me open, feeling her all the time behind me, watching me. And when I did get out, I was away up the length of the street, trailing my long jubbah, glancing backward, panting, for I thought that she might dare to follow, with her daring evil will. And all that night I lay on a common bench in the wind-tossed and dismal Park.

The first thing which I did when the sun was up was to return to that place: and I returned with hard and masterful brow.

Approaching Peters’ house I saw now, what the darkness had hidden from me, that on his balcony was someone — quite alone there. The balcony is a slight open-work wrought-iron structure, connected to a small roof by three slender voluted pillars, two at the ends, one in the middle: and at the middle one I saw someone, a woman — kneeling — her arms clasped tight about the pillar, and her face rather upward-looking. Never did I see aught more horrid: there were the gracious curves of the woman’s bust and hips still well preserved in a clinging dress of red cloth, very faded now; and her reddish hair floated loose in a large flimsy cloud about her; but her face, in that exposed position, had been quite eaten away by the winds to a noseless skeleton, which grinned from ear to ear, with slightly-dropped under-jaw — most horrid in contrast with the body, and frame of hair. I meditated upon her a long time that morning from the opposite pavement. An oval locket at her throat contained, I knew, my likeness: for eight years previously I had given it her. It was Clodagh, the poisoner.

I thought that I would go into that house, and walk through it from top to bottom, and sit in it, and spit in it, and stamp in it, in spite of any one: for the sun was now high. I accordingly went in again, and up the stairs to the spot where I had been frightened, and had heard the words. And here a great rage took me, for I at once saw that I had been made the dupe of the malign wills that beset me, and the laughing-stock of Those for whom I care not a fig. From a little mahogany table there I had knocked sideways to the ground, in my stumble, a small phonograph with a great 25-inch japanned-tin horn, which, the moment that I now noticed it, I took and flung with a great racket down the stairs: for that this it was which had addressed me I did not doubt; it being indeed evident that its clock-work mechanism had been stopped by the volcanic scoriae in the midst of the delivery of a record, but had been started into a few fresh oscillations by the shock of the fall, making it utter those thirteen words, and stop. I was sufficiently indignant at the moment, but have since been glad, for I was thereby put upon the notion of collecting a number of cylinders with records, and have been touched with indescribable sensations, sometimes thrilled, at hearing the silence of this Eternity broken by those singing and speaking voices, so life-like, yet most ghostly, of the old dead.

Well, the most of that same day I spent in a high chamber at Woolwich, dusting out, and sometimes oiling, time-fuses: a work in which I acquired such facility in some hours, that each finally occupied me no more than ninety to a hundred seconds, so that by evening I had, with the previous day's work, close on 600. The construction of these little things is very simple, and, I believe, effective, so that I should have no difficulty in making them myself in large numbers, if it were necessary. Most contain a tiny dry battery, which sends a current along a bell or copper wire at the running-down moment, the clocks being contrived to be set for so many days, hours, and minutes, while others ignite by striking. I arranged in rows in the covered van those which I had prepared, and passed the night in an inn near the Barracks. I had brought candle-sticks from London in the morning, and arranged the furniture — a settee, chest-of-drawers, basin-stand, table, and a number of chairs — in three-quarter-circle round the bed, so getting a triple-row altar of lights, mixed with vases of the house containing small palms and evergreens; with this I mingled a smell of ambergris from the scattered contents of some Turkish sachets which I had; in the bed a bottle of sweet Chypre-wine, with bonbons, nuts, and Havannas. As I lay me down, I could not but reflect, with a smile which I knew to be evil, upon that steady, strong, smouldering lust within me which was urging me through all those pains at the Arsenal, I who shirked every labour as unkingly. So, however, it was: and the next morning I was at it again after an early breakfast, my fingers at first quite stiff with cold, for it blew a keen and January gale. By nine I had 820 fuses; and judging those sufficient to commence with, got into the motor, and took it round to a place called the East Laboratory, a series of detached buildings, where I knew that I should find whatever I wanted: and I prepared my mind for a day's labour. In this place I found incredible stores: mountains of percussion-caps, more chambers of fuses, small-arm cartridges, shells, and all those murderous explosive mixtures, a-making and made, with which modern savagery occupied its leisure in exterminating itself: or, at least, savagery civilised in its top-story only: for civilisation was apparently from the head downwards, and never once grew below the neck in all those centuries, those people being certainly much more mental than cordial, though I doubt if they were genuinely mental either — reminding one rather of that composite image of Nebuchadnezzar, head of gold, breast brazen, feet of clay — head man-like, heart cannibal, feet bestial — like aegipeds, and mermaids, and puzzling undeveloped births. However, it is of no importance: and perhaps I am not much better than the rest, for I, too, after all, am of them. At any rate, their lyddites, melanites, cordites, dynamites, powders, jellies, oils, marls, and civilised barbarisms and obiahs, came in very well for their own destruction: for by two o'clock I had so worked, that I had on the first cart the phalanx of fuses; on the second a goodly number of kegs, cartridge-cases and cartridge-boxes, full of powder, explosive cottons and gelatines, and liquid nitro-glycerine, and earthy dynamite, with some bombs, two reels of cordite, two pieces of tarred cloth, a small iron ladle, a shovel, and a crow-bar; the cab came next, containing a considerable quantity of loose coal; and lastly, in the private carriage lay four big cans of common oil. And first, in the Laboratory, I connected a fuse-conductor with a huge tun of blasting-gelatine, and I set the fuse on the ground, timed for the midnight of the twelfth day thence; and after that I visited the Main Factory, the Carriage Department, the Ordnance Store Department, the Royal Artillery Barracks, and the Powder Magazines in the Marshes, traversing, as it seemed to me, miles of building; and in some I laid heaps of oil-saturated coal with an explosive in suitable spots on the ground-floor near wood-work, and in some an explosive alone: and all I timed for ignition at midnight of the twelfth day. Hot now, and black as ink, I proceeded through the town, stopping with perfect system at every hundredth door: and I laid the faggots of a great burning: and timed them all for ignition at midnight of the twelfth day.

Whatever door I found closed against me I drove at it with a maniac malice.

Shall I commit the whole dark fact to paper? — that deep, deep secret of the human organism?

As I wrought, I waxed wicked as a demon! And with lowered neck, and forward curve of the lower spine, and the blasphemous strut of tragic play-actors, I went. For here was no harmless burning which I did — but the crime of arson; and a most fiendish, though vague, malevolence, and the rage to burn and raven and riot, was upon me like a dog-madness, and all the mood of Nero, and Nebuchadnezzar: and from my mouth proceeded all the obscenities of the slum and of the gutter, and I sent up such hisses and giggles of challenge to Heaven that day as never yet has man let out. But this way lies a spinning frenzy....

I have taken a dead girl with wild huggings to my bosom; and I have touched the corrupted lip, and spat upon her face, and tossed her down, and crushed her teeth with my heel, and jumped and jumped upon her breast, like the snake-stamping zebra, mad, mad...!

I was desolated, however, that first day of the faggot-laying, even in the midst of my sense of omnipotence, by one thing, which made me give some kicks to the motor: for it was only crawling, so that a good part of the way I was stalking by its side; and when I came to that hill near the Old Dover Road, the whole thing stopped, and refused to move, the weight of the train being too great for my horse-power traction. I did not know what to do, and stood there in angry impotence a full half-hour, for the notion of setting up an electric station, with or without automatic stoking-gear, presented so hideous a picture of labour to me, that I would not entertain it. After a time, however, I thought that I remembered that there was a comparatively new power station in St. Paneras driven by turbines: and at once, I uncoupled the motor, covered the drays with the tarpaulins, and went driving at singing speed, choosing the emptier by-streets, and not caring whom I crushed. After some trouble I found, in fact, the station in an obscure by-street made of two long walls, and went in by a window, a rage upon me to have my will quickly accomplished. I ran up some stairs, across two rooms, into a gallery containing a switch-board, and in the room below saw the works, all very neat-looking, but, as I soon found, very dusty. I went down, and fixed upon a generating set — there were three — that would give a decent load, and then saw that the switch-gear belonging to this particular generator was in order. I then got some cloths and thoroughly cleaned the dust off the commutators; ran next — for I was in a strange fierce haste — and turned the water into the turbines, and away went the engine; I hurried to set the lubricators running on the bearings, and in a couple of minutes had adjusted the speed, and the brushes of the generators, and switched the current on to the line. By this time, however, I saw that it was getting dark, and feared that little could be done that day; still, I hurried out, the station still running, got into the car, and was off to look for a good electric one, of which there are hosts in the streets, in order at least to clean up and adjust the motor that night. I drove down three by-streets, till I turned into Euston Road: but I had no sooner reached it than I pulled up — with sudden jerk — with a shout of astonishment.

That cursed street was all lighted up and gay! and three shimmering electric globes, not far apart, illuminated every feature of a ghastly battle-field of dead.

And there was a thing there, the grinning impression of which I shall carry to my grave: a thing which spelled and spelled at me, and ceased, and began again, and ceased, and spelled at me. For, above a shop which faced me was a flag, a red flag with white letters, fluttering on the gale the words: 'Metcalfe's Stores'; and beneath the flag, stretched right across the house, was the thing which spelled, letter by letter, in letters of light: and it spelled two words, deliberately, coming to the end, and going back to recommence:

Drink

ROBORAL.

And that was the last word of civilised Man to me, Adam Jeffson — its final counsel — its ultimate gospel and message — to me, my good God!
Drink Roboral!

I was put into such a passion of rage by this blatant ribaldry, which affected me like the laughter of a skeleton, that I rushed from the car, with the intention, I believe, of seeking stones to stone it: but no stones were there: and I had to stand impotently enduring that rape of my eyes, its victoriously-dogged iteration, its taunting leer, its Drink Roboral — D, R, I, N, K R, O, B, O, R, A, L.

It was one of those electrical spelling-advertisements, worked by a small motor commutator driven by a works-motor, and I had now set it going: for on some night before that Sabbath of doom the chemist must have set it to work, but finding the works abandoned, had not troubled to shut it down again. At any rate, this thing stopped my work for that day, for when I went to shut down the works it was night; and I drove to the place which I had made my home in sullen and weary mood: for I knew that Roboral would not cure the least of all my sores.

The next morning I awoke in quite another frame of mind, disposed to idle, and let things go. After rising, dressing, washing in cold diluted rose-water, and descending to the salle-à-manger, where I had laid my morning-meal the previous evening, I promenaded an hour the only one of these long sombrous tufted corridors in which there were not more than two dead, though behind the doors on either hand, all of which I had locked, I knew that they lay in plenty. When I was warmed, I again went down, looked into my motor, got three cylinders from one of a number of motors standing near, lit up, and drove away — to Woolwich, as I thought at first: but instead of crossing the river by Blackfriars, I went more eastward; and having passed from Holborn into Cheapside, which was impassable, unless I crawled, was about to turn, when I noticed a phonograph-shop: into this I got by a side-door, suddenly seized by quite a curiosity to hear what I might hear. I took a good one with microphone diaphragm, and a number of record-cylinders in a brass-handled box, and I put them into the car, for there was still a very strong peach-odour in this closed shop, which displeased me. I then proceeded southward and westward through by-streets, seeking some probable house into which to go from the rough cold winds, when I saw the Parliament-house, and thither, turning river-ward by Westminster Hall to Palace Yard, I went, and with my two parcels, one weighting each arm, walked into this old place along a line of purple-dusted busts; I deposited my boxes on a table beside a massive brass thing lying there, which, I suppose, must be what they called the Mace; and I sat to hear.

Unfortunately, the phonograph was a clock-work one, and when I wound it, it would not go: so that I got very angry at my absurdity in not bringing an electric mechanism, as I could with much less trouble have put in a chemical than cleaned the clock-work; and this thing put me into such a rage, that I nearly tore it to pieces, and was half for kicking it: but there was a man sitting in an old straight-backed chair quite near me, which they called the Speaker's Chair, who was in such a pose, that he had, every time I glanced suddenly at him, precisely the air of bending forward with interest to watch what I was doing, a Mohrgrabim kind of man, almost black, with Jewish nose, crinkled hair, keffie, and flowing robe, probably, I should say, an Abyssinian Galla; with him were only five or six people about the benches, mostly leaning forward with rested head, so that this place had quite a void sequestered mood. At all events, this Galla, or Bedouin, with his grotesque interest in my doings, restrained my hands: and, finally, by dint of peering, poking, dusting, and adjusting, in an hour's time I got the phonograph to go very well.

And all that morning, and far into late afternoon, forgetful of food, and of the cold which gradually possessed me, I sat there listening, musing — cylinder after cylinder: frivolous songs, orchestras, voices of famous men whom I had spoken with, and shaken their solid hands, speaking again to me, but thick-tongued, with hoarse effort and gurgles, from out the vague void beyond the grave: most strange, most strange. And the third cylinder that I put on, ah, I knew, with a fearful start, that voice of thunder, I knew it well: it was the preacher, Mackay's; and many, many times over I heard those words of his that day, originally spoken, it seems, when the cloud had just passed the longitude of Vienna; and in all that torrent of speech not one single word of 'I told you so': but he cries:

‘...praise Him, O Earth, for He is He: and if He slay me, I will laugh raillery at His Sword, and banter Him to His face: for His Sword is sharp Mercy, and His poisons kill my death. Fear not, therefore, little flock of Man! but take my comfort to your heart to-night, and my sweets to your tongue: for though ye have sinned, and hardened yourselves as brass, and gone far, far astray in these latter wildernesses, yet He is infinitely greater than your sin, and will lead you back. Break not, break not, poor broken heart of Earth: for from Him I run herald to thee this night with the sweet and secret message, that of old He chose thee, and once mixed conjugally with thee in an ancient sleep, O Afflicted: and He is thou, and thou art He, flesh of His flesh, and bone of His bone; and if thou perish utterly, it is that He has perished utterly, too: for thou art He. Hope, therefore, most, and cheeriest smile, at the very apsis and black nadir of Despair: for He is nimble as a weasel, and He twists like Proteus, and His solstices and equinoxes, His tropics and turning-points and recurrences are innate in Being, and when He falls He falls like harlequin and shuttlecocks, shivering plumb to His feet, and each third day, lo, He is risen again, and His defeats are but the stepping-stones and rough scaffolding from which He builds His Parthenons, and from the densest basalt gush His rills, and the last end of this Earth shall be no poison-cloud, I say to you, but Carnival and Harvest-home ... though ye have sinned, poor hearts ...’

So Mackay, with thick-tongued metallic effort. I found this brown room of the Commons-house, with its green benches, and grilled galleries, so agreeable to my mood, that I went again the next morning, and listened to more records, till they tired me: for what I had was a prurient itch to hear secret scandals, and revelations of the festering heart, but these cylinders, gathered from a shop, divulged nothing. I then went out to make for Woolwich, but in the car saw the poet's note-book in which I had written: and I took it, went back, and was writing an hour, till I was tired of that, too; and judging it too late for Woolwich that day, wandered about the dusty committee-rooms and recesses of this considerable place. In one room another foolishness suddenly seized upon me, shewing how my slightest whim has become more imperious within me than all the Jaws of the Medes and Persians: for in that room, Committee Room No. 15, I found an apparently young policeman lying flat on his back, who pleased me: his helmet tilted under his head, and near one white-gloved hand a blue official envelope; the air of that stagnant quiet room was still perceptibly peach-scented, and he gave not the slightest odour that I could detect, though he had been corporal and stalwart, his face now the colour of dark ashes, in each hollow cheek a ragged hole about the size of a sixpence, the flimsy vaulted eye-lids well embedded in their caverns, from under whose fringe of eye-lash seemed whispered the word: 'Eternity.' His hair seemed very long for a policeman, or perhaps it had grown since death; but what interested me about him, was the envelope at his hand: for 'what,' I asked myself, 'was this fellow doing here with an envelope at three o'clock on a Sunday afternoon?' This made me look closer, and then I saw by a mark at the left temple that he had been shot, or felled; whereupon I was thrown into quite a great rage, for I thought that this poor man was killed in the execution of his duty, when many of his kind perhaps, and many higher than he, had fled their post to pray or riot. So, after looking at him a long time, I said to him: 'Well, D. 47, you sleep very well: and you did well, dying so: I am pleased with you, and to mark my favour, I decree that you shall neither rot in the common air, nor burn in the common flames: for by my own hand shall you be distinguished with burial.' And this wind so possessed me, that I at once went out: with the crow-bar from the car I broke the window of a near iron-monger's in Parliament Street, got a spade, and went into Westminster Abbey. I soon prised up a grave-slab of some famous man in the north transept, and commenced to shovel: but, I do not know how, by the time I had digged a foot the whole impulse passed from me: I left off the work, promising to resume it: but nothing was ever done, for the next day I was at Woolwich, and busy enough about other matters.

During the next nine days I worked with a fever on me, and a map of London before me.

There were places in that city! — secrets, vastnesses, horrors! In the wine-vaults at London Docks was a vat which must certainly have contained between twenty and thirty thousand gallons: and with dancing heart I laid a train there; the tobacco-warehouse must have covered eighty acres: and there I laid a fuse. In a house near Regent's Park, standing in a garden, and shut from the street by a high wall, I saw a thing...! and what shapes a great city hid I now first know.

I left no quarter unremembered, taking a train, no longer of four, but of eight, vehicles, drawn by an electric motor which I re-charged every morning, mostly from the turbine station in St. Pancras, once from a steam-station with very small engine and dynamo, found in the Palace Theatre, which gave little trouble, and once from a similar little station in a Strand hotel. With these I visited West Ham and Kew, Finchley and Clapham, Dalston and Marylebone; I exhausted London; I deposited piles in the Guildhall, in Holloway Gaol, in the new pillared Justice-hall of Newgate, in the Tower, in the Parliament-house, in St. Giles' Workhouse, in the Crypt and under the organ of St. Paul's, in the South Kensington Museum, in the Royal Agricultural Society, in Whiteley's place, in the Trinity House, in Liverpool Street, in the Office of Works, in the secret recesses of the British Museum; in a hundred inflammable warehouses, in five hundred shops, in a thousand private dwellings. And I timed them all for ignition at midnight of the 23rd April.

By five in the afternoon of the 22nd, when I left my train in Maida Vale, and drove alone to the solitary house on high ground near Hampstead Heath which I had chosen, the work was well finished.

The great morning dawned, and I was early a-stir: for I had much to do that day.

I intended to make for the sea-shore the next morning, and had therefore to choose a good petrol motor, store it, and have it in a place of safety; I had also to drag another vehicle after me, stored with trunks of time-fuses, books, clothes, and other little things.

My first journey was to Woolwich, whence I took all that I might ever require in the way of mechanism; thence to the National Gallery, where I cut from their frames the 'Vision of St. Helena,' Murillo's 'Boy Drinking,' and 'Christ at the Column'; and thence to the Embassy to bathe, anoint myself, and dress.

As I had anticipated, and hoped, a blustering spring gale was blowing from the north.

Even as I set out from Hampstead, about 9 A.M., I had been able to guess that some of my fuses had somehow anticipated the appointed hour: for I saw three red hazes at various points in the air, and heard the far vague booming of an occasional explosion; and by 11 A.M. I felt sure that a large region of north-eastern London must be in flames. With the solemn feelings of bridegrooms and marriage-mornings — with a flinching, a flinching heart, God knows, yet a heart up-buoyed on thrilling joys — I went about making preparations for the Gargantuan orgy of the night.

The house at Hampstead, which no doubt still stands, is of rather pleasing design in quite a stone and rural style, with good breadths of wall-surface, two plain coped gables, mullioned windows, and oversailing slate verge roofs, but, rather spoiling it, a high square three-storied tower at the south-east angle, on the topmost floor of which I had slept the previous night. There I had provided myself with a jar of pale tobacco mixed with rose-leaves and opium, found in a foreign house in Seymour Street, also a genuine Saloniki hookah, together with the best wines, nuts, and so on, and a gold harp of the musician Krasinski, stamped with his name, taken from his house in Portland Street.

But so much did I find to do that day, and so many odd things turned up which I thought that I would take with me, that it was not till near six that I drove finally northward through Camden Town. And now an ineffable awe possessed my soul at the solemn noise which everywhere encompassed me, an ineffable awe, a blissful terror. Never, never could I have dreamed of aught so great and potent. All above my head there rushed southward with wide-spread wing of haste a sparkling smoke; and mixed with the immense roaring I heard mysterious hubbubs of tumblings and rumblings, which I could not at all comprehend, like the moving-about of furniture in the houses of Titans; while pervading all the air was a most weird and tearful sound, as it were threnody, and a wild wail of pain, and dying swan-songs, and all lamentations and tribulations of the world. Yet I was aware that, at an hour so early, the flames must be far from general; in fact, they had not well commenced.

As I had left a good semicircular region of houses, with a radius of four hundred yards, without combustibles to the south of the isolated house which I was to occupy, and as the wind was so strongly from the north, I simply left my two vehicles at the door of the house, without fear of any injury: nor did any occur. I then went up to the top of the tower, lit the candles, and ate voraciously of the dinner which I had left ready, for since the morning I had taken nothing; and then, with hands and heart that quivered, I arranged the clothes of the low spring-bed upon which to throw my frame in the morning hours. Opposite the wall, where lay the bed, was a Gothic window, pretty large, with low sill, hung with poppy-figured muslin, and looking directly south, so that I could recline at ease in the red-velvet easy-chair, and see. It had evidently been a young lady's room: for on the toilette were cut-glass bottles, a plait of brown hair, powders, rouge-aux-lèvres, one little bronze slipper, and knick-knacks, and I loved her and hated her, though I did not see her anywhere. About half-past eight I sat at the window to watch, all being arranged and ready at my right hand, the candles extinguished in the red room: for the theatre was opened, was opened: and the atmosphere of this earth seemed turned into Hell, and Hell was in my soul.

Soon after midnight there was a sudden and very visible increase in the conflagration. On all hands I began to see blazing structures soar, with grand hurrahs, on high. In fives and tens, in twenties and thirties, all between me and the remote limit of my vision, they leapt, they lingered long, they fell. My spirit more and more felt, and danced — deeper mysteries of sensation, sweeter thrills. I sipped exquisitely, I drew out enjoyment leisurely. Anon, when some more expansive angel of flame would arise from the Pit with steady aspiration, and linger with outspread arms, and burst, I would lift a little from the chair, leaning forward to clap, as at some famous acting; or I would call to them in shouts of cheer, giving them the names of Woman. For now I seemed to see nothing but some bellowing pandemonic universe through crimson glasses, and the air was wildly hot, and my eye-balls like theirs that walk staring in the inner midst of burning fiery furnaces, and my skin itched with a fierce and prickly itch. Anon I touched the chords of the harp to the air of Wagner's 'Walküren-ritt.'

Near three in the morning, I reached the climax of my guilty sweets. My drunken eye-lids closed in a luxury of pleasure, and my lips lay stretched in a smile that dribbled; a sensation of dear peace, of almighty power, consoled me: for now the whole area which through streaming tears I surveyed, mustering its ten thousand thunders, and brawling beyond the stars the voice of its southward-rushing torment, billowed to the horizon one grand Atlantic of smokeless and flushing flame; and in it sported and washed themselves all the fiends of Hell, with laughter, shouts, wild flights, and holiday; and I — first of my race — had flashed a signal to the nearer planets....

Those words: 'signal to the nearer planets' I wrote nearly fourteen months ago, some days after the destruction of London, I being then on board the old Boreal, making for the coast of France: for the night was dark, though calm, and I was afraid of running into some ship, yet not sleepy, so I wrote to occupy my fingers, the ship lying still. The book in which I wrote has been near me: but no impulse to write anything has visited me, till now I continue; not, however, that I have very much to put down.

I had no intention of wearing out my life in lighting fires every morning to warm myself in the inhospitable island of Britain, and set out to France with the view of seeking some palace in the Riviera, Spain, or perhaps Algiers, there, for the present at least, to make my home.

I started from Calais toward the end of April, taking my things along, the first two days by train, and then determining that I was in no hurry, and a petrol motor easier, took one, and maintained a generally southern and somewhat eastern direction, ever-anew astonished at the wildness of the forest vegetation which, within so short a space since the disappearance of man, chokes this pleasant land, even before the definite advent of summer.

After three weeks of very slow travelling — for though I know several countries very well, France with her pavered villages, hilly character, vines, forests, and primeval country-manner, is always new and charming to me — after three weeks I came unexpectedly to a valley which had never entered my head; and the moment that I saw it, I said: ‘Here I will live,’ though I had no idea what it was, for the monastery which I saw did not look at all like a monastery, according to my ideas: but when I searched the map, I discovered that it must be La Chartreuse de Vauclaire in Périgord.

It is my belief that this word ‘Vauclaire’ is nothing else than a corruption of the Latin Vallis Clara, or Bright Valley, for l’s and u’s did interchange about in this way, I remember: cheval becoming chevau(x) in the plural, like ‘fool’ and ‘fou,’ and the rest: which proves the dear laziness of French people, for the ‘l’ was too much trouble for them to sing, and when they came to two ‘l’s’ they quite succumbed, shying that vault, or voute, and calling it some y. But at any rate, this Vauclaire, or Valclear, was well named: for here, if anywhere, is Paradise, and if anyone knew how and where to build and brew liqueurs, it was those good old monks, who followed their Master with entrain in that Cana miracle, and in many other things, I fancy, but aesthetically shirked to say to any mountain: 'Be thou removed.'

The general hue of the vale is a deep cerulean, resembling that blue of the robes of Albertinelli's Madonnas; so, at least, it strikes the eye on a clear forenoon of spring or summer. The monastery consists of an oblong space, or garth, around three sides of which stand sixteen small houses, with regular intervals between, all identical, the cells of the fathers; between the oblong space and the cells come the cloisters, with only one opening to the exterior; in the western part of the oblong is a little square of earth under a large cypress-shade, within which, as in a home of peace, it sleeps: and there, straight and slanting, stand little plain black crosses over graves....

To the west of the quadrangle is the church, with the hostelry, and an asphalted court with some trees and a fountain; and beyond, the entrance-gate.

All this stands on a hill of gentle slope, green as grass; and it is backed close against a steep mountain-side, of which the tree-trunks are conjectural, for I never saw any, the trees resembling rather one continuous leafy tree-top, run out high and far over the extent of the mountain.

I was there four months, till something drove me away. I do not know what had become of the fathers and brothers, for I only found five, four of whom I took in two journeys in the motor beyond the church of Saint Martial d'Artenset, and left them there; and the fifth remained three weeks with me, for I would not disturb him in his prayer. He was a bearded brother of forty years or thereabouts, who knelt in his cell robed and hooded in all his phantom white: for in no way different from whatever is most phantom, visionary and eerie must a procession of these people have seemed by gloaming, or dark night This particular brother knelt, I say, in his small chaste room, glaring upward at his Christ, who hung long-armed in a little recess between the side of three narrow bookshelves and a projection of the wall; and under the Christ a gilt and blue Madonna; the books on the three shelves few, leaning different ways. His right elbow rested on a square plain table, at which was a wooden chair; behind him, in a corner, the bed: a bed all enclosed in dark boards, a broad perpendicular board along the foot, reaching the ceiling, a horizontal board at the side over which he got into bed, another narrower one like it at the ceiling for fringe and curtain, and another perpendicular one hiding the pillow, making the clean bed within a very shady and cosy little den, on the wall of this den being another smaller Christ and a little picture. On the perpendicular board at the foot hung two white garments, and over a second chair at the bed-side another: all very neat and holy. He was a large stern man, blond as corn, but with some red, too, in his hairy beard; and appalling was the significance of those eyes that prayed, and the long-drawn cavity of those saffron cheeks. I cannot explain to myself my deep reverence for this man; but I had it, certainly. Many of the others, it is clear, had fled: but not he: and to the near-marching cloud he opposed the Cross, holding one real as the other — he alone among many. For Christianity was an élite religion, in which all were called, but few chosen, differing from Mohammedanism and Buddhism, which grasped and conquered all within their reach: the effect of Christ rather resembling Plato's and Dante's, it would seem: but Mahomet's more like Homer's and Shakespeare's.

It was my way to plant at the portal the big, carved chair from the chancel on the hot days, and rest my soul, refusing to think of anything, drowsing and smoking for hours. All down there in the plain waved gardens of delicious fruit about the prolonged silver thread of the river Isle, whose course winds loitering quite near the foot of the monastery-slope. This slope dominates a tract of distance that is not only vast, but looks immense, although the horizon is bounded by a semicircle of low hills, rather too stiff and uniform for perfect beauty; the interval of plain being occupied by yellow ploughed lands which were never sown, weedy now, and crossed and recrossed by vividly-green ribbons of vine, with stretches of pale-green lucerne, orchards, and the white village of Monpont near the railway, all embowered, the Isle drawing its mercurial streams through the village-meadow, which is dark with shades of oaks: and to have played there a boy, and used it familiarly from birth as one's own hand or foot, must have been very sweet and homely; after this, the river divides, and takes the shape of a heart; and very far away are visible the grey banks of the Gironde. On the semicircle of hills, when there was little distance-mist, I saw the ruins of some seigneurial château, for the seigneurs, too, knew where to build; and to my left, between a clump of oaks and an avenue of poplars, the bell-tower of the village — church of Saint Martial d'Artenset — a very ancient type of tower, I believe, and common in France, rather ponderous, consisting of a square mass with a smaller square mass stuck on, the latter having large Gothic windows; and behind me the west face of the monastery-church, over the door being the statue of Saint Bruno.

Well, one morning after four months, I opened my eyes in my cell to the piercing consciousness that I had burned Monpont over-night: and so overcome was I with regret for this poor inoffensive little place, that for two days, hardly eating, I paced between the oak and walnut pews of the nave, massive stalls they are, separated by grooved Corinthian pilasters, wondering what was to become of me, and if I was not already mad; and there are some little angels with extraordinarily human Greuze-like faces, supporting the nerves of the apse, which, after a time, every time I passed them, seemed conscious of me and my existence there; and the wood-work which ornaments the length of the nave, and of the choir also, elaborate with carved marguerites and roses, here and there took in my eyes significant forms from certain points of view; and there is a partition — for the nave is divided into two chapels, one for the brothers and one for the fathers, I conclude — and in this partition a massive door, which yet looks quite light and graceful, carved with oak and acanthus leaves, and every time I passed through I had the impression that the door was a sentient thing, subconscious of me; and the delicate Italian-Renaissance brick vault which springs from the vast nave seemed to look upon me with a gloomy knowledge of me, and of the heart within me; and at about four in the afternoon of the second day, after pacing the church for hours, I fell down at one of the two altars near that carved door of the screen, praying God to have mercy upon my soul; and in the very midst of my praying, I was up and away, the devil in me, and I got into the motor, and did not come back to Vauclaire for another month, and came leaving great tracts of burned desolation behind me, towns and forests, Bordeaux burned, Lebourne burned, Bergerac burned.

I returned to Vauclaire, for it seemed now my home; and there I experienced a true, a deep repentance; and I humbled myself before my Maker. And while in this state, sitting one bright day in front of the monastery-gate, something said to me: ‘You will never be a good man, nor permanently escape Hell and Frenzy, unless you have an aim in life, devoting yourself heart and soul to some great work, which will exact all your science, your thought, your ingenuity, your knowledge of modern things, your strength of body and will, your skill of head and hand: otherwise you are bound to succumb. Do this, therefore, beginning, not tomorrow nor this afternoon, but now: for though no man will see your work, there is still the Almighty God, who is also something, in His way: and He will see how you strive, and try, and groan: and perhaps, seeing, He may have mercy upon you.'

In this way arose the idea of the Palace — an idea, indeed, which had entered my brain before, but merely as a bombastic and visionary outcome of my raving moods: now, however, in a very different way, soberly, and soon concerning itself with details, difficulties, means, limitations, and every kind of practical matter-of-fact; and every obstruction which, one by one, I foresaw was, one by one, as the days passed, over-borne by the vigour with which that thought, rapidly becoming a mania, possessed me. After a week of incessant meditation, I decided Yes: and I said: I will build a palace, which shall be both a palace and a temple: the first human temple worthy the King of Heaven, and the only human palace worthy the King of Earth.

After this decision I remained at Vauclaire another week, a very different man to the loungeur it had seen, strenuous, converted, humble, making plans of this and of that, of the detail, and of the whole, drawing, multiplying, dividing, adding, conic sections and the rule-of-three, totting up the period of building, which came out at a little over twelve years, estimating the quantities of material, weight and bulk, my nights full of nightmare as to the sort, deciding as to the size and structure of the crane, forge, and workshop, and the necessarily-limited weights of their component parts, making a list of over 2,400 objects, and finally, up to the third week after my departure from Vauclaire, skimming through the topography of nearly the whole earth, before fixing upon the island of Imbros for my site.

I returned to England, and, once more, to the hollow windows and strewn streets of black, burned-out and desolate London: for its bank-vaults, etc., contained the necessary complement of the gold brought from Paris, and then lying in the Speranza at Dover; nor had I sufficient familiarity with French industries and methods to find, even with the aid of Bottins, one half of the 4,000 odd objects which I had now catalogued. My ship was the Speranza, which brought me from Havre, for at Calais, to which I first went, I could find nothing suitable for all purposes, the Speranza being an American yacht, very palatially fitted, three-masted, air-driven, with a carrying capacity of 2,000 tons, Tobin-bronzed, in good condition, containing sixteen interacting tanks, with a five-block pulley-arrangement amid-ships that enables me to lift very considerable weights without the aid of the hoisting air-engine, high in the water, sharp, handsome, containing a few tons only of sand-ballast, and needing when I found her only three days' work at the water-line and engines to make her decent and fit. I threw out her dead, backed her from the Outer to the Inner Basin to my train on the quai, took in the twenty-three hundred-weight bags of gold, and the half-ton of amber, and with this alone went to Dover, thence to Canterbury by motor, and thence in a long train, with a store of dynamite from the Castle for blasting possible obstructions, to London: meaning to make Dover my dépôt, and the London rails my thoroughfare from all parts of the country.

Instead of three months, as I had calculated, it took me nine: a harrowing slavery. I had to blast no less than forty-three trains from the path of my loaded wagons, several times blasting away the metals as well, and then having to travel hundreds of yards without metals: for the labour of kindling the obstructing engines, to shunt them down sidings perhaps distant, was a thing which I would not undertake. However, all's well that ends well, though if I had it to go through again, certainly I should not. The Speranza is now lying seven miles off Cape Roca, a heavy mist on the still water, this being the 19th of June at 10 in the night: no wind, no moon: cabin full of mist: and I pretty listless and disappointed, wondering in my heart why I was such a fool as to take all that trouble, nine long servile months, my good God, and now seriously thinking of throwing the whole vile thing to the devil; she pretty deep in the water, pregnant with the palace. When the thirty-three ...

Those words: 'when the thirty-three' were written by me over seventeen years since — long years — seventeen in number, nor have I now any idea to what they refer. The book in which I wrote I had lost in the cabin of the Speranza, and yesterday, returning to Imbros from an hour's aimless cruise, discovered it there behind a chest.

I find now considerable difficulty in guiding the pencil, and these few lines now written have quite an odd look, like the handwriting of a man not very proficient in the art: it is seventeen years, seventeen, seventeen ... ah! And the expression of my ideas is not fluent either: I have to think for the word a minute, and I should not be surprised if the spelling of some of them is queer. My brain has been thinking inarticulately perhaps, all these years: and the English words and letters, as they now stand written, have rather an improbable and foreign air to me, as a Greek or Russian book might look to a man who has not so long been learning those languages as to forget the impossibly foreign impression received from them on the first day of tackling them. Or perhaps it is only my fancy: for that I have fancies I know.

But what to write? The history of those seventeen years could not be put down, my good God: at least, it would take me seventeen more to do it. If I were to detail the building of the palace alone, and how it killed me nearly, and how I twice fled from it, and had to return, and became its bounden slave, and dreamed of it, and grovelled before it, and prayed, and raved, and rolled; and how I forgot to make provision on the west side for the contraction and expansion of the gold in the colder weather and the heats of summer, and had to break down nine months' work, and how I cursed Thee, how I cursed Thee; and how the lake of wine evaporated faster than the conduits replenished it, and the three journeys which I had to take to Constantinople for shiploads of wine, and my frothing despairs, till I had the thought of placing the reservoir in the platform; and how I had then to break down the south side of the platform to the very bottom, and of the month-long nightmare of terror that I had lest the south side of the palace would undergo subsidence; and how the petrol failed, and of the three-weeks' search for petrol along the coast; and how, after list-rubbing all the jet, I found that I had forgotten the necessary rouge for polishing; and how, in the third year, I found the fluate, which I had for water-proofing the pores of the platform-stone, nearly all leaked away in the Speranza's hold, and I had to get silicate of soda at Gallipoli; and how, after two years' observation, I had to come to the conclusion that the lake was leaking, and discovered that this Imbros sand was not suitable for mixing with the skin of Portland cement which covered the cement concrete, and had to substitute sheet-bitumen in three places; and how I did all, all for the sake of God, thinking: 'I will work, and be a good man, and cast Hell from me:

and when I see it stand finished, it will be an Altar and a Testimony to me, and I shall find peace, and be well': and how I have been cheated — seventeen years, long years of my life — for there is no God; and how my plasterers'-hair failed me, and I had to use flock, hessian, scrym, wadding, wood-street paving-blocks, and whatever I could find, for filling the interspaces between the platform cross-walls; and of the espagnolette bolts, how a number of them mysteriously disappeared, as if snatched to Hell by harpies, and I had to make them; and how the crane-chain would not reach two of the silver-panel castings when they were finished, and they were too heavy for me to lift, and the wringing of the hands of my despair, and my biting of the earth, and the transport of my fury; and how, for a whole wild week, I searched in vain for the text-book which describes the ambering process; and how, when all was nearly over, in the blasting away of the forge and crane with dynamite, a long crack appeared down the gold of the east platform-steps, and how I would not be consoled, but mourned and mourned; and how, in spite of all my tribulations, it was sweetly interesting to watch my power slowly grow from the first feeble beginnings of the landing of materials and unloading them from the motor, a hundred-weight at a time, till I could swing four tons — see the solid metals flow — enjoy the gliding sounds of the handle, crank-shaft, and system of levers, forcing inwards the mould-end, and the upper and lower plungers, for pressing the material — build at ease in a travelling-cage — and watch from my hut-door through sleepless hours, under the electric moonlight of this land, the three piles of gold stones, the silver panels, the two-foot squares of jet, and be comforted; and how the putty-wash — but it is past, it is past: and not to live over again that vulgar nightmare of means and ends have I taken to this writing again — but to put down something else, if I dare.

Seventeen years, my good God, of that delusion! I could write down no sort of explanation for all those groans and griefs, at which a reasoning being would not shriek with laughter. I should have lived at ease in some palace of the Middle-Orient, and burned my cities: but no, I must be ‘a good man’ — vain thought. The words of a wild madman, that preaching man in England who prophesied what happened, were with me, where he says: ‘the defeat of Man is His defeat’; and I said to myself: ‘Well, the last man shall not be quite a fiend, just to spite That Other.’ And I worked and groaned, saying: ‘I will be a good man, and burn nothing, nor utter aught unseemly, nor debauch myself, but choke back the blasphemies that Those Others shriek through my throat, and build and build, with moils and groans.’ And it was Vanity: though I do love the house, too, I love it well, for it is my home on the waste earth.

I had calculated to finish it in twelve years, and I should undoubtedly have finished it in fourteen, instead of in sixteen and seven months, but one day, when the south, north, and east platform-steps were already finished — it was in the July of the third year, and near sunset — as I left off work, instead of going to the tent where my dinner lay ready, I walked down to the ship — most strangely — in a daft, mechanical sort of way, without saying a word to myself, an evil-meaning smile of malice on my lips; and at midnight I was lying off Mitylene, thirty miles to the south, having bid, as I thought, a last farewell to all those toils. I was going to burn Athens.

I did not, however: but kept on my way westward round Cape Matapan, intending to destroy the forests and towns of Sicily, if I found there a suitable motor for travelling, for I had not been at the pains to take the motor on board at Imbros; otherwise I would ravage parts of southern Italy. But when I came thereabouts, I was confronted with an awful horror: for no southern Italy was there, and no Sicily was there, unless a small new island, probably not five miles long, was Sicily; and nothing else I saw, save the still-smoking crater of Stromboli. I cruised northward, searching for land, and for a long time would not believe the evidence of the instruments, thinking that they wilfully misled me, or I stark mad. But no: no Italy was there, till I came to the latitude of Naples, it, too, having disappeared, engulfed, engulfed, all that stretch. From this monstrous thing I received so solemn a shock and mood of awe, that the evil mind in me was quite chilled and quelled: for it was, and is, my belief that a wide-spread re-arrangement of the earth's surface is being purposed, and in all that drama, O my God, how shall I be found?

However, I went on my way, but more leisurely, not daring for a long time to do anything, lest I might offend anyone; and, in this foolish cowering mind, coasted all the western coast of Spain and France during five weeks, in that prolonged intensity of calm weather which now alternates with storms that transcend all thought, till I came again to Calais: and there, for the first time, landed.

Here I would no longer contain myself, but burned; and that magnificent stretch of forest that lay between Agincourt and Abbéville, covering five square miles, I burned; and Abbéville I burned; and Amiens I burned; and three forests between Amiens and Paris I burned; and Paris I burned; burning and burning during four months, leaving behind me smoking districts, a long tract of ravage, like some being of the Pit that blights where pass his flaming wings.

This of city-burning has now become a habit with me more enchaining — and infinitely more debased — than ever was opium to the smoker, or alcohol to the drunkard. I count it among the prime necessities of my life: it is my brandy, my bacchanal, my secret sin. I have burned Calcutta, Pekin, and San Francisco. In spite of the restraining influence of this palace, I have burned and burned. I have burned two hundred cities and countrysides. Like Leviathan disporting himself in the sea, so I have rioted in this earth.

After an absence of six months, I returned to Imbros: for I was for looking again upon the work which I had done, that I might mock myself for all that unkingly grovelling: and when I saw it, standing there as I had left it, frustrate and forlorn, and waiting its maker's hand, some pity and instinct to build took me — for something of God was in Man — and I fell upon my knees, and spread my arms to God, and was converted, promising to finish the palace, with prayers that as I built so He would build my soul, and save the last man from the enemy. And I set to work that day to list-rub the last few dalles of the jet.

I did not leave Imbros after that during four years, except for occasional brief trips to the coast — to Kilid-Bahr, Gallipoli, Lapsaki, Gamos, Rodosto, Erdek, Erekli, or even once to Constantinople and Scutari — if I happened to want anything, or if I was tired of work: but without once doing the least harm to anything, but containing my humours, and fearing my Maker. And full of peaceful charm were those little cruises through this Levantic world, which, truly, is rather like a light sketch in water-colours done by an angel than like the dun real earth; and full of self-satisfaction and pious contentment would I return to Imbros, approved of my conscience, for that I had surmounted temptation, and lived tame and stainless.

I had set up the southern of the two closed-lotus pillars, and the platform-top was already looking as lovely as heaven, with its alternate two-foot squares of pellucid gold and pellucid jet, when I noticed one morning that the Speranza's bottom was really now too foul, and the whim took me then and there to leave all, and clean her as far as I could. I at once went on board, descended to the hold, took off my sudeyrie, and began to shift the ballast over to starboard, so as to tilt up her port bottom to the scraper. This was wearying labour, and about noon I was sitting on a bag, resting in the almost darkness, when something seemed to whisper to me these words: 'You dreamed last night that there is an old Chinaman alive in Peking.' Horridly I started: I had dreamed something of the sort, but, from the moment of waking, till then, had forgotten it: and I leapt livid to my feet.

I cleaned no Speranza that day, nor for four days did I anything, but sat on the cabin-house and mused, my supporting palm among the hairy draperies of my chin: for the thought of such a thing, if it could by any possibility be true, was detestable as death to me, changing the colour of the sun, and the whole aspect of the world: and anon, at the outrage of that thing, my brow would flush with wrath, and my eyes blaze: till, on the fourth afternoon, I said to myself: 'That old Chinaman in Peking is likely to get burned to death, I think, or blown to the clouds!'

So, a second time, on the 4th March, the poor palace was left to build itself. For, after a short trip to Gallipoli, where I got some young lime-twigs in boxes of earth, and some preserved limes and ginger, I set out for a long voyage to the East, passing through the Suez Canal, and visiting Bombay, where I was three weeks, and then destroyed it.

I had the thought of going across Hindustan by engine, but did not like to leave my ship, to which I was very attached, not sure of finding anything so suitable and good at Calcutta; and, moreover, I was afraid to abandon my petrol motor, which I had taken on board with the air-windlass, since I was going to uncivilised land. I therefore coasted down western Hindustan.

All that northern shore of the Arabian Sea has at the present time an odour which it wafts far over the water, resembling odours of happy vague dream-lands, sweet to smell in the early mornings as if the earth were nothing but a perfume, and life an inhalation.

On that voyage, however, I had, from beginning to end, twenty-seven fearful storms, or, if I count that one near the Carolines, then twenty-eight. But I do not wish to write of these rages: they were too inhuman: and how I came alive through them against all my wildest hope, Someone, or Something, only knows.

I will write down here a thing: it is this, my God — something which I have observed: a definite obstreperousness in the mood of the elements now, when once roused, which grows, which grows continually. Tempests have become very very far more wrathful, the sea more truculent and unbounded in its insolence; when it thunders, it thunders with a venom new to me, cracking as though it would split the firmament, and bawling through the heaven of heavens, as if roaring to devour all things; in Bombay once, and in China thrice, I was shaken by earthquakes, the second and third marked by a certain extravagance of agitation, that might turn a man grey. Why should this be, my God? I remember reading very long ago that on the American prairies, which from time immemorial had been swept by great storms, the storms gradually subsided when man went to reside permanently there. If this be true, it would seem that the mere presence of man had a certain subduing or mesmerising effect upon the native turbulence of Nature, and his absence now may have removed the curb. It is my belief that within fifty years from now the huge forces of the earth will be let fully loose to tumble as they will; and this planet will become one of the undisputed playgrounds of Hell, and the theatre of commotions stupendous as those witnessed on the face of Saturn.

The Earth is all on my brain, on my brain, O dark-minded Mother, with thy passionate cravings after the Infinite, thy regrets, and mighty griefs, and comatose sleeps, and sinister coming doom, O Earth: and I, poor man, though a king, sole witness of thy bleak tremendous woes. Upon her I brood, and do not cease, but brood and brood — the habit, if I remember right, first becoming fixed and fated during that long voyage eastward: for what is in store for her God only knows, and I have seen in my broodings long visions of her future, which, if a man should see with the eye of flesh, he would spread the arms, and wheel and wheel through the mazes of a hiccuping giggling frenzy, for the vision only is the very verge of madness. If I might cease but for one hour that perpetual brooding upon her! But I am her child, and my mind grows and grows to her like the off-shoots of the banyan-tree, that take root downward, and she sucks and draws it, as she draws my feet by gravitation, and I cannot take wing from her: for she is greater than I, and there is no escaping her; and at the last, I know, my soul will dash itself to ruin, like erring sea-fowl upon pharos-lights, against her wild and mighty bosom. Often a whole night through I lie open-eyed in the dark, with bursting brain, thinking of that hollow Gulf of Mexico, how identical in shape and size with the protuberance of Africa just opposite, and how the protuberance of the Venezuelan and Brazilian coast fits in with the in-curve of Africa: so that it is obvious to me — it is quite obvious — that they once were one; and one night rushed so far apart; and the wild Atlantic knew that thing, and ran gladly, hasting in between: and how if eye of flesh had been there to see, and ear to hear that cruel thundering, my God, my God — what horror! And if now they meet again, so long apart

...but that way fury lies. Yet one cannot help but think: I lie awake and think, for she fills my soul, and absorbs it, with all her moods and ways. She has meanings, secrets, plans. Strange, strange, for instance, that similarity between the scheme of Europe and the scheme of Asia: each with three southern peninsulas pointing south: Spain corresponding with Arabia, Italy with India, the Morea and Greece, divided by the Gulf of Corinth, corresponding with the Malay Peninsula and Annam, divided by the Gulf of Siam; each with two northern peninsulas pointing south, Sweden and Norway, and Korea and Kamschatka; each with two great islands similarly placed, Britain and Ireland, and the Japanese Hondo and Yezo; the Old World and the New has each a peninsula pointing north — Denmark and Yucatan: a forefinger with long nail — and a thumb — pointing to the Pole. What does she mean? What can she mean, O Ye that made her? Is she herself a living being, with a will and a fate, as sailors said that ships were living entities? And that thing that wheeled at the Pole, wheels it still yonder, yonder, in its dark ecstasy? Strange that volcanoes are all near the sea: I don't know why; I don't think that anyone ever knew. This fact, in connection with submarine explosions, used to be cited in support of the chemical theory of volcanoes, which supposed the infiltration of the sea into ravines containing the materials which form the fuel of eruptions: but God knows if that is true. The lofty ones are intermittent — a century, two, ten, of silent waiting, and then their talk silenced for ever some poor district; the low ones are constant in action. Who could know the dark way of the world? Sometimes they form a linear system, consisting of several vents which extend in one direction, near together, like chimneys of some long foundry beneath. In mountains, a series of serrated peaks denotes the presence of dolomites; rounded heads mean calcareous rocks; and needles, crystalline schists. The preponderance of land in the northern hemisphere denotes the greater intensity there of the causes of elevation at a remote geologic epoch: that is all that one can say about it: but whence that greater intensity? I have some knowledge of the earth for only ten miles down: but she has eight thousand miles: and whether through all that depth she is flame or fluid, hard or soft, I do not know, I do not know. Her method of forming coal, geysers and hot sulphur-springs, and the jewels, and the atolls and coral reefs; the metamorphic rocks of sedimentary origin, like gneiss, the plutonic and volcanic rocks, rocks of fusion, and the unstratified masses which constitute the basis of the crust; and harvests, the burning flame of flowers, and the passage from the vegetable to the animal: I do not know them, but they are of her, and they are like me, molten in the same furnace of her fiery heart. She is dark and moody, sudden and ill-fated, and rends her young like a cannibal lioness; and she is old and wise, and remembers Hur of the Chaldees which Uruk built, and that Temple of Bel which rose in seven pyramids to symbolise the planets, and Birs-i-Nimrud, and Haran, and she bears still, as a thing of yesterday, old Persepolis and the tomb of Cyrus, and those cloister-like vihârah-temples of the ancient Buddhists, cut from the Himalayan rock; and returning from the Far East, I stopped at Ismailia, and so to Cairo, and saw where Memphis was, and stood one bright midnight before that great pyramid of Shafra, and that dumb Sphynx, and, seated at the well of one of the rock-tombs, looked till tears of pity streamed down my cheeks: for great is the earth, and her Ages, but man 'passeth away.' These tombs have pillars extremely like the two palace-pillars, only that these are round, and mine are square: for I chose it so: but the same band near the top, then over this the closed lotus-flower, then the small square plinth, which separates them from the architrave, only mine have no architrave; the tombs consist of a little outer temple or court, then comes a well, and inside another chamber, where, I suppose, the dead were, a ribbon-like astragal surrounding the walls, which are crowned with boldly-projecting cornices, surmounted by an abacus. And here, till the pressing want of food drove me back, I remained: for more and more the earth over-grows me, woos me, assimilates me; so that I ask myself this question: ‘Must I not, in time, cease to be a man, and become a small earth, precisely her copy, extravagantly weird and fierce, half-demoniac, half-ferine, wholly mystic — morose and turbulent — fitful, and deranged, and sad — like her?’

A whole month of that voyage, from May the 15th to June the 13th, I wasted at the Andaman Islands near Malay: for that any old Chinaman could be alive in Pekin began, after some time, to seem the most quixotic notion that ever entered a human brain; and these jungled islands, to which I came after a shocking vast orgy one night at Calcutta, when I fired not only the city but the river, pleased my fancy to such an extent, that at one time I intended to abide there. I was at the one called in the chart ‘Saddle Hill,’ the smallest of them, I think: and seldom have I had such sensations of peace as I lay a whole burning day in a rising vale, deeply-shaded in palm and tropical ranknesses, watching thence the Speranza at anchor: for there was a little offing here at the shore whence the valley arose, and I could see one of its long peaks lined with cocoanut-trees, and all cloud burned out of the sky except the flimsiest lawn-figments, and the sea as absolutely calm as a lake roughened with breezes, yet making a considerable noise in its breaking on the shore, as I have noticed in these sorts of places: I do not know why. These poor Andaman people seem to have been quite savage, for I met a number of them in roaming the island, nearly skeletons, yet with limbs and vertebrae still, in general, cohering, and in some cases dry-skinned and mummified relics of flesh, and never anywhere a sign of clothes: a very singular thing, considering their nearness to high old civilisations all about them. They looked small and black, or almost; and I never found a man without finding on or near him a spear and other weapons: so that they were eager folk, and the wayward dark earth was in them, too, as she should be in her children. They had in many cases some reddish discoloration, which may have been the traces of betel-nut stains: for betel-nuts abound there. And I was so pleased with these people, that I took on board with the gig one of their little tree-canoes: which was my foolishness: for gig and canoe were only three nights later washed from the decks into the middle of the sea.

I passed down the Straits of Malacca, and in that short distance between the Andaman Islands, and the S.W. corner of Borneo I was thrice so mauled, that at times it seemed quite out of the question that anything built by man could escape such unfettered cataclysms, and I resigned myself, but with bitter reproaches, to perish darkly. The effect of the third upon me, when it was over, was the unloosening afresh of all my evil passion: for I said: ‘Since they mean to slay me, death shall find me rebellious’; and for weeks I could not sight some specially happy village, or umbrageous spread of woodland, that I did not stop the ship, and land the materials for their destruction; so that nearly all those spicy lands about the north of Australia will bear the traces of my hand for many a year: for more and more my voyage became dawdling and zigzagged, as the merest whim directed it, or the movement of the pointer on the chart; and I thought of eating the lotus of surcease and nepenthe in some enchanted nook of this bowering summer, where from my hut-door I could see through the pearl-hues of opium the sea-lagoon slaver lazily upon the old coral atol, and the cocoanut-tree would droop like slumber, and the bread-fruit tree would moan in sweet and weary dream, and I should watch the Speranza lie anchored in the pale atol-lake, year after year, and wonder what she was, and whence, and why she dozed so deep for ever, and after an age of melancholy peace and burdened bliss, I should note that sun and moon had ceased revolving, and hung inert, opening anon a heavy lid to doze and drowse again, and God would sigh 'Enough,' and nod, and Being would swoon to sleep: for that any old Chinaman should be alive in Pekin was a thing so fantastically maniac, as to draw from me at times sudden fits of wild red laughter that left me faint.

During a space of four months, from the 18th June to the 23rd October, I visited the Fijis, where I saw skulls still surrounded with remnants of extraordinary haloes of stiff hair, women clad in girdles made of thongs fixed in a belt, and, in Samoa near, bodies crowned with coronets of nautilus-shell, and traces of turmeric-paint and tattooing, and in one townlet a great assemblage of carcasses, suggesting by their look some festival, or dance: so that I believe that these people were overthrown without the least fore-knowledge of anything. The women of the Maoris wore an abundance of green-jade ornaments, and I found a peculiar kind of shell-trumpet, one of which I have now, also a tattooing chisel, and a nicely-carved wooden bowl. The people of New Caledonia, on the other hand, went, I should think, naked, confining their attention to the hair, and in this resembling the Fijians, for they seemed to wear an artificial hair made of the fur of some creature like a bat, and also they wore wooden masks, and great rings — for the ear, no doubt — which must have fallen to the shoulders: for the earth was in them all, and made them wild, perverse and various like herself. I went from one to the other without any system whatever, searching for the ideal resting-place, and often thinking that I had found it: but only wearying of it at the thought that there was a yet deeper and dreamier in the world.

But in this search I received a check, my God, which chilled me to the marrow, and set me flying from these places.

One evening, the 29th November, I dined rather late — at eight — sitting, as was my custom in calm weather, cross-legged on the cabin-rug at the port aft corner, a small semicircle of Speranza gold-plate before me, and near above me the red-shaded lamp with green conical reservoir, whose creakings never cease in the stillest mid-sea, and beyond the plates the array of preserved soups, meat-extracts, meats, fruit, sweets, wines, nuts, liqueurs, coffee on the silver spirit-tripod, glasses, cruet, and so on, which it was always my first care to select from the store-room, open, and lay out once for all in the morning on rising. I was late, seven being my hour: for on that day I had been engaged in the occasionally necessary, but always deferred, task of overhauling the ship, brushing here a rope with tar, there a board with paint, there a crank with oil, rubbing a door-handle, a brass-fitting, filling the three cabin-lamps, dusting mirrors and furniture, dashing the great neat-joined plains of deck with bucketfulls, or, high in air, chopping loose with its rigging the mizzen top-mast, which since a month was sprained at the clamps, all this in cotton drawers under loose quamis, bare-footed, my beard knotted up, the sun a-blaze, the sea smooth and pale with the smooth pallor of strong currents, the ship still enough, no land in sight, yet great tracts of sea-weed making eastward — I working from 11 A.M. till near 7, when sudden darkness interrupted: for I wished to have it all over in one obnoxious day. I was therefore very tired when I went down, lit the central chain-lever lamp and my own two, washed and dressed in my bedroom, and sat to dinner in the dining-hall corner. I ate voraciously, with sweat, as usual, pouring down my eager brow, using knife or spoon in the right hand, but never the Western fork, licking the plates clean in the Mohammedan manner, and drinking pretty freely. Still I was tired, and went upon deck, where I had the threadbare blue-velvet easy-chair with the broken left arm before the wheel, and in it sat smoking cigar after cigar from the Indian D box, half-asleep, yet conscious. The moon came up into a pretty cloudless sky, and she was bright, but not bright enough to out-shine the enlightened flight of the ocean, which that night was one continuous swamp of Jack-o'-lantern phosphorescence, a wild but faint luminosity mingled with stars and flashes of brilliance, the whole trooping unanimously eastward, as if in haste with elfin momentous purpose, a boundless congregation, in the sweep of a strong oceanic current. I could hear it, in my slumbrous lassitude, struggling and gurgling at the tied rudder, and making wet sloppy noises under the sheer of the poop; and I was aware that the Speranza was gliding along pretty fast, drawn into that procession, probably at the rate of four to six knots: but I did not care, knowing very well that no land was within two hundred miles of my bows, for I was in longitude 173°, in the latitude of Fiji and the Society Islands, between those two: and after a time the cigar drooped and dropped from my mouth, and sleep overcame me, and I slept there, in the lap of the Infinite.

So that something preserves me, Something, Someone: and for what? ... If I had slept in the cabin, I must most certainly have perished: for lying there on the poop, I dreamed a dream which once I had dreamed on the ice, far, far yonder in the forgotten hyperborean North: that I was in an Arabian paradise, a Garden of Peaches; and I had a very long vision of it, for I walked among the trees, and picked the fruit, and pressed the blossoms to my nostrils with breathless inhalations of love: till a horrible sickness woke me: and when I opened my eyes, the night was black, the moon gone down, everything wet with dew, the sky arrayed with most glorious stars like a thronged bazaar of tiaraed rajahs and begums with spangled trains, and all the air fragrant with that mortal scent; and high and wide uplifted before me — stretching from the northern to the southern limit — a row of eight or nine inflamed smokes, as from the chimneys of some Cyclopean foundry at work all night, most solemn, most great and dreadful in the solemn night: eight or nine, I should say, or it might be seven, or it might be ten, for I did not count them; and from those craters puffed up gusts of encrimsoned material, here a gust and there a gust, with tinselled fumes that convolved upon themselves, and sparks and flashes, all veiled in a garish haze of light: for the foundry worked, though languidly; and upon a rocky land four miles ahead, which no chart had ever marked, the Speranza drove straight with the current of the phosphorus sea.

As I rose, I fell flat: and what I did thereafter I did in a state of existence whose acts, to the waking mind, appear unreal as dream. I must at once, I think, have been conscious that here was the cause of the destruction of mankind; that it still surrounded its own neighbourhood with poisonous fumes; and that I was approaching it. I must have somehow crawled, or dragged myself forward. There is an impression on my mind that it was a purple land of pure porphyry; there is some faint memory, or dream, of hearing a long-drawn booming of waves upon its crags: I do not know whence I have them. I think that I remember retching with desperate jerks of the travailing intestines; also that I was on my face as I moved the regulator in the engine-room: but any recollection of going down the stairs, or of coming up again, I have not. Happily, the wheel was tied, the rudder hard to port, and as the ship moved, she must, therefore, have turned; and I must have been back to untie the wheel in good time, for when my senses came, I was lying there, my head against the under gimbal, one foot on a spoke of the wheel, no land in sight, and morning breaking.

This made me so sick, that for either two or three days I lay without eating in the chair near the wheel, only rarely waking to sufficient sense to see to it that she was making westward from that place; and on the morning when I finally roused myself I did not know whether it was the second or the third morning: so that my calendar, so scrupulously kept, may be a day out, for to this day I have never been at the pains to ascertain whether I am here writing now on the 5th or the 6th of June.

Well, on the fourth, or the fifth, evening after this, just as the sun was sinking beyond the rim of the sea, I happened to look where he hung motionless on the starboard bow: and there I saw a clean-cut black-green spot against his red — a most unusual sight here and now — a ship: a poor thing, as it turned out when I got near her, without any sign of mast, heavily water-logged, some relics of old rigging hanging over, even her bowsprit apparently broken in the middle (though I could not see it), and she nothing more than a hirsute green mass of old weeds and sea-things from bowsprit-tip to poop, and from bulwarks to water-line, stout as a hedgehog, only awaiting there the next high sea to founder.

It being near my dinner-hour and night's rest, I stopped the Speranza some fifteen yards from her, and commenced to pace my spacious poop, as usual, before eating; and as I paced, I would glance at her, wondering at her destiny, and who were the human men that had lived on her, their Christian names, and family names, their age, and thought, and way of life, and beards; till the desire arose within me to go to her, and see; and I threw off my outer garments, uncovered and unroped the cedar cutter — the only boat, except the air-pinnace, left to me intact — and got her down by the mizzen five-block pulley-system. But it was a ridiculous nonsense, for having paddled to her, I was thrown into paroxysms of rage by repeated failures to scale her bulwarks, low as they were; my hands, indeed, could reach, but I found no hold upon the slimy mass, and three rope-ends which I caught were also untenably slippery: so that I jerked always back into the boat, my clothes a mass of filth, and the only thought in my blazing brain a twenty-pound charge of guncotton, of which I had plenty, to blow her to uttermost Hell. I had to return to the Speranza, get a half-inch rope, then back to the other, for I would not be balked in such a way, though now the dark was come, only slightly tempered by a half-moon, and I getting hungry, and from minute to minute more fiendishly ferocious. Finally, by dint of throwing, I got the rope-loop round a mast-stump, drew myself up, and made fast the boat, my left hand cut by some cursed shell: and all for what? the imperiousness of a whim. The faint moonlight shewed an ample tract of deck, invisible in most parts under rolled beds of putrid seaweed, and no bodies, and nothing but a concave, large esplanade of seaweed. She was a ship of probably 1,500 tons, three-masted, and a sailer. I got aft (for I had on thick outer babooshes), and saw that only four of the companion-steps remained; by a small leap, however, I could descend into that desolation, where the stale sea-stench seemed concentrated into a very essence of rankness. Here I experienced a singular ghostly awe and timorousness, lest she should sink with me, or something: but striking matches, I saw an ordinary cabin, with some fungoids, skulls, bones and rags, but not one cohering skeleton. In the second starboard berth was a small table, and on the floor a thick round ink-pot, whose continual rolling on its side made me look down; and there I saw a flat square book with black covers, which curved half-open of itself, for it had been wet and stained. This I took, and went back to the Speranza: for that ship was nothing but an emptiness, and a stench of the crude elements of life, nearly assimilated now to the rank deep to which she was wedded, and soon to be absorbed into its nature and being, to become a sea in little, as I, in time, my God, shall be nothing but an earth in little.

During dinner, and after, I read the book, with some difficulty, for it was pen-written in French, and discoloured, and it turned out to be the journal of someone, a passenger and voyager, I imagine, who called himself Albert Tissu, and the ship the Marie Meyer. There was nothing remarkable in the narrative that I could see — common-place descriptions of South Sea scenes, records of weather, cargoes, and the like — till I came to the last written page: and that was remarkable enough. It was dated the 13th of April — strange thing, my good God, incredibly strange — that same day, twenty long years ago, when I reached the Pole; and the writing on that page was quite different from the neat look of the rest, proving immoderate excitement, wildest haste; and he heads it ‘Cinq Heures,’ — I suppose in the evening, for he does not say: and he writes: ‘Monstrous event! phenomenon without likeness! the witnesses of which must for ever live immortalised in the annals of the universe, an event which will make even Mama, Henri and Juliette admit that I was justified in undertaking this most eventful voyage. Talking with Captain Tombarel on the poop, when a sudden exclamation from him— “Mon Dieu!” His visage whitens! I follow the direction of his gaze to eastward! I behold! eight kilomètres perhaps away — , ten monstrous waterspouts, reaching up, up, high enough — all apparently in one straight line, with intervals of nine hundred mètres, very regularly placed. They do not wander, dance, nor waver, as waterspouts do; nor are they at all lily-shaped, like waterspouts: but ten hewn pillars of water, with uniform diameter from top to bottom, only a little twisted here and there, and, as I divine, fifty mètres in girth. Five, ten, stupendous minutes we look, Captain Tombarel mechanically repeating and repeating under his breath “Mon Dieu!” “Mon Dieu!” the whole crew now on the poop, I agitated, but collected, watch in hand. And suddenly, all is blotted out: the pillars of water, doubtless still there, can no more be seen: for the ocean all about them is steaming, hissing higher than the pillars a dense white vapour, vast in extent, whose venomous sibilation we at this distance can quite distinctly hear. It is affrighting, it is intolerable! the eyes can hardly bear to watch, the ears to hear! it seems unholy travail, monstrous birth! But it lasts not long: all at once the Marie Meyer commences to pitch and roll violently, and the sea, a moment since calm, is now rough! and at the same time, through the white vapour, we see a dark shadow slowly rising — the shadow of a mighty back, a new-born land, bearing upwards ten flames of fire, slowly, steadily, out of the sea, into the clouds. At the moment when that sublime emergence ceases, or seems to cease, the grand thought that smites me is this: “I, Albert Tissu, am immortalised: my name shall never perish from among men!” I rush down, I write it. The latitude is 16° 21’ 13” South; the longitude 176° 58’ 19” West. There is a great deal of running about on the decks — they are descending. There is surely a strange odour of almonds — I only hope — it is so dark, mon D — —’

So the Frenchman, Tissu.

[This must be French reckoning, from meridian of Paris.]

With all that region I would have no more to do: for all here, it used to be said, lies a great sunken continent; and I thought it would be rising and shewing itself to my eyes, and driving me stark mad: for the earth is full of these contortions, sudden monstrous grimaces and apparitions, which are like the face of Medusa, affrighting a man into spinning stone; and nothing could be more appallingly insecure than living on a planet.

I did not stop till I had got so far northward as the Philippine Islands, where I was two weeks — exuberant, odorous places, but so hilly and rude, that at one place I abandoned all attempt at travelling in the motor, and left it in a valley by a broad, shallow, noisy river, full of mossy stones: for I said: 'Here I will live, and be at peace'; and then I had a fright, for during three days I could not re-discover the river and the motor, and I was in the greatest despair, thinking: 'When shall I find my way out of these jungles and vastnesses?' For I was where no paths were, and had lost myself in deeps where the lure of the earth is too strong and rank for a single man, since in such places, I suppose, a man would rapidly be transformed into a tree, or a snake, or a tiger. At last, however, I found the place, to my great joy, but I would not shew that I was glad, and to hide it, fell upon a front wheel of the car with some kicks. I could not make out who the people were that lived here: for the relics of some seemed quite black, like New Zealand races, and I could still detect the traces of tattooing, while others suggested Mongolian types, and some looked like pigmies, and some like whites. But I cannot detail the two-years' incidents of that voyage: for it is past, and like a dream: and not to write of that — of all that — have I taken this pencil in hand after seventeen long, long years.

Singular my reluctance to put it on paper. I will write rather of the voyage to China, and how I landed the motor on the wharf at Tientsin, and went up the river through a maize and rice-land most charming in spite of intense cold, I thick with clothes as an Arctic traveller; and of the three dreadful earthquakes within two weeks; and how the only map which I had of the city gave no indication of the whereabouts of its military depositories, and I had to seek for them; and of the three days' effort to enter them, for every gate was solid and closed; and how I burned it, but had to observe its flames, without deep pleasure, from beyond the walls to the south, the whole place being one cursed plain; yet how, at one moment,

I cried aloud with wild banterings and glad laughter of Tophet to that old Chinaman still alive within it; and how I coasted, and saw the hairy Ainus, man and woman hairy alike; and how, lying one midnight awake in my cabin, the Speranza being in a still glassy water under a cliff overhung by drooping trees — it was the harbour of Chemulpo — to me lying awake came the thought: ‘Suppose now you should hear a step walking to and fro, leisurely, on the poop above you — just suppose’; and the night of horrors which I had, for I could not help supposing, and at one time really thought that I heard it: and how the sweat rolled and poured from my brow; and how I went to Nagasaki, and burned it; and how I crossed over the great Pacific deep to San Francisco, for I knew that Chinamen had been there, too, and one of them might be alive; and how, one calm day, the 15th or the 16th April, I, sitting by the wheel in the mid-Pacific, suddenly saw a great white hole that ran and wheeled, and wheeled and ran, in the sea, coming toward me, and I was aware of the hot breath of a reeling wind, and then of the hot wind itself, which deep-groaned the sound of the letter V, humming like a billion spinning-tops, and the Speranza was on her side, sea pouring over her port-bulwarks, and myself in the corner between deck and taffrail, drowning fast, but unable to stir; but all was soon past and the white hole in the sea, and the hot spinning-top of wind, ran wheeling beyond, to the southern horizon, and the Speranza righted herself: so that it was clear that someone wished to destroy me, for that a typhoon of such vehemence ever blew before I cannot think; and how I came to San Francisco, and how I burned it, and had my sweets: for it was mine; and how I thought to pass over the great trans-continental railway to New York, but would not, fearing to leave the Speranza, lest all the ships in the harbour there should be wrecked, or rusted, and buried under sea-weed, and turned unto the sea; and how I went back, my mind all given up now to musings upon the earth and her ways, and a thought in my soul that I would return to those deep places of the Filipinas, and become an autochthone — a tree, or a snake, or a man with snake-limbs, like the old autochthones: but I would not: for Heaven was in man, too: Earth and Heaven; and how as I steamed round west again, another winter come, and I now in a mood of dismal despondencies, on the very brink of the inane abyss and smiling idiotcy, I saw in the island of Java the great temple of Boro Budor: and like a tornado, or volcanic event, my soul was changed: for my recent studies in the architecture of the human race recurred to me with interest, and three nights I slept in the temple, examining it by day. It is vast, with that look of solid massiveness which above all characterises the Japanese and Chinese building, my measurement of its width being 529 feet, and it rises terrace-like in six stories to a height of about 120 or 130 feet: here Buddhist and Brahmin forms are combined into a most richly-developed whole, with a voluptuousness of tracery that is simply intoxicating, each of the five off-sets being divided up into an innumerable series of external niches, containing each a statue of the sitting Boodh, all surmounted by a number of cupolas, and the whole crowned by a magnificent dagop: and when I saw this, I had the impulse to return to my home after so long wandering, and to finish the temple of temples, and the palace of palaces; and I said: ‘I will return, and build it as a testimony to God.’

Save for a time, near Cairo, I did not once stop on that homeward voyage, but turned into the little harbour at Imbros at a tranquil sunset on the 7th of March (as I reckon), and I moored the Speranza to the ring in the little quay, and I raised the battered motor from the hold with the middle air-engine (battered by the typhoon in the mid-Pacific, which had broken it from the rope-fastenings and tumbled it head-over-heels to port), and I went through the windowless village-street, and up through the plantains and cypresses which I knew, and the Nile mimosas, and mulberries, and Trebizond palms, and pines, and acacias, and fig-trees, till the thicket stopped me, and I had to alight: for in those two years the path had finally disappeared; and on, on foot, I made my way, till I came to the board-bridge, and leant there, and looked at the rill; and thence climbed the steep path in the sward toward that rolling table-land where I had built with many a groan; and half-way up, I saw the tip of the crane-arm, then the blazing top of the south pillar, then the shed-roof, then the platform, a blinking blotch of glory to the watery eyes under the setting sun. But the tent, and nearly all that it contained, was gone.

For four days I would do nothing, simply lying and watching, shirking a load so huge: but on the fifth morning I languidly began something: and I had not worked an hour, when a fever took me — to finish it, to finish it — and it lasted upon me, with only three brief intervals, nearly seven years; nor would the end have been so long in coming, but for the unexpected difficulty of getting the four flat roofs water-tight, for I had to take down half the east one. Finally, I made them of gold slabs one-and-a-quarter inch thick, smooth on both sides, on each beam double gutters being fixed along each side of the top flange to catch any leakage at the joints, which are filled with slaters'-cement. The slabs are clamped to the top flanges by steel clips, having bolts set with plaster-of-Paris in holes drilled in the slabs. These clips are 1-1/2 in. by 3/17 in., and are 17 in. apart. The roofs are slightly pitched to the front edges, where they drain into gold-plated copper-gutters on plated wrought-iron brackets, with one side flashed up over the blocks, which raise the slabs from the beam-tops, to clear the joint gutters.... But now I babble again of that base servitude, which I would forget, but cannot: for every measurement, bolt, ring, is in my brain, like a burden: but it is past, it is past — and it was vanity.

Six months ago to-day it was finished: six months more protracted, desolate, burdened, than all those sixteen years in which I built.

I wonder what a man — another man — some Shah, or Tsar, of that far-off past, would say now of me, if eye could rest upon me! With what awe would he certainly shrink before the wild majesty of these eyes; and though I am not lunatic — for I am not, I am not — how would he fly me with the exclamation: ‘There is the very lunacy of Pride!’

For there would seem to him — it must be so — in myself, in all about me, something extravagantly royal, touched with terror. My body has fattened, and my girth now fills out to a portly roundness its broad Babylonish girdle of crimson cloth, minutely gold-embroidered, and hung with silver, copper and gold coins of the Orient; my beard, still black, sweeps in two divergent sheaves to my hips, flustered by every wind; as I walk through this palace, the amber-and-silver floor reflects in its depths my low-necked, short-armed robe of purple, blue, and scarlet, a-glow with luminous stones. I am ten times crowned Lord and Emperor; I sit a hundred times enthroned in confirmed, obese old Majesty. Challenge me who will — challenge me who dare! Among those myriad worlds upon which I nightly pore, I may have my Peers and Compeers and Fellow-denizens ... but here I am Sole; Earth acknowledges my ancient sway and hereditary sceptre: for though she draws me, not yet, not yet, am I hers, but she is mine. It seems to me not less than a million million aeons since other beings, more or less resembling me, walked impudently in the open sunlight on this planet, which is rightly mine — I can indeed no longer picture to myself, nor even credit, that such a state of things — so fantastic, so faretched, so infinitely droll — could have existed: though, at bottom, I suppose, I know that it must have been really so. Up to ten years ago, in fact, I used frequently to dream that there were others. I would see them walk in the streets like ghosts, and be troubled, and start awake: but never now could such a thing, I think, occur to me in sleep: for the wildness of the circumstance would certainly strike my consciousness, and immediately I should know that the dream was a dream. For now, at least, I am sole, I am lord. The golden walls of this palace which I have built look down, enamoured of their reflection, into a lake of the choicest, purplest wine.

Not that I made it of wine because wine is rare; nor the walls of gold because gold is rare: that would have been too childish: but because I would match for beauty a human work with the works of those Others: and because it happens, by some persistent freak of the earth, that precisely things most rare and costly are generally the most beautiful.

The vision of glorious loveliness which is this palace now risen before my eyes cannot be described by pen and paper, though there may be words in the lexicons of language which, if I sought for them with inspired wit for sixteen years, as I have built for sixteen years, might as vividly express my thought on paper, as the stones-of-gold, so grouped and built, express it to the eye: but, failing such labours and skill, I suppose I could not give, if there were another man, and I tried to give, the faintest conception of its celestial charm.

It is a structure positively as clear as the sun, and as fair as the moon — the sole great human work in the making of which no restraining thought of cost has played a part: one of its steps alone being of more cost than all the temples, mosques and besestins, the palaces, pagodas and cathedrals, built between the ages of the Nimrods and the Napoleons.

The house itself is very small — only 40 ft. long, by 35 broad, by 27 high: yet the structure as a whole is sufficiently enormous, high uplifted: the rest of the bulk being occupied by the platform, on which the house stands, each side of this measuring at its base 480 ft., its height from top to bottom 130 ft, and its top 48 ft. square, the elevation of the steps being just nearly 30 degrees, and the top reached from each of the four points of the compass by 183 low long steps, very massively overlaid with smooth molten gold — not forming a continuous flight, but broken into threes and fives, sixes and nines, with landings between the series, these from the top looking like a great terraced parterre of gold. It is thus an Assyrian palace in scheme: only that the platform has steps on all sides, instead of on one. The platform-top, from its edge to the golden walls of the house, is a mosaic consisting of squares of the glassiest clarified gold, and squares of the glassiest jet, corner to corner, each square 2 ft. wide. Around the edge of the platform on top run 48 square plain gold pilasters, 12 on each side, 2 ft. high, tapering upwards, and topped by a knob of solid gold, pierced with a hole through which passes a lax inch-and-a-half silver chain, hung with little silver balls which strike together in the breeze. The mansion consists of an outer court, facing east toward the sea, and the house proper, which encloses an inner court. The outer court is a hollow oblong 32 ft. wide by 8 ft. long, the summit of its three walls being battlemented; they are 18-1/2 ft. in height, or 8-1/2 ft. lower than the house; around their gold sides, on inside and outside, 3 ft. from the top, runs a plain flat band of silver, 1 ft. wide, projecting 2/3 in., and at the gate, which is a plain Egyptian entrance, facing eastwards, 2-1/2 ft. narrower at top than at bottom, stand the two great square pillars of massive plain gold, tapering upwards, 45 ft. high, with their capital of band, closed lotus, and thin plinth; in the outer court, immediately opposite the gate, is an oblong well, 12 ft. by 3 ft, reproducing in little the shape of the court, its sides, which are gold-lined, tapering downward to near the bottom of the platform, where a conduit of 1/8 in. diameter automatically replenishes the ascertained mean evaporation of the lake during the year, the well containing 105,360 litres when nearly full, and the lake occupying a circle round the platform of 980 ft. diameter, with a depth of 3-1/2 ft. Round the well run pilasters connected by silver chains with little balls, and it communicates by a 1/8 in. conduit with a pool of wine let into the inner court, this being fed from eight tall and narrow golden tanks, tapering upwards, which surround it, each containing a different red wine, sufficient on the whole to last for all purposes during my lifetime. The ground of the outer court is also a mosaic of jet and gold: but thenceforth the jet-squares give place throughout to squares of silver, and the gold-squares to squares of clear amber, clear as solidified oil. The entrance is by an Egyptian doorway 7 ft. high, with folding-doors of gold-plated cedar, opening inwards, surrounded by a very large projecting coping of plain silver, 3-1/2 ft. wide, severe simplicity of line throughout enormously multiplying the effect of richness of material. The interior resembles, I believe, rather a Homeric, than an Assyrian or Egyptian house — except for the ‘galleries,’ which are purely Babylonish and Old Hebrew. The inner court, with its wine-pool and tanks, is a small oblong of 8 ft. by 9 ft., upon which open four silver-latticed window-oblongs in the same proportion, and two doors, before and behind, oblongs in the same proportion. Round this run the eight walls of the house proper, the inner 10 ft. from the outer, each parallel two forming a single long corridor-like chamber, except the front (east) two, which are divided into three apartments; in each side of the house are six panels of massive plain silver, half-an-inch thinner in their central space, where are affixed paintings, 22 or else 21 taken at the burning of Paris from a place called ‘The Louvre,’ and 2 or else 3 from a place in England: so that the panels have the look of frames, and are surrounded by oval garlands of the palest amethyst, topaz, sapphire, and turquoise which I could find, each garland being of only one kind of stone, a mere oval ring two feet wide at the sides and narrowing to an inch at the top and bottom, without designs. The galleries are five separate recesses in the outer walls under the roofs, two in the east façade, and one in the north, south, and west, hung with pavilions of purple, blue, rose and white silk on rings and rods of gold, with gold pilasters and banisters, each entered by four steps from the roof, to which lead, north and south, two spiral stairs of cedar. On the east roof stands the kiosk, under which is the little lunar telescope; and from that height, and from the galleries, I can watch under the bright moonlight of this climate, which is very like lime-light, the for-ever silent blue hills of Macedonia, and where the islands of Samothraki, Lemnos, Tenedos slumber like purplish fairies on the Aegean Sea: for, usually, I sleep during the day, and keep a night-long vigil, often at midnight descending to bathe my coloured baths in the lake, and to disport myself in that strange intoxication of nostrils, eyes, and pores, dreaming long wide-eyed dreams at the bottom, to return dazed, and weak, and drunken. Or again — twice within these last void and idle six months — I have suddenly run, bawling out, from this temple of luxury, tearing off my gaudy rags, to hide in a hut by the shore, smitten for one intense moment with realisation of the past of this earth, and moaning: ‘alone, alone ... all alone, alone, alone ... alone, alone....’ For events precisely resembling eruptions take place in my brain; and one spangled midnight — ah, how spangled! — I may kneel on the roof with streaming, uplifted face, with outspread arms, and awe-struck heart, adoring the Eternal: the next, I may strut like a cock, wanton as sin, lusting to burn a city, to wallow in filth, and, like the Babylonian maniac, calling myself the equal of Heaven.

But it was not to write of this — of all this — !

Of the furnishing of the palace I have written nothing.... But why I hesitate to admit to myself what I know, is not clear. If They speak to me, I may surely write of Them: for I do not fear Them, but am Their peer.

Of the island I have written nothing: its size, climate, form, vegetation.... There are two winds: a north and a south wind; the north is cool, and the south is warm; and the south blows during the winter months, so that sometimes on Christmas-day it is quite hot; and the north, which is cool, blows from May to September, so that the summer is hardly ever oppressive, and the climate was made for a king. The mangal-stove in the south hall I have never once lit.

The length, I should say, is 19 miles; the breadth 10, or thereabouts; and the highest mountains should reach a height of some 2,000 ft., though I have not been all over it. It is very densely wooded in most parts, and I have seen large growths of wheat and barley, obviously degenerate now, with currants, figs, valonia, tobacco, vines in rank abundance, and two marble quarries. From the palace, which lies on a sunny plateau of beautifully-sloping swards, dotted with the circular shadows thrown by fifteen huge cedars, and seven planes, I can see on all sides an edge of forest, with the gleam of a lake to the north, and in the hollow to the east the rivulet with its little bridge, and a few clumps and beds of flowers. I can also spy right through ——

It shall be written now:

I have this day heard within me the contention of the Voices.

I thought that they were done with me! That all, all, all, was ended! I have not heard them for twenty years!

But to-day — distinctly — breaking in with brawling impassioned suddenness upon my consciousness.... I heard.

This late far niente and vacuous inaction here have been undermining my spirit; this inert brooding upon the earth; this empty life, and bursting brain! Immediately after eating at noon to-day, I said to myself:

‘I have been duped by the palace: for I have wasted myself in building, hoping for peace, and there is no peace. Therefore now I shall fly from it, to another, sweeter work — not of building, but of destroying — not of Heaven, but of Hell — not of self-denial, but of reddest orgy. Constantinople — beware!’ I tossed the chair aside, and with a stamp was on my feet: and as I stood — again, again — I heard: the startlingly sudden wrangle, the fierce, vulgar outbreak and voluble controversy, till my consciousness could not hear its ears: and one urged: ‘Go! go!’ and the other: ‘Not there...! where you like, ... but not there...! for your life!’

I did not — for I could not — go: I was so overcome. I fell upon the couch shivering.

These Voices, or impulses, plainly as I felt them of old, quarrel within me now with an openness new to them. Lately, influenced by my long scientific habit of thought, I have occasionally wondered whether what I used to call ‘the two Voices’ were not in reality two strong instinctive movements, such as most men may have felt, though with less force. But to-day doubt is past, doubt is past: nor, unless I be very mad, can I ever doubt again.

I have been thinking, thinking of my life: there is a something which I cannot understand.

There was a man whom I met once in that dark backward and abysm of time, when I must have been very young — I fancy at some college or school in England, and his name now is far enough beyond scope of my memory, lost in the vast limbo of past things. But he used to talk continually about certain ‘Black’ and ‘White’ Powers, and of their strife for this world. He was a short man with a Roman nose, and lived in fear of growing a paunch. His forehead a-top, in profile, was more prominent than the nose-end, he parted his hair in the middle, and had the theory that the male form was more beautiful than the female. I forget what his name was — the dim clear-obscure being. Very profound was the effect of his words upon me, though, I think, I used to make a point of slighting them. This man always declared that ‘the Black’ would carry off the victory in the end: and so he has, so he has.

But assuming the existence of this ‘Black’ and this ‘White’ being — and supposing it to be a fact that my reaching the Pole had any connection with the destruction of my race, according to the notions of that extraordinary Scotch parson — then it must have been the power of ‘the Black’ which carried me, in spite of all obstacles, to the Pole. So far I can understand.

But after I had reached the Pole, what further use had either White or Black for me? Which was it — White or Black — that preserved my life through my long return on the ice — and why? It could not have been ‘the Black’! For I readily divine that from the moment when I touched the Pole, the only desire of the Black, which had previously preserved, must have been to destroy me, with the rest. It must have been ‘the White,’ then, that led me back, retarding me long, so that I should not enter the poison-cloud, and then openly presenting me the Boreal to bring me home to Europe. But his motive? And the significance of these recommencing wrangles, after such a silence? This I do not understand!

Curse Them, curse Them, with their mad tangles! I care nothing for Them! Are there any White Idiots and Black Idiots — at all? Or are these Voices that I hear nothing but the cries of my own strained nerves, and I all mad and morbid, morbid and mad, mad, my good God?

This inertia here is not good for me! This stalking about the palace! and long thinkings about Earth and Heaven, Black and White, White and Black, and things beyond the stars! My brain is like bursting through the walls of my poor head.

To-morrow, then, to Constantinople.

Descending to go to the ship, I had almost reached the middle of the east platform-steps, when my foot slipped on the smooth gold: and the fall, though I was not walking carelessly, had, I swear, all the violence of a fall caused by a push. I struck my head, and, as I rolled downward, swooned. When I came to myself, I was lying on the very bottom step, which is thinly washed by the wine-waves: another roll and I suppose I must have drowned. I sat there an hour, lost in amazement, then crossed the causeway, came down to the Speransa with the motor, went through her, spent the day in work, slept on her, worked again to-day, till four, at both ship and time-fuses (I with only 700 fuses left, and in Stamboul alone must be 8,000 houses, without counting Galata, Tophana, Kassim-pacha, Scutari, and the rest), started out at 5.30, and am now at 11 P.M. lying motionless two miles off the north coast of the island of Marmora, with moonlight gloating on the water, a faint north breeze, and the little pale land looking immensely stretched-out, solemn and great, as if that were the world, and there were nothing else; and the tiny island at its end immense, and the Speranza vast, and I only little. To-morrow at 11 A.M. I will moor the Speranza in the Golden Horn at the spot where there is that low damp nook of the bagnio behind the naval magazines and that hill where the palace of the Capitan Pacha is.

I found that great tangle of ships in the Golden Horn wonderfully preserved, many with hardly any moss-growths. This must be due, I suppose, to the little Ali-Bey and Kezat-Hanah, which flow into the Horn at the top, and made no doubt a constant current.

Ah, I remember the place: long ago I lived here some months, or, it may be, years. It is the fairest of cities — and the greatest. I believe that London in England was larger: but no city, surely, ever seemed so large. But it is flimsy, and will burn like tinder. The houses are made of light timber, with interstices filled by earth and bricks, and some of them look ruinous already, with their lovely faded tints of green and gold and red and blue and yellow, like the hues of withered flowers: for it is a city of paints and trees, and all in the little winding streets, as I write, are volatile almond-blossoms, mixed with maple-blossoms, white with purple. Even the most splendid of the Sultan's palaces are built in this combustible way: for I believe that they had a notion that stone-building was presumptuous, though I have seen some very thick stone-houses in Galata. This place, I remember, lived in a constant state of sensation on account of nightly flares-up; and I have come across several tracts already devastated by fires. The ministers-of-state used to attend them, and if the fire would not go out, the Sultan himself was obliged to be there, in order to encourage the firemen. Now it will burn still better.

But I have been here six weeks, and still no burning: for the place seems to plead with me, it is so ravishing, so that I do not know why I did not live here, and spare my toils during those sixteen nightmare years; for two whole weeks the impulse to burn was quieted; and since then there has been an irritating whisper at my ear which said: 'It is not really like the great King that you are, this burning, but like a foolish child, or a savage, who liked to see fireworks: or at least, if you must burn, do not burn poor Constantinople, which is so charming, and so very old, with its balsamic perfumes, and the blossomy trees of white and light-purple peeping over the walls of the cloistered painted houses, and all those lichened tombs — those granite menhirs and regions of ancient marble tombs between the quarters, Greek tombs, Byzantine, Jew, Mussulman tombs, with their strange and sacred inscriptions — overwaved by their cypresses and vast plane-trees.' And for weeks I would do nothing: but roamed about, with two minds in me, under the tropic brilliance of the sky by day, and the vast dreamy nights of this place that are like nights seen through azure-tinted glasses, and in each of them is not one night, but the thousand-and-one long crowded nights of glamour and fancy: for I would sit on the immense esplanade of the Seraskierat, or the mighty grey stones of the porch of the mosque of Sultan Mehmed-fatih, dominating from its great steps all old Stamboul, and watch the moon for hours and hours, so passionately bright she soared through clear and cloud, till I would be smitten with doubt of my own identity, for whether I were she, or the earth, or myself, or some other thing or man, I did not know, all being so silent alike, and all, except myself, so vast, the Seraskierat, and the Suleimanieh, and Stamboul, and the Marmora Sea, and the earth, and those argent fields of the moon, all large alike compared with me, and measure and space were lost, and I with them.

These proud Turks died stolidly, many of them. In streets of Kassimpacha, in crowded Taxim on the heights of Pera, and under the long Moorish arcades of Sultan-Selim, I have seen the open-air barber's razor with his bones, and with him the half-shaved skull of the faithful, and the long two-hours' narghile with traces of burnt tembaki and haschish still in the bowl. Ashes now are they all, and dry yellow bone; but in the houses of Phanar and noisy old Galata, and in the Jew quarter of Pri-pacha, the black shoe and head-dress of the Greek is still distinguishable from the Hebrew blue. It was a mixed ritual of colours here in boot and hat: yellow for Mussulman, red boots, black calpac for Armenian, for the Effendi a white turban, for the Greek a black. The Tartar skull shines from under a high taper calpac, the Nizain-djid's from a melon-shaped head-piece; the Imam's and Dervish's from a grey conical felt; and there is here and there a Frank in European rags. I have seen the towering turban of the Bashi-bazouk, and his long sword, and some softas in the domes on the great wall of Stamboul, and the beggar, and the street-merchant with large tray of water-melons, sweetmeats, raisins, sherbet, and the bear-shewer, and the Barbary organ, and the night-watchman who evermore cried 'Fire!' with his long lantern, two pistols, dirk, and wooden javelin. Strange how all that old life has come back to my fancy now, pretty vividly, and for the first time, though I have been here several times lately. I have gone out to those plains beyond the walls with their view of rather barren mountain-peaks, the city looking nothing but minarets shooting through black cypress-tops, and I seemed to see the wild muezzin at some summit, crying the midday prayer: 'Mohammed Resoul Allah!' — the wild man; and from that great avenue of cypresses which traverses the cemetery of Scutari, the walled city of Stamboul lay spread entire up to Phanar and Eyoub in their cypress-woods before me, the whole embowered now in trees, all that complexity of ways and dark alleys with overhanging balconies of old Byzantine houses, beneath which a rider had to stoop the head, where old Turks would lose their way in mazes of the picturesque; and on the shaded Bosphorus coast, to Foundoucli and beyond, some peeping yali, snow-white palace, or old

Armenian cot; and the Seraglio by the sea, a town within a town; and southward the Sea of Marmora, blue-and-white, and vast, and fresh as a sea just born, rejoicing at its birth and at the jovial sun, all brisk, alert, to the shadowy islands afar: and as I looked, I suddenly said aloud a wild, mad thing, my God, a wild and maniac thing, a shrieking maniac thing for Hell to laugh at: for something said with my tongue: 'This city is not quite dead.'

Three nights I slept in Stamboul itself at the palace of some sanjak-bey or emir, or rather dozed, with one slumbrous eye that would open to watch my visitors Sinbad, and Ali Baba, and old Haroun, to see how they slumbered and dozed: for it was in the small luxurious chamber where the bey received those speechless all-night visits of the Turks, long rosy hours of perfumed romance, and drunkenness of the fancy, and visionary languor, sinking toward morning into the yet deeper peace of dreamless sleep; and there, still, were the white yatags for the guests to sit cross-legged on for the waking dream, and to fall upon for the final swoon, and the copper brazier still scenting of essence-of-rose, and the cushions, rugs, hangings, the monsters on the wall, the haschish-chibouques, narghiles, hookahs, and drugged pale cigarettes, and a secret-looking lattice beyond the door, painted with trees and birds; and the air narcotic and grey with the pastilles which I had burned, and the scented smokes which I had smoked; and I all drugged and mumbling, my left eye suspicious of Ali there, and Sinbad, and old Haroun, who dozed. And when I had slept, and rose to wash in a room near the overhanging latticed balcony of the façade, before me to the north lay old Galata in sunshine, and that steep large street mounting to Pera, once full at every night-fall of divans on which grave dervishes smoked narghiles, and there was no space for passage, for all was divans, lounges, almond-trees, heaven-high hum, chibouques in forests, the dervish, and the innumerable porter, the horse-hirer with his horse from Tophana, and arsenal-men from Kassim, and traders from Galata, and artillery-workmen from Tophana; and on the other side of the house, the south end, a covered bridge led across a street, which consisted mostly of two immense blind walls, into a great tangled wilderness of flowers, which was the harem-garden, where I passed some hours; and here I might have remained many days, many weeks perhaps, but that, dozing one fore-day with those fancied others, it was as if there occurred a laugh somewhere, and a thing said: 'But this city is not quite dead!' waking me from deeps of peace to startled wakefulness. And I thought to myself: 'If it be not quite dead, it will be soon — and with some suddenness!' And the next morning I was at the Arsenal.

It is long since I have so deeply enjoyed, even to the marrow. It may be 'the White' who has the guardianship of my life: but assuredly it is 'the Black' who reigns in my soul.

Grandly did old Stamboul, Galata, Tophana, Kassim, right out beyond the walls to Phanar and Eyoub, blaze and burn. The whole place, except one little region of Galata, was like so much tinder, and in the five hours between 8 P.M. and 1 A.M. all was over. I saw the tops of those vast masses of cemetery-cypresses round the tombs of the Osmanlis outside the walls, and those in the cemetery of Kassim, and those round the sacred mosque of Eyoub, shrivel away instantaneously, like flimsy hair caught by a flame; I saw the Genoese tower of Galata go heading obliquely on an upward curve, like Sir Roger de Coverley and wild rockets, and burst high, high, with a report; in pairs, and threes, and fours, I saw the blue cupolas of the twelve or fourteen great mosques give in and subside, or soar and rain, and the great minarets nod the head, and topple; and I saw the flames reach out and out across the empty breadth of the Etmeidan — three hundred yards — to the six minarets of the Mosque of Achmet, wrapping the red Egyptian-granite obelisk in the centre; and across the breadth of the Serai-Meidani it reached to the buildings of the Seraglio and the Sublime Porte; and across those vague barren stretches that lie between the houses and the great wall; and across the seventy or eighty great arcaded bazaars, all-enwrapping, it reached; and the spirit of fire grew upon me: for the Golden Horn itself was a tongue of fire, crowded, west of the galley-harbour, with exploding battleships, Turkish frigates, corvettes, brigs — and east, with tens of thousands of feluccas, caiques, gondolas and merchantmen aflame. On my left burned all Scutari; and between six and eight in the evening I had sent out thirty-seven vessels under low horse-powers of air, with trains and fuses laid for 11 P.M., to light with their wandering fires the Sea of Marmora. By midnight I was encompassed in one great furnace and fiery gulf, all the sea and sky inflamed, and earth a-flare. Not far from me to the left I saw the vast Tophana barracks of the Cannoniers, and the Artillery-works, after long reluctance and delay, take wing together; and three minutes later, down by the water, the barrack of the Bombardiers and the Military School together, grandly, grandly; and then, to the right, in the valley of Kassim, the Arsenal: these occupying the sky like smoky suns, and shedding a glaring day over many a mile of sea and land; I saw the two lines of ruddier flaring where the barge-bridge and the raft-bridge over the Golden Horn made haste to burn; and all that vastness burned with haste, quicker and quicker — to fervour — to fury — to unanimous rabies: and when its red roaring stormed the infinite, and the might of its glowing heart was Gravitation, Being, Sensation, and I its compliant wife — then my head nodded, and with crooked lips I sighed as it were my last sigh, and tumbled, weak and drunken, upon my face.

O wild Providence! Unfathomable madness of Heaven! that ever I should write what now I write! I will not write it....

The hissing of it! It is only a crazy dream! a tearing-out of the hair by the roots to scatter upon the raving storms of Saturn! My hand will not write it!

In God's name —— ! During four nights after the burning I slept in a house — French as I saw by the books, &c., probably the Ambassador's, for it has very large gardens and a beautiful view over the sea, situated on the rapid east declivity of Pera; it is one of the few large houses which, for my safety, I had left standing round the minaret whence I had watched, this minaret being at the top of the old Mussulman quarter on the heights of Taxim, between Pera proper and Foundoucli. At the bottom, both at the quay of Foundoucli, and at that of Tophana, I had left under shelter two caiques for double safety, one a Sultan's gilt craft, with gold spur at the prow, and one a boat of those zaptias that used to patrol the Golden Horn as water-police: by one or other of these I meant to reach the Speranza, she being then safely anchored some distance up the Bosphorus coast. So, on the fifth morning I set out for the Tophana quay; but a light rain had fallen over-night, and this had re-excited the thin grey smoke resembling quenched steam, which, as from some reeking province of Abaddon, still trickled upward over many a square mile of blackened tract, though of flame I could see no sign. I had not accordingly advanced far over every sort of débris, when I found my eyes watering, my throat choked, and my way almost blocked by roughness: whereupon I said: 'I will turn back, cross the region of tombs and barren waste behind Pera, descend the hill, get the zaptia boat at the Foundoucli quay, and so reach the Speranza.'

Accordingly, I made my way out of the region of smoke, passed beyond the limits of smouldering ruin and tomb, and soon entered a rich woodland, somewhat scorched at first, but soon green and flourishing as the jungle. This cooled and soothed me, and being in no hurry to reach the ship, I was led on and on, in a somewhat north-western direction, I fancy. Somewhere hereabouts, I thought, was the place they called 'The Sweet Waters,' and I went on with the vague notion of coming upon them, thinking to pass the day, till afternoon, in the forest. Here nature, in only twenty years has returned to an exuberant savagery, and all was now the wildest vegetation, dark dells, rills wimpling through deep-brown shade of sensitive mimosa, large pendulous fuchsia, palm, cypress, mulberry, jonquil, narcissus, daffodil, rhododendron, acacia, fig. Once I stumbled upon a cemetery of old gilt tombs, absolutely overgrown and lost, and thrice caught glimpses of little trellised yalis choked in boscage. With slow and listless foot I went, munching an almond or an olive, though I could swear that olives were not formerly indigenous to any soil so northern: yet here they are now, pretty plentiful, though elementary, so that modifications whose end I cannot see are certainly proceeding in everything, some of the cypresses which I met that day being immense beyond anything I ever heard of: and the thought, I remember, was in my head, that if a twig or leaf should change into a bird, or a fish with wings, and fly before my eyes, what then should I do? and I would eye a branch suspiciously anon. After a long time I penetrated into a very sombre grove. The day outside the wood was brilliant and hot, and very still, the leaves and flowers here all motionless. I seemed, as it were, to hear the vacant silence of the world, and my foot treading on a twig, produced the report of pistols. I presently reached a glade in a thicket, about eight yards across, that had a scent of lime and orange, where the just-sufficient twilight enabled me to see some old bones, three skulls, and the edge of a tam-tam peeping from a tuft of wild corn with corn-flowers, and here and there some golden champac, and all about a profusion of musk-roses. I had stopped — why I do not recollect — perhaps thinking that if I was not getting to the Sweet Waters, I should seriously set about finding my way out. And as I stood looking about me, I remember that some cruising insect trawled near my ear its lonely drone.

Suddenly, God knows, I started, I started.

I imagined — I dreamed — that I saw a pressure in a bed of moss and violets, recently made! And while I stood gloating upon that impossible thing, I imagined — I dreamed — the lunacy of it! — that I heard a laugh...! the laugh, my good God, of a human soul.

Or it seemed half a laugh, and half a sob: and it passed from me in one fleeting instant.

Laughs, and sobs, and idiot hallucinations, I had often heard before, feet walking, sounds behind me: and even as I had heard them, I had known that they were nothing. But brief as was this impression, it was yet so thrillingly real, that my poor heart received, as it were, the very shock of death, and I fell backward into a mass of moss, supported on the right palm, while the left pressed my working bosom; and there, toiling to catch my breath, I lay still, all my soul focussed into my ears. But now I could hear no sound, save only the vast and audible hum of the silence of the universe.

There was, however, the foot-print. If my eye and ear should so conspire against me, that, I thought, was hard.

Still I lay, still, in that same pose, without a stir, sick and dry-mouthed, infirm and languishing, with dying breaths: but keen, keen — and malign.

I would wait, I said to myself, I would be artful as snakes, though so woefully sick and invalid: I would make no sound....

After some minutes I became conscious that my eyes were leering — leering in one fixed direction: and instantly, the mere fact that I had a sense of direction proved to me that I must, in truth, have heard something! I strove — I managed — to raise myself: and as I stood upright, feebly swaying there, not the terrors of death alone were in my breast, but the authority of the monarch was on my brow.

I moved: I found the strength.

Slow step by slow step, with daintiest noiselessness, I moved to a thread of moss that from the glade passed into the thicket, and along its winding way I stepped, in the direction of the sound. Now my ears caught the purling noise of a brooklet, and following the moss-path, I was led into a mass of bush only two or three feet higher than my head. Through this, prowling like a stealthy cat, I wheedled my painful way, emerged upon a strip of open long-grass, and now was faced, three yards before me, by a wall of acacia-trees, prickly-pear and pichulas, between which and a forest beyond I spied a gleam of running water.

On hands and knees I crept toward the acacia-thicket, entered it a little, and leaning far forward, peered. And there — at once — ten yards to my right — I saw.

Singular to say, my agitation, instead of intensifying to the point of apoplexy and death, now, at the actual sight, subsided to something very like calmness. With malign and sullen eye askance I stood, and steadily I watched her there.

She was on her knees, her palms lightly touching the ground, supporting her. At the edge of the streamlet she knelt, and she was looking with a species of startled shy astonishment at the reflexion of her face in the limpid brown water. And I, with sullen eye askance regarded her a good ten minutes' space.

I believe that her momentary laugh and sob, which I had heard, was the result of surprise at seeing her own image; and I firmly believe, from the expression of her face, that this was the first time that she had seen it.

Never, I thought, as I stood moodily gazing, had I seen on the earth a creature so fair (though, analysing now at leisure, I can quite conclude that there was nothing at all remarkable about her good looks). Her hair, somewhat lighter than auburn, and frizzy, was a real garment to her nakedness, covering her below the hips, some strings of it falling, too, into the water: her eyes, a dark blue, were wide in a most silly expression of bewilderment. Even as I eyed and eyed her, she slowly rose: and at once I saw in all her manner an air of unfamiliarity with the world, as of one wholly at a loss what to do. Her pupils did not seem accustomed to light; and I could swear that that was the first day in which she had seen a tree or a stream.

Her age appeared eighteen or twenty. I guessed that she was of Circassian blood, or, at least, origin. Her skin was whitey-brown, or old ivory-white.

She stood up motionless, at a loss. She took a lock of her hair, and drew it through her lips. There was some look in her eyes, which I could plainly see now, somehow indicating wild hunger, though the wood was full of food. After letting go her hair, she stood again feckless and imbecile, with sideward-hung head, very pitiable to see I think now, though no faintest pity touched me then. It was clear that she did not at all know what to make of the look of things. Finally, she sat on a moss-bank, reached and took a musk-rose on her palm, and looked hopelessly at it.

One minute after my first actual sight of her my extravagance of agitation, I say, died down to something like calm. The earth was mine by old right: I felt that: and this creature a mere slave upon whom, without heat or haste, I might perform my will: and for some time I stood, coolly enough considering what that will should be.

I had at my girdle the little cangiar, with silver handle encrusted with coral, and curved blade six inches long, damascened in gold, and sharp as a razor; the blackest and the basest of all the devils of the Pit was whispering in my breast with calm persistence: ‘Kill, kill — and eat.’

Why I should have killed her I do not know. That question I now ask myself. It must be true, true that it is ‘not good’ for man to be alone. There was a religious sect in the Past which called itself ‘Socialist’: and with these must have been the truth, man being at his best and highest when most social, and at his worst and lowest when isolated: for the Earth gets hold of all isolation, and draws it, and makes it fierce, base, and materialistic, like sultans, aristocracies, and the like: but Heaven is where two or three are gathered together. It may be so: I do not know, nor care. But I know that after twenty years of solitude on a planet the human soul is more enamoured of solitude than of life, shrinking like a tender nerve from the rough intrusion of Another into the secret realm of Self: and hence, perhaps, the bitterness with which solitary castes, Brahmins, patricians, aristocracies, always resisted any attempt to invade their slowly-acquired domain of privileges. Also, it may be true, it may, it may, that after twenty years of solitary selfishness, a man becomes, without suspecting it — not at all noticing the slow stages — a real and true beast, a horrible, hideous beast, mad, prowling, like that King of Babylon, his nails like birds' claws, and his hair like eagles' feathers, with instincts all inflamed and fierce, delighting in darkness and crime for their own sake. I do not know, nor care: but I know that, as I drew the cangiar, the basest and the slyest of all the devils was whispering me, tongue in cheek: 'Kill, kill — and be merry.'

With excruciating slowness, like a crawling glacier, tender as a nerve of the touching leaves, I moved, I stole, obliquely toward her through the wall of bush, the knife behind my back. Once only there was a restraint, a check: I felt myself held back: I had to stop: for one of the ends of my divided beard had caught in a limb of prickly-pear.

I set to disentangling it: and it was, I believe, at the moment of succeeding that I first noticed the state of the sky, a strip of which I could see across the rivulet: a minute or so before it had been pretty clear, but now was busy with hurrying clouds. It was a sinister muttering of thunder which had made me glance upward.

When my eyes returned to the sitting figure, she was looking foolishly about the sky with an expression which almost proved that she had never before heard that sound of thunder, or at least had no idea what it could bode. My fixed regard lost not one of her movements, while inch by inch, not breathing, careful as the poise of a balance, I crawled. And suddenly, with a rush, I was out in the open, running her down....

She leapt: perhaps two, perhaps three, paces she fled: then stock still she stood — within some four yards of me — with panting nostrils, with enquiring face.

I saw it all in one instant, and in one instant all was over. I had not checked the impetus of my run at her stoppage, and I was on the point of reaching her with uplifted knife, when I was suddenly checked and smitten by a stupendous violence: a flash of blinding light, attracted by the steel which I held, struck tingling through my frame, and at the same time the most passionate crash of thunder that ever shocked a poor human ear felled me to the ground. The cangiar, snatched from my hand, fell near the girl's foot.

I did not entirely lose consciousness, though, surely, the Powers no longer hide themselves from me, and their close contact is too intolerably rough and vigorous for a poor mortal man. During, I should think, three or four minutes, I lay so astounded under that bullying cry of wrath, that I could not move a finger. When at last I did sit up, the girl was standing near me, with a sort of smile, holding out to me the cangiar in a pouring rain.

I took it from her, and my doddering fingers dropped it into the stream.

Pour, pour came the rain, raining as it can in this place, not long, but a deluge while it lasts, dripping in thick-liquidity, like a profuse sweat, through the forest, I seeking to get back by the way I had come, flying, but with difficulty and slowness, and a feeling in me that I was being tracked. And so it proved: for when I struck into more open space, nearly opposite the west walls, but now on the north side of the Golden Horn, where there is a flat grassy ground somewhere between the valley of Kassim and Charkoi, with horror I saw that protégée of Heaven, or of someone, not ten yards behind, following me like a mechanical figure, it being now near three in the afternoon, and the rain drenching me through, and I tired and hungry, and from all the ruins of Constantinople not one whiff of smoke ascending.

I trudged on wearily till I came to the quay of Foundoucli, and the zaptia boat; and there she was with me still, her hair nothing but a thin drowned string down her back.

Not only can she not speak to me in any language that I know: but she can speak in no language: it is my firm belief that she has never spoken.

She never saw a boat, or water, or the world, till now — I could swear it. She came into the boat with me, and sat astern, clinging for dear life to the gunwale by her finger-nails, and I paddled the eight hundred yards to the Speranza, and she came up to the deck after me. When she saw the open water, the boat, the yalis on the coast, and then the ship, astonishment was imprinted on her face. But she appears to know little fear. She smiled like a child, and on the ship touched this and that, as if each were a living thing.

It was only here and there that one could see the ivory-brown colour of her skin: the rest was covered with dirt, like old bottles long lying in cellars.

By the time we reached the Speranza, the rain suddenly stopped: I went down to my cabin to change my clothes, and had to shut the door in her face to keep her out. When I opened it, she was there, and she followed me to the windlass, when I went to set the anchor-engine going. I intended, I suppose, to take her to Imbros, where she might live in one of the broken-down houses of the village. But when the anchor was not yet half up, I stopped the engine, and let the chain run again. For I said, ‘No, I will be alone, I am not a child.’

I knew that she was hungry by the look in her eyes: but I cared nothing for that. I was hungry, too: and that was all I cared about.

I would not let her be there with me another instant. I got down into the boat, and when she followed, I rowed her back all the way past Foundoucli and the Tophana quay to where one turns into the Golden Horn by St. Sophia, around the mouth of the Horn being a vast semicircle of charred wreckage, carried out by the river-currents. I went up the steps on the Galata side before one comes to where the barge-bridge was. When she had followed me on to the embankment, I walked up one of those rising streets, very encumbered now with stone-débris and ashes, but still marked by some standing black wall-fragments, it being now not far from night, but the air as clear and washed as the translucency of a great purple diamond with the rain and the afterglow of the sun, and all the west aflame.

When I was about a hundred yards up in this old mixed quarter of Greeks, Turks, Jews, Italians, Albanians, and noise and cafedjis and wine-bibbing, having turned two corners, I suddenly gathered my skirts, spun round, and, as fast as I could, was off at a heavy trot back to the quay. She was after me, but being taken by surprise, I suppose, was distanced a little at first. However, by the time I could scurry myself down into the boat, she was so near, that she only saved herself from the water by a balancing stoppage at the brink, as I pushed off. I then set out to get back to the ship, muttering: ‘You can have Turkey, if you like, and I will keep the rest of the world.’

I rowed sea-ward, my face toward her, but steadily averted, for I would not look her way to see what she was doing. However, as I turned the point of the quay, where the open sea washes quite rough and loud, to go northward and disappear from her, I heard a babbling cry — the first sound which she had uttered. I did look then: and she was still quite near me, for the silly maniac had been running along the embankment, following me.

‘Little fool!’ I cried out across the water, ‘what are you after now?’ And, oh my good God, shall I ever forget that strangeness, that wild strangeness, of my own voice, addressing on this earth another human soul?

There she stood, whimpering like an abandoned dog after me. I turned the boat, rowed, came to the first steps, landed, and struck her two stinging slaps, one on each cheek. While she cowered, surprised no doubt, I took her by the hand, led her back to the boat, landed on the Stamboul side, and set off, still leading her, my object being to find some sort of possible edifice near by, not hopelessly burned, in which to leave her: for in all Galata there was plainly none, and Pera, I thought, was too far to walk to. But it would have been better if I had gone to Pera, for we had to walk quite three miles from Seraglio Point all along the city battlements to the Seven-towers, she picking her bare-footed way after me through the great Sahara of charred stuff, and night now well arrived, and the moon a-drift in the heaven, making the desolate lonesomeness of the ruins tenfold desolate, so that my heart smote me then with bitterness and remorse, and I had a vision of myself that night which I will not put down on paper. At last, however, pretty late in the evening, I spied a large mansion with green lattice-work façade, and shaknisier, and terrace-roof, which had been hidden from me by the arcades of a bazaar, a vast open space at about the centre of Stamboul, one of the largest of the bazaars, I should think, in the middle of which stood the mansion, probably the home of pasha or vizier: for it had a very distinguished look in that place. It seemed very little hurt, though the vegetation that had apparently choked the great open space was singed to a black fluff, among which lay thousands of calcined bones of man, horse, ass, and camel, for all was distinct in the bright, yet so pensive and forlorn, moonlight, which was that Eastern moonlight of pure astral mystery which illumines Persepolis, and Babylon, and ruined cities of the old Anakim.

The house, I knew, would contain divans, yatags, cushions, foods, wines, sherbets, henna, saffron, mastic, raki, haschish, costumes, and a hundred luxuries still good. There was an outer wall, but the foliage over it had been singed away, and the gate all charred. It gave way at a push from my palm. The girl was close behind me. I next threw open a little green lattice-door in the façade under the shaknisier, and entered. Here it was dark, and the moment that she, too, was within, I slipped out quickly, slammed the door in her face, and hooked it upon her by a little hook over the latch.

I now walked some yards beyond the court, then stopped, listening for her expected cry: but all was still: five minutes — ten — I waited: but no sound. I then continued my morose and melancholy way, hollow with hunger, intending to start that night for Imbros.

But this time I had hardly advanced twenty steps, when I heard a frail and strangled cry, apparently in mid-air behind me, and glancing, saw the creature lying at the gateway, a white thing in black stubble-ashes. She had evidently jumped, well outward, from a small casement of lattice on a level with the little shaknisier grating, through which once peeped bright eyes, thirty feet aloft.

I hardly believe that she was conscious of any danger in jumping, for all the laws of life are new to her, and, having sought and found the opening, she may have merely come with blind instinctiveness after me, taking the first way open to her. I walked back, pulled at her arm, and found that she could not stand. Her face was screwed with silent pain — she did not moan. Her left foot, I could see, was bleeding: and by the wounded ankle I took her, and dragged her so through the ashes across the narrow court, and tossed her like a little dog with all my force within the door, cursing her.

Now I would not go back the long way to the ship, but struck a match, and went lighting up girandoles, cressets, candelabra, into a confusion of lights among great numbers of pale-tinted pillars, rose and azure, with verd-antique, olive, and Portoro marble, and serpentine. The mansion was large, I having to traverse quite a desert of embroidered brocade-hangings, slender columns, and Broussa silks, till I saw a stair-case doorway behind a Smyrna portière, went up, and wandered some time in a house of gilt-barred windows, with very little furniture, but palatial spaces, solitary huge pieces of faïence of inestimable age, and arms, my footfalls quite stifled in the Persian carpeting. I passed through a covered-in hanging-gallery, with one window-grating overlooking an inner court, and by this entered the harem, which declared itself by a greater luxury, bric-à-bracerie, and profusion of manner. Here, descending a short curved stair behind a portière, I came into a marble-paved sort of larder, in which was an old negress in blue dress, her hair still adhering, and an infinite supply of sweetmeats, French preserved foods, sherbets, wines, and so on. I put a number of things into a pannier, went up again, found some of those exquisite pale cigarettes which drunken in the hollow of an emerald, also a jewelled two-yard-long chibouque, and tembaki: and with all descended by another stair, and laid them on the steps of a little raised kiosk of green marble in a corner of the court; went up again, and brought down a still-snowy yatag to sleep on; and there, by the kiosk-step, ate and passed the night, smoking for several hours in a state of languor. In the centre of the court is a square marble well, looking white through a rankness of wild vine, acacias in flower, weeds, jasmines, and roses, which overgrew it, as well as the kiosk and the whole court, climbing even the four-square arcade of Moorish arches round the open space, under one of which I had deposited a long lantern of crimson silk: for here no breath of the fire had come. About two in morning I fell to sleep, a deeper peace of shadow now reigning where so long the melancholy silver of the moon had lingered.

About eight in the morning I rose and made my way to the front, intending that that should be my last night in this ruined place: for all the night, sleeping and waking, the thing which had happened filled my brain, growing from one depth of incredibility to a deeper, so that at last I arrived at a sort of certainty that it could be nothing but a drunken dream: but as I opened my eyes afresh, the deep-cutting realisation of that impossibility smote like a pang of lightning-stroke through my being: and I said: 'I will go again to the far Orient, and forget': and I started out from the court, not knowing what had become of her during the night, till, having reached the outer chamber, with a wild start I saw her lying there at the door in the very spot where I had flung her, asleep sideways, head on arm ... Softly, softly, I stept over her, got out, and went running at a cautious clandestine trot. The morning was in high fête, most fresh and pure, and to breathe was to be young, and to see such a sunlight lighten even upon ruin so vast was to be blithe. After running two hundred yards to one of the great broken bazaar-portals, I looked back to see if I was followed: but all that space was desolately empty. I then walked on past the arch, on which a green oblong, once inscribed, as usual, with some text in gilt hieroglyphs, is still discernible; and, emerging, saw the great panorama of destruction, a few vast standing walls, with hollow Oriental windows framing deep sky beyond, and here and there a pillar, or half-minaret, and down within the walls of the old Seraglio still some leafless, branchless trunks, and in Eyoub and Phanar leafless forests, and on the northern horizon Pera with the steep upper-half of the Iani-Chircha street still there, and on the height the European houses, and all between blackness, stones, a rolling landscape of ravine, like the hilly pack-ice of the North if its snow were ink, and to the right Scutari, black, laid low, with its vast region of tombs, and rare stumps of its forests, and the blithe blue sea, with the widening semicircle of floating débris, looking like brown foul scum at some points, congested before the bridgeless Golden Horn: for I stood pretty high in the centre of Stamboul somewhere in the region of the Suleimanieh, or of Sultan-Selim, as I judged, with immense purviews into abstract distances and mirage. And to me it seemed too vast, too lonesome, and after advancing a few hundred yards beyond the bazaar, I turned again.

I found the girl still asleep at the house-door, and stirring her with my foot, woke her. She leapt up with a start of surprise, and a remarkable sinuous agility, and gazed an astounded moment at me, till, separating reality from dream and habit, she realised me: but immediately subsided to the floor again, being in evident pain. I pulled her up, and made her limp after me through several halls to the inner court, and the well, where I set her upon the weedy margin, took her foot in my lap, examined it, drew water, washed it, and bandaged it with a strip torn from my caftan-hem, now and again speaking gruffly to her, so that she might no more follow me.

After this, I had breakfast by the kiosk-steps, and when I was finished, put a mass of truffled foie gras on a plate, brushed through the thicket to the well, and gave it her. She took it, but looked foolish, not eating. I then, with my forefinger, put a little into her mouth, whereupon she set hungrily to eat it all. I also gave her some ginger-bread, a handful of bonbons, some Krishnu wine, and some anisette.

I then started out afresh, gruffly bidding her stay there, and left her sitting on the well, her hair falling down the opening, she peering after me through the bushes. But I had not half reached the ogival bazaar-portal, when looking anxiously back, I saw that she was limping after me. So that this creature tracks me in the manner of a nutshell following about in the wake of a ship.

I turned back with her to the house, for it was necessary that I should plan some further method of eluding her. That was five days ago, and here I have stayed: for the house and court are sufficiently agreeable, and form a museum of real objets d'art. It is settled, however, that to-morrow I return to Imbros.

It seems certain that she never wore, saw, nor knew of, clothes.

I have dressed her, first sousing her thoroughly with sponge and soap in luke-warm rose-water in the silver cistern of the harem-bath, which is a circular marbled apartment with a fountain and the complicated ceilings of these houses, and frescoes, and gilt texts of the Koran on the walls, and pale rose-silk hangings. On the divan I had heaped a number of selected garments, and having shewed her how to towel herself, I made her step into a pair of the trousers called shintiyan made of yellow-striped white-silk; this, by a running string, I tied loosely round the upper part of her hips; then, drawing up the bottoms to her knees, tied them there, so that their voluminous baggy folds, overhanging still to the ankles, have rather the look of a skirt; over this I put upon her a blue-striped chiffon chemise, or quamis, reaching a little below the hips; I then put on a short jacket or vest of scarlet satin, thickly embroidered in gold and precious stones, reaching somewhat below the waist, and pretty tight-fitting; and, making her lie on the couch, I put upon her little feet little yellow baboosh-slippers, then anklets, on her fingers rings, round her neck a necklace of sequins, finally dyeing her nails, which I cut, with henna. There remained her head, but with this I would have nothing to do, only pointing to the tarboosh which I had brought, to a square kerchief, to some corals, and to the fresco of a woman on the wall, which, if she chose, she might copy. Lastly, I pierced her ears with the silver needles which they used here: and after two hours of it left her.

About an hour afterwards I saw her in the arcade round the court, and, to my great surprise, she had a perfect plait down her back, and over her head and brows a green-silk feredjeh, or hood, precisely as in the picture.

Here is a question, the answer to which would be interesting to me: Whether or not for twenty years — or say rather twenty centuries, twenty eternal aeons — I have been stark mad, a raving maniac; and whether or not I am now suddenly sane, sitting here writing in my right mind, my whole mood and tone changed, or rapidly changing? And whether such change can be due to the presence of only one other being in the world with me?

This singular being! Where she has lived — and how — is a problem to which not the faintest solution is conceivable. She had, I say, never seen clothes: for when I began to dress her, her perplexity was unbounded; also, during her twenty years, she has never seen almonds, figs, nuts, liqueurs, chocolate, conserves, vegetables, sugar, oil, honey, sweetmeats, orange-sherbet, mastic, salt, raki, tobacco, and many such things: for she showed perplexity at all these, hesitation to eat them: but she has known and tasted white wine: I could see that. Here, then, is a mystery.

I have not gone to Imbros, but remained here some days longer observing her.

I have allowed her to sit in a corner at meal-time, not far from where I eat, and I have given her food.

She is wonderfully clever! I continually find that, after an incredibly short time, she has most completely adapted herself to this or that. Already she wears her outfit as coquettishly as though born to clothes. Without at all seeming observant — for, on the contrary, she gives an impression of great flightiness — she watches me, I am convinced, with pretty exact observation. She knows precisely when I am speaking roughly, bidding her go, bidding her come, tired of her, tolerant of her, scorning her, cursing her. If I wish her to the devil, she quickly divines it by my face, and will disappear. Yesterday I noticed something queer about her, and soon discovered that she had been staining her lids with black kohol, like the hanums, so that, having found a box, she must have guessed its use from the pictures. Wonderfully clever! — imitative as a mirror. Two mornings ago I found an old mother-of-pearl kittur, and sitting under the arcade, touched the strings, playing a simple air; I could just see her behind one of the arch-pillars on the opposite side, and she was listening with apparent eagerness, and, I fancied, panting. Well, returning from a walk beyond the Phanar walls in the afternoon, I heard the same air coming out from the house, for she was repeating it pretty faultlessly by ear.

Also, during the forenoon of the previous day, I came upon her — for footsteps make no sound in this house — in the pacha's visitors'-hall: and what was she doing? — copying the poses of three dancing-girls frescoed there! So that she would seem to have a character as light as a butterfly's, and is afraid of nothing.

Now I know.

I had observed that at the beginning of every meal she seemed to have something on her mind, going toward the door, hesitating as if to see whether I would follow, and then returning. At length yesterday, after sitting to eat, she jumped up, and to my infinite surprise, said her first word: said it with a most quaint, experimental effort of the tongue, as a fledgling trying the air: the word 'Come.'

That morning, meeting her in the court, I had told her to repeat some words after me: but she had made no attempt, as if shy to break the long silence of her life; and now I felt some sort of foolish pleasure in hearing her utter that word, often no doubt heard from me: and after hurriedly eating, I went with her, saying to myself: 'She must be about to shew me the food to which she is accustomed: and perhaps that will solve her origin.'

And so it has proved. I have now discovered that to the moment when she saw me, she had tasted only her mother's milk, dates, and that white wine of Ismidt which the Koran permits.

As it was getting dark, I lit and took with me the big red-silk lantern, and we set out, she leading, and walking confoundedly fast, slackening when I swore at her, and getting fast again: and she walks with a certain levity, flightiness, and liberated furore, very hard to describe, as though space were a luxury to be revelled in. By what instinctive cleverness, or native vigour of memory, she found her way I cannot tell, but she led me such a walk that night, miles, miles, till I became furious, darkness having soon fallen with only a faint moon obscured by cloud, and a drizzle which haunted the air, she without light climbing and picking her thinly-slippered steps over mounds of débris and loosely-strewn masonry with unfailing agility, I occasionally splashing a foot with horror into one of those little ponds which always marked the Stamboul streets. When I was nearer her, I would see her peer across and upward toward Pera, as if that were a remembered land-mark, and would note the perpetual aspen oscillations of the long coral drops in her ears, and the nimble ply of her limbs, wondering with a groan if Pera was our goal.

Our goal was even beyond Pera. When we came to the Golden Horn, she pointed to my caique which lay at the Old Seraglio steps, and over the water we went, she lying quite at ease now, with her face at the level of the water in the centre of the crescent-shape, as familiarly as a hanum of old engaged in some escapade through the crowded Babel of Galata and that north side of the Horn.

Through Galata we passed, I already cursing the journey: and, following the line of the coast and the great steep thoroughfare of Pera, we came at last, almost in the country, to a great wall, and the entrance to an immense terraced garden, whose limits were invisible, many of the trees and avenues being still intact.

I knew it at once: I had lain a special fuse-train in the great palace at the top of the terraces: it was the royal palace, Yildiz.

Up and up we went through the grounds, a few unburned old bodies in rags of uniform still discernible here and there as the lantern swung past them, a musician in sky-blue, a fantassin and officer-of-the-guard in scarlet, forming a cross, with domestics of the palace in red-and-orange.

The palace itself was quite in ruins, together with all its surrounding barracks, mosque, and seraglio, and, as we reached the top of the grounds, presented a picture very like those which I have seen of the ruins of Persepolis, only that here the columns, both standing and fallen, were innumerable, and all more or less blackened; and through doorless doors we passed, down immensely-wide short flights of steps, and up them, and over strewn courtyards, by tottering fragments of arcades, all roofless, and tracts of charcoal between interrupted avenues of pillars, I following, expectant, and she very eager now. Finally, down a flight of twelve or fourteen rather steep and narrow steps, very dislocated, we went to a level which, I thought, must be the floor of the palace vaults: for at the bottom of the steps we stood on a large plain floor of plaster, which bore the marks of the flames; and over this the girl ran a few steps, pointed with excited recognition to a hole in it, ran further, and disappeared down the hole.

When I followed, and lowered the lantern a little, I saw that the drop down was about eight feet, made less than six feet by a heap of stone-rubbish below, the falling of which had caused the hole: and it was by standing on this rubbish-heap, I knew at once, that she must have been enabled to climb out into the world.

I dropped down, and found myself in a low flat-roofed cellar, with a floor of black earth, very fusty and damp, but so very vast in extent that even in the day-time, I suppose, I could not have discerned its boundaries; I fancy, indeed, that it extends beneath the whole palace and its environs — an enormous stretch of space: with the lantern I could only see a very limited portion of its area. She still led me eagerly on, and I presently came upon a whole region of flat boxes, each about two feet square, and nine inches high, made of very thin laths, packed to the roof; and about a-hundred-and-fifty feet from these I saw, where she pointed, another region of bottles, fat-bellied bottles in chemises of wicker-work, stretching away into gloom and total darkness. The boxes, of which a great number lay broken open, as they can be by merely pulling with the fingers at a pliant crack, contain dates; and the bottles, of which many thousands lay empty, contain, I saw, old Ismidtwine. Some fifty or sixty casks, covered with mildew, some old pieces of furniture, and a great cube of rotting, curling parchments, showed that this cellar had been more or less loosely used for the occasional storage of superfluous stores and knick-knacks.

It was also more or less loosely used as a domestic prison. For in the lane between the region of boxes and the region of bottles, near the former, there lay on the ground the skeleton of a woman, the details of whose costume were still appreciable, with thin brass gyves on her wrists: and when I had examined her well, I knew the whole history of the creature standing silent by my side.

She is the daughter of the Sultan, as I assumed when I had once determined that the skeleton is both the skeleton of her mother, and the skeleton of the Sultana.

That the skeleton was her mother is clear: for the cloud occurred just twenty-one years since, and the dead woman was, of course, at that moment in the prison, which must have been air-tight, and with her the girl: but since the girl is quite certainly not much more than twenty — she looks younger — she must at that time have been either unborn or a young babe: but a babe would hardly be imprisoned with another than its own mother. I am rather inclined to think that the girl was unborn at the moment of the cloud, and was born in the cellar.

That the mother was the Sultana is clear from her fragments of dress, and the symbolic character of her every ornament, crescent earrings, heron-feather, and the blue campaca enamelled in a bracelet. This poor woman, I have thought, may have been the victim of some unbounded fit of imperial passion, incurred by some domestic crime, real or imagined, which may have been pardoned in a day had not death overtaken her master and the world.

There are four steep stone steps at about the centre of the cellar, leading up to a locked iron trap-door, apparently the only opening into this great hole: and this trap-door must have been so nearly air-tight as to bar the intrusion of the poison in anything like deadly quantity.

But how rare — how strange — the coincidence of chances here. For, if the trap-door was absolutely air-tight, I cannot think that the supply of oxygen in the cellar, large as it was, would have been sufficient to last the girl twenty years, to say nothing of what her mother used up before death: for I imagine that the woman must have continued to live some time in her dungeon, sufficiently long, at least, to teach her child to procure its food of dates and wine; so that the door must have been only just sufficiently hermetic to bar the poison, yet admit some oxygen; or else, the place may have been absolutely air-tight at the time of the cloud, and some crack, which I have not seen, opened to admit oxygen after the poison was dispersed: in any case — the all-but-infinite rarity of the chance!

Thinking these things I climbed out, and we walked to Pera, where I slept in a great white-stone house in five or six acres of garden overlooking the cemetery of Kassim, having pointed out to the girl another house in which to sleep.

This girl! what a history! After existing twenty years in a sunless world hardly three acres wide, she one day suddenly saw the only sky which she knew collapse at one point! a hole appeared into yet a world beyond! It was I who had come, and kindled Constantinople, and set her free.

Ah, I see something now! I see! it was for this that I was preserved: I to be a sort of new-fangled Adam — and this little creature to be my Eve! That is it! The White does not admit defeat: he would recommence the Race again! At the last, the eleventh hour — in spite of all — he would turn defeat into victory, and outwit that Other.

However, if this be so — and I seem to see it quite clearly — then in that White scheme is a singular flaw: at one point, it is obvious, that elaborate Forethought fails: for I have a free will — and I refuse, I refuse.

Certainly, in this matter I am on the side of the Black: and since it depends absolutely upon me, this time Black wins.

No more men on the earth after me, ye Powers! To you the question may be nothing more than a gambling excitement as to the final outcome of your aërial squabble: but to the poor men who had to bear the wrongs, Inquisitions, rack-rents, Waterloos, unspeakable horrors, it was hard earnest, you know! Oh the wretchedness — the deep, deep pain — of that bungling ant-hill, happily wiped out, my God! My sweetheart Clodagh ... she was not an ideal being! There was a man called Judas who betrayed the gentle Founder of the Christian Faith, and there was some Roman king named Galba, a horrid dog, and there was a French devil, Gilles de Raiz: and the rest were all much the same, much the same. Oh no, it was not a good race, that small infantry which called itself Man: and here, falling on my knees before God and Satan as I write, I swear, I swear: Never through me shall it spring and fester again.

I cannot realise her! Not at all, at all, at all! If she is out of my sight and hearing ten minutes, I fall to doubting her reality. If I lose her for half a day, all the old feelings, resembling certainties, come back, that I have only been dreaming — that this appearance cannot be an actual objective fact of life, since the impossible is impossible.

Seventeen long years, seventeen long years, of madness....

To-morrow I start for Imbros: and whether this girl chooses to follow me, or whether she stays behind, I will see her from the moment I land no more.

She must rise very early. I who am now regularly on the palace-roof at dawn, sometimes from between the pavilion-curtains of the galleries, or from the steps of the telescope-kiosk, may spy her far down below, a dainty microscopic figure, generally running about the sward, or gazing up in wonder at the palace from the lake-edge.

It is now three months since she came with me to Imbros.

I left her the first night in that pale-yellow house with the two green jalousies facing the beach, where there was everything that she would need; but I knew that, like all the houses there now, it leaked profusely, and the next day I went down to the curving stair, cut through the rock at the back and south of the village, climbed, and half a mile beyond found that park and villa with gables, which I had noted from the sea. The villa is almost intact, very strongly built of purplish marble, though small, and very like a Western house, with shingles, and three gables, so that I think it must have been the yali of some Englishman, for it contains a number of English books, though the only body I saw there was what looked like an Aararat Kurd, with spiral string wound down his turban, yellow ankle-pantaloons, and flung red shoulder-cloak; and all in the heavily-wooded park, and all about the low rock-steps up the hill, profusions of man-dragora; and from the rock-steps to the house a narrow long avenue of acacias, mossy underfoot, that mingle overhead, the house standing about four yards from the edge of the perpendicular sea-cliff, whence one can see the Speranzas main top-mast, and broken mizzen-mast-head, in her quiet haven. After examining the place I went down again to the village, and her house: but she was not there: and two hours long I paced about among the weeds of these amateur little alleys and flat-roofed windowless houses (though some have terrace-roofs, and a rare aperture), whose once-raw yellows, greens, and blues look now like sunset tints when the last flush is gone, and they fade dun. When at last she came running with open mouth, I took her up the rock-steps, and into the house, and there she has lived, one of the gable-tips, I now find (that overlooking the sea), being just visible from the north-east corner of the palace-roof, two miles from it.

That night again, when I was leaving her, she made an attempt to follow me. But I was resolved to end it, then: and cutting a sassafras-whip I cut her deep, three times, till she ran, crying.

So, then, what is my fate henceforth? — to think always, from sun to moon, and from moon to sun, of one only thing — and that thing an object for the microscope? — to become a sneaking Paul Pry to spy upon the silly movements of one little sparrow, like some fatuous motiveless gossip of old, his occupation to peep, his one faculty to scent, his honey and his achievement to unearth the infinitely unimportant? I would kill her first!

I am convinced that she is no stay-at-home, but roams continually over the island: for thrice, wandering myself, I have come upon her.

The first time she was running with flushed face, intent upon striking down a butterfly with a twig held in the left hand (for both hands she uses with dexterity). It was at about nine in the morning, in her park, near the bottom where there are high grass-growths and ferny luxuriance between the close tree-trunks, and shadow, and the broken wall of an old funeral-kiosk sunk aslant under moss, creepers, and wild flowers, behind which I peeped hidden and wet with dew. She has had the assurance to modify the dress I put upon her, and was herself a butterfly, for instead of the shintiyān, she had on a zouave, hardly reaching to the waist, of saffron satin, no feredjé, but a scarlet fez with violet tassel, and baggy pantaloons of azure silk; down her back the long auburn plait, quite neat, but all her front hair loose and wanton, the fez cocked backward, while I caught glimpses of her fugitive heels lifting out of the dropping slipper-sole. She is pretty clever, but not clever enough, for that butterfly escaped, and in one instant I saw her change into weary and sad, for on this earth is nothing more fickle than that Proteus face, which resembles a landscape swept with cloud-shadows on a bright day. Fast beat my heart that morning, owing to the consciousness that, while I saw, I was unseen, yet might be seen.

Another noontide, three weeks afterwards, I came upon her a good way up yonder to the west of the palace, sleeping on her arm in an alley between overgrown old trellises, where rioting wild vine buried her in gloom: but I had not been peeping through the bushes a minute, when she started up and looked wildly about, her quick consciousness, I imagine, detecting a presence: though I think that I managed to get away unseen. She keeps her face very dirty: all about her mouth was dry-stained with a polychrome of grape, mûrs, and other coloured juices, like slobbering gamins of old. I could also see that her nose and cheeks are now sprinkled with little freckles.

Four days since I saw her a third time, and then found that the primitive instinct to represent the world in pictures has been working in her: for she was drawing. It was down in the middle one of the three east-and-west village streets, for thither I had strolled toward evening, and coming out upon the street from between an old wall and a house, saw her quite near. I pulled up short — and peered. She was lying on her face all among grasses, a piece of yellow board before her, and in her fingers a chalk-splinter: and very intently she drew, her tongue-tip travelling along her short upper-lip from side to side, regularly as a pendulum, her fez tipped far back, and the left foot swinging upward from the knee. She had drawn her yali at the top, and now, as I could see by peering well forward, was drawing underneath the palace — from memory, for where she lay it is all hidden: yet the palace it was, for there were the waving lines meant for the steps, the two slanting pillars, the slanting battlements of the outer court, and before the portal, with turban reaching above the roof, and my two whisks of beard sweeping below the knees — myself.

Something spurred me, and I could not resist shouting a sudden “Hi!” whereupon she scrambled like a spring-bok to her feet, I pointing to the drawing, smiling.

This creature has a way of mincing her pressed lips, while she shakes the head, intensely cooing a fond laugh: and so she did then.

“You are a clever little wretch, you know,” said I, she cocking her eye, trying to divine my meaning with vague smile.

‘Oh, yes, a clever little wretch,’ I went on in a gruff voice, ‘clever as a serpent, no doubt: for in the first case it was the Black who used the serpent, but now it is the White. But it will not do, you know. Do you know what you are to me, you? You are my Eve! — a little fool, a little piebald frog like you. But it will not do at all, at all! A nice race it would be with you for mother, and me for father, wouldn’t it? — half-criminal like the father, half-idiot like the mother: just like the last, in short. They used to say, in fact, that the offspring of a brother and sister was always weak-headed: and from such a wedlock certainly came the human race, so no wonder it was what it was: and so it would have to be again now. Well no — unless we have the children, and cut their throats at birth: and you would not like that at all, I know, and, on the whole, it would not work, for the White would be striking a poor man dead with His lightning, if I attempted that. No, then: the modern Adam is some eight to twenty thousand years wiser than the first — you see? less instinctive, more rational. The first disobeyed by commission: I shall disobey by omission: only his disobedience was a sin, mine is a heroism. I have not been a particularly ideal sort of beast so far, you know: but in me, Adam Jeffson — I swear it — the human race shall at last attain a true nobility, the nobility of self-extinction. I shall turn out trumps: I shall prove myself stronger than Tendency, World-Genius, Providence, Currents of Fate, White Power, Black Power, or whatever is the name for it. No more Clodaghs, Lucrezia Borgias, Semiramises, Pompadours, Irish Landlords, Hundred-Years’ Wars — you see?’

She kept her left eye obliquely cocked like a little fool, wondering, no doubt, what I was saying.

‘And talking of Clodagh,’ I went on, ‘I shall call you that henceforth, to keep me reminded. So that is your name — not Eve — but Clodagh, who was a Poisoner, you see? She poisoned a poor man who trusted her: and that is your name now — not Eve, but Clodagh — to remind me, you most dangerous little speckled viper! And in order that I may no more see your foolish little pretty face, I decree that, for the future, you wear a yashmak to cover up your lips, which, I can see, were meant to be seductive, though dirty; and you can leave the blue eyes, and the little white-skinned freckled nose uncovered, if you like, they being commonplace enough. Meantime, if you care to see how to draw a palace — I will show you.’

Before I stretched my hand, she was presenting the board — so that she had guessed something of my meaning! But some hard tone in my talk had wounded her, for she presented it looking very glum, her under-lip pushing a little obliquely out, very pathetically, I must say, as always when she is just ready to cry.

In a few strokes I drew the palace, and herself standing at the portal between the pillars: and now great was her satisfaction, for she pointed to the sketched figure, and to herself, interrogatively: and when I nodded ‘yes,’ she went cooing her fond murmurous laugh, with pressed and mincing lips: and it is clear that, in spite of my beatings, she is in no way afraid of me.

Before I could move away, I felt some rain-drops, and down in some seconds rushed a shower. I looked, saw that the sky was rapidly darkening, and ran into the nearest of the little cubical houses, leaving her glancing sideways upward, with the quaintest artlessness of interest in the downpour: for she is not yet quite familiarised with the operations of nature, and seems to regard them with a certain amiable inquisitive seriousness, as though they were living beings, comrades as good as herself. She presently joined me, but even then stretched her hand out to feel the drops.

Now there came a thunder-clap, the wind was rising, and rain spattering about me: for the panes of these houses, made, I believe, of paper saturated in almond-oil, have long disappeared, and rains, penetrating by roof and rare window, splash the bones of men. I gathered up my skirts to run toward other shelter, but she was before me, saying in her strange experimental voice that word of hers: "Come."

She ran in advance, and I, with the outer robe over my head, followed, urging flinching way against the whipped rain-wash. She took the way by the stone horse-pond, through an alley to the left between two blind walls, then down a steep path through wood to the rock-steps, and up we ran, and along the hill, to her yali, which is a mile nearer the village than the palace, though by the time we pelted into its dry shelter we were wet to the skin.

Sudden darkness had come, but she quickly found some matches, lit one, looking at it with a certain meditative air, and applied it to a candle and to a bronze Western lamp on the table, which I had taught her to oil and light. Near a Western fire-place was a Turkish mangal, like one which she had seen me light to warm bath-waters in Constantinople, and when I pointed to it, she ran to the kitchen, returned with some chopped wood, and very cleverly lit it. And there for several hours I sat that night, reading (the first time for many years): it was a book by the poet Milton, found in a glazed book-case on the other side of the fire-place: and most strange, most novel, I found those august words about warring angels that night, while the storm raved: for this man had evidently taken no end of pains with his book, and done it gallantly well, too, making the thing hum: and I could not conceive why he should have been at that trouble — unless it were for the same reason that I built the palace, because some spark bites a man, and he would be like — but that is all vanity, and delusion.

Well, there is a rage in the storms of late years which really transcends bounds; I do not remember if I have noted it in these sheets before: but I never could have conceived a turbulence so huge. Hour after hour I sat there that night, smoking a chibouque, reading, and listening to the batteries and lamentations of that haunted air, shrinking from it, fearing even for the Speranza by her quay in the sequestered harbour, and for the palace-pillars. But what astonished me was that girl: for, after sitting on the ottoman to my left some time, she fell sideways asleep, not the least fear about her, though I should have thought that nervousness at such a turmoil would be so natural to her: and whence she has this light confidence in the world into which she has so abruptly come I do not know, for it is as though someone inspired her with the mood of nonchalance, saying: ‘Be of good cheer, and care not a pin about anything: for God is God.’

I heard the ocean swing hoarse like heavy ordnance against the cliffs below, where they meet the outer surface of the southern of the two claws of land that form the harbour: and the thought came into my mind: ‘If now I taught her to speak, to read, I could sometimes make her read a book to me.’

The winds seemed wilfully struggling for the house to snatch and wing it away into the drear Eternities of the night: and I could not but heave the sigh: ‘Alas for us two poor waifs and castaways of our race, little bits of flotsam and seaweed-hair cast up here a moment, ah me, on this shore of the Ages, soon to be dragged back, O turgid Eternity, into thy abysmal gorge; and upon what strand — who shall say? — shall she next be flung, and I, divided then perhaps by all the stretch of the trillion-distanced astral gulf?’

And such a pity, and a wringing of the heart, seemed in things, that a tear fell from my eyes that ominous midnight.

She started up at a gust of more appalling volume, rubbing her eyes, with dishevelled hair (it must have been about midnight), listening a minute, with that demure, droll interest of hers, to the noise of the elements, and then smiled to me; rose then, left the room, and presently returned with a pomegranate and some almonds on a plate, also some delicious old sweet wine in a Samian cruche, and an old silver cup, gilt inside, standing in a zarf. These she placed on the table near me, I murmuring: ‘Hospitality.’

She looked at the book, which I read as I ate, with lowered left eye-lid, seeking to guess its use, I suppose. Most things she understands at once, but this must have baffled her: for to see one looking fixedly at a thing, and not know what one is looking at it for, must be very disconcerting.

I held it up before her, saying:

“Shall I teach you to read it? If I did, how would you repay me, you Clodagh?”

She cocked her eyes, seeking to comprehend. God knows, at that moment I pitied the poor dumb waif, alone in all the whole round earth with me. The candle-flame, moved by the wind like a slow-painting brush, flickered upon her face, though every cranny was closed.

“Perhaps, then,” I said, “I will teach you. You are a pitiable little derelict of your race, you know: and two hours every day I will let you come to the palace, and I will teach you. But be sure, be careful. If there be danger, I will kill you: assuredly — without fail. And let me begin with a lesson now: say after me: ‘White.’”

I took her hand, and got her to understand that I wanted her to repeat after me.

“White,” said I.

“Hwhite,” said she.

‘Power,’ said I.

‘Pow-wer,’ said she.

‘White Power,’ said I.

‘Hwhite Pow-wer,’ said she.

‘Shall not,’ said I.

‘Sall not,’ said she.

‘White Power shall not,’ said I.

‘Hwhite Pow-wer sall not,’ said she.

‘Prevail,’ said I.

‘Fffail,’ said she, pronouncing the ‘v’ with a long fluttering ‘f’-sound.

‘Pre-vail,’ said I.

‘Pe-vvvail,’ said she.

‘White Power shall not prevail,’ said I.

‘Hwhite Pow-wer sall not — fffail,’ said she.

A thunder which roared as she said it seemed to me to go laughing through the universe, and a minute I looked upon her face with positive shrinking fear; till, starting up, I thrust her with violence from my path, and dashed forth to re-seek the palace and my bed.

Such was the ingratitude and fatality which my first attempt, four nights since, to teach her met with. It remains to be seen whether my pity for her dumbness, or some servile tendency toward fellowship in myself, will result in any further lesson. Certainly, I think not: for though I have given my word, the most solemnly-pledged word may be broken.

Surely, surely, her presence in the world with me — for I suppose it is that — has wrought some profound changes in my mood: for gone now apparently are those turbulent hours when, stalking like a peacock, I flaunted my monarchy in the face of the Eternal Powers, with hissed blasphemies; or else dribbled, shaking my body in a lewd dance; or was off to fire some vast city and revel in redness and the chucklings of Hell; or rolled in the drunkenness of drugs. It was mere frenzy! — I see it now — it was ‘not good,’ ‘not good.’ And it rather looks as if it were past — or almost. I have clipped my beard and hair, removed the earrings, and thought of modifying my attire. I will just watch to see whether she comes loitering down there about the gate of the lake.

Her progress is like....

It is nine months since I have written, on these sheets, those words, ‘Her progress is like....’ being the beginning of some narrative in which something interrupted me: and since then I have had no impulse to write.

But I was thinking just now of the curious tricks and uncertainties of my memory, and seeing the sheets, will record it here. I have lately been trying to recall the name of a sister of mine — some perfectly simple name, I know — and the name of my old home in England: and they have completely passed out of my cognizance, though she was my only sister, and we grew up closely together: some quite simple name, I forget it now. Yet I can’t say that my memory is bad: there are things — quite unexpected, unimportant things — which come up in my mind with considerable clearness. For instance, I remember to have met in Paris (I think), long before the poison-cloud, a little Brazilian boy of the colour of weak coffee-and-milk, of whom she now constantly reminds me. He wore his hair short like a convict’s, so that one could spy the fish-white flesh beneath, and delighted to play solitary about the stairs of the hotel, dressed up in the white balloon-dress of a Pierrot. I have the impression now that he must have had very large ears. Clever as a flea he was, knowing five or six languages, as it were by nature, without having any suspicion that that was at all extraordinary. She has that same light, unconscious, and nonchalant cleverness, and easy way of life. It is little more than a year since I began to teach her, and already she can speak English with a quite considerable vocabulary, and perfect correctness (except that she does not pronounce the letter 'r'); she has also read, or rather devoured, a good many books; and can write, draw, and play the harp. And all she does without effort: rather with the flighty naturalness with which a bird takes to the wing.

What made me teach her to read was this: One afternoon, fourteen months or so ago, I from the roof-kiosk saw her down at the lake-rim, a book in hand; and as she had seen me looking steadily at books, so she was looking steadily at it, with pathetic sideward head: so that I burst into laughter, for I saw her clearly through the glass, and whether she is the simplest little fool, or the craftiest serpent that ever breathed, I am not yet sure. If I thought that she has the least design upon my honour, it would be ill for her.

I went to Gallipoli for two days in the month of May, and brought back a very pretty little caique, a perfect slender crescent of the colour of the moon, though I had two days' labour in cutting through bush-thicket for the passage of the motor in bringing it up to the lake. It has pleased me to see her lie among the silk cushions of the middle, while I, paddling, taught her her first words and sentences between the hours of eight and ten in the evening, though later they became 10 A.M. to noon, when the reading began, we sitting on the palace-steps before the portal, her mouth invariably well covered with the yashmak, the lesson-book being a large-lettered old Bible found at her yali. Why she must needs wear the yashmak she has never once asked; and how much she divines, knows, or intends, I have no idea, continually questioning myself as to whether she is all simplicity, or all cunning.

That she is conscious of some profound difference in our organisation I cannot doubt: for that I have a long beard, and she none at all, is among the most patent of facts.

I have thought that a certain Western-ness — a growing modernity of tone — may be the result, as far as I am concerned, of her presence with me? I do not know....

There is the gleam of a lake-end just visible in the north forest from the palace-top, and in it a good number of fish like carp, tench, roach, etc., so in May I searched for a tackle-shop in the Gallipoli Fatmeh-bazaar, and got four 12-foot rods, with reels, silk-line, quill-floats, a few yards of silk-worm gut, with a packet of No. 7 and 8 hooks, and split-shot for sinkers; and since red-worms, maggots and gentles are common on the island, I felt sure of a great many more fish than the number I wanted, which was none at all. However, for the mere amusement, I fished several times, lying at my length in a patch of long-grass over-waved by an enormous cedar, where the bank is steep, and the water deep. And one mid-afternoon she was suddenly there with me, questioned me with her eyes, and when I consented, stayed: and presently I said I would teach her bottom-angling, and sent her flying up to the palace for another rod and tackle.

That day she did nothing, for after teaching her to thread the worm, and put the gentles on the smaller hooks, I sent her to hunt for worms to chop up for ground-baiting the pitch for the next afternoon; and when this was done it was dinner-time, and I sent her home, for by then I was giving the reading-lessons in the morning.

The next day I found her at the bank, taught her to take the sounding for adjusting the float, and she lay down not far from me, holding the rod. So I said to her:

‘Well, this is better than living in a dark cellar twenty years, with nothing to do but walk up and down, sleep, and consume dates and Ismidt wine.’

‘Yes!’ says she.

‘Twenty years!’ said I: ‘How did you bear it?’

‘I was not closs,’ says she.

‘Did you never suspect that there was a world outside that cellar?’ said

I.

‘Never,’ says she, ‘or lather, yes: but I did not suppose that it was this world, but another where he lived.’

‘He who?’

‘He who spoke with me.’

‘Who was that?’

‘Oh! a bite!’ she screamed gladly.

I saw her float bob under, and started up, rushed to her, and taught her how to strike and play it, though it turned out when landed to be nothing but a tiny barbel: but she was in ecstasies, holding it on her palm, murmuring her fond coo.

She re-baited, and we lay again. I said:

‘But what a life: no exit, no light, no prospect, no hope—’

‘Plenty of hope!’ says she.

‘Good Heavens! hope of what?’

‘I knew vely well that something was lipening over the cellar, or under, or aloud it, and would come to pass at a certain fixed hour, and that I should see it, and feel it, and it would be vely nice.’

‘Ah, well, you had to wait for it, at any rate. Didn’t those twenty years seem long?’

‘No — at least sometimes — not often. I was always so occupied.’

‘Occupied in doing what?’

‘In eating, or dlinking, or lunning, or talking.’

‘Talking to yourself?’

‘Not myself.’

‘To whom, then?’

‘To the one who told me when I was hungry, and put the dates to satisfy my hunger.’

‘I see. Don’t wriggle about in that way, or you will never catch any fish. The maxim of angling is: “Study to be quiet”—’

‘O! another bite!’ she called, and this time, all alone, very agilely landed a good-sized bream.

‘But do you mean that you were never sad?’ said I when she was re-settled.

‘Sometimes I would sit and cly,’ says she— ‘I did not know why. But if that was “sadness,” I was never miserlable, never, never. And if I clied, it did not last long, and I would soon fall to sleep, for he would lock me in his lap, and kiss me, and wipe all my tears away.’

‘He who?’

‘Why, what a question! he who told me when I was hungry, and of the thing that was lipening outside the cellar, which would be so nice.’

‘I see, I see. But in all that dingy place, and thick gloom, were you never at all afraid?’

‘Aflaid! I! of what?’

‘Of the unknown.’

‘I do not understand you. How could I be aflaid? The known was the very opposite of tellible: it was merely hunger and dates, thirst and wine, the desire to lun and space to lun in, the desire to sleep and sleep: there was nothing tellible in that: and the unknown was even less tellible than the known: for it was the nice thing that was lipening outside the cellar. I do not understand—’

‘Ah, yes,’ said I, ‘you are a clever little being: but your continual fluttering about is fatal to all angling. Isn’t it in your nature to keep still a minute? And with regard now to your habits in the cellar — ?’

‘Another!’ she cried with happy laugh, and landed a young chub. And that afternoon she caught seven, and I none.

Another day I took her from the pitch to one of the kitchens in the village with some of the fish, till then always thrown away, and taught her cooking: for the only cooking-implement in the palace is the silver alcohol-lamp for coffee and chocolate. We both scrubbed the utensils, and boil and fry I taught her, and the making of a sauce from vinegar, bottled olives, and the tinned American butter from the Speranza, and the boiling of rice mixed with flour for ground-baiting our pitch. And she, at first astonished, was soon all deft housewifeliness, breathless officiousness, and behind my back, of her own intuitiveness, grated some dry almonds found there, and with them sprinkled the fried tench. And we ate them, sitting on the floor together: the first new food, I suppose, tasted by me for twenty-one years: nor did I find it disagreeable.

The next day she came up to the palace reading a book, which turned out to be a cookery-book in English, found at her yali; and a week later, she appeared, out of hours, presenting me a yellow-earthenware dish containing a mess of gorgeous colours — a boiled fish under red peppers, bits of saffron, a greenish sauce, and almonds: but I turned her away, and would have none of her, or her dish.

About a mile up to the west of the palace is a very old ruin in the deepest forest, I think of a mosque, though only three truncated internal pillars under ivy, and the weedy floor, with the courtyard and portal-steps remain, before it being a long avenue of cedars, gently descending from the steps, the path between the trees choked with long-grass and wild rye reaching to my middle. Here I saw one day a large disc of old brass, bossed in the middle, which may have been either a shield or part of an ancient cymbal, with concentric rings graven round it, from centre to circumference. The next day I brought some nails, a hammer, a saw, and a box of paints from the Speranza; and I painted the rings in different colours, cut down a slim lime-trunk, nailed the thin disc along its top, and planted it well, before the steps: for I said I would make a bull's-eye, and do rifle and revolver practice before it, from the avenue. And this the next evening I was doing at four hundred feet, startling the island, it seemed, with that unusual noise, when up she came peering with enquiring face: at which I was very angry, because my arm, long unused, was firing wide: but I was too proud to say anything, and let her look, and soon she understood, laughing every time I made a considerable miss, till at last I turned upon her saying: 'If you think it so easy, you may try.'

She had been wanting to try, for she came eagerly to the offer, and after I had opened and showed her the mechanism, the cartridges, and how to shoot, I put into her hands one of the Speranza Colt's. She took her bottom-lip between her teeth, shut her left eye, vaulted out the revolver like an old shot to the level of her intense right eye, and sent a ball through the geometrical centre of the boss.

However, it was a fluke-shot, for I had the satisfaction of seeing her miss every one of the other five, except the last, which hit the black. That, however, was three weeks since, and now my hitting record is forty per cent., and hers ninety-six — most extraordinary: so that it is clear that this creature is the protégée of someone, and favouritism is in the world.

Her book of books is the Old Testament. Sometimes, at noon or afternoon, I may look abroad from the roof or galleries, and see a remote figure sitting on the sward under the shade of plane or black cypress: and I always know that the book she cons there is the Bible — like an old Rabbi. She has a passion for stories: and there finds a store.

Three nights since when it was pretty late, and the moon very splendid, I saw her passing homewards close to the lake, and shouted down to her, meaning to say ‘Good-night’; but she thought that I had called her, and came: and sitting out on the top step we talked for hours, she without the yashmak.

We fell to talking about the Bible. And says she: ‘What did Cain to Abel?’

‘He knocked him over,’ I replied, liking sometimes to use such idioms, with the double object of teaching and perplexing her.

‘Over what?’ says she.

‘Over his heels,’ said I.

‘I do not complehend!’

‘He killed him, then.’

‘That I know. But how did Abel feel when he was killed? What is it to be killed?’

‘Well,’ said I, ‘you have seen bones all around you, and the bones of your mother, and you can feel the bones in your fingers. Your fingers will become mere bone after you are dead, as die you must. Those bones which you see around you, are, of course, the bones of the men of whom we often ‘speak: and the same thing happened to them which happens to a fish or a butterfly when you catch them, and they lie all still.’

‘And the men and the butterfly feel the same after they are dead?’

‘Precisely the same. They lie in a deep drowse, and dream a nonsense-dream.’

‘That is not dleadful. I thought that it was much more dleadful. I should not mind dying.’

‘Ah!... so much the better: for it is possible that you may have to die a great deal sooner than you think.’

‘I should not mind. Why were men so vely aflaid to die?’

‘Because they were all such shocking cowards.’

‘Oh, not all! not all!’

(This girl, I know not with what motive, has now definitely set herself up against me as the defender of the dead race. With every chance she is at it.)

‘Nearly all,’ said I: ‘tell me one who was not afraid—’

‘There was Isaac,’ says she: ‘when Ablaham laid him on the wood to kill him, he did not jump up and lun to hide.’

‘Isaac was a great exception,’ said I: ‘in the Bible and such books, you understand, you read of only the best sorts of people; but there were millions and millions of others — especially about the time of the poison-cloud — on a very much lower level — putrid wretches — covetous, false, murderous, mean, selfish, debased, hideous, diseased, making the earth a very charnel of festering vices and crimes.’

This, for several minutes, she did not answer, sitting with her back half toward me, cracking almonds, continually striking one step with the ball of her outstretched foot. In the clarid gold of the platform I saw her fez and corals reflected as an elongated blotch of florid red. She turned and drank some wine from the great gold Jarvan goblet which I had brought from the temple of Boro Budor, her head quite covered in by it. Then, the little hairs at her lip-corners still wet, says she:

‘Vices and climes, climes and vices. Always the same. What were these climes and vices?’

‘Robberies of a hundred sorts, murders of ten hundred—’

‘But what made them do them?’

‘Their evil nature — their base souls.’

‘But you are one of them, I am another: yet you and I live here together, and we do no vices and climes.’

Her astounding shrewdness! Right into the inmost heart of a matter does her simple wit seem to pierce!

‘No,’ I said, ‘we do no vices and crimes, because we lack motive. There is no danger that we should hate each other, for we have plenty to eat and drink, dates, wines, and thousands of things. (Our danger is rather the other way.) But they hated and schemed, because they were very numerous, and there arose a question among them of dates and wine.’

‘Was there not, then, enough land to grow dates and wine for all?’

‘There was — yes: much more than enough, I fancy. But some got hold of a vast lot of it, and as the rest felt the pinch of scarcity, there arose, naturally, a pretty state of things — including the vices and crimes.’

‘Ah, but then,’ says she, ‘it was not to their bad souls that the vices and climes were due, but only to this question of land. It is certain that if there had been no such question, there would have been no vices and climes, because you and I, who are just like them, do no vices and climes here, where there is no such question.’

The clear limelight of her intelligence! She wriggled on her seat in her effort of argument.

‘I am not going to argue the matter,’ I said. ‘There was that question of dates and wine, you see. And there always must be on an earth where millions of men, with varying degrees of cunning, reside.’

‘Oh, not at all necessarily!’ she cries with conviction: ‘not at all, at all: since there are much more dates and wine than are enough for all. If there should spring up more men now, having the whole wisdom, science, and experience of the past at their hand, and they made an arrangement among themselves that the first man who tried to take more than he could work for should be killed, and sent to glean a nonsense-glean, the question could never again arise!’

‘It arose before — it would arise again.’

‘But no! I can guess clearly how it arose before: it arose through the sheer carelessness of the first men. The land was at first so very, very much more than enough for all, that the men did not take the trouble to make an arrangement among themselves; and afterwards the habit of carelessness was confirmed; till at last the very original carelessness must have got to have the look of an arrangement; and so the stream which began in a little long ended in a big long, the long growing more and more fixed and fatal as the stream lrolled further from the source. I see it clearly, can’t you? But now, if some more men would spring, they would be taught—’

‘Ah, but no more men will spring, you see — !’

‘There is no telling. I sometimes feel as if they must, and shall. The trees blossom, the thunder rolls, the air makes me run and leap, the ground is full of richness, and I hear the voice of the Lord God walking all among the trees of the forests.’

As she said this, I saw her under-lip push out and tremble, as when she is near to crying, and her eyes moisten: but a moment after she looked at me full, and smiled, so mobile is her face: and as she looked, it suddenly struck me what a noble temple of a brow the creature has, almost pointed at the uplifted summit, and widening down like a bell-curved Gothic arch, draped in strings of frizzy hair which anon she shakes backward with her head.

‘Clodagh,’ I said after some minutes— ‘do you know why I called you Clodagh?’

‘No? Tell me?’

‘Because once, long ago before the poison-cloud, I had a lover called Clodagh: and she was a....’

‘But tell me first,’ cries she: ‘how did one know one’s lover, or one’s wife, from all the others?’

‘Well, by their faces....’

‘But there must have been many faces — all alike—’

‘Not all alike. Each was different from the rest.’

‘Still, it must have been very clever to tell. I can hardly conceive any face, except yours and mine.’

‘Ah, because you are a little goose, you see.’

‘What was a goose like?’

‘It was a thing like a butterfly, only larger, and it kept its toes always spread out, with a skin stretched between.’

‘Leally? How capricious! And am I like that? — but what were you saying that your lover, Clodagh, was?’

‘She was a Poisoner.’

‘Then why call me Clodagh, since I am not a poisoner?’

‘I call you so to remind me: lest you — lest you — should become my — lover, too.’

‘I am your lover already: for I love you.’

‘What, girl?’

‘Do I not love you, who are mine?’

‘Come, come, don’t be a little maniac!’ I went. ‘Clodagh was a poisoner....’

‘Why did she poison? Had she not enough dates and wine?’

‘She had, yes: but she wanted more, more, more, the silly idiot.’

‘So that the vices and climes were not confined to those that lacked things, but were done by the others, too?’

‘By the others chiefly.’

‘Then I see how it was!’

‘How was it?’

‘The others had got spoiled. The vices and climes must have begun with those who lacked things, and then the others, always seeing vices and climes alound them, began to do them, too — as when one rotten olive is in a bottle, the whole mass soon becomes collupted: but originally they were not rotten, but only became so. And all though a little carelessness at the first. I am sure that if more men could spling now—’

‘But I told you, didn’t I, that no more men will spring? You understand, Clodagh, that originally the earth produced men by a long process, beginning with a very low type of creature, and continually developing it, until at last a man stood up. But that can never happen again: for the earth is old, old, and has lost her producing vigour now. So talk no more of men splinging, and of things which you do not understand. Instead, go inside — stop, I will tell you a secret: to-day in the wood I picked some musk-roses and wound them into a wreath, meaning to give them you for your head when you came to-morrow: and it is inside on the pearl tripod in the second room to the left: go, therefore, and put it on, and bring the harp, and play to me, my dear.’

She ran quick with a little cry, and coming again, sat crowned, incarnadine in the blushing depths of the gold. Nor did I send her home to her lonely yali, till the pale and languished moon, weary of all-night beatitudes, sank down soft-couched in quilts of curdling opals to the Hesperian realms of her rest.

So sometimes we speak together, she and I, she and I.

That ever I should write such a thing! I am driven out from Imbros!

I was walking up in a wood yesterday to the west — it was a calm clear evening about seven, the sun having just set. I had the book in which I have written so far in my hand, for I had thought of making a sketch of an old windmill to the north-west to show her. Twenty minutes before she had been with me, for I had chanced to meet her, and she had come, but kept darting on ahead after peeping fruit, gathering armfuls of amaranth, nenuphar, and red-berried asphodel, till, weary of my life, I had called to her: ‘Go away! out of my sight’ — and she, with suddenly pushed under-lip, had walked off.

Well, I was continuing my stroll, when I seemed to feel some quaking of the ground, and before one could count twenty, it was as if the island was bent upon wracking itself to pieces. My first thought was of her, and in great scare I went running, calling in the direction which she had gone, staggering as on the deck of some labouring ship, falling, picking myself up, running again. The air was quite full of uproar, and the land waving like the sea: and as I went plunging, not knowing whither, I saw to my right some three or four acres of forest droop and sink into a gulf which opened to receive them. Up I flung my arms, crying out: ‘Good God! save the girl!’ and a minute later rushed out, to my surprise, into open space on a hill-side. On the lower ground I could see the palace, and beyond it, a small space of white sea which had the awful appearance of being higher than the land. Down the hill-side I staggered, driven by the impulse to fly somewhither, but about half way down was startled afresh by a shrill pattering like musical hail, and the next moment saw the entire palace rush with the jangling clatter of a thousand bells into the heaving lake.

Some seconds after this, the earthquake, having lasted fully ten minutes, began to lull, and soon ceased. I found her an hour later standing among the ruins of her little yali.

Well, what a thing! Probably every building on the island has been destroyed; the palace-platform, all cracked, leans half-sunken askew into the lake, like a huge stranded ark, while of the palace itself no trace remains, except a mound of gold stones emerging above the lake to the south. Gone, gone — sixteen years of vanity and vexation. But from a practical point of view, what is a worst calamity of all is that the Speranza now lies high-and-dry in the village: for she was bodily picked up from the quay by the tidal wave, and driven bow-foremost into a street not half her width, and there now lies, looking huge enough in the little village, wedged for ever, smashed in at the nip like a frail match-box, a most astonishing spectacle: her bows forty feet up the street, ten feet above the ground at the stem, rudder resting on the inner edge of the quay, foremast tilted forward, the other two masts all right, and that bottom, which has passed through seas so far, buried in every sort of green and brown seaweed, the old Speranza. Her steps were there, and by a slight leap I could catch them underneath and go up hand-over-hand, till I got foothold; this I did at ten the same night when the sea-water had mostly drained back from the land, leaving everything very swampy, however; she there with me, and soon following me upon the ship. I found most things cracked into tiny fragments, twisted, disfigured out of likeness, the house-walls themselves displaced a little at the nip, the bow of the cedar skiff smashed in to her middle against the aft starboard corner of the galley; and were it not for the fact that the air-pinnace had not broken from her heavy ropings, and one of the compasses still whole, I do not know what I should have done: for the four old water-logged boats in the cove have utterly disappeared.

I made her sleep on the cabin-floor amid the débris of berth and everything, and I myself slept high up in the wood to the west. I am writing now lying in the long-grass the morning after, the sun rising, though I cannot see him. My plan for to-day is to cut three or four logs with the saw, lay them on the ground by the ship, lower the pinnace upon them, so get her gradually down into the water, and by evening bid a long farewell to Imbros, which drives me out in this way. Still, I look forward with pleasure to our hour's run to the Mainland, when I shall teach her to steer by the compass, and manipulate liquid-air, as I have taught her to dress, to talk, to cook, to write, to think, to live. For she is my creation, this creature: as it were, a 'rib from my side.'

But what is the design of this expulsion? And what was it that she called it last night?— 'this new going out from Halan'! 'Haran,' I believe, being the place from which Abraham went out, when 'called' by God.

We apparently felt only the tail of the earthquake at Imbros: for it has ravaged Turkey! And we two poor helpless creatures put down here in the theatre of all these infinite violences: it is too bad, too bad. For the rages of Nature at present are perfectly astonishing, and what it may come to I do not know. When we came to the Macedonian coast in good moonlight, we sailed along it, and up the Dardanelles, looking out for village, yali, or any habitation where we might put up: but everything has apparently been wrecked. We saw Kilid-Bahr, Chanak-Kaleh, Gallipoli, Lapsaki in ruins; at the last place I landed, leaving her in the boat, and walked a little way, but soon went back with the news that there was not even a bazaar-arch left standing whole, in most parts even the line of the streets being obliterated, for the place had fallen like a house of dice, and had then been shaken up and jumbled. Finally we slept in a forest on the other side of the strait, beyond Gallipoli, taking our few provisions, and having to wade at some points through morass a foot deep before we reached dry woodland.

Here, the next morning, I sat alone — for we had slept separated by at least half a mile — thinking out the question of whither I should go: my choice would have been to remain either in the region where I was, or to go Eastward: but the region where I was offered no dwelling that I could see; and to go any distance Eastward, I needed a ship. Of ships I had seen during the night only wrecks, nor did I know where to find one in all these latitudes. I was thus, like her ‘Ablaham,’ urged Westward.

In order, then, to go Westward, I first went a little further Eastward, once more entered the Golden Horn, and once more mounted the scorched Seraglio steps. Here what the wickedness of man had spared, the wickedness of Nature had destroyed, and the few houses which I had left standing round the upper part of Pera I now saw low as the rest; also the house near the Suleimanieh, where we had lived our first days, to which I went as to a home, I found without a pillar standing; and that night she slept under the half-roof of a little funeral-kiosk in the scorched cypress-wood of Eyoub, and I a mile away, at the edge of the forest where first I saw her.

The next morning, having met, as agreed, at the site of the Prophet’s mosque, we traversed together the valley and cemetery of Kassim by the quagmires up to Pera, all the landscape having to me a rather twisted unfamiliar aspect. We had determined to spend the morning in searching for supplies among the earthquake-ruins of Pera; and as I had decided to collect sufficient in one day to save us further pains for some time, we passed a good many hours in this task, I confining myself to the great white house in the park overlooking Kassim, where I had once slept, losing myself in the huge obliquities of its floors, roofs and wall-fragments, she going to the old Mussulman quarter of Djianghir near, on the heights of Taxim, where were many shops, and thence round the brow of the hill to the great French Embassy-house, overlooking Foundoucli and the sea, both of us having large Persian carpet-bags, and all in the air of that wilderness of ruin that morning a sweet, strong, permanent odour of maple-blossom.

We met toward evening, she quivering under such a load, that I would not let her carry it, but abandoned my day's labour, which was lighter, and took hers, which was quite enough: we went back Westward, seeking all the while some shelter from the saturating night-dews of this place: and nothing could we find, till we came again, quite late, to her broken funeral-kiosk at the entrance to the immense cemetery-avenue of Eyoub. There without a word I left her among the shattered catafalques, for I was weary; but having gone some distance, turned back, thinking that I might take some more raisins from the bag; and after getting them, said to her, shaking her little hand where she sat under the roof-shadow on a stone:

‘Good-night, Clodagh.’

She did not answer promptly: and her answer, to my surprise, was a protest against her name: for a rather sulky, yet gentle, voice came from the darkness, saying:

‘I am not a Poisoner!’

‘Well,’ said I, ‘all right: tell me whatever you like that I should call you, and henceforth I will call you that.’

‘Call me Eve,’ says she.

‘Well, no,’ said I, ‘not Eve, anything but that: for my name is Adam, and if I called you Eve, that would be simply absurd, and we do not want to be ridiculous in each other's eyes. But I will call you anything else that you like.'

'Call me Leda,' says she.

'And why Leda?' said I.

'Because Leda sounds something like Clodagh,' says she, 'and you are al-ready in the habit of calling me Clodagh; and I saw the name Leda in a book, and liked it: but Clodagh is most horrible, most bitterly horrible!'

'Well, then,' said I, 'Leda it shall be, and I shan't forget, for I like it, too, and it suits you, and you ought to have a name beginning with an "L." Good-night, my dear, sleep well, and dream, dream.'

'And to you, too, my God give dreams of peace and pleasantness,' says she; and I went.

And it was only when I had lain myself upon leaves for my bed, my head on my caftan, a rill for my lullaby, and two stars, which alone I could see out of the heavenful, for my watch-lights; and only when my eyes were already closed toward slumber, that a sudden strong thought pierced and woke me: for I remembered that Leda was the name of a Greek woman who had borne twins. In fact, I should not be surprised if this Greek word Leda is the same word etymologically as the Hebrew Eve, for I have heard of v's, and b's, and d's interchanging about in this way, and if Di, meaning God, or Light, and Bi, meaning Life, and Iove, and Ihovah and God, meaning much the same, are all one, that would be nothing astonishing to me, as widow, and veuve, are one: and where it says, 'truly the Light is Good (tob, bon),' this is as if it said, 'truly the Di is Di.' Such, at any rate, is the fatality that attends me, even in the smallest things: for this Western Eve, or Greek Leda, had twins.

Well, the next morning we crossed by the ruins of old Greek Phanar across the triple Stamboul-wall, which still showed its deep-ivied portal, and made our way, not without climbing, along the Golden Horn to the foot of the Old Seraglio, where I soon found signs of the railway. And that minute commenced our journey across Turkey, Bulgaria, Servia, Bosnia, Croatia, to Trieste, occupying no day or two as in old times, but four months, a long-drawn nightmare, though a nightmare of rich happiness, if one may say so, leaving on the memory a vague vast impression of monstrous ravines, ever-succeeding profundities, heights and greatnesses, jungles strange as some moon-struck poet's fantasy, everlasting glooms, and a sound of mighty unseen rivers, cataracts, and slow cumbered rills whose bulrushes never see the sun, with largesse everywhere, secrecies, profusions, the unimaginable, the unspeakable, a savagery most lush and fierce and gaudy, and vales of Arcadie, and remote mountain-peaks, and tarns shy as old-buried treasure, and glaciers, and we two human folk pretty small and drowned and lost in all that amplitude, yet moving always through it.

We followed the lines that first day till we came to a steam train, and I found the engine fairly good, and everything necessary to move it at my hand: but the metals in such a condition of twisted, broken, vaulted, and buried confusion, due to the earthquake, that, having run some hundreds of yards to examine them, I saw that nothing could be done in that way. At first this threw me into a condition like despair, for what we were to do I did not know: but after persevering on foot for four days along the deep-rusted track, which is of that large-gauge type peculiar to Eastern Europe, I began to see that there were considerable sound stretches, and took heart.

I had with me land-charts and compass, but nothing for taking altitude-observations: for the Speranza instruments, except one compass, had all been broken-up by her shock. However, on getting to the town of Silivri, about thirty miles from our start, I saw in the ruins of a half-standing bazaar-shop a number of brass objects, and there found several good sextants, quadrants, and theodolites. Two mornings later, we came upon an engine in mid-country, with coals in it, and a stream near; I had a goat-skin of almond-oil in the bag, and found the machinery serviceable after an hour's careful inspection, having examined the boiler with a candle through the manhole, and removed the autoclaves of the heaters. All was red with rust, and the shaft of the connecting-rod in particular seemed so frail, that at one moment I was very dubious: I decided, however, and, except for a slight leakage at the tubulure which led the steam to the valve-chest, all went very well; at a pressure never exceeding three-and-a-half atmospheres, we travelled nearly a hundred and twenty miles before being stopped by a head-to-head block on the line, when we had to abandon our engine; we then continued another seven miles a-foot, I all the time mourning my motor, which I had had to leave at Imbros, and hoping at every townlet to find a whole one, but in vain.

It was wonderful to see the villages and towns going back to the earth, already invaded by vegetation, and hardly any longer breaking the continuity of pure Nature, the town now as much the country as the country, and that which is not-Man becoming all in all with a certain furore of vigour. A whole day in the southern gorges of the Balkan Mountains the slow train went tearing its way through many a mile of bind-weed tendrils, a continuous curtain, flaming with large flowers, but sombre as the falling shades of night, rather resembling jungles of Ceylon and the Filipinas; and she, that day, lying in the single car behind, where I had made her a little yatag-bed from Tatar Bazardjik, continually played the kittur, barely touching the strings, and crooning low, low, in her rich contralto, eternally the same air, over and over again, crooning, crooning, some melancholy tune of her own dreaming, just audible to me through the slow-travailing monotony of the engine; till I was drunken with so sweet a woe, my God, a woe that was sweet as life, and a dolour that lulled like nepenthe, and a grief that soothed like kisses, so sweet, so sweet, that all that world of wood and gloom lost locality and realness for me, and became nothing but a charmed and pensive Heaven for her to moan and lullaby in; and from between my fingers streamed plenteous tears that day, and all that I could keep on mourning was ‘O Leda, O Leda, O Leda,’ till my heart was near to break.

The feed-pump eccentric-shaft of this engine, which was very poor and flaky, suddenly gave out about five in the afternoon, and I had to stop in a hurry, and that sweet invisible mechanism which had crooned and crooned about my ears in the air, and followed me whithersoever I went, stopped too. Down she jumped, calling out:

‘Well, I had a plesentiment that something would happen, and I am so glad, for I was tired!’

Seeing that nothing could be done with the feed-water pump, I got down, took the bag, and parting before us the continuous screen, we went pioneering to the left between a rock-cleft, stepping over large stones that looked black with moss-growths, no sky, but hundreds of feet of impenetrable leafage overhead, and everywhere the dew-dabbled profusion of dim ferneries, dishevelled maidenheads mixed with a large-leaved mimosa, wild vine, white briony, and a smell of cedar, and a soft rushing of perpetual waters that charmed the gloaming. The way led slightly upwards three hundred feet, and presently, after some windings, and the climbing of five huge steps almost regular, yet obviously natural, the gorge opened in a roundish space, fifty feet across, with far overhanging edges seven hundred feet high; and there, behind a curtain which fell from above, its tendrils defined and straight like a Japanese bead-hanging, we spread the store of foods, I opening the wines, fruits, vegetables and meats, she arranging them in order with the gold plate, and lighting both the spirit-lamp and the lantern: for here it was quite dark. Near us behind the curtain of tendrils was a small green cave in the rock, and at its mouth a pool two yards wide, a black and limpid water that leisurely wheeled, discharging a little rivulet from the cave: and in it I saw three owl-eyed fish, a finger long, loiter, and spur themselves, and gaze. Leda, who cannot be still in tongue or limb, chattered in her glib baby manner as we ate, and then, after smoking a cigarette, said that she would go and ‘lun,’ and went, and left me darkling, for she is the sun and the moon and the host of the stars, I occupying myself that night in making a calendar at the end of this book in which I have written, for my almanack and many things that I prized were lost with the palace — making a calendar, counting the days in my head — but counting them across my thoughts of her.

She came again to tell me good-night, and then went down to the train to sleep; and I put out the lantern, and stooped within the cave, and made my simple couch beside the little rivulet, and slept.

But a fitful sleep, and soon again I woke; and a long time I lay so, gradually becoming conscious of a slow dripping at one spot in the cave: for at a minute’s interval it darkly splashed, regularly, very deliberately; and it seemed to grow always louder and sadder, and the splash at first was ‘Leesha,’ but it became ‘Leda’ to my ears, and it sobbed her name, and I pitied myself, so sad was I. And when I could no longer bear the anguished melancholy of its spasm and its sobbing, I arose and went softly, softly, lest she should hear in that sounding silence of the hushed and darksome night, going more slow, more soft, as I went nearer, a sob in my throat, my feet leading me to her, till I touched the carriage. And against it a long time I leant my clammy brow, a sob aching in my poor throat, and she all mixed up in my head with the suspended hushed night, and with the elfin things in the air that made the silence so musically a-sound to the vacant ear-drum, and with the dripping splash in the cave. And softly I turned the door-handle, and heard her breathe in Asleep, her head near me; and I touched her hair with my lips, and close to her ear I said — for I heard her breathe as if in sleep— ‘Little Leda, I have come to you, for I could not help it, Leda: and oh, my heart is full of the love of you, for you are mine, and I am yours: and to live with you, till we die, and after we are dead to be near you still, Leda, with my broken heart near your heart, little Leda—’

I must have sobbed, I think; for as I spoke close at her ears, with passionately dying eyes of love, I was startled by an irregularity in her breathing; and with cautious hurry I shut the door, and quite back to the cave I stole in haste.

And the next morning when we met I thought — but am not now sure — that she smiled singularly: I thought so. She may, she may, have heard — But I cannot tell.

Twice I was obliged to abandon engines on account of forest-tree obstructions right across the line, which, do what I might, I could not move, and these were the two bitterest incidents of the pilgrimage; and at least thirty times I changed from engine to engine, when other trains blocked. As for the extent of the earthquake, it is pretty certain that it was universal over the Peninsula, and at many points exhibited extreme violence, for up to the time that we entered upon Servian territory, we occasionally came upon stretches of the lines so dislocated, that it was impossible to proceed upon them, and during the whole course I never saw one intact house or castle; four times, where the way was of a nature to permit of it, I left the imbedded metals and made the engine travel the ground till I came upon other metals, when I always succeeded in driving it upon them. It was all very leisurely, for not everywhere, nor every day, could I get a nautical observation, and having at all times to go at low pressures for fear of tube and boiler weakness, crawling through tunnels, and stopping when total darkness came on, we did not go fast, nor much cared to. Once, moreover, for three days, and once for four, we were overtaken by hurricanes of such vast inclemency, that no thought of travelling entered our heads, our only care being to hide our poor cowering bodies as deeply and darkly as possible. Once I passed through a city (Adrianople) doubly devastated, once by the hellish arson of my own hand, and once by the earthquake: and I made haste to leave that place behind me.

Finally, three months and twenty-seven days from the date of the earthquake, having traversed only 900 odd English miles, I let go in the Venice lagoon, in the early morning of the 10th September, the lateen sail and stone anchor of a Maltese speronare, which I had found, and partially cleaned, at Trieste; and thence I passed up the Canalazzo in a gondola. For I said to Leda: 'In Venice will I pitch my Patriarch tent.'

But to will and to do are not the same thing, and still further Westward was I driven. For the stagnant upper canals of this place are now mere miasmas of pestilence: and within two days I was rolling with fever in the Old Procurazie Palace, she standing in pale wonderment at my bed-side, sickness quite a novel thing to her: and, indeed, this was my first serious illness since my twentieth year or thereabouts, when I had over-worked my brain, and went a voyage to Constantinople. I could not move from bed for some weeks, but happily did not lose my senses, and she brought me the whole pharmacopoeia from the shops, from which to choose my medicines. I guessed the cause of this illness, though not a sign of it came near her, and as soon as my trembling knees could bear me, I again set out — always Westward — enjoying now a certain luxury in travelling compared with that Turkish difficulty, for here were no twisted metals, more and better engines, in the cities as many good petrol motors as I chose, and Nature markedly less savage.

I do not know why I did not stop at Verona or Brescia, or some other neighbourhood of the Italian lakes, since I was fond of water: but I had, I think, the thought in my head to return to Vauclaire in France, where I had lived, and there live: for I thought that she might like those old monks. At all events, we did not remain long in any place till we came to Turin, where we spent nine days, she in the house opposite mine, and after that, at her own suggestion, went on still, passing by train into the valley of the Isère, and then into that of the Western Rhone, till we came to the old town of Geneva among some very great mountains peaked with snow, the town seated at the head of a long lake which the earth has made in the shape of the crescent moon, and like the moon it is a thing of much beauty and many moods, suggesting a creature under the spell of charms and magics. However, with this idea of Vauclaire still in my head, we left Geneva in the motor which had brought us at four in the afternoon of the 17th May, I intending to reach the town called Bourg that night about eight, and there sleep, so to go on to Lyons the next morning by train, and so, by the Bordeaux route, make Vauclaire. But by some chance for which I cannot to this hour account (unless the rain was the cause), I missed the chart-road, which should have been fairly level, and found myself on mountain tracks, unconscious of my whereabouts, while darkness fell, and a windless downpour that had a certain sullen venom in its superabundance drenched us. I stopped several times, looking about for château, chalet, or village, but none did I see, though I twice came upon railway lines; and not till midnight did we run down a rather steep pass upon the shore of a lake, which, from its apparent vastness in the moonless obscurity, I could only suppose to be the Lake of Geneva once again. About two hundred yards to the left we saw through the rain a large pile, apparently risen straight out of the lake, looking ghostly livid, for it was of white stone, not high, but an old thing of complicated white little turrets roofed with dark red candle extinguishers, and oddities of Gothic nooks, window slits, and outline, very like a fanciful picture. Round to this we went, drowned as rats, Leda sighing and bedraggled, and found a narrow spit of low land projecting into the lake, where we left the car, walked forward with the bag, crossed a small wooden drawbridge, and came upon a rocky island with a number of thick-foliaged trees about the castle. We quickly found a small open portal, and went throughout the place, quite gay at the shelter, everywhere lighting candles which we found in iron sconces in the rather queer apartments: so that, as the castle is far seen from the shores of the lake, it would have appeared to one looking thence a place suddenly possessed and haunted. We found beds, and slept: and the next day it turned out to be the antique Castle of Chillon, where we remained five long and happy months, till again, again, Fate overtook us.

The morning after our coming, we had breakfast — our last meal together — on the first floor in a pentagonal room approached from a lower level by three little steps. In it is a ponderous oak table pierced with a multitude of worm eaten tunnels, also three mighty high backed chairs, an old oak desk covered still with papers, arras on the walls, and three dark religious oil paintings, and a grandfathers clock: it is at about the middle of the château, and contains two small, but deep, three faced oriels, in each face four compartments with white stone shafts between, these looking south upon shrubs and the rocky edge of the island, then upon the deep blue lake, then upon another tiny island containing four trees in a jungle of flowers, then upon the shore of the lake interrupted by the mouths of a river which turned out to be the Rhone, then upon a white town on the slopes which turned out to be Villeneuve, then upon the great mountains back of Bouveret and St. Gingolph, all having the surprised air of a resurrection just completed, everything new washed in dyes of azure, ultramarine, indigo, snow, emerald, that fresh morning: so that one had to call it the best and holiest place in the world. These five old room walls, and oak floor, and two oriels, became specially mine, though it was really common ground to us both, and there I would do many little things. The papers on the desk told that it had been the bureau of one R.E. Gaud, 'Grand Bailli,' whose residence the place no doubt had been.

She asked me while eating that morning to stay here, and I said that I would see, though with misgiving: so together we went all about the house, and finding it unexpectedly spacious, I consented to stop. At both ends are suites, mostly small rooms, infinitely quaint and cosy, furnished with heavy Henri Quatre furniture and bed draperies; and there are separate, and as it were secret, spiral stairs for exit to each: so we decided that she should have the suite overlooking the length of the lake, the mouths of the Rhone, Bouveret and Villeneuve; and I should have that overlooking the spit of land behind and the little drawbridge, shore cliffs, and elmwood which comes down to the shore, giving at one point a glimpse of the diminutive hamlet of Chillon; and, that decided, I took her hand in mine, and I said:

‘Well, then, here we stay, both under the same roof — for the first time. Leda, I will not explain why to you, but it is dangerous, so much so that it may mean the death of one or other of us: deadly, deadly dangerous, my poor girl. You do not understand, but that is the fact, believe me, for I know it very well, and I would not tell you false. Well, then, you will easily comprehend, that this being so, you must never on any account come near my part of the house, nor will I come near yours. Lately we have been very much together, but then we have been active, full of purpose and occupation: here we shall be nothing of the kind, I can see. You do not understand at all — but things are so. We must live perfectly separate lives, then. You are nothing to me, really, nor I to you, only we live on the same earth, which is nothing at all — a mere chance. Your own food, clothes, and everything that you want, you will procure for yourself: it is perfectly easy: the shores are crowded with mansions, castles, towns and villages; and I will do the same for myself. The motor down there I set apart for your private use: if I want another, I will get one; and to-day I will set about looking you up a boat and fishing tackle, and cut a cross on the bow of yours, so that you may know yours, and never use mine. All this is very necessary: you cannot dream how much: but I know how much. Do not run any risks in climbing, now, or with the motor, or in the boat ... little Leda ...’

I saw her under-lip push, and I turned away in haste, for I did not care whether she cried or not. In that long voyage, and in my illness at Venice, she had become too near and dear to me, my tender love, my dear darling soul; and I said in my heart: ‘I will be a decent being: I will turn out trumps.’

Under this castle is a sort of dungeon, not narrow, nor very dark, in which are seven stout dark-grey pillars, and an eighth, half-built into the wall; and one of them which has an iron ring, as well as the ground around it, is all worn away by some prisoner or prisoners once chained there; and in the pillar the word 'Byron' engraved. This made me remember that a poet of that name had written something about this place, and two days afterwards I actually came upon three volumes of the poet in a room containing a great number of books, many of them English, near the Grand Bailli's bureau: and in one I read the poem, which is called 'The Prisoner of Chillon.' I found it very affecting, and the description good, only I saw no seven rings, and where he speaks of the 'pale and livid light,' he should speak rather of the dun and brownish gloom, for the word 'light' disconcerts the fancy, and of either pallor or blue there is there no sign. However, I was so struck by the horror of man's cruelty to man, as depicted in this poem, that I determined that she should see it; went up straight to her rooms with the book, and, she being away, ferreted among her things to see what she was doing, finding all very neat, except in one room where were a number of prints called La Mode, and débris of snipped cloth, and medley. When, after two hours, she came in, and I suddenly presented myself, 'Oh!' she let slip, and then fell to cooing her laugh; and I took her down through a big room stacked with every kind of rifle, with revolvers, cartridges, powder, swords, bayonets — evidently some official or cantonal magazine — and then showed her the worn stone in the dungeon, the ring, the narrow deep slits in the wall, and I told the tale of cruelty, while the splashing of the lake upon the rock outside was heard with a strange and tragic sound, and her mobile face was all one sorrow.

'How cruel they must have been!' cries she with tremulous lip, her face at the same time reddened with indignation.

'They were mere beastly monsters,' said I: 'it is nothing surprising if monsters were cruel.'

And in the short time while I said that, she was looking up with a new-born smile.

‘Some others came and set the plisoner flee!’ cries she.

‘Yes,’ said I, ‘they did, but—’

‘That was good of them,’ says she.

‘Yes,’ said I, ‘that was all right, so far as it went.’

‘And it was a time when men had al-leady become cluel,’ says she: ‘if those who set him flee were so good when all the lest were cluel, what would they have been at a time when all the lest were kind? They would have been just like Angels....!’

At this place fishing, and long rambles, were the order of the day, both for her and for me, especially fishing, though a week rarely passed which did not find me at Bouveret, St. Gingolph, Yvoire, Messery, Nyon, Ouchy, Vevay, Montreux, Geneva, or one of the two dozen villages, townlets, or towns, that crowd the shores, all very pretty places, each with its charm, and mostly I went on foot, though the railway runs right round the forty odd miles of the lake’s length. One noon-day I was walking through the main-street of Vevay going on to the Cully-road when I had a fearful shock, for in a shop just in front of me to the right I heard a sound — an unmistakable indication of life — as of clattering metals shaken together. My heart leapt into my mouth, I was conscious of becoming bloodlessly pale, and on tip-toe of exquisite caution I stole up to the open door — peeped in — and it was she standing on the counter of a jeweller’s shop, her back turned to me, with head bent low over a tray of jewels in her hands, which she was rummaging for something. I went ‘Hoh!’ for I could not help it, and all that day, till sunset, we were very dear friends, for I could not part from her, we walking together by vor-alpen, wood, and shore all the way to Ouchy, she just like a creature crazy that day with the bliss of living, rolling in grasses and perilous flowery declines, stamping her foot defiantly at me, arrogant queen that she is, and then running like mad for me to catch her, with laughter, abandon, carolling railleries, and the levity of the wild ass's colt on the hills, entangling her loose-flung hair with Bacchic tendril and blossom, and drinking, in the passage through Cully, more wine, I thought, than was good: and the flaming darts of lightning that shot and shocked me that day, and the inner secret gleams and revelations of Beauty which I had, and the pangs of white-hot honey that tortured my soul and body, and were too much for me, and made me sick, oh Heaven, what tongue could express all that deep world of things? And at Ouchy with a backward wave of my arm I silently motioned her from me, for I was dumb, and weak, and I left her there: and all that long night her power was upon me, for she is stronger than gravitation, which may be evaded, and than all the forces of life combined, and the sun and the moon and the earth are nothing compared with her; and when she was gone from me I was like a fish in the air, or like a bird in the deep, for she is my element of life, made for me to breathe in, and I drown without her: so that for many hours I lay on that grassy hill leading to the burial-ground outside Ouchy that night, like a man sore wounded, biting the grass.

What made things worse for me was her adoption of European clothes since coming to this place: I believe that, in her adroit way, she herself made some of her dresses, for one day I saw in her apartments a number of coloured fashion-plates, with a confusion like dress-making; or she may have been only modifying finished things from the shops, for her Western dressing is not quite like what I remember of the modern female style, but is really, I should say, quite her own, rather resembling the Greek, or the eighteenth century. At any rate, the airs and graces are as natural to her as feathers to parrots; and she has changes like the moon; never twice the same, and always transcending her last phase and revelation: for I could not have conceived of anyone in whom taste was a faculty so separate as in her, so positive and salient, like smelling or sight — more like smelling: for it is the faculty, half Reason, half Imagination, by which she fore-scents precisely what will suit exquisitely with what; so that every time I saw her, I received the impression of a perfectly novel, completely bewitching, work of Art: the special quality of works of Art being to produce the momentary conviction that anything else whatever could not possibly be so good.

Occasionally, from my window I would see her in the wood beyond the drawbridge, cool and white in green shade, with her Bible probably, training her skirt like a court-lady, and looking much taller than before. I believe that this new dressing produced a separation between us more complete than it might have been; and especially after that day between Vevay and Ouchy I was very careful not to meet her. The more I saw that she bejewelled herself, powdered herself, embalmed herself like sachets of sweet scents, chapleted her Greek-dressed head with gold fillets, the more I shunned her. Myself, somehow, had now resumed European dress, and, ah me, I was greatly changed, greatly changed, God knows, from the portly inflated monarch-creature that strutted and groaned four years previously in the palace at Imbros: so that my manner of life and thought might once more now have been called modern and Western.

All the more was my sense of responsibility awful: and from day to day it seemed to intensify. An arguing Voice never ceased to remonstrate within me, nor left me peace, and the curse of unborn hosts appeared to menace me. To strengthen my fixity I would often overwhelm myself, and her, with muttered opprobriums, calling myself ‘convict,’ her ‘lady-bird’; asking what manner of man was I that I should dare so great a thing; and as for her, what was she to be the Mother of a world? — a versatile butterfly with a woman's brow! And continually now in my fiercer moods I was meditating either my death — or hers.

Ah, but the butterfly did not let me forget her brow! To the south-west of Villeneuve, between the forest and the river is a well-grown gentian field, and returning from round St. Gingolph to the Château one day in the third month after an absence of three days, I saw, as I turned a corner in the descent of the mountain, some object floating in the air above the field. Never was I more startled, and, above all, perplexed: for, beside the object soaring there like a great butterfly, I could see nothing to account for it. It was not long, however, before I came to the conclusion that she has re-invented the kite — for she had almost certainly never seen one — and I presently sighted her holding the string in the midfield. Her invention resembles the kind called 'swallow-tail' of old.

But mostly it was on the lake that I saw her, for there we chiefly lived, and occasionally there were guilty approaches and rencontres, she in her boat, I in mine, both being slight clinker-built Montreux pleasure-boats, which I had spent some days in overhauling and varnishing, mine with jib, fore-and-aft mainsail, and spanker, hers rather smaller, one-masted, with an easy-running lug-sail. It was no uncommon thing for me to sail quite to Geneva, and come back from a seven-days' cruise with my soul filled and consoled with the lake and all its many moods of bright and darksome, serene and pensive, dolorous and despairing and tragic, at morning, at noon, at sunset, at midnight, a panorama that never for an instant ceased to unroll its transformations, I sometimes climbing the mountains as high as the goat-herd region of hoch-alpen, once sleeping there. And once I was made very ill by a two-weeks' horror which I had: for she disappeared in her skiff, I being at the Château, and she did not come back; and while she was away there was a tempest that turned the lake into an angry ocean, and, ah my good God, she did not come. At last, half-crazy at the vacant days of misery which went by and by, and she did not come, I set out upon a wild-goose quest, of her — of all the hopeless things the most hopeless, for the world is great — and I sought and did not find her; and after three days I turned back, recognising that I was mad to search the infinite, and coming near the Château, I saw her wave her handkerchief from the island-edge, for she divined that I had gone to seek her, and she was watching for me: and when I took her hand, what did she say to me, the Biblical simpleton?— ‘Oh you of little Faith!’ says she. And she had adventures to lisp, with all the r’s liquefied into l’s, and I was with her all that day again.

Once a month perhaps she would knock at my outermost door, which I mostly kept locked when at home, bringing me a sumptuously-dressed, highly-spiced red trout or grayling, which I had not the heart to refuse, and exquisitely she does them, all hot and spiced, applying apparently to their preparation the taste which she applies to dress; and her extraordinary luck in angling did not fail to supply her with the finest specimens, though, for that matter, this lake, with its old fish-hatcheries and fish-ladders, is not miserly in that way, swarming now with the best lake trout, river trout, red trout, and with salmon, of which last I have brought in one with the landing-net of, I should say, thirty-five to forty pounds. As the bottom goes off very rapidly from the two islands to a depth of eight to nine hundred feet, we did not long confine ourselves to bottom-fishing, but gradually advanced to every variety of manoeuvre, doing middle-water spinning with three-triangle flights and sliding lip-hook for jack and trout, trailing with the sail for salmon, live-baiting with the float for pike, daping with blue-bottles, casting with artificial flies, and I could not say in which she became the most carelessly adept, for all soon seemed as old and natural to her as an occupation learned from birth.

On the 21st October I attained my forty-sixth birthday in excellent health: a day destined to end for me in bloodshed and tragedy, alas. I forget now what circumstance had caused me to mention the date long beforehand in, I think, Venice, not dreaming that she would keep any count of it, nor was I even sure that my calendar was not faulty by a day. But at ten in the morning of what I called the 21st, descending by my private spiral in flannels with some trout and par bait, and tackle — I met her coming up, my God, though she had no earthly right to be there. With her cooing murmur of a laugh, yet pale, pale, and with a most guilty look, she presented me a large bouquet of wild flowers.

I was at once thrown into a state of great agitation. She was dressed in rather a frippery of mousseline de soie, all cream-laced, with wide-hanging short sleeves, a large diamond at the low open neck, the ivory-brown skin there contrasting with the powdered bluish-white of her face, where, however, the freckles were not quite whited out; on her feet little pink satin slippers, without any stockings — a divinely pale pink; and well back on her hair a plain thin circlet of gold; and she smelled like heaven, God knows.

I could not speak. She broke an awkward silence, saying, very faint and pallid:

‘It is the day!’

‘I — perhaps—’ I said, or some incoherency like that.

I saw the touch of enthusiasm which she had summoned up quenched by my manner.

‘I have not done long again?’ she asked, looking down, breaking another silence.

‘No, no, oh no,’ said I hurriedly: ‘not done wrong again. Only, I could not suppose that you would count up the days. You are ... considerate. Perhaps — but—’

‘Tell Leda?’

‘Perhaps.... I was going to say ... you might come fishing with me....’

‘O luck!’ she went softly.

I was pierced by a sense of my base cowardice, my incredible weakness: but I could not at all help it.

I took the flowers, and we went down to the south side, where my boat lay; I threw out some of the fish from the well; arranged the tackle, and then the stern cushions for her; got up the sails; and out we went, she steering, I in the bows, with every possible inch of space between us, receiving delicious intermittent whiffs from her of ambergris, frangipane, or some blending of perfumes, the morning being bright and hot, with very little breeze on the water, which looked mottled, like colourless water imperfectly mixed with indigo-wash, we making little headway; so it was some time before I moved nearer her to get the par for fixing on the three-triangle flight, for I was going to trail for salmon or large lake-trout; and during all that time we spoke not a word together.

Afterwards I said:

‘Who told you that flowers are proper to birthdays? or that birthdays are of any importance?’

‘I suppose that nothing can happen so important as birth,’ says she: ‘and perfumes must be proper to birth, because the wise men brought spices to the young Jesus.’

This naïveté was the cause of my immediate recovery: for to laugh is to be saved: and I laughed right out, saying:

‘But you read the Bible too much! all your notions are biblical. You should read the quite modern books.’

‘I have tried,’ says she: ‘but I cannot lead them long, nor often. The whole world seems to have got so collupted. It makes me shudder.’

‘Ah, well now, you see, you quite come round to my point of view,’ said I.

‘Yes, and no,’ says she: ‘they had got so spoiled, that is all. Everlybody seems to have become quite dull-witted — the plainest tluths they could not see. I can imagine that those faculties which aided them in their stlain to become lich themselves, and make the lest more poor, must have been gleatly sharpened, while all the other faculties withered: as I can imagine a person with one eye seeing double thlough it, and quite blind on the other side.’

‘Ah,’ said I, ‘I do not think they even wanted to see on the other side. There were some few tolerably good and clear-sighted ones among them, you know: and these all agreed in pointing out how, by changing one or two of their old man-in-the-moon Bedlam arrangements, they could greatly better themselves: but they heard with listless ears: I don’t know that they ever made any considerable effort. For they had become more or less unconscious of their misery, so miserable were they: like the man in Byron’s “Prisoner of Chillon,” who, when his deliverers came, was quite indifferent, for he says:

“It was at length the same to me
Fettered or fetterless to be:
I had learned to love Despair.””

‘Oh my God,’ she went, covering her face a moment, ‘how dleadful! And it is tluе, it seems tluе: — they had learned to love Despair, to be even ploud of Despair. Yet all the time, I feel sure flom what I have lead, flom what I scent, that the individual man was stlugging to see, to live light, but without power, like one’s leg when it is asleep: that is so pletty of them all! that they meant well — everly one. But they were too tloubled and sad, too awfully burdened: they had no chance at all. Such a queer, unnatual feeling it gives me to lead of all that world: I can’t desclibe it; all their motives seem so tainted, their life so lopsided. Tluely, the whole head was sick, and the whole heart faint.’

‘Quite so,’ said I: ‘and observe that this was no new thing: in the very beginning of the Book we read how God saw that the wickedness of man was great on the earth, and every imagination of his heart evil....’

‘Yes,’ she interrupted, ‘that is tluе: but there must have been some cause! We can be quite sure that it was not natulal, because you and I are men, and our hearts are not evil.’

This was her great argument which she always trotted out, because she found that I had usually no answer to give to it. But this time I said:

‘Our hearts not evil? Say yours: but as to mine you know nothing, Leda.’

The semicircles under her eyes had that morning, as often, a certain moist, heavy, pensive and weary something, as of one fresh from a revel, very sweet and tender: and, looking softly at me with it, she answered:

‘I know my own heart, and it is not evil: not at all: not even in the very least: and I know yours, too.’

‘You know mine!’ cried I, with a half-laugh of surprise.

‘Quite well,’ says she.

I was so troubled by this cool assurance, that I said not a word, but going to her, handed her the baited flight, swivel-trace, and line, which she paid out; then I got back again almost into the bows.

After a ten-minutes I spoke again:

‘So this is news to me: you know all about my heart. Well, come, tell me what is in it!’

Now she was silent, pretending to be busy with the trail, till she said, speaking with low-bent face, and a voice that I could only just hear:

‘I will tell you what is in it: in it is a rebellion which you think good, but is not good. If a stream will just flow, neither trying to climb upward, nor overflowing its banks, but running modestly in its fated channel just wherever it is led, then it will finally reach the sea — the mighty ocean — and lose itself in fulness.’

‘Ah,’ said I, ‘but that counsel is not new. It is what the philosophers used to call “yielding to Destiny,” and “following Nature.” And Destiny and Nature, I give you my word, often led mankind quite wrong—’

‘Or seemed to,’ says she— ‘for a time: as when a stream flows north a little, and the sea is to the south: but it is bound for the sea all the time, and will turn again. Destiny never could, and cannot yet, be judged, for it is not finished: and our race should follow blindly whither it points, sure that through many curves it leads the world to our God.’

‘Our God indeed!’ I cried, getting very excited: ‘girl! you talk speciously, but falsely! whence have you these thoughts in that head of yours? Girl! you talk of “our race”! But there are only two of us left? Are you talking at me, Leda? Do not I follow Destiny?’

‘You?’ she sighed, with down-bent face: ‘ah, poor me!’

‘What should I do if I followed it?’ said I, with a crazy curiosity.

Her face hung lower, paler, in trouble: and she said:

‘You would come now and sit near me here. You would not be there where you are. You would be always and for ever near me....’

My good God! I felt my face redden.

‘Oh, I could not tell you...!’ I cried: ‘you talk the most disastrous...! you lack all responsibility...! Never, never...!’

Her face now was covered with her left hand, her right on the tiller: and bitingly she said, with a touch of venom:

‘I could make you come — now, if I chose: but I will not: I will wait upon my God....’

‘Make me!’ I cried: ‘Leda! How make me?’

‘I could cly before you, as I cly often and often ... in seclet ... for my childlen....’

‘You cry in secret? This is news—’

‘Yes, yes, I cly. Is not the burden of the world heavy upon me, too? and the work I have to do vely, vely gleat? And often and often I cly in seclet, thinking of it: and I could cly now if I chose, for you love your little girl so much, that you could not lesist me one minute....’

Now I saw the push and tortion and trembling of her poor little under-lip, boding tears: and at once a flame was in me which was altogether beyond control; and crying out: ‘why, my poor dear,’ I found myself in the act of rushing through the staggering boat to take her to me.

Mid-way, however, I was saved: a whisper, intense as lightning, arrested me: ‘Forward is no escape, nor backward, but sideward there may be a way!’ And at a sudden impulse, before I knew what I was doing, I was in the water swimming.

The smaller of the islands was two hundred yards away, and thither I swam, rested some minutes, and thence to the Castle. I did not once look behind me.

Well, from 11 A.M. till five in the afternoon, I thought it all out, lying in the damp flannels on my face on the sofa in the recess beside my bed, where it was quite dark behind the tattered piece of arras: and what things I suffered that day, and what deeps I sounded, and what prayers I prayed, God knows. What infinitely complicated the awful problem was this thought in my head: that to kill her would be far more merciful to her than to leave her alone, having killed myself: and, Heaven knows, it was for her alone that I thought, not at all caring for myself. To kill her was better: but to kill her with my own hands — that was too hard to expect of a poor devil like me, a poor common son of Adam, after all, and never any sublime self-immolator, as two or three of them were. And hours I lay there with brows convulsed in an agony, groaning only those words: ‘To kill her! to kill her!’ thinking sometimes that I should be merciful to myself too, and die, and let her live, and not care, since, after my death, I would not see her suffer, for the dead know not anything: and to expect me to kill her with my own hand was a little too much. Yet that one or other of us must die was perfectly certain, for I knew that I was just on the brink of failing in my oath, and matters here had reached an obvious crisis: unless we could make up our minds to part...? putting the width of the earth between us? That conception occurred to me: and in the turmoil of my thoughts it seemed a possibility. Finally, about 5 P.M., I resolved upon something: and first I leapt up, went down and across the house into the arsenal, chose a small revolver, fitted it with cartridge, took it up-stairs, lubricated it with lamp-oil, went down and out across the drawbridge, walked two miles beyond the village, shot the revolver at a tree, found its action accurate, and started back. When I came to the Castle, I walked along the island to the outer end, and looked up: there were her pretty cream Valenciennes, put up by herself, waving inward before the light lake-breeze at one open oriel; and I knew that she was in the Castle, for I felt it: and always, always, when she was within, I knew, for I felt her with me; and always when she was away, I knew, I felt, for the air had a dreadful drought, and a barrenness, in it. And I looked up for a time to see if she would come to the window, and then I called, and she appeared. And I said to her: ‘Come down here.’

Just here there is a little rock-path to the south, going down to the water between rocks mixed with shrub-like little trees, three yards long: a path, or a lane, one might call it, for at the lower end the rocks and trees reach well over a tall man’s head. There she had tied my boat to a slender linden-trunk: and sadder now than Gethsemane that familiar boat seemed to my eyes, for I knew very well that I should never enter it more. I walked up and down the path, awaiting her: and from the jacket-pocket in which lay the revolver I drew a box of Swedish matches, from it took two matches, and broke off a bit from the plain end of one; and the two I held between my left thumb and forefinger joint, the phosphorus ends level and visible, the other ends invisible: and I awaited her, pacing fast, and my brow was as stern as Azrael and Rhadamanthus.

She came, very pale, poor thing, and flurried, breathing fast. And ‘Leda,’ I said, meeting her in the middle of the lane, and going straight to the point, ‘we are to part, as you guess — for ever, as you guess — for I see very well by your face that you guess. I, too, am very sorry, my little child, and heavy is my heart. To leave you ... alone ... in the world ... is — death for me. But it must, ah it must, be done.’

Her face suddenly turned as sallow as the dead were, when the shroud was already on, and the coffin had become a stale added piece of room-furniture by the bed-side; but in recording that fact, I record also this other: that, accompanying this mortal sallowness, which painfully shewed up her poor freckles, was a steady smile, a little turned-down: a smile of steady, of slightly disdainful — Confidence.

She did not say anything: so I went on.

‘I have thought long,’ said I, ‘and I have made a plan — a plan which cannot be effective without your consent and co-operation: and the plan is this: we go from this place together — this same night — to some unknown spot, some town, say a hundred miles hence — by train. There I get two motors, and I in one, and you in the other, we separate, going different ways. We shall thus never be able, however much we may want to, to rediscover each other in all this wide world. That is my plan.’

She looked me in the face, smiling her smile: and the answer was not long in coming.

‘I will go in the train with you,’ says she with slow decisiveness: ‘but where you leave me, there I will stay, till I die; and I will patiently wait till my God convert you, and send you back to me.’

‘That means that you refuse to do what I say?’

‘Yes,’ said she, bowing the head with great dignity.

‘Well, you speak, not like a girl, Leda,’ said I, ‘but like a full woman now. But still, reflect a minute.... O reflect! If you stayed where I left you, I should go back to you, and pretty soon, too: I know that I should. Tell me, then — reflect well, and tell me — do you definitely refuse to part with me?’

The answer was pretty prompt, cool, and firm:

‘Yes; I refuse.’

I left her then, took a turn down the path, and came back.

‘Then,’ said I, ‘here are two matches in my grasp: be good enough to draw one.’

Now she was hit to the heart: I saw her eyes widen to the width of horror, with a glassy stare: she had read of the drawing of lots in the Bible: she knew that it meant death for me, or for her.

But she obeyed without a word, after one backward start and then a brief hovering in decision of thumb and forefinger over my held-out hand. I had fixed it in my mind that if she drew the shorter of the matches, then she should die; if the longer, then I should die.

She drew the shorter....

This was only what I should have expected: for I knew that God loved her, and hated me.

But instantly upon the first shock of the enormity that I should be her executioner, I made my resolve: to drop shot, too, at the moment after she dropped shot, so disposing my body, that it would fall half upon her, and half by her, so that we might be close always: and that would not be so bad, after all.

With a sudden movement I snatched the revolver from my pocket: she did not move, except her white lips, which, I think, whispered:

‘Not yet....’

I stood with hanging arm, forefinger on trigger, looking at her. I saw her glance once at the weapon, and then she fixed her eyes upwards upon my face: and now that same smile, which had disappeared, was on her lips again, meaning confidence, meaning disdain.

I waited for her to open her mouth to say something — to stop that smile — that I might shoot her quick and sudden: and she would not, knowing that I could not kill her while she was smiling; and suddenly, all my pity and love for her changed into a strange resentment and rage against her, for she was purposely making hard for me what I was doing for her sake: and the bitter thought was in my mind: 'You are nothing to me: if you want to die, you do your own killing; and I will do my own killing.' And without one word to her, I strode away, and left her there.

I see now that this whole drawing of lots was nothing more than a farce: I never could have killed her, smiling, or no smiling: for to each thing and man is given a certain strength: and a thing cannot be stronger than its strength, strive as it may: it is so strong, and no stronger, and there is an end of the matter.

I walked up to the Grand Bailli's bureau, a room about twenty-five feet from the ground. By this time it was getting pretty dark, but I could see, by peering, the face of a grandfather's-clock which I had long since set going, and kept wound. It is on the north side of the room, over the writing-desk opposite the oriels. It then pointed to half-past six, and in order to fix some definite moment for the bitter effort of the mortal act, I said: 'At Seven.' I then locked the door which opens upon three little steps near the desk, and also the stair-door; and I began to pace the chamber. There was not a breath of air here, and I was hot; I seemed to be stifling, tore open my shirt at the throat, and opened the lower half of the central mullion-space of one oriel. Some minutes later, at twenty-five to seven, I lit two candles on the desk, and sat to write to her, the pistol at my right hand; but I had hardly begun, when I thought that I heard a sound at the three-step door, which was only four feet to my left: a sound which resembled a scraping of her slipper; I stole to the door, and crouched, listening: but I could hear nothing further. I then returned to the desk, and set to writing, giving her some last directions for her life, telling her why I died, how I loved her, much better than my own soul, begging her to love me always, and to live on to please me, but if she would die, then to be sure to die near me. Tears were pouring down my face, when, turning, I saw her standing in a terrified pose hardly two feet behind me. The absolute stealth which had brought and put her there, unknown to me, was like miracle: for the ladder, whose top I saw intruding into the open oriel, I knew well, having often seen it in a room below, and its length was quite thirty feet, nor could its weight be trifling: yet I had heard not one hint of its impact upon the window. But there, at all events, she was, wan as a ghost.

Immediately, as my consciousness realised her, my hand instinctively went out to secure the weapon: but she darted upon it, and was an instant before me. I flew after her to wrench it away, but she flew, too: and before I caught her, had thrown it cleanly through two rungs of the ladder and the window. I dashed to the window, and after a hurried peer thought that I saw it below at the foot of a rock; away I flew to the stair-door, wrung open the lock, and down the stairs, three at a time, I ran to recover it. I remember being rather surprised that she did not follow, forgetting all about the ladder.

But with a horrid shock I was reminded of it the moment I reached the bottom, before ever I had passed from the house: for I heard the report of the weapon — that crack, my God! and crying out: ‘Well, Lord, she has died for me, then!’ I tottered forward, and tumbled upon her, where she lay under the incline of the ladder in her blood.

That night! what a night it was! of fingers shivering with haste, of harum-scarum quests and searches, of groans, and piteous appeals to God. For there were no surgical instruments, lint, anaesthetics, nor antiseptics that I knew of in the Château; and though I knew of a house in Montreux where I could find them, the distance was quite infinite, and the time an eternity in which to leave her all alone, bleeding to death; and, to my horror, I remembered that there was barely enough petrol in the motor, and the store usually kept in the house exhausted. However, I did it, leaving her there unconscious on her bed: but how I did it, and lived sane afterwards, that is another matter.

If I had not been a medical man, she must, I think, have died: for the bullet had broken the left fifth rib, had been deflected, and I found it buried in the upper part of the abdominal wall. I did not go from her bed-side: I did not sleep, though I nodded and staggered: for all things were nothing to me, but her: and for a frightfully long time she remained comatose. While she was still in this state I took her to a chalet beyond Villeneuve, three miles away on the mountain-side, a homely, but very salubrious place which I knew, imbedded in verdures, for I was desperate at her long collapse, and had hope in the higher air. And there after three more days, she opened her eyes, and smiled with me.

It was then that I said to myself: ‘This is the noblest, sagest, and also the most loveable, of the creatures whom God has made in heaven or earth. She has won my life, and I will live.... But at least, to save myself, I will put the broadest Ocean that there is between her and me: for I wish to be a decent being, for the honour of my race, being the last, and to turn out trumps ... though I do love my dear, God knows....’

And thus, after only fifty-five days at the chalet, were we forced still further Westward.

I wished her to remain at Chillon, intending, myself, to start for the Americas, whence any sudden impulse to return to her could not be easily accomplished: but she refused, saying that she would come with me to the coast of France: and I could not say her no.

And at the coast, after thirteen days we arrived, three days before the New Year, traversing France by steam, air, and petrol traction.

We came to Havre — infirm, infirm of will that I was: for in my deep heart was the secret, hidden away from my own upper self, that, she being at Havre, and I at Portsmouth, we could still speak together.

We came humming into the dark town of Havre in a four-seat motor-car about ten in the evening of the 29th December: a raw bleak night, she, it was clear, poor thing, bitterly cramped with cold. I had some recollection of the place, for I had been there, and drove to the quays, near which I stopped at the Maire's large house, a palatial place overlooking the sea, in which she slept, I occupying another near.

The next morning I was early astir, searched in the mairie for a map of the town, where I also found a Bottin: I could thus locate the Telephone Exchange. In the Maire's house, which I had fixed upon to be her home, the telephone was set up in an alcove adjoining a very stately salon Louis Quinze; and though I knew that these little dry batteries would not be run down in twenty odd years, yet, fearing any weakness, I broke open the box, and substituted a new one from the Company's stores two streets away, at the same time noting the exchange-number of the instrument. This done, I went down among the ships by the wharves, and fixed upon the first old green air-boat that seemed fairly sound, broke open a near shop, procured some buckets of oil, and by three o'clock had tested and prepared my ship. It was a dull and mournful day, drizzling, chilly. I returned then to the mairie, where for the first time I saw her, and she was heavy of heart that day: but when I broke the news that she would be able to speak to me, every day, all day, first she was all incredulous astonishment, then, for a moment, her eyes turned white to Heaven, then she was skipping like a kid. We were together three precious hours, examining the place, and returning with stores of whatever she might require, till I saw darkness coming on, and we went down to the ship.

And when those long-dead screws awoke and moved, bearing me toward the Outer Basin, I saw her stand darkling, lonely, on the Quai through heart-rending murk and drizzly inclemency: and oh my God, the gloomy underlook of those red eyes, and the piteous out-push of that little lip, and the hurried burying of that face! My heart broke, for I had not given her even one little, last kiss, and she had been so good, quietly acquiescing, like a good wife, not attempting to force her presence upon me in the ship; and I left her there, all widowed, alone on the Continent of Europe, watching after me: and I went out to the bleak and dreary fields of the sea.

Arriving at Portsmouth the next morning, I made my residence in the first house in which I found an instrument, a spacious dwelling facing the Harbour Pier. I then hurried round to the Exchange, which is on the Hard near the Docks, a large red building with facings of Cornish moor-stone, a bank on the ground-floor, and the Exchange on the first. Here I plugged her number on to mine, ran back, rang — and, to my great thanksgiving, heard her speak. (This instrument, however, did not prove satisfactory: I broke the box, and put in another battery, and still the voice was muffled: finally, I furnished the middle room at the Exchange with a truckle-bed, stores, and a few things, and here have taken up residence.)

I believe that she lives and sleeps under the instrument, as I here live and sleep, sleep and live, under it. My instrument is quite near one of the harbour-windows, so that, hearing her, I can gaze out toward her over the expanse of waters, yet see her not; and she, too, looking over the sea toward me, can hear a voice from the azure depths of nowhere, yet see me not.

I this morning early to her:

‘Good morning! Are you there?’

‘Good morning! No: I am there,’ says she.

‘Well, that was what I asked— “are you there”?’

‘But I not here, I am there,’ says she.

‘I know very well that you are not “here,”’ said I, ‘for I do not see you: but I asked if you were there, and you say “No,” and then “Yes.”’

‘It is the paladox of the heart,’ says she.

‘The what?’

‘The paladox,’ says she.

‘But still I do not understand: how can you be both there and not there?’

‘If my ear is here, and I elsewhere?’ says she.

‘An operation?’

‘Yes!’ says she.

‘What doctor?’

‘A specialist!’ says she.

‘An ear-specialist?’

‘A heart!’ says she.

‘And you let a heart-specialist operate on your ear?’

‘On myself he operlated, and left the ear behind!’ says she.

‘Well, and how are you after it?’

‘Fairly well. Are you?’ says she.

‘Quite well. Did you sleep well?’

‘Except when you lang me up at midnight. I have had such a dleam ...’

‘What?’

‘I dleamed that I saw two little boys of the same age — only I could not see their faces, I never can see anybody’s face, only yours and mine, mine and yours always — of the same age — playing in a wood....’

‘Ah, I hope that one of them was not called Cain, my poor girl.’

‘Not at all! neither of them! Suppose I tell a stoly, and say that one was called Caius and the other Tibelius, or one John and the other Jesus?’

‘Ah. Well, tell me the dleam....’

‘Now you do not deserve.’

‘Well, what will you do to-day?’

‘I? It is a lovely day ... have you nice weather in England?’

‘Very.’

‘Well, between eleven and twelve I will go out and gather Spling-flowers in the park, and cover the salon deep, deep. Wouldn’t you like to be here?’

‘Not I.’

‘You would!’

‘Why should I? I prefer England.’

‘But Flance is nice too: and Flance wants to be fliends with England, and is waiting, oh waiting, for England to come over, and be fliends. Couldn’t some lapplochement be negotiated?’

‘Good-bye. This talking spoils my morning smoke....’

So we speak together across the sea, my God.

On the morning of the 8th April, when I had been separated thirteen weeks from her, I boarded several ships in the Inner Port, a lunacy in my heart, and selected what looked like a very swift boat, one of the smaller Atlantic air-steamers called the Stettin, which seemed to require the least labour in oiling, &c., in order to fit her for the sea: for the boat in which I had come to England was a mere tub, though sound, and I pined for the wings of a dove, that I might fly away to her, and be at rest.

I toiled with fluttering hands that day, and I believe that I was of the colour of ashes to my very lips. By half-past two o’clock I was finished, and by three was coasting down Southampton Water by Netley Hospital and the Hamble-mouth, having said not one word about anything at the telephone, or even to my own guilty heart not a word. But in the silent depths of my being I felt this fact: that this must be a 35-knot boat, and that, if driven hard, hard, in spite of the heavy garment of seaweed which she trailed, she would do 30; also that Havre was 120 miles away, and at 7 P.M. I should be on its quay.

And when I was away, and out on the bright and breezy sea, I called to her, crying out: 'I am coming!' And I knew that she heard me, and that her heart leapt to meet me, for mine leapt, too, and felt her answering.

The sun went down: it set. I was tired of the day's work, and of standing at the high-set wheel; and I could not yet see the coast of France. And a thought smote me, and after another ten minutes I turned the ship's head back, my face screwed with pain, God knows, like a man whose thumbs are ground between the screws, and his body drawn out and out on the rack to tenuous length, and his flesh massacred with pincers: and I fell upon the floor of the bridge contorted with anguish: for I could not go to her. But after a time that paroxysm passed, and I rose up sullen and resentful, and resumed my place at the wheel, steering back for England: for a fixed resolve was in my breast, and I said: 'Oh no, no more. If I could bear it, I would, I would ... but if it is impossible, how can I? To-morrow night as the sun sets — without fail — so help me God — I will kill myself.'

So it is finished, my good God.

On the early morning of the next day, the 9th, I having come back to Portsmouth about eleven the previous night, when I bid her 'Good morning' through the telephone, she said 'Good morning,' and not another word. I said:

‘I got my hookah-bowl broken last night, and shall be trying to mend it to-day.’

No answer.

‘Are you there?’ said I.

‘Yes,’ says she.

‘Then why don’t you answer?’ said I.

‘Where were you all yesterday?’ says she.

‘I went for a little cruise in the basin,’ said I.

Silence for three minutes: then she says:

‘What is the matter?’

‘Matter?’ said I, ‘nothing!’

‘Tell me!’ she says — with such an intensity and rage, as to make me shudder.

‘There is nothing to tell, Leda!’

‘Oh, but how can you be so chuel to me?’ she cries, and ah, there was anguish in that voice! ‘There is something to tell — there is! Don’t I know it vely well by your voice?’

Ah, the thought took me then, how, on the morrow, she would ring, and have no answer; and she would ring again, and have no answer; and she would ring all day, and ring, and ring; and for ever she would ring, with white-flowing hair and the staring eye-balls of frenzy, battering reproaches at the doors of God, and the Universe would cry back to her howls and ravings only one eternal answer of Silence, of Silence. And as I thought of that — for very pity, for very pity, my God — I could not help sobbing aloud:

‘May God pity you, woman!’

I do not know if she heard it: she must, I think, have heard: but no reply came; and there I, shivering like the sheeted dead, stood waiting for her next word, waiting long, dreading, hoping for, her voice, thinking that if she spoke and sobbed but once, I should drop dead, dead, where I stood, or bite my tongue through, or shriek the high laugh of distraction. But when at last, after quite thirty or forty minutes she spoke, her voice was perfectly firm and calm. She said:

‘Are you there?’

‘Yes,’ said I, ‘yes, Leda.’

‘What was the color,’ says she, ‘of the poison-cloud which destroyed the world?’

‘Purple, Leda,’ said I.

‘And it had a smell like almonds or peach blossoms, did it not?’ says she.

‘Yes,’ said I, ‘yes.’

‘Then,’ says she, ‘there is another eruption. Every now and again I seem to scent strange whiffs like that ... and there is a purple vapour in the East which glows and glows ... just see if you can see it....’

I flew across the room to an east window, threw up the grimy sash, and looked. But the view was barred by the plain brick back of a tall warehouse. I rushed back, gasped to her to wait, rushed down the two stairs, and out upon the Hard. For a minute I ran dodging wildly about, seeking a purview to the East, and finally ran up the dockyard, behind the storehouses to the Semaphore, and reached the top, panting for life. I looked abroad. The morning sky, but for a bank of cloud to the north-west, was cloudless, the sun blazing in a region of clear azure pallor. And back again I flew.

‘I cannot see it...!’ I cried.

‘Then it has not travelled far enough to the north-west yet,’ she said with decision.

‘My wife!’ I cried: ‘you are my wife now!’

‘Am I?’ says she: ‘at last? Are you glad?... But shall I not soon die?’

‘No! You can escape! My home! My heart! If only for an hour or two, then death — just think, together — on the same couch, for ever, heart to heart — how sweet!’

‘Yes! how sweet! But how escape?’

‘It travelled slowly before. Get quick — will you? — into one of the smaller boats by the quay — there is one just under the crane that is an air-boat — you have seen me turn on the air, haven’t you? — that handle on the right as you descend the steps under the dial-thing — get first a bucket of oil from the shop next to the clock-tower in the quay-street, and throw it over everything that you see rusted. Only, spend no time — for me, my heaven! You can steer by the tiller and compass: well, the wheel is quite the same, only just the opposite. First unmoor, then to the handle, then to the wheel. The course is directly North-East by North. I will meet you on the sea — go now—’

I was wild with bliss. I thought that I should take her between my arms, and have the little freckles against my face, and taste her short firm-fleshed upper-lip, and moan upon her, and whimper upon her, and mutter upon her, and say ‘My wife.’ And even when I knew that she was gone from the telephone, I still stood there, hoarsely calling after her: ‘My wife! My wife!’

I flew down to where the steamer lay moored that had borne me the previous day. Her joint speed with the speed of Leda’s boat would be forty knots: in three hours we must meet. I had not the least fear of her dying before I saw her: for, apart from the deliberate movement of the vapour that first time, I fore-tasted and trusted my love, that she would surely come, and not fail: as dying saints fore-tasted and trusted Eternal Life.

I was no sooner on board the Stettin than her engines were straining under what was equivalent to forced draught. On the previous day it would have little surprised me at any moment, while I drove her, to be carried to the clouds in an explosion from her deep-rusted steel tanks: but this day such a fear never crossed my mind: for I knew very well that I was immortal till I saw her.

The sea was not only perfectly smooth, but placid, as on the previous day: only it seemed far placider, and the sun brighter, and there was a levity in the breezes that frilled the sea in fugitive dark patches, like frissons of tickling; and I thought that the morning was a true marriage-morning, and remembered that it was a Sabbath; and sweet odours our wedding would not lack of peach and almond, though, looking eastward, I could see no faintest sign of any purple cloud, but only rags of chiffon under the sun; and it would be an eternal wedding, for one day in our sight would be as a thousand years, and our thousand years of bliss would be but one day, and in the evening of all that eternity death would come and sweetly lay its finger upon our languid lids, and we should die of weary bliss; and all manner of dancings and singings — fandango and light galliard, corantoes and the solemn gavotte — were a-tune in my heart that happy day; and running by the chart-house to the wheel, I saw under the table a great roll of old flags, and presently they were flying in a long curve of gala from the main; and the sea rumped in a long tract of tumbling milk behind me; and I hasted homeward, to meet my heart.

No purple cloud could I see as, on and on, for two hours, I tore southward: but at hot noon, on the weather beam I spied through the glass across the water something else which moved, and it was you who came to me, Oh Leda, my spirit's breath!

I bore down upon her, waving: and soon I saw her stand like an ancient mariner, but in white muslins that fluttered, at her wheel on the bridge — it was one of those little old Havre-Antwerp craft very high in the bows — and she waved a little white thing. And we came nearer, till I could spy her face, her smile, and I shouted her to stop, and in a minute stopped myself, and by happy steering came with slowing headway to a slight crash by her side, and ran down the trellised steps to her, and led her up; and on the deck, without saying a word, I fell to my knees before her, and I bowed my brow to the floor, with obeisance, and I worshipped her there as Heaven.

And we were wedded: for she, too, bowed the knee with me under the jovial blue sky; and under her eyes were the little moist semicircles of dreamy pensive fatigue, so dear and wifish: and God was there, and saw her kneel: for He loves the girl.

And I got the two ships apart, and they rested there some yards divided all the day, and we were in the main-deck cabin, where I had locked a door, so that no one might come in to be with my love and me.

I said to her:

‘We will fly west to one of the Somersetshire coal-mines, or to one of the Cornwall tin-mines, and we will barricade ourselves against the cloud, and provision ourselves for six months — for it is perfectly feasible, and we have plenty of time, and no crowds to break down our barricades — and there in the deep earth we will live sweetly together, till the danger is overpast.’

And she smiled, and drew her hand across my face, and said:

‘No, no: don’t you trust in my God? do you think He would really let me die?’

For she has appropriated the Almighty God to herself, naming Him ‘my God’ — the impudence: though she generally knows what she is saying, too. And she would not fly the cloud.

And I am now writing three weeks later at a little place called Châteaux-Roses, and no poison-cloud, and no sign of any poison-cloud, has come. And this I do not understand.

It may be that she divined that I was about to destroy myself ... she may be quite capable.... But no, I do not understand, and shall never ask her.

But this I understand: that it is the White who is Master here: that though he wins but by a hair, yet he wins, he wins: and since he wins, dance, dance, my heart.

I look for a race that shall resemble its Mother: nimble-witted, light-minded, pious — like her; all-human, ambidextrous, ambicephalous, two-eyed — like her; and if, like her, they talk the English language with all the r's turned into l's, I shall not care.

They will be vegetable-eaters, I suppose, when all the meat now extant is eaten up: but it is not certain that meat is good for men: and if it is really good, then they will invent a meat: for they will be her sons, and she, to the furthest cycle in which the female human mind is permitted to orbit, is, I swear, all-wise.

There was a preaching man — a Scotchman he was, named Macintosh, or something like that — who said that the last end of Man shall be well, and very well: and she says the same: and the agreement of these two makes a Truth. And to that I now say: Amen, Amen.

For I, Adam Jeffson, second Parent of the world, hereby lay down, ordain, and decree for all time, clearly perceiving it now: That the one Motto and Watch-word essentially proper to each human individual, and to the whole Race of Man, as distinct from other races in heaven or in earth, was always, and remains, even this: 'Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him.'

THE END

The Evil That Men Do (1904)

First published in London by Ward , Lock & Co in 1904, The Evil That Men Do is not one of the author's better known works and it has not received much attention from scholars or critics. It concerns a strange man called Robert Hartwell, as the author combines elements of mystery, romance and adventure to create an unnerving story. An interesting element of the novel and one which provided fertile material for late nineteenth and early twentieth century writers, is the question of whether morality is hereditary, or whether environmental factors are predominant in shaping one's character.

I. ON THE SEA

AN INTERESTING QUESTION raised by the incident we have to tell is this: How far is it true that children inherit the traits of their parents? The son, the father — a racehorse is usually a racehorse; but is the son, the father, a Napoleon, a Napoleon? On the contrary, history teaches that no great man ever had a great son.

A child's resemblance to its parents may sometimes arise after its birth; for constant intimacy is alone sufficient to produce resemblance. Thus, the late President McKinley came to look like his wife's brother; and so with many couples.

For years the child's existence is all mixed up with its parents'. How many kisses, forbidden hours of sleep in the drowsy mother's bed! Therefore, if either parent has a disease, the child can hardly escape. Later on he will be told that his consumption is "hereditary," but it may have originated since his birth.

No one would question the fact of heredity: we only remark that the extent to which we now believe in it is "not proven" in the case of that mysterious animal, man; and we are led to the reflection by a singular case which happened on board a ship some forty five years ago.

She was the Africa, and was one of those Union line mail boats that ply between the Cape and Southampton before the Castle line was formed to share with the Union line half the Government subvention, about 1870. They were small boats (compared with the present monsters) of 1,000 tons or so, of the kind which it was the fashion to call "tin-kettles;" half steamer, half sailing-ship, brigantine-rigged, with one funnel; and the postage of a letter to the Cape was — one shilling.

The captain of the Africa — a certain Captain Denner — was a handsome man of forty, with a large freckled face, who might have done very well for a model of Charlemagne, or some old sea-king, only that his long beard was black. He had a red birth-mark, the size of a penny, across his left temple. His lips were rather thick, and his moustache, parting in the middle, showed their strong pressure there. Though rather taciturn at times he was a good captain, popular with the passengers: and the voyage went well, till they reached the latitude of Madeira. At that time, by the way, it lasted thirty days, not sixteen, as now.

One Sunday morning, then, near Madeira, the vessel moving through a calm sea, the passengers were assembled at prayers, which were conducted by a clergyman who happened to be aboard. Among them were two ladies, a Mrs Drayton and a Mrs Hartwell, both of whom were about to become mothers.

It was noted as an odd thing that the captain was not at the service; no one, in fact, had seen him at all that morning. The first officer had knocked at his door, but the captain, without opening, had called back, in a strange voice, the strange words: “Go away.”

However, the clergyman had not yet reached the Litany, when the captain appeared at the door of the dining-saloon, where the worshippers were. Their backs were turned to the door, but when the clergyman stopped, with gaping mouth, the others looked round and saw the captain.

He had on nothing but a shirt and drawers. Some open ports, with a wellhole communicating with the smoke-room above, gave plenty of light, and he was distinctly seen: his rich, black hair seemed to stand on end, his eyes were wild, and in his hand was a revolver.

As all stared at this apparition he lifted his right arm, uttered the sound “bang,” and shot the clergyman dead. He then turned the weapon a little, uttered the same sound, and sent another into eternity. The third shot pierced Mrs Drayton’s right forearm; the fourth wounded the purser in the breast; the fifth killed a passenger who was running to seize the madman. This scene somehow affected the witnesses of it, not merely with terror, but with some sort of ghostly awe, which left all the survivors, male and female, in a state of nervous ruin for days. Before the fifth shot, all the ladies had fainted.

A rush, however, was made by the men, the lunatic was mastered, put into irons, and died the same night of the brain disease which had suddenly seized him.

Four months afterwards, in the town of Bradford, Mrs Drayton gave birth to a son; six months afterwards, near Rugby, Mrs Hartwell too, gave birth to a son. And the point which we wanted to emphasize is this, that these two boys, as they grew to manhood, bore no resemblance to hereditary types; but each had a raspberry birthmark the size of a penny on his left temple; and each was the image of Captain Denner, the captain of the Africa.

In that instant of the captain’s apparition at the saloon door in that one vivid shock of panic, the nervous beings of the two mothers had leapt, caught, appropriated, and kodaked the captain’s image.

And for thirty-eight years after that Sunday on the sea those two portraits of the captain of the Africa lived in England unconscious of each other. But after that stretch of time, the winds that blew the lives of men like wandering waves of the sea, blew them together, and they met.

II. ON THE ROAD

IT WAS ON the road between Cromer and Norwich — a good road, as many cyclists know, but with some steep bits, especially toward Cromer end, and there between Horsham, St. Fay's and Aylsham.

It is late autumn, and all those woods of Stratton, Strawless, and Blickling, are whirls of dead leaves. The sun is setting — bleakly setting; and the storm winds sweeping south wrinkle the puddles in the road, along which one may walk miles and not meet a soul.

Certainly, the country has a desolate aspect this evening; the ground, turned since harvest for the first wheat sowing, looks black and dead with wet. Hardly a tuft of chrysanthemum in some sheltered nook still braves the bleakness of wintry winds. The ferns, and heather of Roughton Heath look scorched by the breath of a fire. The wind seems to have a grey colour.

Go still further north along the road, and you will find all that breadth of sand, where the village girls “paddle” through the summer and catch sea anemones, swallowed up now by the sea. It is blowing great guns inland, and the flat-bottomed crab boats are perched in nooks of the cliffs beyond the range of the breakers.

Beyond Roughton and Aylsham, a motor car comes scorching at a speed of not less than thirty miles an hour; for the wind blows keen and, moreover, the driver of this particular twin cylinder is famous for his illegal pace.

His car is a specially “chic” turn-out, an elongated mass of double phaeton type, brown-painted, upholstered in green leather, with French Dunlops, and lightly pitches forward all that weight over the slushy road a purring Juggernaut — toward Norwich, toward London.

On the front seat are two men, thick as bears in a rug, gloves, and furred coats. Only their noses are cold, but even that little they resent: they do not know that within two hours they will be cold all over.

“Dimmed cold,” says one.

“Hang the silly storm,” says the other.

They are the financier, James Drayton, and his right-hand man, McCalmont. They have motored together from London to Sheffield to attend a conference on the pooling of some steel concern, but when the conference was over, instead of returning direct to London, Drayton has said to McCalmont’s surprise, that he wished to see someone at Cromer, and at Cromer they have accordingly arrived about four that afternoon. But whom it could have been that Drayton wished to see at Cromer, McCalmont, even now, cannot guess. Drayton apparently had “seen” no one at Cromer. He did separate a few minutes from McCalmont, but only to go into the poste restante, where he got a letter, which, after reading, he tore up. Why, therefore, they have made this detour to the east of England, McCalmont is still wondering. Drayton must have had some reason.

In silence they pitch and slip ahead. Steadily hums the car, the rough wind instruments make music of dead marches about them, the sun has set and darkness gathers fast.

James Drayton is a big man, with a handsome, large face, florid and freckled, a black beard, and rather thick lips, whose pressure is visible at the parting of the moustache. He, too, would do very well for Charlemagne or a sea-king, as we said of Captain Denner, of the Africa, whose image he is. His eyes have a hard, aggressive look, and his appearance somehow tells you that he is a modern city man to the finger tips, who knows the world familiarly, uses it, and perhaps abuses it.

They are now at the elevated ground about Ingworth, whence they can see the darkling valley of the Bure on either hand, and black before them the woods of Blickling. It is a place where many a spill has taken place on account of two nasty turnings where the road crosses bridges, but Drayton proves that he knows the locality by altering his change-speed gear. The car hastens slower, and neatly negotiates the ticklish bits.

At the second turning it splashes a man on the road. He is a tramp — at least, he is tramping. A little bundle in a red handkerchief hangs from a stick over his Shoulder. He has no jacket this inclement night; his boots are ruined; misery is in his eyes, bitterness in his pressed lips. His name is Robert Hartwell.

And because of the slowing-down of the motor, and because some greyness still lingers in the dark, therefore Hartwell sees for a moment that face of Drayton, though Drayton and McCalmont do not observe Hartwell. And Hartwell thinks to himself, “Well, that man might be my brother! — ah, but you seem to be happier than I, my friend!”

The motor vanishes down the hill towards Blickling, the lessening voice of its flight still haunting Hartwell’s ear drum like a wasp — till that, too, is gone. And on he tramps, muttering bitter at heart, in the same direction as they — towards Norwich, towards London, and the tortoise shall yet beat the hare.

Past the mill, past the farm among the trees, the bridge, the old gabled manor-house, hedges loaded with the storm, heron, crop and grebe by the solitary pool, with bat and white owl in the air, the strange screams of madness in the winds that now fill a darkness unrelieved by moon or star —

Hartwell continually puts his feet into puddles without seeing them and sounds come from his chest!

Meanwhile, the motor has not gone far upon the main road, for soon after crossing the Bure, it has turned aside into rather obscure country tending to bracken and heath, Drayton having said to McCalmont: "There ought to be a place just in there somewhere, which I remember from long ago. Suppose we go and get a glass of ale, and light up."

McCalmont is surprised, for there is champagne on board, if Drayton is thirsty, and it is surely not necessary to go to a tavern to "light up!" but he says, "As you like," and soon Drayton takes a lane to the left.

A mile in this direction, and they come, to a house behind the shoulder of a hill — a rather high house, black with age, with a physiognomy both picturesque and sinister. The roofs are quaint, on different levels, some quite small; there are broken external steps; some of the windows are broader than long, latticed, small or irregularly placed, and two are dormer windows. Along the front runs a gut with some water trickling among rocks, and beyond this a hillside of rocks, pines, and a couple of old huts. Some special dismalness here causes McCalmont to shiver at the cold, as they draw up.

"What place is it?" he asks.

"I think it is called 'The Anchor,'" says Drayton.

Some rain begins to be mixed with the wind as they go into a bar parlour, with a floor of earth stamped hard, and sanded. The light is dim, but a turf fire burns brightly in the grate. Only one man is there, a laborer, with his tankard on the bench beside him; and from his happy posture one may conjecture him not sober. He is the driver of a manure cart whose horse is enduring all the storm yonder at the house side. He has still a long way to fare, past Aylsham, almost on to Marsham, and the entrance of the rich men rouses him. He pulls himself together, braves the outer night, mounts and sets off, not uncomfited, for he has a can of beer with him. We shall overtake him, again be overtaken by him, and again overtake him.

Meanwhile, the landlord has drawn some cider for Drayton. Cider is not McCalmont's taste, but Drayton duly sips his cider.

"By the way, landlord," says he presently, "just take me to a room: I want to write a letter."

McCalmont is really surprised now. Why on earth — But Drayton knows what he is about: he knows that Letty, the landlord's daughter, is listening behind the inner door, hears what he says, and will act accordingly.

Barnes, the landlord, has never before seen Drayton, nor Drayton Barnes; but Letty and Drayton have met this summer on Cromer pier.

Drayton says to his friend: "Shan't be long," and Barnes says to Drayton: "This way, sir."

Barnes is a powerful man with a red beard, and a constant frown. He has a certain air of self-importance above his station, as of "one who has come down." He and Drayton mount some creaking stairs; some paper and two candles are placed on a table in a dingy old-timbered room, then Barnes retires.

Drayton, however, writes no letter, but waits, and in a minute Letty looks in. She is twenty or so, middle-sized, fair, plump, and pretty — not the prettiness of a doll — there is character in her face. She is neatly dressed in grey and has quite the air and speech of a lady, save for a countrified word here or there. Her hair is firmly built, she has some jewellery, watch and chain, and smells of lavender, as Drayton puts a kiss on her cheek.

"We mustn't talk here," she whispers, "come—"

She leads him by the hand through darkness down a back stair into the open. Nothing is said till they are beyond the kitchen garden, the stable, the fowl house, the pigs. Then there is a hedge with a gate, then a plank bridging a rill, then a fir plantation. Among the firs they stand.

Rain smites their faces, winds catch away their words. Now, too, there is a vague sound of thunder somewhere, but they heed none of these things. Each is fully occupied by the other.

“We have only a few minutes,” says Letty Barnes.

“What’s it all about, my girl?” answers Drayton. “I got your letter at the Cromer poste restante, but you are cool to expect a man like me to be running after you.”

“Oh, you drop all pretence of love, then, I see?” says Letty.

Drayton puts his arm round her waist.

“Kiss your old man. I love you all right, girlie — honestly, I do, but you mustn’t be a bore, Letty. I am prepared to do a lot for you, if you only know how to manage me—”

“But I do know how to manage you, as you are going to see! I have found out! Not by begging, but by commanding! With all your experience, you seem to know very little about women, really; and as to me, you don’t know me one little bit! I look like a lamb, don’t I? Aren’t you really going to marry me, then, after all?”

“Don’t be a goose, Letty; don’t be a goose.”

“You did promise though, I think, didn’t you?”

“Let me see: I forget now.”

“Ah, a great scoundrel!”

“Little Letty, little Letty.”

“A bitter devil, James Drayton!”

“Let not your angry passions rise, my Letty! I’m a sixty-horse-power for angry passions myself, you know.”

“And I! and I! and my father! — when he finds out. Do you think, then, that you will be getting off scot free this time? How silly! We are not common people! Compared to a clown like you, we are respectable folk, though poor. You dare, James Drayton! Pity yourself, if you won’t — pity — me—”

She suddenly covered her face, and the winds bore away one sob.

“My good girl,” says Drayton, “don’t cry, because crying depresses me; and don’t threaten me, because I don’t like it, so don’t do it.”

“Selfish brute! I never knew what it was to hate—”

“Look here; be quick. What; is it you want with me?”

“Keep your promise!”

“That all you got to say for yourself?”

“What happens to you, if you fail to honor a signed promise to pay at three months’ sight for value received, James? You become a dead man commercially, don’t you? Well, your promise to me is more binding in my sight than a thousand pieces of paper, and your failure to keep it shall have the same penalty, my friend — death — social death—”

“Pooh! I am going—”

“No, don’t go. I didn’t make you come here to quarrel, and waste words, but to tell you that you are quite in my power. I have discovered about your engagement to Lady Methwold; you are to be married in three months, aren’t you? But listen to this other fact: I have taken a trip to your place, Corton Chantry—”

“You!” whispers Drayton; and now his face is suddenly pallid.

“Ah, that touches you near, James,” says Letty. “Yes, I have been to Corton. It is only nine miles from here, you know. You must be a scoundrel, really. I will marry you, but within seven months from now I shall be divorced from you. I shouldn’t live with you for all the crowns—”

“You been to Corton, girl! What ever for?”

“I don’t quite know why: some instinct took me. I had heard that you kept the place running wild, with only one daft man, named Steve Anderson, to look after it. That stirred my curiosity, for lately I have believed you capable of any villainy. So I went, and I heard screams—”

“By gad!”

“Yes, screams — a woman’s — in that north tower—”

“You little beggar!”

“Take care! you touch me! you dare! Look here — can you see? — this is a letter which I have ready to send to Lady Methwold—”

Drayton is a man of action, and the instant that white object appears through the murk, he makes a catch at it. His hand meets Letty Barnes’ wrist and seizes it. But he has not to do with a weakling. Letty is strong, and they proceed to fight like two men, though there is no reason why they should, really, for if this letter be got from Letty, she can surely write another, but they are speedily in that state of mind in which men no longer reason.

Passion possesses them, pants in their breath, stares in their eyes.

“Let it — go you — shall!” pants Drayton, stooped to her hand; but Letty’s fingers are a vice. Though if it were less dark, one would see her failing, as with bitten lip and many a jerk and stumble she endures that rough usage to which Drayton is subjecting her.

And every moment, as they fight, up and up climbs the temperature of their rage. The striving for that letter becomes a mania. Where will it end?

This way frenzy lies. But neither will yield and their breaths grow louder than the winds.

“Give it — up you — shall—”

“No, you — devil—”

But Letty is white; her hands are sore and burning; she feels herself going, going; and now she sends out one shriek upon the night.

McCalmont, who is pacing in the tavern-bar, awaiting Drayton, says:

“What’s that?”

“Where?” asks Barnes, the landlord.

“Didn’t I hear something like a cry somewhere?”

“Ey, it’s the wind,” says Barnes; “rough night, rough night. I’d not care to be out on the road, sir.”

But by that cry of Letty’s, Drayton has been startled, and in a moment she has wrenched her hand free, and is gone flying. He catches her, but misses her, and panting to himself, “No, you don’t,” is after her.

She has run back toward the rill and the board-bridge, but she never reaches it. He has caught her, his hand in the collar of her dress behind.

“Going to — drop it?” he pants at her ear.

But she cannot answer. He is choking her. She tries to say that she yields, then to say “pity,” but no whisper comes. Now a thousand words throng in her throat — only to speak would be Heaven — but no more comes than from dry suction-pumps that caw and gurgle. Her poor eyes stare in a horror of panic, seeing Eternity upon her, and the sudden grave yawn to receive her youth.

“Quick! going to drop it?” he repeats. But how can she answer? She cannot answer! and her silence adds fuel to his flame.

But the end is not yet; there is a rent of cloth. Something gives way at her neck. She dives and is running free.

Away from the rill this time — and he runs after her: but neither runs fast — they cannot — there is a certain impotence in their run, as when in dreams one would hasten, but cannot, the limbs are so hampered and heavy.

But of the two it is she who runs the more feebly, and his legs are long. He gets near again and makes a blow, but a feeble wild blow, made too soon, which only touches her. She dodges, and is gone in a changed direction.

And again he is after her, with that same feeble obstinacy, so deplorable to see. If she can only escape his sight one instant, how lucky, for she will be lost to him in the dark. But the wood is fatally sparse, and he never quite loses her. Anon they stumble for the ground is rough with game-holes, thistle, fern, and furze, and once Drayton is staggering backward with arms a-struggle in the air. But he saves himself, and is soon impending again while she, feeling him near again, with a panic now boundless and lunatic, throws her soul into the scream:

“Help! he is going — !”

They are a longish distance from the tavern, but such a scream as that, that Barnes, her father, behind the bar, cocks an ear and says to McCalmont, who is pacing with his hands in his coat-pockets:

“Well, I thought I heard — Heard anything, sir?”

“No,” says McCalmont, “no. Thought I did a while since, though.”

“Ey, it’s the blessed wind. It cries out behind the hill at times, like a woman in trouble.”

But Drayton has made another blow at the poor victim, again without effect. She is nimble, though failing, and during his momentary stoppage she evades and is off in yet a new direction. But her end is not far; she is tumbling too frequently — and all at once, with a mortal little last cry, she is down. Instantly he is on his knees over her.

His right forearm presses on her windpipe — he does not look at her at all, nor admit to himself that he is killing her. He looks away sideways, as if interested in something yonder among the trees —

Presently he picks himself up, leans his back against a fir-bole, peers this way and that and recovers wind a little.

At the bottom of the plantation runs a bend of that same gut which passes before the tavern — a square-cut opening in the ground about ten feet wide and fifteen feet deep. Their run has brought them so near it that Drayton, leaning against a tree, can see its edge. He thinks that it is a river, but a mere thread of water trickles through it.

He goes to the body again, takes the letter to Lady Methwold from her hand, tears it up, and is about to throw the pieces upon the wind when he considers himself and puts them into a pocket. He then draws her ten yards to the gut, over the edge. He listens for a splash, but hears neither splash nor thud. The winds are in his ears and it is as though he had thrown her into an abyss of darkness. She is gone from him.

Now he runs — thievish, but quick — back toward the rill, the bridge, the hedge-gate, past the pigs, the kitchen garden, up the dark back-stairs. He re-enters the room which he had left with her. There burn the two candles as before, quietly, as if nothing had happened meanwhile. He looks at his hands, at his clothes — no blood. He takes off his coat and shakes off the water. But his face! that looks a bit wild; he sees it in a spotted piece of mirror that hangs from a timber of this old room. He can't show such a face to McCalmont; there's a scratch, too, under his left eye. The little beggar must have scratched him somehow.

She is dead, then! He has killed her dead — unexpected thing. But it has happened, it is so. He cannot at all recognise himself, paces the room, misery in his face. Pity he ever met her that night on Cromer pier; pity he came to her this night; pity she was ever born — and he.

“Well, that's as it may—” He pulls himself together, glances again at the glass. He will wait a little longer.

Now he has the thought that the number of the sheets given him may be known to the landlord. He will therefore take one — will even write a letter, since he came for that and has time. His mind is in a state in which thought is fairly active, but not with perfect rationality. Standing, he covers half a sheet with writing; but the words are nonsense words, to fill up space. He blots them on a Life Assurance almanac, in which leaves of blotting paper alternate with memorandum leaves.

Now he descends and, as he enters the bar, McCalmont says:

“By Jove! you must have written ten letters, old man.”

“Only one, boy,” answers Drayton, “but that wanted some thinking, you see. All ready to be off?”

McCalmont has lighted up; all is ready. Drayton slips a couple of shillings into the landlord’s hand and, stepping outside, they hear Barnes call “Letty!”

Off goes the motor round the hill, down the lane, out upon the road; and now the darkness is lit by an occasional lightning flash.

Within four minutes, near Blickling, they come upon Robert Hartwell, who has tramped thus far with his bundle and stick. He is aware of the gathering hum of the two dragon-eyes staring nearer upon him and, stepping aside, he mutters as they dash past.

Five minutes later, they overtake the manure-cart of the laborer who had left “The Anchor” on their entrance. He sends a drowsy shout to warn them as they grow near, for he carries no light. And past him, too, they dash. But he shall overtake them, and again be overtaken by them.

III. ROBERT HARTWELL'S SIN

WE LEFT HARTWELL where the road crosses a bridge in the Bure Valley, and he has tramped on to the second encounter with the motor, wondering how much bitterer the weather will become, and if the world is a place designed to torture and oppress the poor. All the time he is on the look-out for some barn or hollow tree, in which to rest his frame.

He is a big man, about the size of Drayton, the same age — two months' younger — the same black beard, a longish oblong of hair; on his left temple the same raspberry mark; his moustache flows sideways in the same way, showing the pressure of rather thick lips, and a definite point in the middle of the upper. They have the same straight noses, freckle-splashed faces, glossy hair. Hartwell's photograph would do very well for a photograph of Denner, captain of the S.S. Africa, dead thirty-eight years since. So would Drayton's.

Only Hartwell's hands are different from Drayton's. He is not, however, a working-man of common type; his father was a nail manufacturer; he himself has spent three years at Rugby School, though Rugby has receded many a thousand miles from Hartwell now.

When he was seventeen, his father failed, and died. Then for three years he maintained his mother by hard work as an under-clerk in an electrical machine-makers. He was steady — at one time even religious — had abilities and rose higher in his firm. But his mother died and, alone in the world, he fell in love with a pretty work-girl, who induced him to marry. She was worthless, and drank. One day she appeared at the office and made a scene. He was dismissed. Falling now into misery, he took work at the factory in whose office he had been a clerk. He has been a working-man ever since.

But, an excellent specimen of his class, his remarkable mind has not rusted. He has been a student, a keen watcher of the world's march in science, thought, invention, social changes. He knows a great lot about chemistry and biology, reads German, has filled a pile of note-books with notes at science classes, knows Darwin, Haeckel, by heart. He has been a sober, sagacious workman, bringing up his son, Bobbie, as respectably as he could, ever since his wife died ten years ago.

But he has had misfortunes — disaster after disaster just lately, and the iron has entered into his soul. He has seen Bobbie hungry and one memorable night Bobbie has seen him drunk.

Electricity makes such progress in these days! — it flies. The workman can hardly keep pace with the bewildering changes. What is new to-day will be ancient history to-morrow, and the older types of craftsmen, their pursuits and habits of mind, already fixed, see younger men step in and take their place.

Hartwell has made two inventions from each of which he hoped for wealth, but he lacked the few pounds to patent either. One was patented for him by a manufacturer, who has given him £20, making thousands himself by it. The other is still in the air.

He has seen door after door close in his face, and hope has pined. Too many people seem to be born! something is wrong with the scheme of things, and there's a "fault" in the Machine. His thick firm lips pressed together on that Norwich Road, hisses are on his breath, and now is the winter of his discontent.

Partly by train, partly tramping, he has come from Birmingham to Cromer, allured by the hope of getting employment in a gentleman's stable, for an acquaintance had written him of a vacancy there. But it was filled when he arrived. He is now tramping for London with the vaguest hopes though, certainly, his boots will never outlast that length of road. Already his feet are soaked and congealed. The foxes have holes, but he nowhere to lay his head. His vitals scream for food.

He does not blame himself — he knows that he is little to blame; he does not blame man, nor the devil; his rage is against the nature of the world. But it does not break out — he is not of that sort. Till, just as he comes to that lane leading to “The Anchor,” where Drayton has turned in, some rain, as we said before, begins to be mixed with the winds and this little thing, though his mind is of the strongest, irritates Hartwell to fury, and now he breaks out.

“Curse the rain,” he mutters, looking up.

And as on he plods, taunting words come to him, mockeries of Nature. “A metal-worker's apprentice would have conceived it better!” he laughs. But the rain only gets worse; there grows a sound of thunder somewhere in the dark; he breathes a wish that lightning may strike him dead — if it can. The lightning can, but is busy.

During the next two miles, his lips are never silent; and while he goes muttering James Drayton is doing what we know to Letty Barnes.

Then again Drayton passes Hartwell on the road and, this time, that motor-car has upon the usually cold mind of Hartwell an effect like madness. How brazen a power the thing is! domineering in its approach, obtrusive in its passage, triumphant in its swift translation from sight. It has the eyes, the smell, the wings, the mutter and meditation of an Ogre. It is like a daughter of Mammon.

Wealth! Hartwell knows what it is, he has stood in mansions. He knows poverty. As the proud chariot of iron flashes past him, he has in his consciousness at one and the same moment both houselessness and the palace, rags and furred robes, the crust and the fat of turtles. It is a double vision almost, which he has, and a lust for wealth, more crass and ugly than he has ever felt, arises and boils in his breast. To shoot in motor cars, anon crushing some wretch on the road — to roll in luxury, while multitude's starve — how good, he thinks!

“Give me that!” he says, and now he is down on his knees, frowning, his hands clutched in his hair, for though his fires are slow to kindle they burn hot and strong, like hard anthracite and he is praying, but not looking up, looking down, not praying to heaven.

“Whatever your name Mammon — Power of the world — give me that! Say ten years, five! I will serve you gladly — say five years — from tonight. Will you? Can you? Are you there? No, you are not there, but if you were — I offer myself: only cloy me—”

His head is bowed right down, frowning, but he rises hastily, ashamed of himself, muttering:

“No! let it not be said that I have entered my second childhood at the age of thirty-seven.”

But he goes on his way a worse man. Between Blickling and Aylsham a thought comes into his head of his son, Bobbie, whom he has left at Birmingham with an old friend. He has tenderly loved the lad: but he mutters now:

“Selfishness is the law, my friend, I must not care for you.”

Presently, near eight o'clock, he is passing through Aylsham, his fires burned out now, or only sullenly smouldering within him. And again in Aylsham he has overtaken James Drayton, and sees him. It is at the old coaching-house, the “Black Boys;” the motor is before the door, and since the thunderstorm is over, and hardly any rain left for the wind to play with, half-a-dozen admiring boys and girls are gathered round the motor, and Hartwell, too, stops to admire. In the room behind that window, Drayton and McCalmont are dining, and there is a space under the blind by which Hartwell, stooping, spies Drayton, full face.

“Well, certainly,” he breathes, “this is odd! there is the same man again, my own twin brother, as I live. It is said that everyone has a double. Ah, lucky person, lucky person!”

Five minutes he stoops there, peering, absorbed in the contemplation of this marvel. Then, with a sigh he straightens himself, and goes his dreary way — through Aylsham — down the railed footway by the lych-gate and down the hill beyond.

IV. SO SOON?

DOWN THE LONG hill trudges Hartwell, his eyes bent upon the ground in gloomy reverie, and now this thought occurs to him whether, on the strength of the resemblance between him and Drayton, it might not be a good thing to turn back and beg a shilling of the rich man. He had never begged before — but hunger and weariness grow pressing —

He regrets the idea, but it recurs, and he is again considering it, his eyes on the ground, when he strikes upon something, and his walk is brought to a stoppage. What is it? a cart lying across the road, no horse, no driver. It lies tilted, like a stranded ship, one of the wheels is off.

It is the manure cart of the laborer who left “The Anchor,” fuddled, when Drayton and McCalmont entered it. We said that they should overtake them, and they did; we said that he should overtake them again, and he has, while they dine at Aylsham; but they shall overtake him again — or, at least, his cart.

“But the dolt!” thinks Hartwell, “to leave the cart in the middle of the road this dark night!”

At the breakdown the driver has unspanned, mounted the horse with all its hames and trailing harness, and gone on to his farm near Marsham to seek help, for he cannot move the cart: and he has gone at a walk, happy, singing, and full of hot spiced ale.

Hartwell walks round the cart, lingering, thinking what to do. He decides to return to Aylsham, and tell some one. But as he turns to climb, he hears, he sees — with an alarm which quickly grows into horror. There is a humming song somewhere, then two dragon eyes quick coming, and above the dragon eyes two little adder eyes, clear cut, in the darkness — the glowing ends of two cigars. At 25 miles an hour they come. Hartwell forgets his vow to do no good.

“Stop!” he howls, waving, red-faced, running a little up. He implores as for his own life, “Danger! Stop!”

But in vain. If they hear, they do not understand, nor heed. There is no time. Drayton has fuddled himself at dinner that he may forget what lies in the gutter behind “The Anchor.” On hums the motor, and suddenly Hartwell is no more shouting to save others, but skedaddling to save his own skin — down again to the cart — beyond it — like one pelting from pestilence. Nor does he stop till he hears behind him the shock — a bumping hubbub, then a rattling and throbbing — and his eye-corner catches sight of a sheet of flame vanishing like lightning flash into the dark.

Then all is still — all but the wind. Drayton has gone to meet Letty Barnes.

It was the high side of the tilted cart that had been turned to the motor, but even so, McCalmont has been shot clean over it, a long way, like an arrow; and when Hartwell turns back toward the scene of the ruin, it is upon McCalmont that he first comes. He finds that the dead man’s head has made quite a hole in the ground, and his neck is obviously broken. Everything can be seen, for the car has ignited in one spot, and yonder on the road and in the roadside field are several flames dodging about from the rain, as petroleum does on contact with water.

Going on to the cart, Harwell finds it bottom upward, some fifteen feet from where it stood before. It has been turned over and over, and half of its substance is matchwood. The motor is still jammed into it, and looks shorter, tilted sideways, and twisted. The two lights are gone, the front tires burst, and everything in front of the steering pillar and dash board is a chaos of dripping debris.

Drayton's body is still in the car, but no longer on the front seat. He is lying in an ungainly pose across the back seat, with one foot up on the back of the front seat. Little more remains of his face than the beard; unlike McCalmont, he has dived head foremost against the cart, and been tossed by it like a ball.

"Dead as two nails—" mutters Hartwell.

He himself is rather dazed — the calamity here is so pitiful. He walks a little to and fro, not knowing what to do. Thinking that the driver of the cart may come, he peers along the road, trotting a little this way and that — . No driver comes. All is solitude and aglow from the jumping fires. Some night bird flies across between the Lombardy poplars that line the road. On the east is a stretch of bracken, with a pond, on the west a hilly field, with a rick on the top, just discernible. Some minutes pass. Hartwell, waiting, shivers with cold.

The next definite thought borne on his head is this: that he, for his part, will not fail of bed and board this night, that there is money, watches, on these dead men and it is an ill wind that blows no one any good —

He does not delay. He, too, as we said of Drayton, is a man of action. He approaches Drayton to despoil him and now he thinks: "this is the one that is my twin—"

But at that thought he stops and turns as white as McCalmont yonder. His teeth chatter as at some blast of Arctic cold. For a time he is like one struck into stone, then he is pacing curiously this way and that, bent sideways, one hand pressed into his pocket, the other shouldering his stick. He has invented —

And all of a sudden he is in a passion of haste, a storm of action. He is in the car, not yet well ignited, on the back seat beside Drayton, undressing him; and quick and keen is the work. He has off collar and tie — coat — throws off the braces, shirt, vest, and now the boots — they are laced — pitifully slow. Now he whips off the trousers, drawers. The earnest labor of his bosom is hoarser than the storm, but the dead limbs are still limp, and lend themselves readily to that tugging and hustling. All is well, that wild glance discerns no one on the road. The dead man is naked, the clothes lie in a heap on the seat.

In some seconds now Hartwell himself is naked to the waist and in two minutes he has on the dead man's vest and shirt, collar and tie. Then, ceasing to dress himself, he dresses Drayton in his own rags. His hands, all that he touches, are smeared — so much the better.

He returns to his own dressing again, tosses off his nether garments, puts on Drayton's, then dresses Drayton in his own rags. In proportion, as he becomes Drayton, so Drayton becomes he. Finally he puts on Drayton's socks, boots, ring, gloves, and Drayton has on his. He does not use Drayton's hat: he will do without a hat. He casts his own cap, stick, and bundle away.

Now he leaves the car, drags out the dead man, and places him on the ground under the front wheels of the motor, between motor and cart. It will seem to the world that McCalmont and an unknown tramp have been killed in the accident, but that Drayton has escaped. Hartwell will be Drayton.

He stands a little, recovering wind. The work is done. No one comes along the road. After a time he starts to trudge back up the hill, bareheaded, but warm and rich, toward Aylsham, a new man, in a wildly new world, with a new name. But what name? That will be well: there are papers in the dead man's pocket. He feels first in the lower coat pockets — that warm coat — but there he finds only some shreds of paper, the shreds of the letter which Letty Barnes wrote to Lady Methwold against Drayton. But in the trouser are a bunch of keys, in the breast pockets many papers that will be well about the name and other things. He feels his strength, he knows that he is sagacious, trusts in himself at bottom —

And as to the purse? That is well also. It contains two sovereigns, and five bank notes. He will feast to-night — he will say that the accident has made him hungry afresh. He vaguely wonders if one can get champagne in Aylsham, and by the time he is half way up the hill that has become a care to him, he is not for the moment in a condition of sanity. He wheels on all the whirlwinds —

He thinks that if he only had Bobby with him, that would intensify the pleasure...to see him eat and eat — But he stops short at another thought. “Starting from to-night,” he has said, “I will serve you — only cloy me—” His fingers touch his brow. But it soon passes! He laughs audibly: he is not a child.

Moving on again, it occurs to him that it might be well to have a bruise somewhere. With a stone he strikes his forehead, a good hard blow which he hardly feels. And now he laughs again — a laugh cynical, defiant, triumphant; then immediately his teeth beat together with ague. But he pulls himself together, proceeds up the hill, and is soon in Aylsham.

So began the drama of love and pain, which we have to tell.

V. HARTWELL FINDS HIMSELF A MARRIED MAN

WHEN HARTWELL RE-ENTERED Aylsham, he stopped under a street lamp, and looked at several of the envelopes in the breast pocket of Drayton's overcoat, which he had on. He saw the words "James Drayton, Esq.," on them all, and decided that that was the name which was to be his thenceforth.

He then walked up the empty street to the "Black Dogs," and entered the old coaching house chilled to the heart with that feeling of rashness gone crazy, which must have chilled the heart of the first man who ever stepped into the car of a balloon, trusting on theory alone, to make the first strange leap into the air. He was met in the passage by a girl, who started and turned pale at the sight of the gore on the clothes, at the self-inflicted bruise on his hatless head and at the streamlets of blood on his white face. He seemed to her the murdered ghost of the man who, not twenty minutes before, had dined in boisterous health at the tavern, and gone away, hearty and happy and half-tipsy in his motor car.

"There has been an accident," cried Hartwell to her: "just lend me your shoulder to lean on — that's a girl — I can hardly stand."

She gave him her shoulder and conducted him, step by step, to the commercial room on the left of the passage, while a number of people who had caught sight of him from the bar on the right crowded at the door of the parlour, staring after him till he disappeared. He sank into the first easy-chair, all sighs, with an abandoned head and a bent back, while the landlord, who had run in, and the girl stood over and gazed at him.

“An accident has happened to the car,” sighed Hartwell: “my friend is killed; also a tramp who was on the road. I cannot talk. Someone run and tell the police.”

“Run quick for, some brandy, Maggie,” said the landlord. “Dreadful thing, sir! How did it happen, sir?”

“I cannot talk,” sighed Hartwell.

The girl ran out and quickly ran in again with a glass of brandy and water, which the landlord held to Hartwell’s lips, and Hartwell drank, sighing with gusto at the end:

“That’s a man.”

“Feel better now, sir?” asked the landlord, contemplating him, with his arms akimbo.

“Yes, that’s better. Put me to bed, my friend, and let me be left alone. Ah, no, I feel not well—”

“Dreadful thing, sir! Who would have thought half an hour since — Maggie, send off John for Dr Richards at once.”

By this time two of the other servants of the establishment and several of the visitors were assembled at the door, craning in to see.

“No doctor, I think,” murmured Hartwell to the landlord. “I do not need any — at least I will not have any. Do not make me talk — just put me to bed.”

“Just draw off the gentleman’s gloves, Maggie,” said the landlord. “I’ll take off his coat.”

“Leave the gloves and coat for the present,” murmured Hartwell, “you have only to take me to a room, and then give notice to the authorities.”

He now raised himself with pretended difficulty, and, supported by the girl and the man, stumbled up the stairs with feebleness which was not all pretence, for he was very weary from his tramping, and weak with hunger.

One of the other servant girls followed them with a lamp to a room above stairs, where Hartwell at once drew himself upon an ottoman, whose chintz covering he soiled with mud and blood.

“Get off the gentleman’s boots, Maggie,” said the landlord. “May I take off your coat now, sir?”

“That is all right about my things,” replied Hartwell. “You may leave me and I will do all for myself presently. Perhaps something to eat may do me good, though I have just dined. The shaking has caused me to feel—”

“At once, sir: what will you have?”

“Anything — with some wine. Say, in half an hour’s time I will ring for it. But meanwhile I want some hot water. Bring me this at once.”

“Yes, sir. By the way, sir — what name to give to the police?”

With a renewed chill at the heart Hartwell now, for the first time, pronounced these words:

“Mr James Drayton.”

The landlord and the girl then went away and Hartwell sat on the ottoman in his coat with his wide brow on his gloved palm, till the girl returned with a jug of hot water and lit a fire in the room. When she was gone again, Hartwell locked the door upon himself, took off his outer clothes, his gloves and his boots, poured the hot water into a basin and put the basin on a small table which he pushed to the side of the bed.

He then took out all the objects which Drayton’s pockets contained, except the shreds of Letty’s letter in the coat pocket, and he placed these all together on the table by the bedside with the basin of hot water and the lamp, in order to examine them at his leisure. He then got into bed and lay for some minutes idle, luxuriating in the rest and peace of the soft bed after his weariness and thinking of what chance his strange to-morrow might bring forth.

He would have fallen asleep, but that he severely roused himself with a flash of the eye, warning himself that, however tired he might be, there must be little sleep for him that night. He had kept on his gloves in the presence of the landlord and the girl so that they might not see his working man's hands, and now he put his hands into the basin of hot water, hoping by dint of soaking and soaping to have them at least presentable before the morning came. After some soaking, he used Drayton's penknife to shape the nails and cut away the callous growths round the quicks and then continued to soak them. They had once been as soft and shapely as Drayton's, and only needed coaxing to become so again.

After half an hour he rose, wiped his hands, poured out the water from the basin, and rang for the supper before returning to bed. The girl appeared bringing the news that the two bodies had been taken to the mortuary and bringing also a fat Norfolk capon, an apple tart, and a bottle of port. Hartwell then ate a hearty meal, but without quite that sense of luxury which he had looked for from feast at first. There is always a certain disappointment in the actual enjoyment of the delights which one has longed for and, moreover, Hartwell's mind had already enlarged itself to the largeness of his new kingdom, a kingdom in which the stomach suddenly ceased to be of importance. For men stand, as it were, at different heights, each seeing from his own level, so what the beggar thinks is heaven, the millionaire regards as nothing and what the millionaire pursues, the saint or the thinker regards as a bauble. In one and the same night Hartwell was all the three — beggar, millionaire, and thinker. He had longed for a meal at seven; at nine he had forgotten food, and was thinking of palaces and social grandeur; before midnight, he had half forgotten palaces and was thinking with joy of the laboratory which he would make and of the research work which he would do in it.

When the girl, Maggie, brought the supper, he ordered her to fetch him up some ink, a pen, and some writing paper, with more hot water for his hands. Immediately after the meal, when he was alone again, he set to work to examine Drayton's papers, of which there lay quite a mass on the table near him and, leaning toward the lamp on his elbow, he weighed the meaning of each with a certain sideward sagacity of gaze, a sagacity that smiled in its self-sureness.

Each letter brought its own light to its intelligence, adding its share to its knowledge of Drayton's pursuits, passions, friends, business, environment, tastes, point of view, and ways of life. Only a few lines in one business letter, and the whole of another letter, he tried in vain to understand. Once he stopped short in the reading, and was lost in reflection, asking himself:

"Shall I succeed in carrying it through? Have I the steel, the wit?" And presently, as he read, he muttered, "He seems to have been a great character for horses;" and once again with a severe flash of the eye, he said, "He was a ruffian, this man!" and, lastly, as he read the letter, which he could not understand, he started with a whisper: "Oh, I have a wife—"

In that letter, which had been written by Drayton himself, Hartwell saw these words: "the wife." He had taken out the letter from an envelope which had no address on it, and yet had been fastened down, and it seemed the letter of a crazy man, being, in fact, none other than that nonsense-letter written by Drayton at the "Anchor Tavern" after the death of Letty, in order to be able to say to himself or to others that he had written a letter. For to the greatest liars truth is dear, and men engaged in building up a fabric of lies have been known to mix truth with it in a random way, even at the greatest personal risk to themselves: and so with Drayton and his nonsense-letter. And in this letter Hartwell read the words:

“Dear Sir, — Weather very bad to-night, blowing great guns. So it has come to this: if any one had told me that it would, I should have bet half a million to the contrary. The little wretch went to C.C.” — meaning Corton Chancery— “and heard the wife’s screams. Weather very bad to-night, wind, rain, thunder, and lightning. It isn’t all beer and skittles in this little world; there are things that make a man feel rather cold. Now is the time for all good men to come to the rescue of the party. If that little Kirk only does to Brighteye what I have put him up to do, my Queenie will win the next Oaks as sure as there’s a sun. Now is the time for all good men to come to the rescue of the party. Weather very bad to-night, very bad.

“Yours truly,

“James Drayton.”

“This man was certainly a ruffian in many ways,” thought Hartwell, on reading the letter for the third time and, after tearing off the signature, which he needed, he tore that letter in fine shreds, rose and threw the shreds on the fire with disgust.

When he returned to the bed, he lay for some time with his hands under his head, listening to the sound of the lessening storm outside, and thinking of “the wife.” “The little wretch has gone to C.C., and heard the wife’s screams.” “The” wife could only mean Drayton’s wife, and her occupation was, apparently — to scream. So that for her also, evidently, it was not all beer and skittles in this little world. As to the meaning of “C.C.” there was nothing in what he had so far read to show him. His mind at once took up the notion that “C.C.” was a person, nor did the thought that it might be a place occur to him for many a day. If it had occurred to him in time, it might have saved him a world of misery but, in fact, Drayton’s nonsense letter having been once destroyed, the letters “C.C.” passed out of Hartwell's memory for that memory, though an extraordinary one, soon found as much to carry, as it could bear.

There remained on the table three more letters which he had not read, and the very first of these which he took up still further complicated his relations with women, for it was from a lady to whom Drayton had evidently been engaged at the moment of his death and the discovery of the engagement to be married, of this already married man, drew from Hartwell's lips the exclamation: "This ruffian!" The lady's letter was crested with the three pearled coronet of earldom, came from "The Villa Borgia-Costi, Cannes," was signed "Julia," and said, among other things:

"It is raining to-day, and my Aunt Margaret and I mope, which is nothing strange for her when the racing-season is over, but exceptional for me. So if I am disposed to be over frank with you, you will attribute it to external nature and the way the wind blows...I certainly do not wish to hurt you — I wonder if I could if I tried? — for apart from the wild relations between us, I am convinced that I have some sort of depraved liking for you, you are so breezy and boisterous, and careless of the usual shams. I believe you would beat me blue if I married you, and that is why I said 'yes,' for the same reason that one hunts in 'bullfish' country, because of the spice of madness and danger in it. And then I was really grateful to you for saving my life that day in Northamptonshire, for it was gallantly done at the risk of your own neck and, lastly I suppose, I wished to prove myself independent of the general point of view, to be a mad-cap. I believe, on reflection, that this last was the main leit-motif of my maidenly 'yes.' But I said that I would be quite frank, since it is rainy, and I say that you are heavy, my James, and begin to weigh upon one...

A woman may have a wayward admiration for the Centaur or the Cyclops, and throw kisses at them, but one does not marry them...I have been wondering why we should marry, really? I recommend you to lock yourself into a room and ask yourself that question. Are we fond of each other, then? That does not seem very probable. I repeat and insist upon it, that I do like and enjoy you, as one enjoys a breeze, but how, if I throw you over a week before the wedding? then you might bring an action for breach of promise, which would be fun, and make my brothers swear. It really seems that I am going to do it, unless you give me some reason...

Write soon, and tell me, but not with the thick end of the pen, etc., etc.”

Hartwell saw from the date that this letter was a week old.

“At any rate,” he thought, with a smiling eye, a slight lifting of the lower lids giving always to his eyes their smiling expression; “at any rate, it will not be difficult for me to shirk my engagement with the lively Julia and I shall not delay to release her by letter. I am already married! Let us choose to eschew bigamy and all breaches of the common law. This Drayton was undoubtedly a ruffian—”

In reading and weighing letters and documents, hours passed over Hartwell. It grew on towards midnight, the house was wrapped in silence, and only the wind and rain were heard. But he would not permit himself to sleep. His next care was to take Drayton’s signature which he had torn from the nonsense letter, and to set himself to copy it with the writing material which Maggie had brought him. Drayton’s handwriting was very different from his own, and he foresaw that the typewriter, for some time at least, would have to be his closest friend. But as to the mere signature, that would be easily enough acquired by a day or two of earnest work. He had no lack of trust in his own handiness, capacity, and equalness to every difficulty that might arise. For two hours and a half he was copying the signature, over and over very slowly, like a boy doing his copy-book, with ever repeated “James, James,” “Drayton, Drayton.” Occasionally, if he paused, he soaked his hands in the water, then wiped them and re-commenced the copying. It was far into the foreday when he nodded over the paper, and could hardly go on. He then rose and threw the sheets, on which he had written, into the now dying embers of the fire.

He was in the act of throwing himself backward upon his pillow to enjoy the sweetest sleep when he started, for opposite him, in the half-darkness, he saw a face looking at him. He had blown out the lamp, but one of the blinds was not lowered, so that some sort of light from the outer night with its street lamps relieved the darkness of the room and he could darkly see the face. He knew at once that it was his own face reflected in the mirror of the chest of drawers, but it was also the face of the man whose place in the world he was taking, and the suspicion suggested to his nerves was that he might think the face his own, and yet it might be Drayton’s.

No mind could be colder, or more trained and fixed into scepticism, than Hartwell’s. The average sceptic, looking at the growth of so striking a being as man from the lowest forms of fish-life, cannot help thinking that there has been something intelligently working in the world to bring forth such a product: but to Hartwell’s hard head all was chance, chance. There was no compromise with him: he belonged to the school of Haeckel.

His universe consisted of atoms and ether alone, driven by more or less blind forces. As to ghosts and all other things, “whose existence we have no means of verifying,” these were to him the merest “dreams of man’s childhood.” Yet he did lift his hands to assure himself that the man in the glass lifted his hand also.

His eyes then closed in sleep, but when he was on the point of sleep they opened again to see, for his nerves were not themselves that night, and a man with a black beard and coarse eyebrows was in the glass, dwelling there as in a home. The temptation occurred to Hartwell to rise, and throw a towel over the glass, but he would not do this. Finally his eyes flashed with a certain severe humor characteristic of him. He suddenly closed his lids, and was soon involved in as wild a vision as ever rioted in a man's head.

VI. HARTWELL HEARS FROM A LADY OF TITLE

IN THE GREY of the morning Hartwell opened his eyes and the first thing which he saw was a towel hanging over the mirror of the chest of drawers. He was astonished and could only conclude that he had put it there during sleep, for it happened to him to walk in his sleep before this, but his rising from bed to do this proved that his nervous fancy about Drayton's face during the night had made a deep enough impression on his nerves. He now smiled at himself for being subject to such disorders of digestion and dismissed the matter from his mind.

For two hours he then lay, full of plans and thought. During that time he made a review of all that the world contained to gratify him and of all these things he chose out what pleased him best. It has been shown that revels and poms were already below the level to which his staid mind had risen, but among the letters he had seen one from the captain of a yacht called the Sempronia. She was his now and he would travel; and there was a long-love science of biology; he would become a genuinely "learned man" — that old dream of his. He could picture himself moving about his own laboratory, adding a little to the sum of human knowledge.

First, however, he would give his mind to acquiring a sufficient working knowledge of Drayton's business in order to retire from it without serious loss. There would have to be at least one month's daily personal attendance at the office in Fenchurch Street, after which he would probably be able to retire with credit in order to lead a mild, studious, epicurean life, the life of much science, a little art, and the pagan virtues.

For the pagan virtues, or any virtue, Hartwell had no more respect theoretically, than for vice, since “a pure egotism” was his summing up of the duty of man. But since he had inherited a tendency to virtue from his father and forefathers, he knew that more or less virtue was as needful to his comfort as breathing; “the pagan virtues,” therefore, and a life of calm study, was the line along which he foresaw his maximum of happiness in that great new world into which he was that morning born. Drayton’s friends would, of course, be greatly surprised at such a change in Drayton’s manner of life — no more Epsom, unbridled motor cars, and rattling doings.

Hartwell foresaw their surprise, but he decided that he would live his life as he thought fit: for by old habit of mind he looked with no small disdain upon “the human animal in his present stage of development,” and was ever disposed to esteem lightly the opinions of that animal. From time to time he might pretend in his new world that the shock of the motor car accident had made a difference in him and, for the rest, he trusted in the bodily oneness between himself and Drayton to bear the strain of any novelty of conduct that might be marked in the new Drayton.

As to “the wife” who “screamed,” he he would provide for and somehow rid himself of her, if he was really married; and as to Julia, the sweetheart, he would be quickly rid of her, too. So he lay and dreamed and planned in the early morning, not counting upon the unexpected which, however, is always sure to happen: and within two hours his new state of existence seemed already as old and stale to him as if he had been a rich man and filled Drayton’s place for ten years. As for hunger and want they had become to him unrealities as remote and forgotten as the nightmare of the night.

Near eight he rose to go to Drayton's overcoat pocket where there were still some shreds of paper which he had not examined. He had felt them in the pocket and, on account of the trouble of fitting them together, had not taken them out on taking the mass of other papers. He now took them in one heap, unlocked his door, removed the towel from the mirror, returned to bed, and began to fit the shreds of paper together.

But he was almost at once interrupted in this by a rap and bundled the shreds with the other papers as the opened door, let in a flood of day light, and the girl, Maggie, came in asking how he was.

"Much better, thank you," said Hartwell.

"Hodder, the sergeant, is downstairs asking to speak with you, sir," she said.

"Send him up and bring me a breakfast of hard-boiled eggs and coffee," said Hartwell. "Then see what can be made of my clothes by dint of cleaning. The overcoat, I think, is beyond your cares, and I must get a new one in the town; or perhaps I shall take from the police that of my friend, Mr — McCalmont."

He had seen from the letters that McCalmont was the name of Drayton's right-hand man, and also that McCalmont had accompanied his chief on the motor car expedition to Sheffield. He therefore made the true guess that this was the name of the second dead man.

The girl took up his clothes and went out. Then came in the officer, hat in hand, saying, "sorry sir, I'm sure, for your terrible accident."

"Ah, yes," said Hartwell, "I have had a memorable shaking, sergeant and an escape only to be attributed to the interpositions of a merciful Providence."

"Bad bruise on the forehead sir, I see," said the officer in a sympathetic voice.

“Yes, I was pitched head foremost over the cart — happily into a mass of mud. Sit down on that side of the bed while I have some breakfast and I will tell you all.”

Hodder, the sergeant, sat and they spoke of the accident, of the condition of the two bodies and what had been done with the half-burned car, with the cart and with the guilty carter. As for the inquest, the coroner had issued his warrants and it would be at two p.m.

“It was a night o’ trouble, last night,” remarked the officer, as he rose to go, “what with the storm and there’s Mr Barnes, of the “Anchor Inn,” can’t find his daughter, Letty. Its odd too, sir, how that laboring man got himself between your motor car and the cart. There’s precious little left of his head, I see.”

Hartwell’s eyes, characterised by a certain humorous vivacity in their sideward look, smiled upon him as he said:

“The poor tramp perished in trying to save us. We heard him howling out to us but had no idea what he meant. The lamps may have dazzled and made him think us farther from him than we were and so he got himself between the car and the cart.”

“You must have been going a pace, sir!”

“No doubt. If you like to fine me, I suppose I must pay—”

“Oh, that’ll be all right sir, bless you,” said Hodder, the sergeant.

He then went away, but before Hartwell could finish his breakfast, in came the girl again, this time with a breezy telegram, which said:

“CONGRATULATION! HURRAH! — BENTLEY.”

And while he ate, three more arrived. This meant that the accident of the night had got into the London morning papers; and by 10.30 there was quite a crowd of telegrams.

One of them said:

“MY HEARTY CONGRATULATION; I AM COMING DOWN TO YOU. — OSWALD.”

Another said:

“THE OFFICE BEG TO UNITE IN EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY AND CONGRATULATIONS. — FOTHERGILL.”

A third said:

“YOUR USUAL LUCK; THREE CHEERS FOR THE OLD FIRM! — EDWARDS.”

Hartwell lay back smoking a cigar: but he was to find no rest now from the rain of congratulatory telegrams. There was only one which was the reverse of congratulatory, for it said:

“YOU HAVE ESCAPED THIS TIME, BUT NOT FOR LONG,” and this one was anonymous. Near one o’clock there came one from “the sweetheart” at Cannes, saying:

“THE NEWS HAS BEEN TELEGRAPHED ME BY YOUR BROTHER: ACCEPT MY CONGRATULATIONS. — JULIA.”

He had just read this when Maggie, whose legs were growing weary of mounting and going down the stairs, re-appeared, saying:

“Mr Oswald Drayton to see you, sir.”

“Ah,” thought Hartwell, “this is that Oswald who was ‘coming down to me,’ and he is a ‘Drayton,’ the ‘brother’ probably whom ‘Julia’ speaks of.

Now, then, begins the test,” and his eyes hardened keenly under their coarse brows. “Show him up,” he said.

Presently there entered before Hartwell, in his room at the inn, a man rather under middle size, with a polished bald head (though he was only 35) and a friz of reddish hair running behind from ear to ear. He had a well-curved moustache, a hard chin, square jaws, a square head and a limp in his walk. His dress was the perfection of correctness, with some studied harmony between the tie, the gloves, the morning coat and, in all his air, a suggestion of club-land and Pall Mall.

“This does not look like my brother,” thought Hartwell, quickly. But he was bold, he spoke first, though with a quailing sense of rashness, saying quietly: “My good Oswald, you are kind to come—”

But the words were so unlike Drayton’s, who had usually addressed brother Oswald with a rough off-handiness, tossing him anon a careless hundred-pound-note, that Oswald stopped short one moment and his eyebrows slightly lifted. He shook hands, saying:

“My dear James, I am delighted at your escape, but — my dear fellow — you certainly look bad.”

“In what way?” asked Hartwell quickly.

“Done up somehow, thinner—”

“Haven’t I — cause?”

“Of course you have. I have myself lost a pound at least in weight since hearing of the accident. By a mere chance my man, Magee, saw it in the ‘Times’ about eight this morning, and I at once telegraphed to Lady Methwold. Er — heard from her, by the way?”

Hartwell at the first instant did not know who Lady Methwold was and, though in the second instant he guessed, his momentary conclusion caused him to say, more to himself than to Oswald, “Lady Methwold — you mean Julia.”

Oswald slowly seated himself, and slowly turned his large gaze upon Hartwell, for all Oswald’s movements were slow and premeditated. He was stiffer even than his collar. Anon he slowly turned his gaze at his image in the glass with sublime eyebrows. There was about him some detachment or absence of mind, as of one musing inwardly on himself and not finding surrounding objects of sufficient interest to occupy his attention.

“My good fellow,” said he, “you are queer. Why on earth am I to call Lady Methwold ‘Julia’ before your marriage with her, if that ever arrives? Has she telegraphed to you?” He asked it with an interest which did not escape Hartwell’s notice.

“Yes. Why?” asked Hartwell.

“Curiosity. Don’t be odd. One has always a natural interest in people whose actions are always unexpected. Tell me about the spill” — with half a yawn.

Hartwell, looking at him penetratingly, said:

“Why tell you? You are not really anxious about the spill.”

Oswald again turned his large eyes upon the bed, subconscious, no doubt, of a change in Drayton’s noisy, slangy choice of words, and he said with surprise:

“My good James! do you mean because I merely yawned? It is that infernal journey — You are queer to-day. I see you have got a knock on the head. If I was not anxious, why come? No other brother would.”

“He is poor,” thought Hartwell, “and a sponger: his motive is money.”

But before he could sound Oswald further, the breathless Maggie again looked in, saying, “Mr Barnes to see you, sir.”

“Show him up,” said Hartwell, without having any idea who Mr Barnes was, and in a minute in came the red beard and constant frown of Barnes, the father of the murdered Letty.

“You will excuse me, sir,” began Barnes, “I am in a bit of trouble—”

“Yes, just take that chair, Mr Barnes,” said Hartwell.

“Thank you, sir. Sorry to hear of your accident, sir, and I congratulate you on your lucky escape. I am very much put about this morning, sir, or should not have troubled you. Fact is — God help us all! — my daughter, Letty, left the house during the night and can’t be found.”

At the mention of that name, “Letty,” Oswald Drayton slowly turned himself to look at Barnes, and listened closer.

“I thought she might have come to her cousin’s in Aylsham,” continued Barnes; “at least, it was just possible, but she hasn’t. There’s no telling where’s she got to, or when she left the house, or why, or — anything. Forgive a father’s feelings, gentlemen—”

The man buried his face, and a sob was heard in the room. Oswald’s gaze turned upon Hartwell’s face.

“I am sorry for your trouble, Barnes,” said Hartwell. “I only hope that —” he was about to say, “am in no way connected—” but checked himself.

“I have been thinking that it is just possible that you may have seen the lass last night, sir,” said Barnes, looking up.

“I may have, tell me more.”

“You recollect coming to The Anchor in your motor car, sir? It must have been about twenty past seven?”

“That is true, I had almost forgotten. My head is all in a topsy-turvey this morning, Barnes. You see where I got the blow—” Hartwell passed his palm across the breadth of his brow, and Oswald’s gaze travelled slowly from one to the other.

“Forgive me for troubling you sir, with my troubles, when you have your own,” said Barnes. “I had the notion that if you had seen the lass when you went upstairs to write your letter, then we’d be able to say that at that hour, anyway, she was in the house. But if you don’t recollect seeing her, I can only wish you a good day, and a speedy recovery — ah, good God!”

Barnes sighed, and stamped his stick and his foot together as he rose, the picture of loss and care.

“You are certain to find her, Barnes!” Hartwell called comfortingly after him, “have you made a thorough search?”

“The house, the whole neighborhood, five of us, since midnight, sir. She’s gone, God knows where to.”

The old man went out, and as he disappeared, Oswald’s eyebrows deliberately lifted and, turning upon Hartwell, he said:

“I am prepared to take an oath that you have run off with that girl, James.”

The fact was that, five days before this, Oswald had received a letter from a woman unknown to him named Letty Barnes, asking if he would tell her the proposed date of his brother’s marriage with Lady Methwold; he had received it with a number of others brought him by his man Magee, at his club, and had then somehow dropped or mislaid it, for when he looked for it afterwards he could not find it anywhere. But he happened to remember the name Letty, because Letty seemed to be someone who, like himself, had a dislike to his brother.

“What makes you think that I have run off with her?” asked Hartwell.

Oswald would say nothing about Letty’s letter to him, but said only:

“Why else should you stop at that inn when you were coming to dine at Aylsham? You have run off with her — dreadful scoundrel.”

This was meant as flattery for Oswald, having come down to beg for money, wished to please. The real Drayton would have undoubtedly chuckled at being thus prodded about his conquests, but Hartwell who was born with the soul of a professor in the body of a Viking, took it without the least humor, foreseeing already that Drayton's way of life would probably involve him in some distasteful episodes. He looked at Oswald with a smiling eye, saying:

"I see that your methods of deduction are not conclusive, Oswald. Because I stopped on my way to dine at Aylsham at the 'Anchor Inn,' therefore, you say, I have run off with the girl there. But the landlord has already given you my real reason for stopping — namely, to write a letter."

"You would have waited till you came to Aylsham to write it, if you hadn't had some other motive," said Oswald, "and what on earth are you doing in this part of the country at all? My man, Magee, told me that you had gone to Sheffield for something, or other."

"So I had. But I returned this way to do some business at Cromer."

"Do people do business at Cromer?" asked Oswald wearily, looking at his image in the wardrobe glass with the critical detachment of a drill sergeant. "I thought Cromer was all bathing machines and shrimps. It is of no importance, my dear James. I don't know why you take it gravely, a girl less or more can't matter to you. But I thought that you were going to reform when you became engaged to her ladyship of Garlot. Magee, who never can get over his surprise that she ever took you, thinks that if she had any conception of your rowdyism, she would send you to the devil."

(Magee was Oswald's Irish servant, and Oswald seldom opened his mouth, without somehow bringing in Magee.)

"Magee is right," said Hartwell, "I am, in fact, already practically thrown over. So, if it will comfort you to know that I shall not finally outrun you in the good graces of that lady, then be comforted. We shall not marry.”

Hartwell’s thick lips smiled clinically as he said this, with that definite point in the middle of the upper pressed into the lower, not thinking how sad a prophecy he uttered. Oswald stared incredulously at him, as he uttered it, though even the mere prophecy pleased Oswald for one of the dreads of his life was that his brother should marry anyone, since that would mean the loss of two entails which would fall to him if his brother died without an heir.

Oswald had no suspicion that his brother had married nine years before this, in South Africa, a certain Martha Harper, and he had taken to his bed for a week, sick with disgust, when the extraordinary news of Drayton’s engagement with Lady Julia became public, for he himself had long worshipped Julia as a “bright particular star” afar off, and had vaguely hoped to wed it. That the “James” whom he despised should have rushed in and conquered where Oswald feared to tread was a marvel to which Oswald’s slow mind could never accustom itself. He had a constitutional and chronic dislike for the breezy Drayton, who threw him doles and checks with a careless hand, as one throws bones to a dog, and with this dislike was mixed a fine-gentleman disdain for the rough-and-ready city-man which Oswald could often hardly keep from peeping through his pretended chumship with James, to whom he was obliged to cringe, since his elegant existence among the tip-top circles was almost dependent on James’ doles.

The brothers had not grown up together. They moved for the most part in different sets. Till James’ surprising engagement with the wayward and independent Julia, James and Oswald could hardly have been called social equals, Oswald being so distinguished, though poor, and James so democratic a fellow, though a millionaire. Their parents had been pretty high in the social scale, but at an early age James had quarrelled with his father, had run away from school, resolving to stand on his own footing and make his own way, and in South Africa, where he lived a good many years, had laid the foundations of his large fortune.

It was not surprising, therefore, that little love was lost between the brothers, since they had seen little of each other, nor did Oswald's dislike — as yet — amount to actual hatred of "James." Yet that morning when he had been shown by Magee the account in the newspaper of the good James' escape from the spill, the thought in Oswald's mind, though he did not express it, was this: "My vicious luck."

He and Hartwell conversed for half an hour in a desultory way, Hartwell pumping him on the details of Oswald's own and the dead Drayton's mode of existence, their friends, habits, and so on, till at one-thirty Hartwell started, saying:

"I must get up and dress for that inquest."

Then Oswald, too, rose, and paced a little, anon inspecting the image in the glass, saying:

"So McCalmont is gone? Well, one cannot pretend to be sorry. I hated McCalmont."

"Why so?" asked Hartwell, glad of any scrap of information.

"You know very well that he used to put you against me, James. I say, Jimmy" — Oswald's voice lowered rather meanly— "I lost £80 on that dreadful Riley-match, and there's an infernal bill from Prince's this week. Don't think I'm exigent, but I might have scraped something together to-day from somewhere, if I had not rushed down to see you. May I count upon a hundred before I start back to town."

"I will think about it," said Hartwell, not intending to give. "You might go down while I dress and ask the girl whether the sergeant has sent me McCalmont's overcoat, as I told him to. My own is all stained."

“Is it that splendid sable of yours that is all stained? I say, may I have it, Jimmy? I might use the fur.”

“If you like!” said Hartwell off-handedly.

Oswald went out, while Hartwell dressed in Drayton’s clothes, which the girl had well cleaned and brought up, some time before. He then descended to the commercial room, where lunch was waiting for him, and he and Oswald sat to lunch.

Oswald was all the time conscious in a dull way of some change, some heightening of mind and character in the good James before him, but without making any attempt to account for it. All problems, in fact, were regarded by Oswald as an ox regards a five-barred gate, seeing it certainly there, but unable to understand who made it, or how, or why, and not caring, but chewing its cud, and feeling bored. During the lunch, however, Oswald could not but be surprised at the little that “James” drank, and he asked:

“Why are you drinking less heroically, my good James? That spill has had a chastening effect upon you. You are less florid and boisterous, somehow. You look like a converted burglar, which is horrid. I believe her fair ladyship of Garlot would almost prefer the unconverted type. Better not change, James, from just what you were at the moment of her consent, or she will certainly fly off at a tangent, and leave you. Is that really true then, that she shows sighs of restiveness?”

“Yes,” said Hartwell.

“Tell me.”

“I have a letter saying that she has re-considered the matter, and is disposed to cast me into despair.”

“Despair!” repeated Oswald to himself, with a mocking breath of laughter. Just that little turn of expression was so unexpected for his slangy brother to use. “But do you think that she meant it, Jimmy?”

“I have no doubt about it — Ah that makes you glad, Oswald! Your sympathies with the pangs of your brother are not so profound as they should be, my friend.”

Oswald glanced at him in surprise, and then said with abashed lids in a lower voice:

“My dear James, you are queer to-day.”

Already the power of Hartwell’s personality was producing upon him an effect of greater respect.

“You remarked that before,” said Hartwell, “that I am queer to-day. But in what sense queer? Because I probe in you your unbrotherly mood? You are to get it well into your mind Oswald, that I am not queer to-day, even if I was queer before.”

“My dear fellow,” said Oswald, “I don’t care a curse whether you are queer or not. I don’t know what it is all about. If I am glad at all that Lady Methwold won’t have you, it is partly for your sake. You know very well that you have no earthly right to such a wife.”

“Why not?”

“Because, because. You know very well. In two weeks she would play the very deuce with you, or you with her, or both. She is the very finest flower of nineteenth-century Society, and you belong to the Roman Empire under Galba.”

“Not altogether to the Roman Empire, Oswald,” said Hartwell with a twinkling eye. “No! I have heard a mention of the geologic ages, my friend, at least a mention, though you may not think so well of me. And why, after all, am I not a suitable catch for a lady of title? I am rich —

“Not a suitable match for her, James. There are plenty of others who will be glad of you, if you are sufficiently absurd to desire rank in a wife. What, then have you done about her letter?”

“Nothing yet. I mean to answer it shortly. And I shall accept her inclination to withdraw from the engagement as being as serious as I consider it wise.”

“You won’t really, James?”

“Yes, never fear, you shall be well pleased!”

“Magee tells me that she is coming back from Cannes before Christmas, first to Garlot Croft, and then for hunting in Gloucestershire.”

“I may see her then, or write before — Ah, it must be time for the inquest,” Hartwell rose as he said this, and took out the dead man’s watch to look at it, and now occurred a painful incident to him, for he could not open the watch, which was double cased, and only opened on the touching of a tiny spring which he did not know where to find. He fumbled with the winding knob, but the watch would not open, and catching sight of Oswald looking at him, he grew rather confused, feeling that he should surely know the secret of opening his own watch. It was rather a bitter moment. The watch would not open, and Hartwell’s colour slightly changed when Oswald asked:

“Why ever can’t you open it?”

This question, innocent as it was, was never forgotten by Hartwell who, in his sensitive outlook for the first sign of a suspicion that he was not Drayton, was apt to flee when no man pursued. From that moment, he definitely disliked, as well as despised, Oswald, in whom however, not even the beginning of a suspicion of anything wrong had arisen. For men know each other, not by vague impressions of character or manner, but almost entirely by the broad evidence of the senses, so that if one knows one’s brother, or one’s husband, to be a saint, yet if someone exactly like him came home tipsy one day, the last thing which one would think is that it was not really he. One might say, “I cannot believe my eyes,” but one would nevertheless believe them, in spite of a whole life's excellence of character, for our trust in our senses is perfect — far more perfect than they deserve.

If even the faintest suspicion should happen to arise in one's mind that the tipsy man might not really be one's brother or husband, then the march from that to certainty would in most cases be swift, but the birth of such a suspicion would be more hard and stubborn than the changing of coal into diamond, if the bodily resemblance was very strong. In the case of Hartwell and Drayton, not only was the manner, speech and tone of mind as different as possible in the two men, but even the bodily resemblance was not perfect. For Hartwell's beard was worn quite an inch shorter than Drayton's and the raspberry birth-mark on his temple was rather smaller, and of a different shape to that of Drayton. Yet that "first suspicion" which was necessary to open the eyes to see all this did not occur to Oswald nor, for a long time, to anyone.

Such an incident as that of the watch, and a hundred others like it which did not fail to occur to Hartwell during the first two weeks of the imposture, might have opened any eyes but those fast closed by the undoubting certainty that he was Drayton, since he was like Drayton, and stood in Drayton's shoes. He was quite a minute fumbling with Drayton's watch, yet could not open it. His first impulse was to say that the shock of the spill had made him forget everything, finally, however, he rose better than that to the emergency, his perfect calm returning as he quietly said:

"I see the cover got strained in my fall. Never mind, it must be time to go."

They then set out for the court, Hartwell in a hat of the landlord's and in McCalmont's overcoat which Hodder, the sergeant, had sent him. He walked down the street, still keeping up the pretence of feebleness, leaning on Oswald's arm, with his palm on the bruise on his brow. The wealth and importance of Drayton had been learned by Aylsham from the morning papers, so Hartwell was received by the coroner and his twelve men like a sovereign who had been the victim of someone's wrong-doing, was condoled with, was not permitted to stand in giving his evidence, and finally went out with everyone bowing to him. As to the furious driving not a word was said.

The jury did not give their verdict that day, and on this account, as well as to meet Mrs McCalmont and her father who had telegraphed him their coming down, Hartwell had to remain at Aylsham that night. Oswald, meanwhile, was clearly beginning to fidget — hating to stay — for outside of Mayfair he was like a fish out of water, yet afraid to speak of hurrying off, lest he should go without the £100, for 'James' was touchy and a creature of whims. But as they re-entered the old coaching house, he ventured to say at last:

"I think I must go, Jimmy; I could hardly stand a night in this hole."

"Then go, my friend," answered Hartwell, who had now sufficiently used Oswald to pump from him all the knowledge he could furnish, and wished to be alone to study McCalmont's papers, which he had just obtained at the court.

"Then may I have the cheque, Jimmy, before I go?" asked Oswald in a certain sycophant voice.

"I think not," answered Hartwell. He had Drayton's cheque-book, but did not yet consider himself sufficiently expert in signing Drayton's name to do so, even if he had wished to be obliging. But Hartwell was no scatterer of £100 cheques, and did not wish to be obliging and, at that moment, the enmity already begun between him and Oswald deepened.

"But I thought you promised?" said Oswald.

"I said that I would think about it."

“Don’t be a miser, Jimmy! Didn’t I rush down at once to see you?”

“No doubt, but I have been over-liberal of late. You know that.”

“The clown!” muttered Oswald to himself, “but what has happened to the brute? His choice of words seems different — Won’t you then, Jimmy?”

“No.”

That “No” was very final. Hartwell went up to his room, and Oswald lingered in the commercial room for two hours, pacing there with his slow limp, as the afternoon shadows lengthened, nosing the old window panes, his mind bitter with the miseries of scarcity, and with the thought which haunted it that, if the car had only pitched James when it had pitched McCalmont, then he, Oswald, would have changed his rooms in a week’s time to the Albany and would have wintered in Algiers.

As for Hartwell, wearied with the anxieties of the day and night, he had gone again to bed. He already knew Oswald through and through and acted with respect to him without hesitation. For already a certain heightening of wit and insight, which his ticklish situation called forth, was begun in him — a certain “adaptation to his environment,” almost like the growth of a new sense which, in a few weeks, would find him sharpened at the call of a thousand exigencies into a very genius of swift discernment and decision.

When Oswald went up to say good-bye, he found Hartwell asleep. He did not wake him but, coming down again to go, got the “splendid sable” overcoat which Hartwell had made him a present of, from the maid, who had cleaned it as well as she could. He was about to leave the tavern, when, feeling in the pockets of the overcoat, in the vague hope of finding a forgotten five pound note, he found instead a shred of paper. A shred of Letty Barnes’ letter to Lady Methwold, which Hartwell had chanced to leave behind in the pocket in taking out the rest in a heap.

The hand-writing interested Oswald, he seemed to know it. Letty Barnes had written to him in that hand, asking the date of his brother's marriage.

"James" had said that morning that he did not know Letty, yet here was a shred of her writing in James' pocket and on it Oswald read the word and the half-word: "cruel bru."

That seemed very odd to Oswald that James should have denied knowing her, for James usually took such things more lightly. What, then, had he done with this Letty?

Oswald called Maggie again, and asked her:

"Has anything more been heard of Mr Barnes' daughter?"

"I don't think so, sir," she answered. "There's a great excitement about it in the town. Everybody was that fond of Letty."

"Where is the 'Anchor Inn?'"

"About two miles from here, between Ingworth and Coleby, sir."

"I want you to get me a horse and trap."

Oswald waited till this was procured him, and instead of walking to the station, drove to "The Anchor," and actually slept there that night.

Hartwell, on his part, spent the night much as he had spent the last, studiously examining McCalmont's papers, making his plans for the future and forming his handwriting on the model of Drayton's. About nine in the evening there occurred to him an event in the shape of a letter from Lady Julia. It had been written two days after the one of hers which he had found in Drayton's pocket, threatening him with dismissal, and four days before Julia had heard of his accident. The letter had gone from Cannes to Drayton's house in Addison Road, and was now sent down to Aylsham with some others by a Miss Scatchett, who was Drayton's town housekeeper.

In this letter Lady Methwold did what in the previous letter she had only threatened to do, for with a light and almost flippant touch, but still firmly enough, she threw Drayton over, giving no reason that any British jury would take seriously. Though it was evident “between the lines” that she had thought seriously of the matter, for she accounted in one place for her change of whim by the fact that she was “six months older.” Hartwell had already so identified himself with Drayton, that, if he had been dissected, some slight pique or feeling of offence would have been found within him at this light treatment. He read the letter with a cold and smiling eye, and murmured when he was finished:

“Your ladyship will be spared the action, and since I no longer possess your ladyship’s affections, I shall now set about and dispose myself to exist without them.”

He was almost merry that night — as near it as his earnest nature ever got — full of a sense of success, safety, and old-established ease. But as he was dropping off to sleep, about two in the morning, the same thing as on the previous night troubled his repose, for he caught sight of a face in the mirror which was his, and yet might possibly be Drayton’s. The face meditated upon him, and since Hartwell looked at it through half-closed lids, the face seemed a dead man’s face. This disturbed Hartwell, as such things do to one who is about to sleep and though he had smiled at himself that morning, his unrest was even greater this second night. It was a morbidness, the beginning of a madness — which might grow. Fearing lest he should again cover the mirror in his sleep, he rose and threw the towel over it. Till he did that he could not sleep.

VII. HARTWELL COMES HOME

THE NEXT EVENING, near eight, James Drayton's brougham awaited its master at Liverpool Street Station, for Hartwell, after making arrangements for the burial of the "tramp," and the bringing of McCalmont's body to London, had telegraphed his coming to Miss Scatchett, his housekeeper, and she had sent a brougham to meet him.

It was a dark, rainy night, and the scene about the station was a blur of umbrellas, wheels, mist, lights, mud, and hurrying feet.

Standing in it all, apparently awaiting someone, was a tall young man, with a wide hat tilted aside on his head, blonde hair, and the most alert eyes — evidently a Frenchman — with a certain dancing levity in all his air. His clothes were of a fashionable cut, but shabby, he had no overcoat, no umbrella and his jacket collar was turned up. But though cold and poor, he did not seem depressed, being a young man used to the ups and downs of life, certain to be rich to-morrow, if he was poor to-day, and quite certain to be poor again the day after to-morrow. His name was Emile Dulaunay, Count d'Artenset-Villiers, for though penniless for the moment, he was the representative of one of the oldest seigneurial families.

"Mon dieu!" thought the count, "I wish that she would come."

But he was getting wet, his expected friend did not appear and finally, seeing a brougham standing just near him among a number of carriages, and seeing also that its door had by chance fallen open he, in his nimble way, slipped in out of the rain, with a grimace of self-conscious monkeyism, and there in the brougham, he sat, leaning out of the door with a bright outlook both for his expected friend and for the owner of the brougham, ready to slip out at the first sign of the latter's appearing.

He had not been three minutes in the brougham, when quite near him a big man in a furred coat seemed to rise out of the ground, calling out: "Drayton's carriage!" This was Hartwell, just arrived from Aylsham. Hartwell, of course, did not know his own carriage and coachman, and his hesitating indirect approach in the crowd had given the Frenchman no hint that he was the owner of the carriage. At the call of "Drayton's carriage!" the coachman sang out in reply: "Here, sir!" and before the Frenchman could stir, Hartwell was at the carriage door.

The excellent count was about to laugh an excuse and take to flight when, to his extreme mystification, Hartwell said, "How do you do?" put out his hand, and shook the count's. For Hartwell naturally assumed that here must be some household friend or dependant of Drayton's who had come in the carriage to meet him.

Hartwell got hurriedly into the carriage, saying to Dulaunay:

"Tell him to drive us home fast, I am hungry."

And Dulaunay at once said to himself "Here then, evidently, is a dinner arranged beforehand for me by the good God himself."

A born adventurer and hanger-on on Providence, living by instants like a bird, Dulaunay followed always giddily whither chance led, little recking whither that might be, and leaning out of the door he called to the astonished driver, who had not seen him get in: "It is necessary that you hasten yourself!" whereupon the carriage moved, and off they went westward.

There was a silence for a time in the dim brougham, each of its two occupants waiting in vain for the other to speak. Dulaunay would not say a word, and finally Hartwell asked:

“Is everything going well at home?”

“But, sir, I hope it,” answered Dulaunay.

Hartwell considered that answer in silence.

“Tell me about things,” he said, presently.

“What things, sir?”

“Everything.”

“Well — but— ‘everything’ is a sufficiently ample subject, you will admit, sir! It is, in effect, an abstract science that, sir, demands — .” The count said this with reproach.

“Ha! yes, that is so. I see that you are as full of your jokes as usual.”

“But yes, as usual, sir. It is better to take the life lightly, is it not, sir?”

“You are a philosopher as well as a humorist,” said Hartwell, “and a philosopher of my own school. I am in agreement with you.”

He did not know what to make of the Frenchman by his side, who was evidently a man of culture and no chef, nor was it within the bounds of Dulaunay’s fancy to conceive why this excellent sir was taking him in his carriage to dinner. They were now passing down Holborn. Hartwell longed and was sorely tempted, to ask the name and relation to himself of the man who was so near to him, yet was so strange, dark, and spectral to his consciousness. But, as he was supposed to know, to ask was precisely the thing which he was resolved in no case to do. Dulaunay for his part could only dream that he was the subject of some mistake which might bring him a dinner and other good chances, and refrained from uttering rashness with his lips, so that the two men, wholly unrelated till that hour, but now linked fast together by a chain of circumstances, remained perfect riddles one to the other.

“As to my housekeeper?” said, Hartwell, brusquely, after a long time.

“What, as to her?” asked the excellent count.

“Is she well?”

“I venture to cherish the hope that she is well, sir,” said Dulaunay, in a tone of some surprise.

“You have not seen her lately, then?”

“Not perhaps lately, sir.”

“Where, then, have you been?”

“I? Why at home.”

“I see, at home, but not come in contact with her, so to say?”

“Not into personal contact, perhaps, sir.”

“You say ‘perhaps’ always,” said Hartwell, reproachfully.

“Yes, sir,” answered Dulaunay.

There was silence between them again, till Hartwell said:

“I am late, by the way. I hope our dinner will not spoil.”

“The heaven defend that, sir,” answered the count, in a quiet and confident tone of protest.

Hartwell, meantime, was thinking: “Strange that he asks me not a word about the accident;” and presently he said:

“What did you think of my accident?”

“Your accident? Mon Dieu! but the news of your accident sensibly touches me, sir,” cried the count.

“I cannot, however, flatter myself that you exhibit the keenest interest in the details.”

“I! but even the keenest!” cried the count, “permit me instantly, sir, to ask of you a full history of that vexing circumstance!”

Hartwell, with that humorous shrewd look of his narrow eye, answered:

“I will not burden you on the eve of your dinner. A motor car may be heavy for digestion.”

Whereupon Dulaunay at once spun round toward Hartwell in an ardour of narrative, exclaiming:

“A motor car! but I have not yet told you, I think, of that what you call it?— ‘upset’ that arrived to me in the Upper Auvergne? You are going to hear—”

And the glib count plunged into a story of hair-breadth escape, full of cries and gesticulation, which lasted till they were sweeping through the gates of Addison Road to the house.

Arrived at James Drayton’s home in Addison’s Road, the two occupants of the carriage got out. The coachman, who had seen only one man get in, saw two get out, but almost before he could ask himself anew how that was, his attention was all drawn off from this question by the strange conduct of a mastiff — a large, buff watch-dog, named “Bull” — which had bounded from the outer hall as the carriage entered the drive. Bull had been a great friend of Drayton’s, and the moment Hartwell appeared at the carriage door the hound ran to fondle him and be fondled by him. But half-way to the carriage the dog stopped short, uttered a yelp, then a growl, and now was apparently about to spring with a bristling neck and no good meaning upon the new-comer. But again he stopped short, whined and shrunk backwards, with vague eyes of awe, his back bristling with superstitious horror. And suddenly the dog was in flight, whimpering, his tail between his legs, round the house to the back.

The coachman, seeing all this, muttered to himself:

“Well, I never!”

And Hartwell thought:

“Our dog will have to be reasoned with severely!”

Miss Scatchett, the housekeeper, had thought fit, in view of so great an event as the accident, to have her staff assembled in the inner-hall, where

Hartwell shook hands all round, receiving their congratulations with an affable dignity while the Frenchman stuck to his elbow with many bows and an opening of the arms.

“Well, Mr Drayton, you have had a miraculous escape, heaven be praised!” said Miss Scatchett, a very meagre old gentlewoman, with a bird-like and active air, who wore old brown silks and black silk mits on her hands. Hartwell already knew her name and decided at his first glance at her that she was a spinster.

“Such is life, Miss Scatchett,” he said; “I am safe, you see, I am here, in spite of all. Let all be attributed to that merciful Providence which occupies itself in watching over our mute existences. I received your letter of sympathy, and thank you. I thank you all — I wish this overcoat taken to my room. It is my poor McCalmont’s” — and he threw off the overcoat to the arm of a footman, his object being to discover the whereabouts of his own room, and when the footman moved Hartwell followed, and when Hartwell moved Dulaunay followed.

“Ah, I fear you have had a truly terrible shock sir,” said Miss Scatchett, who also went up with them for, missing the breezy entrance of her old Drayton and finding instead a self-respecting and genial dignity, she could only put this down to the shock of the accident.

“Yes, a terrible shock enough,” answered Hartwell, “it may be months before I am myself again. I believe that you will henceforth miss in me a certain, let me say, boisterousness, Miss Scatchett. I feel myself somewhat changed. The memory in particular seems rather clouded. I struck just here, where you see the bruise.”

“Dear, dear me!”

“Well, never mind, I say! Let us take all things cheerily and bravely as they come, Miss Scatchett. Our earth is not a paradise, but the Chance which governs it is not uniformly bitter. Ah, here we are.”

The footman with the coat now entered a room on the first floor, into which Hartwell followed him, and seeing Dulaunay about to follow also said rather testily, “You may, perhaps, prefer to go to your own room, sir, before dinner.”

“Certainly, sir,” answered the count, and turned with enquiring brows towards Miss Scatchett, who was wondering that he had not been presented to her while Hartwell, on his side, assumed that the Count was well known to her.

“This way, sir,” said Miss Scatchett to Dulaunay, as Hartwell closed the door upon himself, and she led the way up another soft stair to a bed-room overlooking the lawn. And here Dulaunay, after surveying its spaciousness, the bright fire, the draperies, and comfortable bed, muttered to himself:

“Mon dieu, it is not but the English, after all, who know to be imposing!”

“May I ask, sir,” said Miss Scatchett, “if you will be staying any considerable time with Mr Drayton?”

“But, madame, I hope it,” said the pleased Frenchman. “Have the goodness to make to know Mr Drayton that I descend to dinner in five minutes.”

“Very good sir, and your name?”

“Emile Dulaunay, the Count d’Artenset-Villiers, madam, at your service,” answered the Count.

VIII. HARTWELL MEETS A LADY

IF WE PASS over twelve days from that night of Hartwell's coming home to Addison Road — twelve days which Hartwell spent in a state of the hardest mental strain in learning a thousand facts, in conversing with fifty people whom he had never before seen, in fighting his way to a more entrenched position in the kingdom which he had seized upon and generally, in getting to himself that almost "new sense" of sharp insight which the many calls upon his wits made needful to him — if we pass over these active twelve days, we find him on the thirteenth afternoon sitting in his private room in his Fenchurch Street office, looking through a number of documents relating to landed estate, as title deeds, conveyances, mortgages, liens, and so on, which he had not had the time to look into before.

From these he now found himself the owner of an important estate in Bucks, of another in Hampshire, and of a smaller one in Norfolk. This last was that Corton Estate where, as we know, "the wife" was. But Hartwell did not know that she was there and in vain, so far, had he tried to find out her whereabouts, though he was now fairly certain that he was really married, for he had found, under lock and key, a diary of Drayton's in which were more obscure references to "the wife." But who? where? this question greatly troubled Hartwell, when he found time, as during his unquiet nights, to think of it.

This Corton was a dilapidated old place, not yielding any rent, apparently given over to poachers, and unless Hartwell should some day think of turning it to some account, it was quite likely that he might not go down there for years.

Besides these three estates, there was a “Hobham House” in Surrey, not far from London, and on that twelfth evening, after examining the deeds, he determined to take a trip to this Hobham House at once, intending to decide that night as to whether it or Addison Road house would prove the more suitable for the laboratory which he was about to make. He therefore got the keys from the outer office, and took train for the small Surrey station of Lydney, where he asked his way, and thence walked to Hobham House. He found it to be a square brick building in a lonely situation at the end of an avenue of pines, and went through all the rooms, which were empty but for a few pieces of old furniture here and there.

He then set out to return to the station, but being absorbed in thought, he happened to take a wrong path where two paths met, and walking on and on without noticing his mistake, he was soon in the park of another estate, which adjoined the woods round Hobham House. Its name was Garlot Croft; it was the country-seat of Julia, Lady Methwold, which fact it was that had caused Drayton to acquire Hobham House lying near it, though he had hardly ever occupied Hobham House.

Hartwell was descending an avenue rather rough with ruts of hardened mud, when he saw before him a lady walking in the same direction as he, rolling a bicycle — saw, as it were, without seeing her, for he was looking on the ground. He had soon overtaken and passed her a little, absorbed in thought, when he heard a deep voice of mockery behind him say:

“A justly-offended James!”

He turned, and his eyes rested on a spirited image, a lady of twenty-two or twenty-three years, with a small head and face and a divinely tall length of body between her toes and her chin, and Hartwell said to himself:

“This can only be ‘Julia,’ whom I imagined to be still at Cannes.”

Since she had formally given him up, he had not even been at the pains to answer her letter of dismissal. He had not, indeed, had the time to remember her existence. He put out his hand with a genial smile in his eyes, pleased with her frank beauty, the freedom of her carriage, and her profusion of soft-brown hair, which had become rather loose and dropped a little behind the neck, and he said:

“No, I was absorbed in thought, and looking on the ground. I am not offended, still less justly offended. For I am sure you never did a wiser thing, for yourself at least.”

At once she looked at him with puzzled eyebrows — a little cynical surprise — and her first thought was:

“Well, but someone has been teaching my James to talk modestly, and to lift his hat with distinction.”

They walked side by side under the over-arching branches of two rows of beech trees, she rolling her bicycle, and even as they talked, Hartwell’s mind was inwardly busy with her, summing her up in a way that had become almost mechanical to him since he had entered the great world under false colours, and he thought to himself:

“She is a widow, young as she is, and she is as fated to second marriage as streams to flowing downward. The portrait in the locket is doubtless that of the already-forgotten Methwold—”

“You have been a long while considering your reply to my letter, James,” she said, bridling, “or are you more correctly ‘Mr Drayton’ now?”

“Still ‘James, let me hope,” he answered with a patronising humor in his eyes, “though you, perhaps, should no longer be ‘Julia,’” and he thought to himself, “she is an athlete, a horsewoman, no doubt — the back and neck. But I fancy that only fencing could give that liberation of her curves, that buoyant air. These are her grounds, that yonder is her house, she would not otherwise have troubled to alight from her bicycle on account of this little roughness of the ground.”

While he was thinking this, Julia was saying:

“I have not the least objection to being still ‘Julia,’ if you like. I recognise, of course, that you have the right to be aggrieved, and I am quite disposed to be chums ever after.”

“Then I call you the most charming of ladies,” replied Hartwell, while he was thinking inwardly:

“She is certainly a fine specimen of the human mammal. Her most soft and womanly air is due, I fancy, to her hair, which is very fine, loose and light, and partly perhaps to the peachy coloring of her face, or something in the eyes, which are purple, like the violet or pansy, and are very soft in expression, though bright and spirited.”

And while these thoughts of her were fluttering through his mind, Julia on her part was thinking with surprise of him: “But what is the matter? He is talking very much better than I always thought!”

And she said aloud:

“I was very sorry about the accident, James.”

“‘Very’ is one of the strong words,” he answered in a coldly playful way, smiling upon her with a patronising eye as a man of many cares and deep thought may watch something pretty play in his mood of relaxation, and still his thoughts kept running on her, dissecting her without any conscious effort, thinking: “She has a child, probably only one, a girl, under three years, for the doll on the handle-bar seems to be of cloth, it was bought en route—”

“But I was sincerely sorry,” she said, in answer to his criticism of her ‘very,’ “you are not, please, to consider me a monster of heartlessness, for I do not think I am, then.”

“You are not a monster at all,” he answered, “but an excellent little human person, producing your allotted influence upon the history of life,” and, as he said this, he was thinking inwardly.

She, meanwhile, was looking up at him with the most puzzled of eyebrows, for she could not believe her ears. He had called her “a little human person, producing her allotted influence — !” Was this then her rejected James? Drayton had called her “a clipper!” and she thought again with a pout, “His vulgarity must have been a pose! he is really quite nice when he chooses! I don’t understand—”

“At any rate,” she said aloud, “it seems pretty evident that I need not reproach myself with having broken anyone’s heart.”

“The wound on my head,” he answered, “acted as a counter-irritant to that in my heart. The two thus tended to cure each other.”

“Did, actually, cure each other, say.”

“Pardon, only tended to!” he said with a sort of paternal gallantry. “The wound in the heart — remains.”

“Dear me! It has lasted three eternal weeks, then.”

“It can — never — be effaced.”

“Is it my doing, really, that you are subdued and graver?” she asked seriously after a minute, with a side glance up at his face.

“I fear so,” he answered, languidly toying with her, “the wound, you know, in the heart.”

“Is it that accident?” she laughed, pleased, somehow at his pretence that her thunderbolt of dismissal had not fallen without hurting anyone, yet with a question, a doubt in her, whether her James could by any possibility be making fun of her.

“Yet, you see, I haunt your grounds,” he said.

“You are only passing through to somewhere from Hobham House.”

“No, I am here to be near you.”

“Improbable fib. One would almost say that you were ‘trying again,’ James; but though the words are honeyed, the tone is bored, and the ears of widows are quick and accurate!”

“Then I must resign myself to being misunderstood.”

They had come to a mansion with a Jacobean-Italian front and there they continued to talk a while on the steps of a terrace. It was suddenly so dark that he was to her only a cloaked pillar under a silk hat, and she to him something slim and dainty in a short skirt, with a ghost of white where some phlox lay on her bosom. Near Christmas, as it was, scents of Marechal Niel roses were to be detected in the air, some far-separated lights appeared in the mansion, accentuating its dreamy gloom, and the park lay silent, but for the noises made by three spaniels, which had come to meet her and were gambolling about them.

“Did you really know, then, that I had come back?” she asked.

“Let me be candid — no. I had been to Hobham House, where I am thinking of setting up a laboratory, and making the house my home.”

“Did you say a laboratory?”

“Yes.”

“What sort of a laboratory?”

“The laboratory of a biologist.”

“For your own use, do you mean?”

“Yes.”

“Then, I suppose I am dreaming, or are you Joking?”

“Is this so surprising, then?” he said: “I have always cherished an inclination for science, and finding myself at the age of thirty-eight no longer a stripling, and superfluously wealthy, I am now working hard to free myself from all business, in order to devote the remainder of my days to my inclination. I know of no heart in the world that loves me, unless it be one poor boy, to whom I have been a father, I have no ties, the rather coarse life which you have seen me live never really pleased me: so you will readily conceive why I decide to shut myself in with a mistress who will not write me a letter casting me into despair on the first rainy morning.”

He could no longer see Julia’s face, but there was now something more depicted there than mere astonishment. Some finger of pain and pity touched Julia’s heart at this strange mixture of truth and falsehood pronounced by Hartwell, and her delicate bosom swelled a little at the birth of an instinct within her that if this man fell sick, she would like to nurse him, and if he were sad, then that would be sweet to a woman to lay her hand on his head.

“James,” she said, with her eyes cast down a moment, “I am sorry, then, if I have seemed flippant.”

“But I cannot permit you to be sorry,” he answered. “I repeat seriously that never were your instincts so wise as when you cast me into despair, just as they were never so frivolous as when you engaged yourself to marry me. I was not half worthy of you.”

“But by saying that, you make me doubt the truth of it, James. I did not, perhaps, quite know you. I’m afraid that, since I desired to disengage myself, I should have done it with rather more responsibility and — respect. I am cross with us both then. You should have made me like you better” — her dry little mouth pouted, as she said this.

“As for me, however you liked me, I like you well,” said he. “You are charming, you are most beautiful, and you are also good.”

And, bending to say this in a lower tone, there took place within Hartwell an event, an affection, an act of the soul, which he himself would have called “physiological,” but really was no more so than a chord of music is. He somehow found her hand in his, and kissed it.

She laughed lightly, uneasily, murmuring in a soft low voice:

“No, James.”

“What, have I transgressed?”

“Everybody knows that we are parted. It would be extremely absurd, really, if we are not. And we must not steal things, must we?”

“Then, I shall steal no more. Honesty is the best policy, as you say, but the hardest.”

“Is it hard, really?”

“Yes.”

“Frankly, it never once entered my head to take you seriously, James, to dream that you really cared, or that I did. It is very, very, very amusing! Did you really care, then?”

“No, no,” he said in a new tone; “I must be serious, I see, with you and with myself. Forget my light words. I find you all too important a matter to trifle with — your dove’s voice, your soft face, and all the pleasant fruit of your womanly being. Human creatures are among the paltriest of insects really, dear Lady Julia, if we consider it, but there are those of them, it seems, that have the biological property of giving out a music by merely living, as the dragon-fly’s flight is accompanied by a musical sound. And such you seem to me at this moment, more admirable and important than all the crowd of suns visible to the eye on a moonless night, which delusion of mine proves to you, does it not, that my consciousness is not at this moment at its brightest. And now, moreover, I am only flirting with you, no doubt. Let not half that you hear me say be believed! This impression that I have of you is the merest passing delusion of my senses, you are no fairer and better than any other.”

“Am I to be pleased, then, or vexed? Shall I laugh, or cry?” asked Julia, laughing. “I seem at last to have met a complex man! Or shall I simply remain silently astonished, with neither laughter nor tears? I assure you, that since the darkness has hidden your face I have quite the impression that you are not yourself, but another man. But come, Aunt Margaret is waiting: dinner.”

“Thank you, I will, not,” Hartwell said shortly. “Good-night.”

He shook hands abruptly, turned, and had walked away some steps when she, after a few seconds of hesitation, called after him:

“James! I am going to fox-hunt and spend Christmas with the house party at Castle Moran—”

She said no more. He for his part, stood still, silent, tempted to be there with her, but undecided. He finally broke the silence by saying:

“I do not remember that I have an invitation.”

“I will see to that. That is, if you like.”

“I certainly like, but I do not think — Well, but you are very good. I must be there, then. Good-night.”

Hartwell then walked on through the dark wood, making for the railway station, but going the wrong way, so that later on he had to traverse the park again. He fell at once, as he went, into the dark mood which regularly overcame him at every nightfall, and he thought within himself: “She is like a little flower on a tall stem — certainly very pleasant, very precious, very rare. The deluded arms open of themselves to embrace her — We, however, are ‘married,’ we have a ‘wife’ — Let us choose, if we can, to keep within the four corners of our British Law.”

Julia, for her part, looked after him till he disappeared, amazed at herself and at him. She had liked Drayton, his rough way, his beard, his nonchalance, his frankly City-man point of view. He had once saved her life in the hunting-field, he had, moreover, appealed to her toleration, had amused and outraged her, and she had engaged herself to him mainly because that was outrageous and perverse. But there was some quality of weight, of eminence in him — he was admirable. She dropped her bicycle upon the lawn with rather a crash, and went into the house with a sigh.

IX. HARTWELL IS IN GREAT PERIL

MEANTIME, AS WAS said before, Oswald had slept a night at the “Anchor Inn” in exile from Pall Mall and from those two rooms behind Piccadilly where his man, Magee, made Irish bulls, and told to Oswald whatever Oswald did not already know of the doings and movements of people in the great world.

Precisely why he had slept a night in such a “hole,” as Oswald called the “Anchor,” he could not have told, but he had wished to be on the spot. Something very odd in “James’s” denial to him that he knew Letty Barnes, when he certainly did, and in her strange disappearance, without taking any hat with her, stirred up some interest in Oswald’s rather dull mind. It was not like him to be there in a bed of that “Anchor” tavern, but no one is always a fossil and there Oswald was.

By the next morning the countryside was eagerly talking about the girl. Letty’s appearance, dress, habits, were described in the Norfolk papers, with comments on her good name, her “walk and conversation,” her place and use in the little local world where she had lived and run her course. She had been a good chapel-goer, and, till lately, had taught in the Sunday school, and kept a missionary-box, had gone to spend three weeks with an aunt in Cromer during the summer, but had spent only two, though Barnes, her father, still maintained that she had spent three. The newspapers, however, had definitely found out from the aunt that she had spent only two, and Oswald thought that that third week of her absence from the tavern of which Barnes was so sure, may have been spent with his brother, for he remembered that Drayton had been to Cromer that summer.

On the whole, it was pitiful, the girl seemed to have been snatched away by the Harpies, somehow. Her poor feet had strayed, the Maelstrom had caught her, clouds and darkness were round about her.

Oswald breakfasted on an excellent lobster in that room of the tavern where writing-materials had been placed that night of the murder, for his brother James. Oswald was alone in the room: Barnes had not risen that morning, or, at least, had refused to unlock his door to the old grandmother of the place. The tavern was closed to the public, and a presence like death was all about it.

By Oswald's plate was a note-book made of very thin ivory-leaves, and on these, as he ate, he re-read a few notes which he had made.

His mind, like all his personality, was slow in movement and too standoffish to get very near to truth; but still he was knowing, versed in men and things, and had minutely questioned Barnes and spurred his memory the previous evening.

He had now, therefore, on his note book the facts about how McCalmont first, and then Barnes, had seemed to hear a cry somewhere outside the tavern, though Barnes still seemed to be certain that it was the wind that rough night. How Drayton, meantime, was upstairs writing— "For how long?" Oswald had asked. Barnes could not be too sure, but quite half-an-hour; for when Drayton came down, McCalmont had said: "Why, you must have written ten letters," and Drayton had replied: "Only one, boy, but that one required some thinking." James, then, had had plenty of time to talk to Letty. That he had talked to her (supposing her then in the tavern), was almost proved by the fact that Oswald had found a shred of her writing in James's coat-pocket. James knew her, as to that no further proof was wanting.

"My good James," thought Oswald, "what, then, have you done with this Letty? He had no house hereabouts — yes, he has, though! Corton Chantry can't be very far, and that is where Letty is! He made her go down by the back stairs to get to the motor car, and then whipped her off to Corton some time before the accident. But why on earth without a hat? With her watch and chain — but without a hat."

Then again Oswald considered the words "cruel bru" on the shred of paper. If cruel brute meant James, then Letty was angry, which was against the Corton Chantry theory, unless, indeed, he took her to conciliate her. Oswald had, of course, shown the shred to no one: the one motive of his interest in the matter was, by means of this handle, to wheedle and force £500, which he needed, from his brother, if he could once get at the certainty that Drayton had abducted the girl. So far the notion that she might be dead had hardly taken root in any mind.

Oswald rose from breakfast with his wits all in confusion, he could see no light, and thinking was as burdensome to him as running is to a fat man. He lit a cigar, and slowly limped about the room. He decided at one moment that he would go to Corton Chantry, and see. But then again, the uncertainty of discovering anything made that a bore. No, he would return to London, but first would telegraph to Walker to come down, and put Walker on to see if he could find out anything. Walker was not altogether a fool. (Walker was a young man in London who did shorthand writing and Oswald had him from time to time to write his letters and to write statements for the lawyers about an endlessly long and vague lawsuit which Oswald had in the courts.)

Oswald had written some letters the previous evening at a worm-eaten oak cabinet in which there was some paper, and going now and again to it he wrote to Walker the words:

“I want you to come here at once. Get a pound from Magee.” He then opened an assurance-almanac which lay at his elbow to blot the words, and, in doing this, he saw some inverted writing which looked like his brother’s.

This astonished him. James, then, did actually write a letter in that room, as he had pretended to want to do. Had he two motives in coming here, then? — one motive to write and one to see Letty? For he certainly did see Letty. Oswald neatly tore out the leaf of the blotting-paper, and held it before a spotted piece of mirror hung from the white-washed timber and now, though the leaf was rather thick with blots, he could read in the mirror the words: “Now is the time for all good men,” and again lower down, “now is, the time for all good men to come to the rescue of the.”

Odd words, but certainly in James writing. This, then, was that letter that “wanted some thinking.” Oswald searched through the assurance-almanac, but could find nothing more in Drayton’s hand. He sat at a window and considered it, and in his effort of thought little sweat-grains stood out on his square bald head. “Now is the time for all good men to come” — it was all a blind! a thousand to one. It would be interesting to see the whole of that “letter.”

But, if a blind, James must have been terribly in earnest to hide his relation with Letty at the moment when he was at the pains to sit down and write those words. He was not a cautious man, took consequences breezily, pooh-poohed most things. Why, then, this special anxiousness in the case of Letty, shown, too, in his denial at Aylsham that he knew her.

Now first arose in Oswald’s mind the thought: “Suppose we are seeking a living girl, when we should be seeking a dead? ‘Cruel bru’ seemed to indicate passion!”

At this thought, sitting at a window overlooking the kitchen garden, Oswald went off into a day-dream about a steam yacht of Drayton's called the Sempronia, about banquets at Claridge's and the Carlton, and mingled with it all in his dream was a ceremony at St. Peter's, Eaton Square, in which the soft face of Julia, Lady Methwold, with its peachy painting would be present, and he, Oswald, by her side — If James had, by chance, killed Letty, and if he, Oswald, could clearly prove it to himself and to James, then James' banking-account would become Oswald's to the last penny; or in the last resort the clown might hang — why not? Oswald had cringed to his brother too many years, despising him the while, not to dislike him now.

That was indeed a dream about the Sempronia and St. Peter's — if one had only the wit, energy, and patience to realise it! if one could hit upon the right clues, hide them from the police, and hold them as a Damocles sword over the head of James, till James had formally made over everything — But wit, energy, and patience were an infernal bore. One could not if one could not, one was no longer so young as one had been. It made one pant to think and achieve things. And was the primary assumption correct? It seemed improbable. Mr Jimmy was certainly a shadier beggar than most people supposed, but murder was a tallish order.

Yet that alone explained about the hat. She had gone without a hat. James, therefore, while supposed to be writing, might all the time have been with Letty, and done her some harm. Who could tell? But in that case the body would not be far —

It grew toward noon. Oswald went up three little steps to his bedroom, took his hat, coat, and stick, descended, sent the telegram by a stable-lad to Walker, his shorthand man, and went out at the back of the inn. Barnes, so far, had not shown himself that day.

The day was not cold, but wintry looking, with that dead mist which belongs to winter. Oswald had already examined the grounds without result, and though a new thought was now in him, he went languidly limping, not at all believing in his own conclusion. He sauntered into a fir plantation, smoking a cigar. Yonder, in a hollow sheltered by sweeps of meadow-land, appeared dimly through a veil of mist a little Norfolk church of flint, with a thatched roof and a round tower, and beyond stood a farmstead of neat red brick, with crow-stepped gables. On the ground no trace was now to be seen of Drayton's and Betty's terrible struggle. It had rained in torrents since then and many feet, moreover, had passed over the spot in the search for her. Oswald came to the fateful place — a kind of gut.

“It she were really killed,” he thought, “she would be somewhere about here.”

All along the lower part of the two walls of the gut there was bush, growing high and rank at some points, such as furze, nettle, grasses, tufts of scabious thistle. Midway between the two walls, where the gut is slightly deeper, there ran a rivulet among rocks, some of which were of considerable size. Half a mile to the south of the tavern the gut is crossed by a one-arch bridge —

Oswald went that way, toward the bridge: but he had not gone far when he stood still, for at a shelving spot at the edge of the gut a stone happened to roll before his foot down into the gut. He heard it fall through the bushes at the bottom, and at once he heard another sound, a rushing sound through the bushes, which caused him to peep over, and with a shudder of disgust he saw a black cat scamper guiltily out from a mass of bush which was infested with a swarm of water gnats. The stone had fallen near the cat and frightened it in what it was doing. Oswald guessed, he even knew, then.

Always with his deliberate slight limp, but now with a wild heart, he returned to the house. He asked the old grandmother in the parlour where Barnes was, made his way to Barnes' room, and persisted in knocking at the door, till Barnes looked out.

"You had better come with me, Barnes," said Oswald, "get some things on. But you will have to keep your courage up, my good sir."

Barnes drew on a pair of boots and, without lacing them, came out in his shirt and trousers, with the braces hanging down. He did not say anything, but silently followed Oswald, with that angry-looking frown which always made his heavy eyes look like blue slits. When they reached the gate in the hedge, Barnes must have been struck by some misapprehension, for he turned pale and hesitated, but he said nothing, and after a moment continued to follow Oswald. And soon he was standing by the gut, and Oswald's stick was pointing.

Barnes looked at Oswald steadily, stupidly, for some time, with a piercing frown and with the tip of his tongue out on his lower lip, as if trying to read Oswald's soul, and failing; he was stunned. Then the poor man's lips went crooked, and he smiled, looking down where she lay, and he crooned: "Well, Letty—"

Oswald turned away, murmuring something. There was that in the face of Barnes which could not be looked at. The poor Barnes suddenly gave way beneath his weight, and fell, bawling out in distress.

Oswald could not get him to lift himself, and had to leave him while he himself went back to the inn to send a message to the police. Barnes remained there till near five, when two country constables and a detective hot from London arrived with a stretcher. They were a party of nine and Barnes was with them, grimly calm now, when she was drawn out of the bush. He saw her face in a minute in the failing light, before the macintosh covered it. It was engorged, violence was evident, and Barnes uttered a threat against her destroyer.

He trudged steadily by the body in his undress all the way into Aylsham, following her desperately, taking no notice of anyone or of any question, only trudging behind her like a machine, following her to the very last. He did not droop nor weep. It was only near eight o'clock in the evening, when he was forcibly removed from near her at the mortuary, that he dropped his arms and head upon an officer's shoulders like a man shot, and there gave way to sobbing.

Barnes was returning to "The Anchor" in a trap from "The Black Dogs" in Aylsham, when he met Oswald and Oswald's shorthand man, Walker, who were being driven from "The Anchor" to Aylsham in Barnes's own trap. For Walker, summoned by Oswald's telegram, had arrived at "The Anchor" from London at seven. Barnes called out to Oswald as they met:

"A word with you, sir," and, sitting next each other in the two traps, Oswald and Barnes conversed in subdued voices.

"I've wondered," said Barnes, "why you have been so particular about knowing Mr Drayton's doings that night. I ask you, fair and square, if you suspect him of knowing my girl."

"He may have. I do not know, Barnes."

"He's a friend or relation of yours, I take it, for I saw you in his room at 'The Black Dogs' yesterday."

"Yes, an acquaintance; but my interest in the case has no reference to him, but is simply due to my chance nearness to the scene."

"Do you think — fair and square that Drayton had anything — ?"

"I have really come to no conclusion," said Oswald, and in mere motiveless enmity to his brother he added, "I only see that it would be stupid to take it for granted that he was in that room all the time he was supposed to be writing there. He may have gone down the back stair—”

“Then, God help him, if it’s so!” cried Barnes, furiously. “I want no Law — a life for a life! Drive on, my lad!”

Oswald and Walker then went on to Aylsham, and thence to North Walsham together, where they separated, Oswald for London, Walker for Cromer, the latter full of Oswald’s instructions as to the search which lay before him. Walker’s task was to discover someone about Cromer who had seen Drayton and Letty together, and to this end Walker had with him a photograph of Letty, stolen by Oswald from the album in the little drawing-room of “The Anchor.” The shred which Oswald had found in Drayton’s coat was, of course, a proof to himself only that Drayton knew Letty: for he had no proof to show that he had really taken the shred from the coat. Drayton could deny that it was ever there, and his word would be as good as Oswald’s. Further evidence, therefore, that Drayton knew Letty was essential in order that Oswald might become “James”’ master, and bitterly Oswald now cursed his luck in losing the letter which Letty had written him, asking for the date of Drayton’s marriage with Lady Methwold.

Walker, therefore, had instructions to search well for some witness of Drayton’s and Letty’s friendship, to keep a mum tongue in his head, giving no reason to anyone why he asked his questions, and, if he discovered anything, he was to give hints of a bribe to the person from whom he discovered it, on condition that that person would tell what he had seen to no one but Walker. Above all Walker was to be very quick, for Oswald feared that the police might get some scent from somewhere of the acquaintance of Drayton and Letty, and might be beforehand with him in bringing home the guilt of the murder to Drayton, in which case Oswald would be baulked of his power over his brother’s cheque book.

But, as a matter of fact, no quickness on the part of Walker was necessary, for the police were without the clues which had led Oswald to suspect Drayton, namely, the shred of Letty's letter and the blotting-leaf with the nonsense-words. These were in Oswald's safe-keeping. Even after a long time Letty and Drayton were not in the slightest degree connected in any mind, except in Oswald's, and vaguely, through Oswald, in Barnes'. The police did not even trouble to go to ask Hartwell if "he" had seen her in "The Anchor" on the night of the murder, when "he" had written a letter there, for Barnes told them that Drayton had told him the next morning at "The Black Dogs" in Aylsham that he had not seen her. That Letty had had a lover was certain, and the police ransacked Norfolk, including Cromer, where Letty had been that summer, to find him.

But they unearthed nothing, and after two futile arrests remained agape at the mystery of the girl's death. By the merest chance, however, Walker, without the least merit on his part, discovered something where the police failed, for of the two people in question, Walker had the photograph of the girl and knew the man, but the police only knew the girl, the man being anybody to them. But Oswald should have conducted his researches in person, for Walker, a young "cockney" clerk, was hardly born for research, and bungled matters. After five useless days in Cromer itself, he wandered out in the direction of Overstrand and that group of villages, much frequented by visitors where, as the local saying goes:

"Gimmingham, Trimmingham, Knanton, and Trunch, Northrepps and Southrepps lie all of a bunch."

About each of these villages Walker loitered in turn, liking this vague life of research, till he grew to know the lighting-up minute of the lighthouse, the tombstones round the ruined church-tower on the cliffs, the flocks of Christmas turkeys, the coast-guardman's telescope, and the postman's tread in the distance at evensong. He made languid research in a straw-hat at inns, and questioned every chance acquaintance in a tone of mystery, but Oswald was thinking of recalling him when, wandering one afternoon in a lane near Overstrand, Walker saw in a window across the breadth of a courtyard, an old piece of cardboard with the word "Lodgings" written on it.

It was an abandoned farmhouse embowered in old trees, most of it a rambling ruin of gables and lattices, but one small part of it was modern, and before this part there was a garden plot full of cottage flowers, and there was some poultry in the court-yard. It was occupied by one Gissing, a hale old fellow, one of those amphibious men who live near the coast, a thatcher and reaper, but also a waterman. To say that he had a beard grown back from the chin, like a fringe tied round the jaws, is to describe him. His wife, a hearty, large countrywoman of forty, kept a shop of little oddments in one window, and they had one daughter, named Sarah, seventeen years of age.

Walker went in, really to drink a glass of milk, but, being there, he began to chat; and soon this question arose whether a gentleman with a long black beard, and a fair girl (photograph produced) had been seen by any of them that summer, to which the wife answered:

"Why, they, were here with us a week. They would be Mr Drayton and his lady."

Here, then, was the treasure struck. Walker was so proud of himself, that he decided at once to become a detective. The same day he sent the news to Oswald. But he was a talkative, loose, swaggering fellow, and talked too much to the Gissings during his repeated visit of the next two days. His unnecessary insistence upon silence, his large promises, his hints of Drayton's importance in the world, all this turned the Gissings' head with fabulous hopes. Gissing himself was no brilliant wit, but "mother" was canny. What the matter was they did not quite know, did not even know that the girl whose face they saw in the photograph was dead, but it was clear that the great Drayton was in danger — of something, that Walker was his enemy and that, if they received £50 from Walker's side, they might well receive a thousand pounds if they took the other side.

So on the third morning — four days before Christmas — just when Oswald was turning in his tiresomely slow mind the project of going down to Gissing, Gissing went up to Drayton. He and the wife had plotted it darkly in their heads upon their beds. Walker had mentioned Fenchurch Street as being the place where Drayton's office was. Gissing would be easily able to find it by making inquiries, said the wife, and with almost the last of his £7 harvest money Gissing, saying not one word to anyone, but cannily taking the tide of fortune at the flood, took ticket for London, and so, not knowing to what manner of man he was going, bid a long farewell to his native Poppyland.

X. HARTWELL BEGINS TO “UPROOT”

IT WAS NEAR five p.m., Hartwell's day's work was over, and he was standing with his back to the fire and his elbows stuck up on the mantelpiece of his private room in his Fenchurch Street offices. It was now the third week since he had come in to that wonderful kingdom of his, which he owed to the mere chance of passing at a certain hour along a certain place of the Norwich Road. All, so far, had gone well, but his two "nasal wrinkles" were somewhat more deeply marked than before. There was a wrinkle or two more at the eye-corners, adding meaning and history to that smile of his eyes, and a look of care was among the furrows of that brow, from which the hair stood up a little and fell back in tufts, without any parting.

The fact was, that Hartwell's nights were not peaceful. He had impressions, dreams, that were as real to him as anything which he saw or handled during his waking hours. There was a face which might either be his or another's, according to the state of his mind and body. Something had gone wrong with his nerves in respect to the dead man, Drayton: every morning he chided, or smiled at, himself, but every evening he grew morose again.

The conduct, too, of the mastiff, Bull, had made an altogether exaggerated impression upon Hartwell's nerves. At one time he had Bull on the brain, he dreamt of Bull. How much secret kindness had he lavished on the hound, but it persisted in regarding him as a ghost. But for the charming talkativeness of the French count, Hartwell would have found a quiet evening at home unbearable, but the Frenchman's tongue flowed with a constant stream of anecdotes, epigrams, adventures, and drolleries and Hartwell would have found it hard now to part with him.

But if the nights went badly, the days went well. The industry of Hartwell's thorough mind had been brought to bear upon, and had mastered, Drayton's large business, and he was already almost in a position to be able to withdraw from the City life without making large losses. Moreover, he had met at a Merchant Taylors' banquet a certain Professor M ——, with whom he had become friendly, and M —— was at this time turning two rooms of the first floor at Addison Road into a first-class laboratory for him. To the day when he would be able to call himself a really accomplished biologist, Hartwell was now looking forward with pleasure.

And this was all the positive joy that Drayton's million had brought to Hartwell, except the rather dangerous joy of his meeting in the park of Garlot Croft, with a lady whom he had likened to a flower on a tall stem. "Cloy me — for five years!" he had prayed to the Under-world that wild night on the Norwich Road, at a crazy moment in which he was very unlike himself, but he now found that there was really nothing amusing in the world to buy with the riches which he had, except a laboratory. Dinners at £7 a head and the wine of Chateau Yehym no longer entertained his staid mind.

As to the numbers of men and women whom he had to pretend to know familiarly, Hartwell had passed through well, sometimes with a moment of awkward misery, but never with a breakdown. In fact, lightning had now become the habit of Hartwell's mind to such an extent that, as was said before, it was almost like the phenomenon of a new sense grown up in him at the many pressing calls made by his situation upon his brain. Though, of course, it must have been in him in the germ beforehand, or it could not have grown up. In the same way, as we know, the tadpole is a fish while it lives in water, but when it takes to the land the new conditions so change his body that the fish becomes a frog. And this hard-won knack of sharpness was exercised by Hartwell, not only to the extent needful for his self-protection, but over and above, with the pleasure of a creature sporting in its element, or with the pleasure of one who by long toils has impressed a new and better rhythm upon one's breathing and at last one finds oneself breathing morally, even in one's sleep, without any effort — like that "Master of Breath" (Sahib Nafas), who once breathed in Palestine — and one is all well and perfect, and can hardly bear oneself for abounding joy, because one has really learned at last how to breathe the air. So to some extent it was with Hartwell and his new nimbleness of wit, which he used as a skirmisher uses his short-sword.

At the mere approach of a new man Hartwell now drew conclusions, quite in the manner of the excellent (but, of course, fictitious) Sherlock Holmes, though in a different intellectual mood, perhaps. A neck-tie, a handshake, told him their tale, after some talk he was at home in the situation.

But many things harassed Hartwell, apart from his terrible uncertainties with regard to "the wife." Mysterious letters came to him, threats, freakish rendezvous, sinister vague telegrams.

"MEET ME TO-NIGHT AT THE SAME PLACE AT EIGHT. THE PINK PARROT IS TALKING. MOST IMPORTANT."

Such was one of them. It had no signature, where "the same place" was he did not know, and the most earnest torturing of his wits could bring him no hint of light as to the possible meaning of that so important talking of the pink parrot. Or, again, there was this letter from a Norwich bank:

“We beg to remind you that the sum of £400 deposited with us for the use of Mr Steve Anderson is now reduced to 15s.”

Who Steve Anderson was, where he lived, why Drayton had supplied him with money, Hartwell had no means of knowing. He could hardly write to the bank to ask who or what or where was this Anderson whom he himself was paying. Such a letter from him might some day furnish written evidence that he was not Drayton, and he was far too wary and sensitive of suspicion to write it. Moreover, he was pretty sure beforehand that, if he did, the bank would not know anything about Anderson except his appearance, since it was his habit to go in person to draw the money. Hartwell thought of letting the fund in the bank run out, whereupon if Anderson had known how to write, Anderson would have written to him, but he saw that Anderson could not write, for the bank had sent him a number of Anderson’s cheques, with only a cross for signature. Hartwell feared, therefore, that if by ceasing to pay, he forced Anderson to communicate with, him, Anderson might get a third person to write the letter, thereby revealing perhaps some dangerous secret of Drayton’s life. And in the end he had to deposit a further £400 in the bank, without knowing for what object, though it may at once be said here that this Steve Anderson was a man who looked after “the wife” at Corton.

Then, again, there came another letter in an illiterate scrawl, without any address on it, the writer evidently assuming that Drayton was familiar with her address, and this one said:

“The child tried to run away last week to go to her mother, she says, and I only caught her after a lot of trouble, seeing as she hid herself in the beech wood. I have moved from there and took a house near-by called ‘Hayes,’ seeing as it has a high wall and a gate, and all that expense must come out of the money in the bank at Cheltenham, so please sir, write to them and tell them to let me have £20 extra for the month.

Yours faithfully,

Elizabeth Seward.”

Hartwell saw from the postmark that the letter was written at, or near, a village in Gloucestershire called Birdlip and he thought that some day, perhaps, when he had time he might go there and see what this woman and this “child” who “ran away” could be to him. Drayton, he saw, had deposited £3,000 in the Cheltenham bank, of which this Elizabeth Seward drew the interest, but the same difficulties as to finding out anything about her through the bank faced him as in the case of Steve Anderson, and he had, as the woman asked, to write to the bank bidding them give her an extra £20, without at all knowing for what object. Though it may be stated at once that this “child” was a daughter, named Rosie, of that Martha Drayton, “the wife,” who was in the care of the unknown Steve Anderson at Corton.

Or, again, Hartwell received this mysterious and ugly-looking cable in cypher from Buenos Ayres:

“Think it can be done at last, but still ticklish. Two German Government spies to be nicked first.”

He did not know what “it” was which could be done at last.

Or, again, this from a Cornish village:

“You will have read in the paper that my daughter Margaret drowned herself in Harrold’s pond two nights since. You know this only comes of what you did to her husband, sending men to sea in a rotten old tub of a ship, though you was warned repeatedly how it would be, and then refusing to help the families of the men you’ve murdered. I think that anyone who took the life of a man like you would only be doing a good deed, but I won't say anything more about that now. Still I should look out for myself, rich and great as you are, if I was you.

Mary Liskeard.”

Such things troubled Hartwell. A bitter sense of injury had grown up in him against Drayton. For, in proportion as he became more and more established in his kingdom, as he more and more felt that the wealth which he had wrongfully seized was his own by natural right, like his own hand or foot — which he naturally did feel with the passage of time — so he more and more felt Drayton's sins as an outrageous insolence to himself, because he had to reap them. He grew almost to look not upon himself as the interloper, but upon Drayton as the interloper, the intruder, the outsider, the impostor, who had usurped Robert Hartwell's place for a time, and committed sins in it. And he was in pretty constant talk with (as it were) Drayton's ghost, kicking it, calling it “ruffian,” “clown.” Drayton was always with him. They were more intimate, soul with soul, than ever perhaps were two human beings in the world.

Such, then, were some of Hartwell's troubles. He was surrounded with doubts, dangers, some of them dangers to his life. And now the question arose: On what principle should Hartwell meet and grapple with these difficulties? He was not quite decided yet, for though his reason was quite decided, a still, small voice in some part of him was at war with his reason. He saw that there were two broad principles, on one or other of which he might meet those troubles and dangers. He might complete the wrongdoings of Drayton by added wrongs, and so rid himself of them with ruthless directness. This, indeed, would only be what he had promised to do in a crazy moment, that forgotten night on the Norwich-road. Or, secondly, instead of cutting the knot thus roughly, he might try to unravel it, looking upon Drayton's acts as acts to be patiently redressed or endured, at whatever cost to him self. This would be righteousness. But as to this latter, let it be clearly said again that righteousness had no sanction at all for Hartwell, or the school of thought to which he belonged. The only rational morality in his view was a care of one's tiny self during one's tiny life on this tiny earth — a pure unselfishness or egotism, or, as he called it "egoism." And since this was the only rational morality, therefore he was determined to be moral in that way, as far as ever his inherited love of righteousness would let him — for what he loved above all things was to be rational.

Having thus clearly explained his point of view, or rather the very hue of his mind at this period of his life, one may now introduce to him the poor country man Gissing, who has just come to London from the Manor Farm, near Overstrand, full of the hints about "Drayton's danger," dropped by Walker, Oswald's shorthand man, and eager to see what luck his knowledge of Drayton's and Letty's intimacy would bring him. Hartwell, as was said, was standing with his elbows stuck up on the mantelpiece behind him, and his legs crossed, thinking of his troubles, and a clerk from the outer office looked in, saying: "One Gissing to see you, sir."

"Show Mr Gissing in," said Hartwell.

In then came Gissing presently, in old Sunday best clothes. Hartwell touched an electric button and filled the room with light, for the evening was now getting dark. Gissing touched his forehead with a low bow. Hartwell returned it with a slight bending of the head, and while his steadfast eye rested a little sideways on the countryman, with a smiling twinkle in it, he was saying to himself:

"He has apparently seen me somewhere before; he is agricultural, a grubber of root crops, I should say from the right forefinger. Helps in a mill also, from the whitened outer convolution of the ear, but he must be seaside, too. Yes, his tint, the sea gaze, the fringe of beard, the stain of sail ochre on the hand. Norfolk probably, the wide hat, the black Norman eyes — from about Cromer — He makes crab-pots.

“Have a seat, Gissing.”

“No doubt you remember me, master!” asked Gissing, sitting down on the edge of the chair to which Hartwell pointed.

“Distinctly,” answered Hartwell. “Tell your business quickly.”

And he went on thinking: “He has two women, one modern, the other more old-fashioned, a wife and daughter, say. The younger has learned feather-stitching, the elder apparently not. He is come about money, from his abashment, mixed with a certain look of sharpness. A case of blackmail, but you should be careful, my friend.”

The countryman told what he had come to say, turning his hat round and round in his hands. Someone who was plainly an enemy to Drayton had got scent of Drayton’s and the young lady’s stay at the Manor Farm, and sent down a youngster from London to ferret it out, and the youngster had ferreted it out. Drayton, therefore, was in danger.

“I see,” said Hartwell; “but what is the nature of that danger?”

“Ah, I ain’t seen through that much as yet,” replied the honest countryman, “you would be more better able to guess that nor me, no doubt. I only know that it’s a matter o’ life and death with you, judgin’ by the manner o’ talk of the youngster from London.”

“Very good, we will accept that as a truth, that it is a matter of life and death with me. But tell me this, during the week that I was in your house, by what name did you hear me call my agreeable companion?”

“Let me, see — I don’t recollect hearin’ you call her any name — no, I can’t call it to mind. I’ve heard you say ‘my dear.’”

“Then, here is another stupid mystery,” thought Hartwell to himself with a face of fretful disgust. Is there to be no end to the miseries and muddles of that clown?

“So you can’t tell her name, Gissing?”

“No, I don’t seem to recollect hearing you call her name.”

“But you could describe her accurately, no doubt?”

“Oh, I could describe her like my own good woman. She wor just like the photograph that the youngster has.”

“You have a wife and, if I remember rightly, a — daughter — or two?”

“A wife and one daughter.”

“And are you and they two the only three persons in that part who remember seeing me with my agreeable companion?”

“So says the youngster from London,” replied the countryman, little dreaming how dangerous this statement was to him and to those other two.

“And Mr Walker’s principals — meaning the person, or persons, for whom he is working — who are they?” asked Hartwell.

“Ah, there now you’re asking me mor ‘n I know,” replied Gissing.

“I see. And as to yourself: tell me, Gissing, what sum you expect from me for denying henceforth that you saw what you did see.”

Gissing smiled sheepishly, with a hung head, and a lip just shaking a little with agitation. He was silent a while.

“We’ll, make it £500 and be done,” he said suddenly in a manner which showed that this sum was immense to him, and quite unusual and awkward on his lips.

“But suppose, Gissing, that my enemies offer you a thousand pounds?” said Hartwell.

“Ey, then, I should make it my business to come straight to you, and say, ‘You must give me £1,000,’” replied the dazzled countryman.

“But, Gissing, suppose that they offer you £2000 on the conditions that you do not make it your business to come to me?” said Hartwell, in a tone in which there lurked a certain sinister reproachfulness.

The simple countryman smiled, silently meditating on these great sums, hung his head, shrugged his shoulders, and said nothing.

Hartwell’s eyes flashed with an evil meaning. Within three weeks a Sultan severity of mood had grown in him, especially in his morose hours as night drew on. In a silence marked by the ticks of the clock he had decided to uproot and scatter the Gissings. He left the spot where he had been standing at the fireplace, and began to pace the room, outwardly silent, but within him there was going on a debate on the highest moral plane between the two voices. One of the voices, and the one inclined to follow said: “Banish such qualms, follow reason, and begin this night to up root the Gissings.”

Hartwell turned sharply upon the countryman, saying:

“Well, we shall see, Gissing. I am now going home, and you had better come with me.”

He put on his overcoat, took a bunch of keys from a safe, and they went out. There was a brougham waiting at the outer door to take Hartwell home to Addison Road, and they got in. But instead of “home,” Hartwell called out to the coachman “Cannon Street,” and thither they set off. It was a warm evening, the street lamps, just lit, mingled with some remaining daylight. At Cannon Street Hartwell took two tickets for Lydney, the small Surrey station nearest to Hobham House, and they set off, travelling in different carriages of the train.

Alighting at Lydney, Hartwell passing close by Gissing on the platform, whispered:

“Perhaps we had better not be seen together — follow me.”

In his passage through the village he stopped at a little grocer's shop, bought four tins of potted ham, and two bottles of claret, caused them to be opened, and took them with him. They then entered upon the open country, Gissing following about twenty yards behind Hartwell. It was almost night. They went down the avenue of pines to Hobham House.

Hartwell, with his bunch of keys, unlocked the door under the porch, saying at the same time:

"Follow, follow me closely, Gissing, for it is all dark inside: I am living a bachelor life." And his breath and his pulse were as tranquil as they ever were, as they entered and walked inward.

As for the countryman, he thought no ill, though rather surprised at the look of things, but followed up the uncarpeted stairs through a darkness which was nearly complete. On the second floor Hartwell struck a match, and other matches on the third, till he found a certain door which he had in his mind. He knew that the room behind that door had no window opening upon the grounds, and only two doors, one opening into a small blind closet, and the one which he now found and unlocked. As he unlocked it, he said to Gissing, still keeping his hand on the key:

"In here, Gissing." The countryman passed in, and at once Hartwell deposited inside the door the two bottles and the tins of ham, slammed the door, and locked it on the outside. He then called in through the key hole:

"Gissing, you will see me again in four days time."

Only silence answered Hartwell for a longish while, but as he made his way down the stairs, a cry from the old man went after him.

XI. HARTWELL TAKES TO FLIGHT

ON THE MORNING of Christmas Eve, Hartwell was in the hunting field galloping by the side of Julia, upon whom his eyes were fastened and by whose chatter his ears were occupied, for she was as blithe as a lark or a healthy girl in her teens, that morning, which was one of those fine, cold, “scenting” mornings, when the hounds need no holoo nor lifting, and the blood runs briskly in one’s veins. There was no conversation between the two riders, for everything which Hartwell attempted to say was broken in upon by the merry Julia, who was breathless with prattle and high spirits, asking questions without any intention of waiting for an answer, and flitting airily from subject to subject.

With a field of some eighty hunters, the hounds had been brought to the gorse and thrown in, whereupon at once one of the whips to the lee of covert, had seen a fox steal away,. and from that moment the riding was hard. Hartwell did his best to keep by Julia, though he had hardly ridden for fifteen years and she was a very dashing horse-woman, and for some time he succeeded.

“Do you know the word which you suggest to me now?” he managed to say between two of her breaths.

“What?”

“Lady-bird,” he replied.

Such talk was not very like Hartwell, who was made of heavier metal than the ladies’ men, and it proved that his manhood was on the verge of a great conflagration, these being only the petty first prattlings of the fire. It seemed to him now that Julia's place of places was surely in the saddle. She rode with such spirit and lightness as though her horse was a skiff on a flood, and she taking a wild voyage in it. But he had the same impression of her on the previous evening, when he had seen her dance the cake-walk in the drawing-room at Castle Moran, for he had felt sure then that neither she nor anyone could ever possibly do anything else quite so wildly well. And he had had exactly the same impression of her on seeing her the day before in the orchid house, moving among the flowers with a bent head and a long train to her dress, for he had thought then that it was at such moments, when she was serious and in repose, that she seemed the rightest and the rarest. From which, it will be seen, that Hartwell thenceforth was to find her ladyship his beautiful thing under the sun, above all things to be desired and run after.

At present he was still flirting with her with a certain gawkiness, and a feeling of stooping down to her level, as when a learned man is light-minded with young ladies. But all such feeling was getting as rapidly burnt up as chaff in a furnace, even as they galloped along together.

"I hear that you have been selling your stable, James," she said to him. "Can that really be so?"

"Yes," he began, "I have abandoned all thought—"

"But I thought that 'Queenie' was for me," she laughed, interrupting him always. "Was that not so? But the broken engagement cancels the presents, which reminds me that I have all the things from you done up in a packet, and shall send them. No protest, we must be quite responsible and correct, like ordinary responsible people. It is the proper thing also to do something to the letters, burn them, or send them back — Are you liking it? Such a morning for a real barefaced scamper! A white sky — it is snowing, did you know? but such a mere spray — Look at that thread of red coats drawing away out yonder on the horizon. They are really racing full-speed, yet they hardly seem to be moving, like remote cavalry heading under orders for something in some complex Waterloo—”

“Let me look at nothing remote,” said Hartwell, with a finical smile on his thick lips, “my eyes are fully occupied with—”

“With what is near!” she screamed. “That is not an uncommon remark to make to a lady; it has even been made to me before, but hunting and flirting are enemies, for by neglecting the fox you are apt to catch a vixen! If you be earnest and get in at the death with me, I will consider your proposal to join your yachting party — Where are you going to, then? Egypt? If I go with you, people will only say, are saying already perhaps — I have no intention to be thought crazy on your account — Oh, look at poor old Bostie, with that hound running riot! Let us ride! I don’t know your horse, he seems a puller, and your stirrup looks rather long — this dear old thing of mine has hunted four days a week every season for six years, and has just that little over-ripeness which makes a hunter jolly. Is it not really jolly? like Simla air, with a bluish tint — Oh, to be free — I don’t like fetters!

“If you really want me on the yacht, then, I will, perhaps, but you must ask me a lot, and be humble. But what about my little Looloo in that case? She has been asking after you! She said: ‘Drayton gone?’ and I said: ‘Yes, Drayton has become addicted to science and physiology, poor Drayton!’ Oh, look! those hounds have checked! and there’s that Charley absolutely at a loss what to do! I don’t think a master should be his own huntsman — no, they’re off again! let us ride — !”

These were her last words which Hartwell heard for seven hours, except when she called back at him: “Better not take it!” as she soared over a hedge with a ditch on the taking-off side — an unnecessary warning, for a cold disinclination to break his neck kept Hartwell from feats. He saw her caught away from him into hazy distances down a ploughed dale in the midst of a flying patch of pink.

He returned to the “Crown” in M —— where the meet had been, and thence went back with her and the house-party to Castle Moran in the dusk of the evening. She was then all in furs, with a lingering rich bloom, like the bloom of a peach, on her face. And again it seemed to Hartwell that it was when she was so, all in furs, with such a color, that he loved her the best.

He felt, however, that the task now before him was to behave himself decently with respect to her, if his affection was worth anything. Hartwell flattered himself that he was hardly of the same flesh and blood as that crowd of majors, squires, and lordlings around him, whose main distinction from the higher ape seemed to consist in purposely saying “hunt’n” for “hunting.” He, for his part, was a man trained in rational thought, and had henceforth no longer one, but two, to think for — himself and his other-self.

Supposing that she would brave ridicule and renew the engagement with him — that was highly improbable — but if she did, he could never say to her, “I, Drayton, love you,” when his name really began with an Aitch. Now for the first time, in the presence of love, he felt the misery of telling stories — the moral stickiness and discomfort. He was hardly able to lie to her in casual talk, how much less at a moment when his soul on its knees, confessed its love to her. And apart from the fact that he was not the man he seemed to be, he was “married.” The “wife” who “screamed”, mysteriously hidden now, might any day spring up somewhere and claim him. And Julia’s eyes, though wild sometimes, had a certain reproach in their dark depths when she was still. Hartwell would not be able to bear that look, if he wronged her, so a world of obstacles parted them.

She was talking to him about hunting on the return from M —— , and as they entered the castle-hall, was saying:

“I think our small fields and cramped fences in Surrey are just as much fun as these Northampton covers. Let us have house-parties for February — .”

“Us, who?”

“You and me. I at Garlot, and you at Hobham—”

Late that night he heard her play a “Berceuse,” and sat all the time with sullen and half-closed lids, hardly venturing to glance at her clinging to her fiddle, as if she were struggling to hide and defend the child from someone, and rocking it like a branch in a storm.

“You play charmingly,” he said afterwards, sitting with her in the old drawing-room, famous for its frieze and stucco ceiling, “but that is due to the law of your nature, that you do best whatever you do last.”

Her eyes rested very gravely for some seconds on his face before she replied with her usual frankness of manner:

“Far better not say over-nice things to me, James, lest I remember them.”

Discussing the subject of love, later, Hartwell said:

“Thought is very much higher than most love. But if the love springs from rational perception, if it is love up in the head, then, it is itself thought in a state of passion — though in its highest activity — and nothing is higher. If I ever loved I fancy that, for the most part, I should love in that way.”

“But it would show in your eyes just the same,” she murmured absently, at which words Hartwell’s brow flushed and his eyes dropped from her face.

“I should love simply with the heart,” said Julia, with a short nervous laugh, “the whole of it in one lump, and leave the head and all the rest of me to take care of themselves. But people should pray to be kept out of that. It is no fun, I can see.”

Someone at the piano was playing a valse brillante and three haphazard couples were dancing among the furniture. Hartwell was silent, leaning on his knee, till he suddenly said:

“When an emotion arises, reason has only one maxim— ‘take the train.’ Hence I mean to be a traveller on Christmas night.”

“No, James,” she said earnestly. “People will only say that you are still afraid of being with me.”

“I fear that I am not very sensitive to the opinion of the organism known as ‘people.’”

“But not so soon. I have to plan with you our February hunting-party.”

“Then I must only wait and hear.”

The castle was full of people disposed to be freely merry and the next (Christmas) day was jolly with holly, sport, wine and dancing.

After that whole day spent in Julia’s company, Hartwell strolled out from the castle at about eleven in the night and sat down in a six-sided summerhouse, in order to think out his problem and come to some sort of understanding with himself, once for all, if he could.

Almost suddenly this improbable thing had come upon him like a bolt from the blue — this great care. In stepping into Drayton’s shoes, he had foreseen everything, but he had not foreseen this possibility — the human nature of his own bosom. Here was the unexpected for Hartwell! to find himself, not a thinking machine, but a man in love with a woman. He sat on the seat of the summer-house and his cold eye looked out sideward at it, warily, considering and weighing it.

Truly, Julia was very dear to his heart, to his eyes! To be with her on moonlit midnights on the poop of the Sempronia in the middle of the sea, when it was calm, and look into her eyes, as he drew her shawl close around her shoulders, they two alone in the world, seemed to Hartwell a fair prospect. But that was not the point: the point was that, if he loved her, he should not tell her that he was Drayton, And if he told her that he was Drayton, then he should not marry her, Drayton being already married.

“Egoism” was Hartwell’s settled creed, but in the presence of Julia “egoism” apparently broke down. He found himself thinking more of her than of himself.

Behind the summer-house was a wood all stark with the frost, before its door were four steps with stone balustrades to them, leading down to a lawn on a lower level. On the lawn was a lake and in the middle of the lake a stone satyr, standing on a rock. On the lawn also, between the lake and the summer-house, was a sundial, raised on steps and on and over everything shone a cold Christmas moonlight.

Hartwell had once before spoken with Julia here, and while he now sat there, bent down and thinking, she came again. His heart pulsed slowly and strongly, like fierce cuts of a whip in his breast, when he heard her laugh and knew that she was coming, before he saw her. She was with a school-boy son of their hostess, and Hartwell presently saw them strolling across the lawn in the direction of the lake. She looked wondrously tall to him in the moonlight in her wraps and a furred cloak, like Diana towering above her maidens. She and the boy halted by the lake, which was a stone’s throw from the summerhouse. He thought that they would not know that he was there. He made no sound, but when after some minutes the boy left her at a run, Julia moved toward the summerhouse and Hartwell went and met her on the steps of the terrace.

“You are here, then,” she said. “I thought you might be, and I am glad, for I want to ask you something. But here, sitting still, and it is so cold! Happy men at least put on overcoats, James, therefore you are unhappy. Is it about me?”

He flung away his cigar, saying irrelevantly, as they went into the summer-house together:

“I am not a man for riotous company. I like quietude and hence am here.”

“You not a man for riotous company? Well, then, this is the second time lately that I have had the selfsame impression! and each time when your face has been hidden: it is a little uncanny!”

“What impression?”

“A dream impression, the impression that you are quite a new, another, man!”

Hartwell did not like this.

“Sit here,” he said. “What is it that you want to ask me?”

“Just that: what has made you different?”

“In what sense different?”

“In yourself, in your very fibre, it sometimes seems to me, almost. Why did I not like you well before? Tell me that.”

“You do now?” he asked tenderly, turning a little toward her, his left arm over the back of the bench behind her shoulders, his right hand on the knob of his stick.

“Well, yes, I seem to like you now, James,” she answered; “especially sometimes.”

“When? I am interested, you see.”

“When I am with you, then. When I am not, you are sometimes all mixed — a mixture perhaps of two impressions — one recent, one old. If the old predominates then I am cross, and if the new, then I am pleased, and when I am with you, especially where it is dark, like here, then there is the new alone, and I am quite pleased.” Julia smiled fondly, saying this.

Hartwell's hand made a movement to touch hers, but he drew it back quickly, before there was any contact.

"The change which you say you note in me," he said, "may be perfectly real, but only — a change — let us say, of mood, which I hope will be life-long, since it pleases you. I would do, and be, much to please you."

"Then I feel so honoured, James—"

"And to please me," he said quickly, cutting her short before she could give expression to any more, "to please me, pray do not let your mind recur to any of the rude impressions which I have given you in the past, unless it be to prevent yourself from being sorry for having thrown me over."

"But if I am genuinely sorry now."

"Don't be, don't!" he said fiercely. "I tell you that nothing short of a dog-like shamelessness could ever have permitted me to aspire to your hand, your rare hand, Julia. We were divided as the Poles, and as much divides us still. But, being what I am, if I may be permitted to call you friend and dear to the hour of my death."

Julia now let her hand rest lightly upon his hand that was over the knob of his stick, a touch in the dark which sent a current of magnetism thrilling through Hartwell's frame, rather flustering his self-control and the depth of his breathing. At the same time the excellent Julia said frankly, in a low and intimate tone:

"What 'divides us still?' Nothing divides us. I am fond of you, James."

"Yes," said Hartwell, with greedy ears, forgetting everything in his keenness to hear more of this good news; "in actual fact? to what extent?"

Now gazing closely at her, he could see the delicate length of her chin in profile, lit by a moonbeam which touched it, with the firm contour of her lips, and the lower half of her nose, and his eyes could just guess the violet glow of her eyes in the deeper darkness higher up under the overarching wrap which covered her head.

“To what extent?” she answered with a fond smile, while her eyes rested pensively upon him. “Should I be the first to tell, because it was I who wantonly threw you away? Forgive me for that. I was merely senseless, I suppose. Shall I say to what extent, if I could? To the extent, at least, I think, James, to which you are fond of me.”

“But that is to the very dust!” cried Hartwell aloud, with great suddenness, in a sort of passionate protest; “with a burden under which I must surely break—” He stopped short and his head bowed down with a sound that resembled a sob.

Julia did not understand the full depth of Hartwell’s emotion, nor, of course, its cause. She had her own burden of emotion, which fully occupied her. Her head was leant in a pensive attitude on her hand, her bosom gently heaved, and her eyes were closed. The admirable Julia took her passion seriously. With her eyes closed, she murmured, just loudly enough for Hartwell to hear:

“I have found you. I love.”

But something in that definite word “love” caused Hartwell to rise suddenly from her side and take a backward step, seeing that things had been allowed to go too far. His fingers lightly touched his forehead. His lips were about to pronounce the word “No,” but he stopped to listen to what she was saying, for looking pensively down on the floor of the summer-house, without apparently noticing his getting up from her, she was speaking, rather to herself than to him, saying:

“It is wonderfully tender, really; wonderfully deep and real and lifelong. I never even dreamed what it was like before, James. I don’t suppose that most people even know. It comes mysteriously from Heaven. Yes, I love you. I can only tell you that.”

She now rose and laid her two hands on his shoulders, smiling sweetly and looking into his eyes, as she continued to speak in a soft voice, making her lover the confidant of her tender pains.

Several times Hartwell attempted to utter some word to cut the scene short, but without uttering anything, but when she said, “Yes, that is the accomplished fact; I love you — like a serf,” his lips pronounce a sharp “No!”

“But I say yes.” she answered smiling, thinking that his protest had only reference to the meekness of the word serf— “like a serf and like a mother, and like a woman, and like a daughter, and like your oldest schoolboy friend. I couldn’t say — But what is the matter? Kiss me.”

Hartwell’s lips were pressed together with a certain vindictive severity, his eyes were engorged with blood. He now bitterly blamed himself for his self-indulgence in letting her speak in this way to him, and bitterly he hated destiny for the harsh trick it had paid him. His nose and his wrinkled underlids were pallid, his lips and beard trembled with agitation. His arms opened slightly of themselves for one embrace, but his hard will conquered this impulse, and he turned quite roughly from her.

“I was in the wrong to let you give expression to all that,” he said hoarsely, rapidly: “there are innumerable reasons. I never said that I love you.”

“But what is the matter?” she cried, startled at last. “You never said, but nothing else is so true.”

Hartwell spun sharply round to her, pressed her with a groan to his bosom, and for a minute their souls met and held converse the one with the other where their lips were joined together. But even as she hung upon his heart he placed her with perfunctory haste upon the cushioned seat, and instantly was gone — running — from her. And there where he had placed her she sat for a long time, staring at the ground with her palm under her chin. When she returned to the castle, she heard that Hartwell had hurriedly departed for the station.

XII. HARTWELL RISES IN THE NIGHT

HARTWELL REACHED HIS home in Addison Road on the evening of the day after Boxing Day, a very morose man. As he opened the gate he heard the bayings of Bull the mastiff, but the dog no sooner got to know who it was that was coming in, than with his usual signs of horror he took himself off to the back. And Hartwell's eye flashed with severity as he murmured —

“Let this be the dog's last flight from me.”

When he went in he said to the footman in the outer hall:

“I want Bull chained in his cot for the night.” Then, with a rather lower voice, with a certain stealthiness in it, he added, “If anyone calls to see me before dinner, let me know at once, in my bedroom.”

In the inner hall he was met by Miss Scatchett and the Frenchman, who had hurried from different directions to greet his entrance.

“Sir,” murmured the excellent Count, who had on a large black tie and a limp shirt-front with small frills, “my compliments.”

“Ah, Dulaunay, how do you do?” cried Hartwell with a fling of the hand. “Well, you look hearty, my friend.”

Without stopping for any talk, he went upstairs to his bedroom, where he washed and was dressing, when the footman rapped at his door with the announcement:

“One Robert Hartwell to see you, sir.”

“Send — do not bring — him up,” said Hartwell.

Hartwell threw on a dressing-gown, hastily seated himself in an easy chair, and propped his brow on his thumb and forefinger, looking the picture of meditative calm; but this look was assumed, for the beat of his heart had quickened.

There came a knock at the door.

Hartwell, called “Come in” and a boy of fifteen entered.

He was cleanly dressed, but his trousers were too short by an inch. His boots were heavy and rather worn out, his clothes were all darned, he had on a plaid scarf and held a deerstalker cap in his hand. He looked first agitated, then all at once, wild with amazement.

“Father,” he breathed.

It was this father that Hartwell had not wished the footman to hear, and so had told him to send — not to bring — the boy up.

“Kindly shut the door my young friend,” said he.

The lad obeyed.

This lad was a perfect beauty, resembling his dead mother, and not at all like Hartwell. He was rather small-built, with an oval Madonna face, which was delicately flushed with a rosy colour, and he had soft brown eyes and pretty lips. But he looked for the moment simply silly in his boundless lack of comprehension at finding his poor hard-working father in this mansion, served by a footman and wrapped in the dressing gown of a king.

The father’s eye rested upon him with a caressing smile in it, and with this thought in his head— “Julia would love him.”

“Father! you here?” breathed the lad again in a husky voice.

“Sit down on that chair, my friend,” said Hartwell, “and permit me at once to rid your mind of an error — an excusable one, certainly, but still an error. I am not your father. Your father, I regret to say — is dead.”

The boy touched his brow with his hand. He looked as if he were stunned by these words.

“You not my father, sir?” said he. “Oh, but father—”

“I am not your father. I know well that it must seem incredible to you, but I am about to explain it to you. Your father is dead.”

“Father dead?” breathed the lad. “Is that the truth, sir?”

“The simple truth. Your father had a strong, a very strong resemblance to me and hence your error. I was driving a motor-car along the Norwich Road one dark night some three weeks since, when your father, in the attempt to save me from running into a cart, was himself killed. I am sure that you must have read of the accident in the Sunday paper, though you would not know that the news concerned you, since your father’s name, which could not at the time be discovered, did not appear. However, from a piece of paper found in his pocket I have been able, with much difficulty, to find out your address and so sent for you to come to me.”

“And he’s dead?”

“Yes.”

“Oh, my sir!” The lad fell into a chair, bowed down with sobbing.

Hartwell got up out of his chair, went to him, and put his lips on the boy’s hair with a murmur of love.

“Don’t cry,” he murmured. “You have now a father far mightier than you ever had, and just as fond.”

“You are very kind, sir,” sobbed the boy inconsolably, “but that can’t give back anybody’s own father. There ain’t ne’er another like him — the cleverest workman — that poor, hungry sometimes — and yet always that blooming decent to me — oh my.”

Hartwell, with a soft look in his eyes, said —

“No doubt, no doubt; but men — and boys, too — should know how to check their emotions, and rise above their griefs. The skull is higher than the chest, my friend. Let us therefore live in our top-storey, and be men. Pull yourself together, and listen to what I have now to say to you.”

“But you talk just like father!” said the boy, lifting his wet eyes with a look of bland astonishment— “the same notions, too, about the skull and the chest—”

“Is that really so?” asked Hartwell in a tone of surprise. “Then your father must have been a man who had reflected, and I hope taught you to reflect also. Dry your tears, and let us talk. I have, first of all, a promise to exact from you and it is this — that, since there are reasons why the resemblance between your father and me should not even be suspected, you will never, as long as you live, breathe a word of it to any creature.”

“Yes sir, I promise you, sir — Please sir, where’s my father buried?”

“Never mind your father now, I say. The dead are dead, boy, and only the living are alive. He was buried at Aylsham, then — I will tell you the fuller details another time, but think now of yourself and of me. Promise again to keep the great secret of your life.”

“All right, sir, I promise.”

“You will be like an eagle while you keep it and like an Icarus, whose wings of wax the sun melts, when you fail.”

“I shan’t fail, sir.”

“Well, I believe that, boy. You are to be trusted.” The dinner-gong began to sound. “I must dress, and you must go. Take this £5-note — ah, ah, you aren’t too used to them, I fear, poor boy. I see that you have been getting some work on a generating set at a machine-maker’s within the last two weeks—”

“That’s true, sir. How can you see that, sir? My word, sir, you and father are just like brothers!”

“Forget your father and love me, whose delight you are. Listen to what you have to do now. When you go out from here, take a cab to this little Holborn hotel” — Hartwell handed the boy a slip of paper which he had ready in his pocket— “and live there for the next week. Take also this letter which I have written for you, and carry it to-morrow morning to its address in Saville Row, near Regent Street, where the firm of tailors to whom it is addressed will take care to provide you with a suitable wardrobe. In a week’s time, when you are dressed like a gentleman, you will come and live with me here for a fortnight, after which you will start for Rugby, where I have arranged for your residence with a house-master and in two years you will begin your career as an engineer—”

“Yes, sir,” said the boy, all agaze in a fairy dream, “but — I — want to be a poet, sir.”

“Aha! I have heard that you are given to scribbling rhymes. But you must abandon that mood, to please me. Now you must go. Come first to my fatherly arms, and kiss me.”

Hartwell embraced him and the lad went away in tears, with the bank note, the slip, and the letter to the tailors. Hartwell then descended to dinner, where he found Oswald talking to Dulaunay, for Oswald, a confirmed diner-out, often looked in about dinner-time. At table the talk was with the glib Count, who, liking Hartwell and the haphazard prosperity of his situation here, stuck to it, letting his tongue run loose on every subject under the sun, from the Quartier Latin to Italian literature, and from Anarchism to le boxe, le sport, and le fun.

At this time Hartwell was actually paying Dulaunay a salary of £500 a year, for one morning the excellent count, having complained of a shortness of funds, if not exactly to Hartwell, at least in Hartwell’s hearing.

Hartwell had said in words of a vague and, doubtful meaning: “Mention to me afresh, Dulaunay, the sum which I pay you as salary, these things easily slip the memory.” For Hartwell had now a suspicion that Dulaunay’s relation to him was in some way bogus. Many little things and words had tended to show it to his active perceptions, but he had rather shut his eyes to them, refraining from probing the mystery, for the simple reason that he found the versatile count agreeable, and chose to remain in a half-darkness as to the reason of his presence in the household, to accept him as an accomplished fact, and to leave matters as they were.

One morning he had seen Dulaunay busied in the book-room, another morning he had seen him before an easel painting landscapes and each time he had made the count's occupation an excuse for not prying too closely into his right to be there, thinking in the one case that he may have been a sort of do-nothing librarian to Drayton, and in the other, that he may have been Drayton's protege, on account of his promising talents as an artist — both of which were highly improbable.

Hartwell went out regularly to the city before noon, and as to how the Frenchman passed his days he had no idea, and cared nothing. In the evenings they met and neither referred to anything farther back in the past than the night of their meeting at Liverpool Street-Station. Once only Hartwell had found it necessary to remonstrate pleasantly with Dulaunay on receiving a hint from Miss Scatchett of a certain absence of mind in some of the servants, due to the gallant and excellent count, but otherwise their relation flowed quietly along like a gentle stream. If Miss Scatchett, or Oswald, or anyone had once happened to say to Hartwell: "Who or what is this French count? we did not know him till lately," Hartwell, no doubt, would have been stirred, to find out the truth of things. But though Miss Scatchett or Oswald may have asked themselves why the count was there, their vague interest never chanced to lead them to ask Hartwell anything about him, while Hartwell was willing to believe that the count was an institution in the house, and the count, for his part, within some days after his first drive to Addison Road, in Hartwell's brougham, looked upon Hartwell and all he had as his by an ancient right.

After dinner that evening of young Bobbie Hartwell's visit to the house, the count departed in the brougham for the theatre, while Hartwell and Oswald smoked together in the billiard-room and each interview between the supposed brothers tended to increase the antipathy between them. When Oswald left it was getting late, and Hartwell went up to bed. But he lay without being able to sleep, watching the little ray of a night-light on the dressing-table. He heard the shutting up of the house, and also the wheels of the carriage on the drive, returning with Dulaunay. Hartwell's nights were wretched: firstly, because sleep was hard to get, and secondly, because it was so gruesome when it came. Things now happened to him in dreams — woods, scenes, terrors, with that face which might be either his own or another's, such as he could not have fancied. It even happened to him anon to be shocked by the doubt of the average credulous man: "How, if in heaven and earth there be, after all, more things than atoms, ether and energy? or how if the atoms be very different, far more ghostly things, than one dreams."

This was a strange doubt to trouble such a mind as Hartwell's. When his clock struck two, his eyes flashed severely, and he rose, lit a candle, threw on a splendid gold-wrought dressing-gown and put on a pair of slippers. He then took a revolver from a case, descended to the back, quietly undid a door, and went out into the grounds, which were fairly extensive and rich in vegetation. He walked in the direction of the stable and, in doing this, passed near the dog's cot in an alley, where, by his order Bull was chained up that night. The dog whined on seeing him, but Hartwell did not even glance at it. His face was stern. He had determined that the dog should no more fly from him. He went to an outhouse which stood near the stable, his feet now soaked with the wet in the grasses, and there he found a spade and crowbar, which he took and with them he went on to the far end of the grounds. There, choosing a spot under a holly tree, he set to work to dig a grave two feet deep by the dim light of a moon struggling to shine in a grey and cloudy sky.

This done, he straightened himself, put his arms akimbo, and looked up a little while to where the blotch of moonlight was. He then returned to the kennel, undid the chain, and led the dog towards the grave. Bull followed him with uplifted eyes, showing more of the whites than of the brown part, an expression of weak abashment. Hartwell tied the dog to the holly-tree, stepped back a little, the revolver in his hand and, stooping far forward, held the weapon to the dog's ear. The dog sidled a little round the tree, whining pitifully, but as the dog moved so Hartwell, stooping, followed step by step. "Now, Bull," he said again, and the report sounded. The dog yelped and dropped dead. This was a sort of murder, for in Hartwell's scientific creed the dog is a very near first cousin to man and Hartwell's consciousness of truth was so keen that this was not a mere sterile bit of knowledge to him, but one of the big, living facts of life, ever present in his mind.

He buried the poor Bull with grim lips, and returned to bed and as he lay abed again, thinking of Julia and of his son, into these thoughts there intruded a thought of Gissing, his lonely cold prisoner in Hobham House, whom he had to see on the morrow.

XIII. MORE ABOUT LETTY

THE SUDDEN DEPARTURE of Gissing from the old Manor farm came as a disappointment to Oswald. He actually had on his overcoat and gloves, one afternoon at his chambers, about to go to Norfolk to see Gissing, when he received from Walker his shorthand man, the telegram:

“FIND THAT GISSING TEMPORARILY GONE AWAY. WILL WIRE AGAIN WHEN HE RETURNS;”

so that Magee had to take off Oswald's coat again.

Oswald received this telegram two days before Christmas. He ought to have gone down to Norfolk at least forty-eight hours before and now blamed himself for his slow habit of turning round, but there had been social engagements. One could not throw everything to the devil at a moment's notice. He sighed and waited till Gissing should return home and would have lifted his eyebrows in lingering surprise, if he had been told that Gissing was in a locked room in Hobham House.

When Oswald received that telegram from Walker, Hartwell was already at Castle Moran, fox-hunting with the admirable Julia. It has been seen how he fled from her, when she told him that she loved him and how, after lingering a day at an inn in the country, he returned to Addison Road on the second evening after Christmas and saw his son, Bobby, and killed the dog, Bull, the same night.

The next day Hartwell was at the office in Fenchurch Street, from noon till the closing of the house. During that time he took a second saloon ticket on a P. and O. boat, which was to sail for the East in three days' time, on the Thursday, the 31st of December, "old-year's-day." After the closing of the house he put on his overcoat and put into a pocket of it some sheets of paper and envelopes, a pen and a bottle of ink, together with some other sheets of paper which were covered with his own writing. He went out, and outside bought an ounce of tobacco and a pipe, which he also put into his pocket. He then went to Gannon Street, and took a train for Lydney, the station nearest to Hobham House. At Lydney he bought a loaf, a bottle of claret, and a candle and with these things he walked to Hobham House, unlocked the front door and went in. When he had gone up, unlocked the door of the room in which Gissing was, and entered it, he lit the candle and stuck it in its own grease on the mantelpiece, and now he saw Gissing crouching in a corner near the mantelpiece with a certain glower-underlook at him.

"Well, Gissing," said Hartwell, "I suppose that you have not had four very enjoyable days and I suppose, too, that like a foolish man, you blame me for your discomfort. But it is not my fault, nor is it yours, but the fault of an evil chance which caused you to know more about my affairs than is good for your comfort. I wish you no ill, and only locked you up with little food and no fire in order that you may fully realise my power over you and the more readily follow my instructions."

The countryman's mouth worked in the effort to find expression for what he felt, but in the end all that came out was:

"Ah, you're a wicked one, you!"

Hartwell made no reply, but proceeded to lay on the mantelpiece three half-sheets of paper covered with something written by himself, while Gissing cried out:

"Good Lord on High, mister, why have you done the likes o' this here to a poor man?"

“Gissing,” answered Hartwell, “I have already apologised for the discomfort to which an evil chance has forced me to subject you. Unfortunately, still worse things await you, but let no one be blamed. The cat eats the mouse, the mayfly is torn by the swallow, the sparrow is speared by the shrike, the man kills the microbe, the lamb the lion, the German kills the Frenchman, the Englishman the Hindoo. Nor can we alter this necessary condition of life on our planet by regretting it. The weaker suffer for the stronger—”

Again Gissing looked at Hartwell with his mouth working to find expression, but the power of expressing his thoughts and feelings was not the strong point of Gissing, or of any of his class and kind, and in the end all that came was:

“Ey, he’s a hard man to deal with!”

“But let us not waste words, Gissing,” Hartwell went on. “I have first of all to tell you that on Thursday coming, only three days from now, you will be placed in complete liberty by me on board a ship, on which your passage is already taken. You will start without funds, though with a trunk of clothes, but on your arrival at Hong Kong a correspondent of my firm will offer you permanent employment in his warehouse. You will never return to England, even if you can ever find the means to do so, nor will you ever write to anyone in England, for in this case, if I discover it I shall simply place in the hands of the police a confession which you are now about to write of having attempted to extort blackmail from me on a false charge, whereupon you will be arrested in your new abode. No, say nothing, my friend, but submit yourself to me, or your discomforts will be stretched perhaps to the point of death. See here, I have brought you some bread, some wine, and some tobacco, pleasures which can only be enjoyed by you on condition of submission—”

“Ey he’s a hard man!” groaned the ill-fated countryman, with a hoarse chest, “he don’t call to mind that I’ve got a wife and daughter.”

“I have not forgotten them,” replied Hartwell: “I am a hard man, yes, but by no means a wicked one. Your wife and daughter shall be my care, Gissing, and your wisest course will be to cast their existence out of your memory as soon as ever Nature will permit you—”

“My own wife and daughter! Cast them out o’ my — ! Ah, you, you, you, you!”

“You think me a monster, I see, Gissing, but that is not because I am a monster, but because I am somewhat more rational than you. I know the feelings of a father, and I know well the feelings of a husband, and I experience a human sympathy with your case. But all things must yield to the iron laws of Necessity and on the whole your dependents will do very well. But now to business, my friend. Here are two letters to your wife which I have written and require you to copy out now. I will first of all read them aloud to you. The first one says:

““My dear wife, here am I in Birmingham where I had to come from London on the business that I came up to London about. But not much can be done without the evidence of our Sarah and perhaps yours too. So I want you to send Sarah at once to me at 117, Duke Street, Moseley, Birmingham, and I send you enclosed 17/- in postal orders to give her for the journey — but do not give her any more than 17/-. Perhaps in a day or two I may have to write you again to come to me and her in London, where I am going back to from here. Your affectionate husband—”

“That is the first, Gissing; and the second says:

““My dear wife, I and Sarah met all right here at Birmingham, and now we are just starting back for London. Everything is going first rate, but I want you now to shut up the house and come to meet us at once at 112,

Chapel Street, S. Kensington, London, for which I enclose £1. Then we shall all go home together. Unless you come, we shan't get the £2,000, so be sure to come. Your affectionate husband—'

"Such is the second letter, Gissing; and this third paper is the confession of blackmail and false accusation, which you will also copy out."

"Then, my home will be broken up?" cried the suffering countryman.

"I, in God knows where, my wife in London, my daughter in Birmingham without a penny-piece to bless themselves—"

"Neither they nor you shall starve, Gissing, that I undertake. It is true that there is no such house as 117, Duke Street, Moseley, Birmingham, nor any such house as 112, Chapel Street, S. Kensington, but there is a Duke Street, and a Chapel Street, and in them the two women shall be met by my agents and suitable employment shall be found for them. You will all, indeed, be lost to one another, and to those also who wish to use you for my hurt."

At this point the old man sprang upright from his cowering position, crying out:

"Look here, I — I wouldn't do that thing, not to save my life!"

Hartwell's eyes flashed at this. He said not another word, but with pressed lips, caught up the "pleasures" — the bread, wine, and tobacco — and went out, leaving the pen and ink, the blank sheets of paper, the letters to be copied, and the candle and matches. As to the last two, he had little fear that Gissing's sufferings would tempt him to burn down the house, for in that case the room where Gissing was was in such a position would burn and he would certainly be burned to death.

Those sufferings of Gissing, however, must have been great and might have tempted him to do almost anything. For four days he had eaten nothing but two tins of potted ham, with two bottles of claret. It continued, moreover, to be cold and now he would have to wait at least one other day. With a fine English stoicism, the old man had said not a word about what he suffered, but his frame knew its own pains. As Hartwell walked out bearing off the “pleasures,” Gissing, shivering with his two hands in his pockets, gazed after him with a glowering underlook, and uttered the groan, “Ey, he’s a cold-hearted man.”

Hartwell locked the door on the outside, put the pleasures on the floor, and went away.

When he reached home that night he again found Oswald there. They dined together, and after dinner found themselves alone in the billiard room, for Dulaunay was in the drawing-room, playing pieces from Chopin. For a long time little was said between the supposed brothers. Oswald listlessly threw the billiard balls about the table, Hartwell lay on a couch meditating on the wreaths of smoke from his cigar. Then suddenly, after half an hour, it came out that Oswald had pressing need of £200 and Hartwell, tossing the cigar end into the fire, said:

“My good fellow, I won’t give it you.”

Oswald’s square jaws stiffened themselves at his bitter feelings, he left the table and, standing before the fire, turned an evil look upon Hartwell, who was now, he felt, in his hands. Gissing, indeed, had gone from home — so Walker had telegraphed. But Oswald was only waiting for Gissing’s return to run down to Norfolk and get Gissing’s written evidence that his brother and Letty Barnes had known each other (the desired £200 was partly to tip Gissing with), after which, there would be no more refusals of £200. And, exulting in his power, never dreaming that Gissing lay a prisoner in Hobham House, he said sourly to Hartwell:

“My good James, I fear that you are growing mean, but let me explain to you why I really need this two hundred. A girl in whom I am interested has been murdered, James. Her father is impecunious the police at a loss, and I have taken up the case, employing a private agent to get at the bottom of it.”

“Who was she?” asked Hartwell.

“A girl named Letty Barton,” answered Oswald, his habit of sycophancy even now restraining his lips from venturing upon the open defiance of saying “Letty Barnes.” For though they had opened to say Barnes they ended by saying Barton: a very inconsistent, but natural thing, for he wished to let “James” know that he knew all, but in the midst of obeying his impulses, he was checked by a qualm, by a feeling of his rashness, and modified it by saying the illogical “Barton.” However, if he had said “Letty Barnes,” this name would have had no effect whatever upon Hartwell, from whose memory it had passed ever since that day when he saw her father a moment in the “Black Dogs” at Aylsham. The shreds of Letty’s letter to Julia lay forgotten in McCalmont’s overcoat pocket, which was now hung up in Hartwell’s wardrobe. Hartwell had never fitted them together, had never read in the newspapers of the finding of Letty’s body, did not know that she was dead, or remember that she had lived, or have any reason to think that Drayton had known such a girl. When, therefore, Oswald, saying “Letty Barton,” looked to see Hartwell flinch, he saw only indifference, and thought to himself: “James can command his face.”

“Who was this Letty Barton?” asked Hartwell.

“I need only say that I had an interest in her and mean to avenge her. It was a disgusting atrocity, this murder.”

“By whom committed?”

“A lover. You have seen it in the papers.”

“I don’t remember. It is known then, that she had a lover? Well, the post mortem, of course. Tell me the circumstances and let us see what light a detached reason may throw up on them.”

“I suppose I never knew him well,” thought Oswald, “he is a deeper man —”

“My dear fellow,” he said aloud, “I need not go into it, you have read it all.”

“But if I say not? Tell me.”

“Oh well then, she was found in a gut behind an old tavern, two days after her death. She had been strangled, her hand was bruised, most of her finger-nails were broken, her collar was rumpled behind, while one of its button holes was torn through in front, her face was swollen, round one wrist was a red mark, in her pocket were a thimble, a hymn-book, and a little powder-puff—”

Hartwell, with his thumb and forefinger pressing down his closed eyelids, and frowning deeply, said:

“Well, now, let me see: there was a struggle for a letter.”

“By Jove!” Oswald started, thinking within himself: “That, then, was the letter of which I have a shred! but this motive for telling? His bluff!” He added aloud: “That is quite probably true, my good James, but your certainty is curious.”

“Why so? It seems pretty clear to me. Did you see the body yourself, by the way?”

“Er — yes.”

“You said in describing her appearance that ‘her hand’ was bruised: does that mean one hand only?”

“I really can’t say now.”

“Then it was probably both hands, for one only would very likely have resulted in a more definite observation on your part. But how do you account for these bruises on her hands?”

“She was thrown over a cliff through a lot of prickles and bush: that, I suppose, might account for her scratches and things.”

“Ah, but now you use another word, not ‘bruises,’ but ‘scratches and things.’ Was her face, then, bruised like her hands?”

“No, I think not. It was scratched—”

“Then the hand-bruises had a different origin from the face-scratches; were true bruises, caused by a struggle for some object, a ring, a letter, a coin, or something; and the mauling of both hands seems to prove that the struggle was spirited and prolonged, the object having been slipped to the left hand, when the right became sore.”

“James, you are amazing,” said Oswald, with a breath of laughter: “but admit, my good fellow, that your certainty that the object of the struggle was a letter is curious.”

“Why so? How else can you explain the bruises, the broken nails, and the hymn book?”

“I confess that I do not see your point.”

“The bruises rather seem to prove, don’t they? that the object was not a large object, like a stick, for instance. It was containable in the hand; and since most of her nails were broken, that certainly proves that the object was not a small one like a ring, for instance; for her fingers could not quite close upon the object. That seems to give us the size of the object, the size of a letter crumpled into a ball. It may therefore have been a letter, and the hymn book strongly suggests that it was a letter, for why the hymn book except to hold a letter uncrumpled between the leaves in her pocket? She had placed the letter in the hymn book on writing it, meaning to show it to him, and when the time came she took the hymn book and all. But observe that this gives you the motive of the crime, if you do not already know it. For if I am right we have the fact of a letter written by her for which there was a struggle, and the natural inference is that it was a letter, say, to some new flame of his, containing damaging statements—”

“He has now told me enough to hang him!” thought Oswald, “given Gissing’s evidence that he knew Letty—”

“As to the powder puff—” began Hartwell, but before he could get farther he was interrupted by a footman who looked in to announce some visitors; and Hartwell stood up, saying to Oswald: “Well, jot down all the facts of the matter, Oswald, and we will confer on them some other night. Such things furnish interesting exercises for the reason. As for the £200, you shall have them for this specific purpose of punishing an ugly crime, and I will send you the cheque to-morrow. But I warn you, my good fellow, that my brotherly affection has its limits and that you will have to rely upon your own resources to a far greater extent than heretofore. I have had losses.”

Oswald looked at him with eyes of mere wonder, having given up all hope of the £200 when he had once dared to mention that name — Letty Barton.

XIV. HARTWELL UPROOTS

THE NEXT EVENING, as Hartwell went out from his office to return to Gissing, he saw in the street, near the outer door of the building in which his office was, a man with very heavy eyes, a deep frown, and a red fan-beard. It was Barnes, the father of Letty.

Hartwell peered searchingly at him, at the same time making haste to shut himself in his brougham, which was there awaiting him, and he thought to himself, "I have seen him before — but where? He was waiting there to see me come out. The there-he-is of his expression — . And the man means me no good, his mind in a state of unworldly distraction or despair. The feather in his beard, the old mud on his boots, his wrinkled waistcoat, the rent in his coat pocket, perhaps drinking, yet hardly a drunkard, and the bulge in his pocket angular, perhaps a revolver. But let us not permit ourselves to be shot. Such a weakness would be too immoral."

He drove from Cannon Street to the little Surrey Station of Lydney alone in his compartment and still he kept on musing on Barnes, thinking: "He is a countryman, not of the lowest class, his rings, his chain, but not a farmer. Apparently rather a tradesman. No trace of the use of leggings on the trousers, and trousers gone at the knees, not at the bottoms. Yet a great shot, high aim, too — pheasants, 'rocketers,' — say therefore from Suffolk, Norfolk, the nap on right shoulder, cock of left leg, turpentine stains, muscles of neck. But a tradesman and a sportsman, too? Hardly — then, perhaps, a town tradesman; rather one in open country, near coverts, yet not a farmer. A lonely publican, tavern-keeper — lurking in Fenchurch Street!

What, then, has that ruffian done to this poor man? He's probably in London only to see and hurt me — You should be careful, however, of yourself, mine host."

From Lydney he walked to Hobham House, and up to Gissing's prison. This time, on seeing Gissing, Hartwell's heart was moved to pity. The countryman, roused by the entrance of Hartwell from morbid sleep, still sat without a word or motion in his corner, hugging his tremors, with a glint like lunacy in the downward stare of his eyes. He had copied the confession of blackmail — there it lay on the mantelpiece — but he had not copied either of the letters to his wife. And again Hartwell, seeing this, was adamant, saying:

"See, I have brought you some ham, Gissing. But do as I bid you or I cannot permit myself to alleviate your discomforts."

"Merciful Lord, man!" cried the countryman suddenly, "won't you give a man a morsel o' food, then?"

"No."

"Don't ye believe in a just God above, then, man, man, in God's name?"

"Above, eh?" said Hartwell, sitting on a cloud, no doubt, as on a cushion, in the Turkish manner. "No, Gissing! She in whom I believe exists and is mighty, but He in whom you believe is thin and dying."

"Ey, he's a strange man!" wailed the countryman in muffled words with a covered face.

Hartwell now paced the room with his hands behind his back, and during the time while he twice passed from end to end of the floor Gissing leapt up furiously, took the pen in his hand, and began to copy one of the letters by the light of the candle. Hartwell went and looked over his shoulder, but after the old man had written five or six words Hartwell said:

“You are too cold; you cannot write now, Gissing. Promise me that if I alleviate your discomforts you will do all that I require.”

“Merciful Lord on High, can I help promising?” exclaimed Gissing, “Ain’t I but mortal.”

“That’s a man,” said Hartwell.

He at once took the candle, went out, and descending to the basement found there a chopper and some sticks of firewood. A few of the rooms here and there in the house remained scantily furnished, and on his way back to the top Hartwell took with him two chairs which, on re-entering the prison room he set to work to hew to pieces. Gissing looked silently at him under lowering brows while he did this. When the work grew hot, Hartwell threw off his overcoat, and continued to hew at the two chairs, till both were in fragments.

“Now, then, Gissing, for a fire,” he said with merry eyes, a little short of breath, with his arms akimbo, “and let it never more be said that I am an egoist.”

The enfeebled countryman dropped his head upon his arms over the mantelpiece and two tears flowed down his rude face, while Hartwell stooped at the grate.

“Now, Gissing, for a feast,” said Hartwell rising, when this was done. “Take also this coat of mine, which I will leave with you simply and solely because I do not myself feel cold, and let it serve you for blanket or pillow. When you have regaled yourself, then write the two letters, not forgetting the addresses on the envelopes. To-morrow at noon I come to take you to your ship, on which a trunk of clothes is already shipped for you. Good night.”

The countryman gazed after him as he walked out, not as after a man, but as after a force that could speak and look like a man.

However, the legacy of troubles which Drayton had left to Hartwell were rather like the hundred-headed hydra, and for every head that he cut down another sprang up. That very evening, for instance, when Gissing was at last forced to consent to write the letters to his wife, Hartwell had a startling adventure. He had come from Lydney to Shepherd's Bush, and was walking the short distance from the station to his house, when, as he came to the north corner of Addison Road he saw a woman standing on the east pavement. It was rather dark there, but at once he noticed that she was interested in him, was looking hard at him. She was quite a giantess in size. Her age was perhaps 40, she had the look of a countrywoman, was poorly but decently dressed, her face very round and fat, and covered all over with large freckles.

He wished to examine her more closely, and was about to pass near her when all of a sudden he shied sharply, and took to his heels as fast as he could run to the other (west) side of the road. Nor when he had reached that pavement did he stop, but pelted down on the road with some anxious, backward glances over his shoulder, till he slipped through someone's garden gate, and crouching there behind the wall in the deep shadow thrown by a mass of leafage, he peeped through the railings to see if she was coming. But she had not apparently followed. Not a soul was to be seen in the deep and lonely road and presently with a murmur of "Ah," and a smile he crept out and went hurriedly across to his own gate, which was on the east side of the road.

When, on his entrance into the house, Dulaunay said to him: "Sir, my compliments," Hartwell made the reply: "They are well-timed, my friend," for he knew that a knife lay in the woman's bosom, and that her eyes were very strange and deranged. "I shall assuredly see her again," he thought.

“The sins of that man spring up and multiply about me, and their harvest is great, and the labourer but one.”

The next day was Gissing's day of departure. Near noon Hartwell drove to the beginning of the Avenue before Hobham House, stopped the brougham there, alighted, walked to the house and returned to the brougham with Gissing dressed in the fur overcoat of Hartwell's which Hartwell had left for the countryman's blanket the previous evening. Gissing looked the picture of despair, and was non-resistant as a lamb. Hartwell now had the confession of blackmail and the two letters duly written by Gissing to his wife. They drove to a wharf in Chelsea, where a small steam-boat awaited them and they steamed down the river to Tilbury, where the great ship had just received her passengers from the company's special train. Hartwell gave the countryman a letter to one Bathright, who lived at Hong Kong, impressed upon him anew the line of his future conduct, and the ship moved down the river as Gissing was taken on board.

The next morning Gissing's wife received the first letter, in which her husband instructed her to send her daughter to meet him in Birmingham. And this she did. Two days afterwards she received the second letter, instructing her to start at once to meet her husband and daughter in London. And this also she did. Both mother and daughter were received by agents of Hartwell, the one in Birmingham, the other in London.

Later on, when the mother wrote to 117 Duke Street, Moseley, Birmingham, her letter came back to her, for there was no such address. When the daughter wrote to Overstrand, her letter, too, came back to her, for Hartwell had bought the Old Manor Farm from its owner and had shut it up. He gave their little furniture to the mother.

In the course of months both mother and girl found with some difficulty an opportunity to leave their work for a day and return to Overstrand, in some vague hope of retracing a clue of their past. But they returned at different times, and found that past all scattered to the winds. Mystery and desolation confronted them. The yard was encumbered with leaves, weeds, and grasses, stranger-ducks swam in the green slime of the pond, stranger-fowls scratched the marrow-plot, house martens built all round the eaves, the white owl haunted the lattices, poppy and yellow wild tulip choked the garden. They saw the old home lie like the face of the dead and shed tears at the ways of God.

XV. HARTWELL IS EGOISTIC

“MY VERY DEAR,” Julia wrote to Hartwell on the very day of Gissing’s departure to the East, “is an explanation due to me, or not? You should come to me. I am here in Brook Street. Come, for I have waited, and am waiting. — Julia.”

That morning Hartwell did not go to the city, though he was now in the thick of tearing himself out of the coils of Drayton’s business, but spent the forenoon in his study at Addison Road with the little packet of letters which Julia had written to Drayton, which he had found in the drawer of a wardrobe. There was hardly a word of fondness in any of them, but his eyes loved to smile upon her large writing, whose dash and decision, like cavalry assaulting a position, seemed to say: “There, that’s Julia.” Finally, a visit on business from the captain of the Sempronia caused him to lock the jacket away, and then he had to drive to Hobham House to get Gissing on his ship.

But a week passed after this and still Hartwell did not answer Julia’s note. He was at a loss what to answer. The question whether he should go to her or not go, and if he went what he should say to her, was so distracting that there were moments when he almost wished that those of his enemies who wanted to take his life might succeed in doing what they wanted.

His existence all round was infested with doubts and dangers. If Julia was by far the biggest of them, there were others very grave and pressing. There was the big woman with the clasped knife and the deranged eye. Who was she? Hartwell only knew that his death was her mania — that, like some “Charlotte Corday” she had come up from the country on a mission of death, and that he was her Marat. There, lurking under the shadow of trees, he caught a glimpse of her regularly every night as the brougham swept from Holland Park into Addison Road. She did not apparently know his house, for twice she had started after the carriage, presumably to discover the gate into which it went, but must have lost sight of it before it entered the gate, those being the darkest nightfalls of the year. This woman's name was Mary Liskeard. Her daughter, Margaret, had drowned herself in a lake called Harrod's, owing to melancholia caused by her husband's drowning, which drowning again was owing to some infamy of Drayton's in connection with an unseaworthy ship.

And there was the man with the frown and the red beard, and the heavy eyes. Barnes, too, had brooded and had his mania, and meant to do a deed. The evil seed sown in the mind of Barnes by Oswald, that day of the finding of Letty's body, was now grown to a mustard tree and the careless disdain with which the police had received his conviction that Drayton killed Letty had only the more embittered and fixed Barnes' mania.

Hartwell always now left his office, not by the front door of the building, but by way of a court behind, for regularly each evening from about the hour of the closing of the house till six o'clock he could see Barnes from a window of the office, standing sentry below.

And again there was the little stableman, Kirk. Kirk had apparently been bribed by Drayton to cut the tendon of a rival's horse called Brighteye, and Kirk now pretended that the plot was known to another turf-man named Teddy, to silence whom a further £2000 was necessary. Hartwell saw that if he did not give, his good name would be ruined, but it was not Hartwell's way to give. Apart from the fact that he knew that Teddy was a myth — for the jockey's mind was clear as crystal to him — he considered that to give was immoral. But he did not refuse outright, he temporised, dallied, and discussed, thinking how to uproot this Kirk and meanwhile Kirk had grown pressing.

To permit himself to be shot or hurt Hartwell considered immoral. He looked after No. 1, not because he particularly loved No. 1, but because that was the only sensible thing to do, the world being what he thought it was. Therefore, he meant to put “egoism,” which was his morality, into practice, and so it happened that Barnes, Mary Liskeard, Kirk, the turf-man, and others were in even more danger from him than he was from them.

A week after Julia’s unanswered note, in which she prayed Hartwell to go to her, it happened that Hartwell, in going to lunch over a conference with three financiers at the Holborn Restaurant, was taken down a by-street near the restaurant by his head clerk, who was going to lunch with him, to be shown a house of his which was falling to pieces. The house was No. 7 Twyford Buildings, a queer old house in a slum just to the south of Holborn. The upper part of it was clinker-built, the lower half was all patched with rough boardings; the windows were low and long, like the house itself; the window-panes all broken, and thicker than themselves with grime. The one door, which stood at one end of the house, was secured with a padlock.

When Hartwell was taken into it by his head clerk that day, he looked into every room with a particular interest, though it was empty but for a few corn-bags. (It had been used as a warehouse). He and his head clerk then went on to lunch. After the lunch, when they drove back to Fenchurch Street, there was Kirk awaiting Hartwell in the office, looking a mere spider in a stiff sack-overcoat, with a little mouse-face peeping out from under a Homburg hat and, without any invitation, he followed Hartwell into Hartwell’s private room.

“Well, now,” said Hartwell, when they were seated, “but I thought I hinted to you that it would be better not to show yourself here so often.”

“Look here, that’s as it may be,” answered Kirk.

“Take your hat off.”

“Shan’t. That be blowed!” went Kirk vehemently. “I’m as good a man as you, Drayton, any day.”

“But you try my patience, Kirk,” said Hartwell, with reproach.

“Don’t matter about patience,” muttered the estimable Kirk. “Try his little patience, poor little boy! Look here, where’s the use beating about the bush between men of the world? Going to brass up to-day yes or no? Else Teddy’ll only act, and where’ll you be then? Lord! I think I see your face at the Club of Tats. — great Scott!”

“I’ll pay,” said Hartwell, “I’ll pay. But I mustn’t give myself away — not by cheque, not here. Meet me. Do you happen to know Twyford Buildings? It is an alley off Great Queen Street. Meet me at No. 7 — an old wooden house — at 7.30 to-morrow evening. But be punctual. I shan’t wait for you one second if you are not there when I go. The house will be open, but do not enter the house till you see me coming down the alley. Then very quickly enter and wait. There is a caretaker about the place, who must by no means see us meeting. I can’t have myself compromised. We will then go upstairs to a lighted room, that you may count the money, and write me a receipt. But so that there may be but one footfall as we go up, be prepared as I enter to mount upon my back.”

“Now you’re talking,” answered Kirk. “I’ll be there. Look here, there’s not an atom of bad blood, Drayton, on my side—”

“That’s a man. Good-bye. No. 7 Twyford Buildings, at 7.30 p.m., tomorrow.”

Kirk then went away. The moment he was gone Hartwell peeped cautiously into the street to see if Barnes was there. Barnes was not there yet, but after having three interviews with a broker, an actuary, and the steward of his Buck's estate, Hartwell again peeped out, and there was Barnes standing sentry below.

"Ah," thought Hartwell within himself, "I hardly think that my enemies will save me from that hard interview with her after all." And, sitting now to his desk, he wrote, no longer with the typewriter, but in a hand that was already, after much practice, very like the dead Drayton's: —

"My Dear Julia,

"I have received your note. I hope to call upon you in Brook Street to-morrow evening at 9. If I do not hear from you, I shall assume that I shall then be able to speak with you alone.

"Your sincere friend,

"James Drayton."

The letter written and enclosed, he thrice pressed an electric button, and the clerk who had to answer to three rings entered.

"Post this letter for me, Ife," said Hartwell. "I want you, Ife, to do something for me with some little tact. There is a man with a red beard standing near the street door, whom you might ask the way to somewhere. Then ask if he is not Norfolk or Suffolk, and whether he can tell you anything of the pheasant-shooting, as you think of taking a holiday down there. Try to get him to have a drink with you. Be unconcerned and affable. Then mention casually that you belong to Drayton's, and that the boss means to be off to-morrow night, to the Continent for six months. Then some more talk, and leave him."

Ife undertook this, and went out.

After Ife's departure to interview Barnes, the man with the red beard, Hartwell paced his room. Then half an hour later came Ife, saying to

Hartwell:

“He wouldn’t have a drink, but I told him what you said about going on the Continent. He seems a bit moody, sir; a screw loose somewhere—”

“No doubt. He will probably present himself here to-day, but must on no account be allowed to get to me. Take him to the alcove in which is the speaking-tube, if he comes, and put him into communication with me. And, as I do not know his name, you will use the word ‘eager’ as you mention his name, so that I may know that it is he.”

After this an hour passed before Barnes went up to Hartwell’s office. Barnes had, of course, been spurred to prompt and desperate action by the clerk’s news that Hartwell was going away for six months, for he saw that he must avenge his daughter that very day, or put off his vengeance for a long time. But he had lingered an hour trembling on the brink of action, eager enough, but held back by many doubts and fears. At last, however, he came to a decision, and went up. The clerk, Ife, conducted him to the alcove and the telephone-whistle whiffed into Hartwell’s room.

“Well?” answered Hartwell, with the drum at his ear.

“Mr Barrow, sir— ‘eager’ — to speak with you,” said Ife. For Barnes believed that if he sent in his true name to “Drayton,” he would not be permitted to get near “Drayton,” which was what he wanted, and he called himself Barrow. Though, as a matter of fact, if he had called himself Barnes, Hartwell would probably not have remembered the name, or known what was his grievance.

“Leave him in the alcove, Ife,” said Hartwell, “and close the door upon him,” and half a minute afterwards he said, “You there, Mr Barrow?”

“Yes,” answered Barnes: “you Drayton?”

“The same.”

“Can’t a man converse a bit with you, face to face, like men? Can’t very well through this thing.”

“But this thing was made for conversing through, Barrow,” replied Hartwell in a tone of sinister reproachfulness. “What is it you want?”

“Two minutes’ face to face talk with you.”

“But, Barrow, you speak like an angry man. How is that, Barrow?”

“Me? like an angry man? no, no, no, no—”

“But I know you, Barrow. You mean me no good, but you shall do me no harm. You cannot see me now, and to-morrow night I leave England. But that I may know the cause of your pernicious rancour against me — your baleful malice, Barrow — I will meet you to-morrow evening, if you like, at 7.15, in a house where we shall be alone. The house is No. 7, Twyford Buildings — an old wooden house in an alley lying between Lincoln’s Inn Fields and Great Queen Street. Does that satisfy you?”

“That’ll do for me.”

“Be punctual, then — at 7.15. I shall not wait one minute if you are late. It is No. 7, Twyford Buildings, Lincoln’s Inn, an old empty house. You will find the door open. Enter, if I am not there at 7.15, and go up to a room on the first floor in which you will see a fire. I shall enter the house by a way known only to myself, and we shall fail to meet, unless you are in that lighted room. There await me. But, Barrow, I warn you — attempt no violence. I know what you keep in your pocket, and I shall enter that room and meet you with my finger on the trigger of a weapon, ready for reprisals. Do you understand?”

“I see your meaning,” replied Barnes.

“That’s a man! Good-bye.”

And Barnes went away muttering: “He’s taking me to that empty old house to do for me, if I don’t do for him first. Well, then, it’ll be the quicker man of the two! and, by the lord above us, that shall be me!”

Soon after this Hartwell left the office to go home, walking down his secret back court to where the brougham always now waited for him. That night when he drove round the corner into Addison Road, Mary Liskeard was not at the corner, but Hartwell peering out all the time along the road descried her further down under a mass of shadow cast by some trees. For the third time she started after the carriage, as it passed her, and this time undoubtedly saw the gate into which it swept.

Hartwell found in the house that night, not only Oswald who was almost a professional diner-out, but also seven foreign people, guests of the count, in a condition of gaiety, for that his jour de fête, or baptism day. Accordingly, a quite bird-like vivacity characterised the full dinner table, which rather burdened Mr Dray-”tong,” in whose grave heart was an ache, a sadness and a longing. There was a thin Arlesienne girl in a costume which seemed in peril of dropping down her shoulders who, while she talked, vibrated up and down in sheer animation of being, and her fingers twinkled abroad in the air. Always she said of something or other: “T-res, t-res, jolie — magnifique!”

Young Bobbie Hartwell, looking in his fashionable new clothes like a blushing page-o’-honor, gazed contemplatively at her with open mouth, and threw out anon a silent breath of laughter. Hartwell committed the indiscretion of talking some rather Birmingham French, and at once saw Oswald’s eyebrows slowly lift and Oswald’s gaze turn upon him, like a wooden head moved round by slow clock-work. For Oswald had not known that his “James” could speak Birmingham French. Now he knew; but Hartwell’s eyes rested lingeringly, with no good meaning, on that gaze of surprise, and he remembered it.

Later in the night Oswald and Hartwell were getting together among some palms in a nook of the drawing-room, whose silken walls gave a shimmer of azure in the dreamy light, when Oswald produced a piece of paper covered with notes. Dulaunay, with his foreign guests and Bobbie, were playing whist and chattering some distance away.

“You asked me,” said Oswald to Hartwell, “to jot down these details about the murder of Letty Barton. You said, I think, that you would ‘reason’ about, them—”

“Ah, yes, how is the matter going?” asked Hartwell.

“I don’t know that anything has been discovered.”

If will be understood that Oswald, while waiting to hear from his man, Walker, the news of the return of Gissing to Overstrand, had heard instead — with bitterness and amazement — that all the Gissings had mysteriously disappeared, and that their house was shut up. Now the Gissings were the only valid proof connecting Drayton with Letty Barnes, for the shred of her letter found by Oswald was a proof to himself alone, since he could produce no evidence to show that he had found it where he had, in Drayton’s pocket. So that the Gissings disappearance had quite dashed the cup of triumph from Oswald’s hands.

But a fresh hope had arisen for Oswald. “James” had one night voluntarily revealed to him much of the details of the tragedy— “the struggle for a letter,” the “motive” — evidently finding some foolhardy pleasure, as Oswald thought, in living the tragedy over again, on the pretence of “reasoning;” and how if “James” could be led on to tell — too much? It was a possibility. Oswald, at least, would not fail to tempt him. And so it happened that if Hartwell’s “reason” should chance to let itself over-much run on the subject of Letty Barnes, it was quite likely to put the hangman’s noose around ins own neck.

Reclining on a couch, Hartwell let his eyes run over Oswald's notes; then after some minutes of thought, which he spent frowning deeply and with closed eyes, he said:

"She seems to have been expecting the lover that night, and certainly met him first in the tavern before they went into the grounds."

Oswald was amazed at this candour: "This is delicious candour!" he thought to himself.

"Yes, that may be so, James," he said aloud, "very curious. But how does your 'reason' arrive at all that?"

"That much, I think, is perfectly established," said Hartwell. "You have only to consider the powder-puff in the girl's pocket, her whole dress, the watch and chain. She was to be seen by her lover in the light."

Oswald laughed with bitter gladness. As "James'" only relative, he was specially bitter just now at the preposterous "adoption" of young Bobbie Hartwell.

"James, you are admirable," he said. "Oh, I am quite sincere. However you come to know all this, your mere manner of telling it is even more extraordinary than your notion of building laboratories. That blow on the head has knocked all the good stuff from the interior to the surface of your brain. You are no longer James Drayton—"

Hartwell looked at him with a chill "beware!" in that smile of his eye with the wrinkles at its corner; for any remark about change in Drayton, unless it was sweet flattery in the mouth of Julia, instantly stirred up in Hartwell a threatful watchfulness, for his nerves were always on the qui vive to detect the first dawn of a suspicion that he was not Drayton. Oswald's question about the watch at Aylsham—"Why can't you open it?"—was stored in Hartwell's memory, and now to it was added these other words: "You are no longer James Drayton," two little remarks that might well have made Oswald take a hurried trip to Australia or Peru, if he had understood the still menace of that humour in Hartwell's sideward look. But Hartwell, as was said before, "fled when no human man pursued." If anyone had told Oswald that Hartwell was not Drayton, for some minutes such a person would have seemed crazy to Oswald. For though the mental difference between Hartwell and Drayton was very great, the bodily resemblance was just as great, or greater, and it is by the body that men know one another.

Before anything farther could be said on the subject of Letty Barnes, a footman entered the drawing-room, and walked up to Hartwell, saying:

"One Mary Liskeard to see you, sir."

"I know the name," thought Hartwell at once, "she has threatened me in a letter. Her daughter's husband was lost with the 'Berenice,' and her daughter then drowned herself." Then he had a quick thought that this might be the very woman who lay in wait for him every night in Addison Road and rising, he walked a little way across the room with the footman, saying in a low voice near the man's ear: "A very big woman, with a very freckled face, John?"

"Yes, sir." answered the footman.

"Tell her this fib, John, that I leave England for six months to-morrow night, nor can she see me to-night. But tell her that she may see me to-morrow evening between six and eight, as I leave my office in the City, then give her the Fenchurch Street address."

While the man went down to deliver this message, Hartwell, in his keen interest in this woman, ran into his bedroom and peeped from behind the curtains as she passed down the drive. On returning to the drawing-room, he took his stand by the Arlesienne, who was rattling off a piece on the piano.

He afterwards made Bobbie recite "The Lotus-eaters," spent the evening socially, and reasoned no more about Letty Barnes that night.

The next morning he went to the City as usual, spent the day in work as usual, and no one looking at the face of Hartwell all that day could have imagined the terrible work that lay before him that evening — the terrible, doubtful meeting with his enemies at Twyford Buildings first of all and then, if he should happen to survive that meeting, the equally terrible meeting with the admirable and beloved Julia afterwards. About five in the afternoon he called the clerk, Ife, and said to him:

"I am requesting Durrant and Co. to make me a tender and specification for the repair of No. 7, Twyford Buildings. I want to beg you, therefore, to take a scuttle of coals in a cab and to get me a roaring fire lighted there in that large first floor just at the top of the stair. Go now and, in going away from the place after lighting the fire, be careful to leave the front door a little open for Durrant's man when he goes."

Before six o'clock, then, a fire was burning in that room of No. 7, Twyford Buildings. At Fenchurch Street Hartwell signed letters, and wound up the day's work. One by one the clerks went away. But he still remained alone in the office, doing nothing, pacing his room, glancing frequently at the clock, till it was 7.15 p.m. That was the hour at which Barnes was to be at Twyford Buildings in the lighted room. At 7.30 Kirk was to be standing in the alley before the door, waiting for Hartwell to come to him. Hartwell intended to be punctual in keeping his appointment with Kirk, but he wished Barnes to spend the quarter of an hour between 7.15 and 7.30 on a stretch of nervous expectancy. At 7.15 it was time for him to start. He went down, knowing that Mary Liskeard was there in the street near the outer door. He had seen her arrival from a window of the office, but he passed her with a rush and a run, and got himself safely into a cab.

He had caused her, as he had caused Barnes, to believe that this night was her last chance, and the deranged woman, all possessed with her mania and her mission, was eager to seize it. She followed Hartwell in another cab, as he expected that she would. At this hour Barnes was standing lonely and lurking, with an intense ear and an alert pistol, in the room with the fire in the Twyford Buildings house.

The night was thick with a London fog, very cold and very dark; the lights in the streets and in the shops seemed to smoulder; all was uproar, gloom, and dull fires; and London resembled an extinct, but still howling, Tartarus. Nearly all the interior of No. 7, Twyford Buildings was about as black as it could be. Only that one room with the fire in it jiggled in an ecstatic indecision between light and shadow.

While Hartwell and Mary Liskeard were on their way in two cabs, the jockey, Kirk, arrived punctually at Twyford Buildings at 7.29, and stood at the door of No. 7, waiting to see Hartwell come. Twyford Buildings is a narrow alley of some ten houses on each side. It is not passable to vehicles, for at its east end are two barrier-posts, and at its west one of the houses projects, this house being joined to the opposite house by an arch. Two lanterns hanging outside two of the houses light its cosy wretchedness. A rare woman or a child may be seen lounging in a doorway, always looking terribly poor.

Hartwell alighted in Holborn at the Royal Music Hall, and ran southward down a passage toward Lincoln's Inn Fields with his eyes in his back, for he knew that the woman was trotting after him in heavy, stealthy haste. He came to the two barrier-posts and turned westward into Twyford Buildings, and instantly Kirk slipped within the door of No. 7, as Hartwell had bidden him do.

Hartwell, too, slipping some moments after Kirk within the door, whispered quickly into Kirk's ear: "Perhaps we had better change hats," and he whipped off Kirk's Homburg hat, and put his own silk hat on Kirk's head. He then caught up the light weight of the jockey on his back, as had been arranged, and now with sounding steps he walked down the passage toward the stair, half-expecting meanwhile Mary Liskeard's knife in someone's back, though not in his own, which Kirk protected. But, in fact, he was nearly up the stairs before the woman entered the darkness of the passage, and there stood uncertain what to do next, for she could not see the stair, and though she heard Hartwell's footsteps, she did not know where they were.

But, in any case, the poor Kirk was doomed: for if he escaped the woman, there remained for him Barnes. Barnes heard the loud coming step, the step of a heavy man like Hartwell. He had quite closed the door in order to have the first short chance at the opening, but still the coming footsteps were distinct, and Barnes stood near behind the door, alert to shoot the first shot, for he believed that Hartwell was about to shoot him.

When Hartwell came to the door, he deposited Kirk without making a sound, whispering at the same time very softly into Kirk's ear the two words, "In here." Kirk turned the handle of the door, opened it, and looked in, as he moved to enter. And the moment Barnes' eyes were aware in the dancing firelight of a human being and a silk hat, prompt as lightning he fired, and Kirk dropped, shot through the head. At the same time Hartwell made off stealthily on tip-toe up the passage in which the door of that room stood.

As for Mary Liskeard, the effect upon her nerves of that shot may be imagined. She was in a strange house surrounded with darkness, and she sickened at the unknown on hearing the report of Barnes' pistol. She hid in one of the rooms below, opening upon the passage, her body shaken in an agitation almost like that of epilepsy. But she would not run. She waited for Hartwell to come down to go out. During his passage from the stair to the door her mission would be fulfilled.

Barnes, meantime, understood by the fire light that he had not shot the murderer of his daughter. He stood over the body. Certainly, Kirk was not Drayton. And now panic took hold of Barnes, for awful is the thing done, far awfuller than the thing projected. It appears in a different light, it cannot, moreover, be undone. Barnes smote his brow, this was not Drayton. All thought of avenging his daughter that night vanished instantly from his mind, for one corpse, like one dinner, is enough for one night. Barnes' only instinct for the moment was flight from what he had done, and he fled.

But Mary Liskeard in her room below, hearing the hurried, light step coming down the stairs, thought that it was "Drayton," as she could not help thinking, for the pistol shot fired by Barnes at Kirk was to Mary Liskeard a shot fired by "Drayton" at her; she had therefore the idea that Drayton had decoyed her into this house to do her to death, for she knew that he knew of her continual spying on him. She had the natural instinct, therefore, that since "Drayton" had decoyed her there for such a purpose the house would be empty. Any step, therefore, which she might hear would certainly be "Drayton's" and the stealthy haste with which Barnes came down confirmed her in her certainty that Barnes was "Drayton," for she felt without thinking, that "Drayton," after firing his shot at her, must have lost her, and now was escaping, lest she should come upon and kill him in the dark. She could see nothing, but when Barnes was very near to her in the passage, into which she had slipped out from her hiding-place, she could discern a form. And he dropped so heavily as to make the old house tremble, for she had stabbed him in the left temple.

At that moment, before the woman could run out, Hartwell himself appeared at the top of the stairs, hatless, holding a lighted candle. The woman looked alternately from him to the wounded man at her feet; and severely, with bright eyes, Hartwell looked down at her. This silent gazing and looking lasted, perhaps, as long as a minute. Then the woman moved, big as she was, with the movement of a panther — swift, stealthy, and cruel, she moved toward Hartwell.

Hartwell sent a howl at her.

“Do not pursue me, Mary Liskeard!” he passionately shouted, “these rooms are full of pitfalls! Let it not be said that I was the cause of your death, Mary!”

Out he puffed the candle, and ran. But she was close upon him, deaf to his counsel, the knife in her hand. He could actually hear behind him the short breaths of her heavy haste. They ran the length of the first floor down a passage which lay between rooms on either hand, then into a room on the left, then through room after room, doors banging after their flight, mostly through perfect darkness, with only his footfalls to guide her course, she all blown and panting, with feeble little womanly cries of “Oh!” and “Stop him!” and “My daughter!” Hartwell knew that several of these rooms had traps for the passage of merchandise from one floor to the other, and he knew in which of them the traps were, but as for her, she ran quite blindly, though she chanced always to escape, till the race brought them to a doorway without a floor, opening sheer upon the yard at the back of the house. Hartwell knew it, and since she was close behind him, leapt through the door, alighting safe on his toes and palms twenty feet below; but Mary Liskeard expected no drop, ran on through the door after him, and with all that weight came down with a child’s outcry. The yard was paved with small cobble stones. When Hartwell bent over her, he found that she was dead.

He entered the house by a window, went upon the stair, took his hat from Kirk's head, passed by Barnes lying on his face in the passage on the ground floor, and went away, leaving the door wide open. Hartwell thought that Barnes was dead, or he would not have left him lying there without assistance, but Barnes was not dead. Later in the night Barnes was found hanging half out of the front door. The knife had penetrated the left temple, wounding that part of the brain which doctors call "Broca's area." A wound just there on the left side means dumbness, and also paralysis of the right side of the body, and this was thenceforth Barnes' wrecked condition.

Barnes could neither tell nor write what had happened. When the police subsequently inquired in Fenchurch Street why the door of No. 7, Twyford Buildings had been left open that night, they were told that it was in order that a building contractor might go over it, and Barnes' wound and the two deaths remained one of the unsolved mysteries. It was supposed that the woman had stabbed Barnes, shot Kirk, and then committed suicide.

As for Hartwell, on leaving Twyford Buildings, his enemies having thus destroyed one another, he dined at a restaurant, and took a cab to Brook Street, in order to keep his appointment, with the fair Julia.

XVI. HARTWELL PAINS A LADY

THE FRANK AND admirable Julia met Hartwell on the stairs as he came up, and led him by the hand to a narrow, long drawing-room, with a full-length crayon of herself at one of the narrow ends, and an alabaster hearthplace at the opposite end. In the room sat "Aunt Margaret" (Lady Wisden), a very faded and bejewelled type, fifty years of age if she was a day. Her much-painted face had the crude glaring look of amateurish water-colour sketches, not pleasing to the male eye; her cheek-bones were high, twin thrones on which sat Rouge; her lips thin; She sat on a couch near the hearthplace, and with her demurely sat the young Bobbie Hartwell.

Julia had only recently come in, her hat was still on her head, and at once on Hartwell's entrance she began flurriedly to talk, saying anything that came to her lips, as if afraid of a moment's silence.

"Here, you see," she said, "is your new Bobbie: he has made me play him a Traumbild, and has been reciting 'The Lotus-eaters' for Aunt Margaret, who flatters me with the assurance that he resembles me! He is charming with his accent and his freshness, but will spoil within two years, for all the debutantes will fall in love—"

"Why is he here?" asked Hartwell. "As for the debutantes, they shall not see him much, the young man shall be in his workshop."

Hartwell's lips were pressed together with a firm expression. He was rather pale. The scene at No. 7, Twyford Buildings, from which he had lately come, had not been a happy one, and he foresaw that the scene to which he was now come might be even more trying to his strength of will.

He was therefore in no drawing-room mood and, even as he shook hands with Lady Wisden, he said:

“My visit must be short, if you will pardon my abruptness. You, my young friend, will at once take yourself off whithersoever your whim may lead you. Pardon me, I am not quite well to-night.”

Silence fell at this. Julia shot a glance at Hartwell, and changed colour at the severe and iron look of his face. The boy at once rose blushing, shook hands with Julia and Hartwell, and was about to shake hands with Aunt Margaret, when she said to him, “I am coming, too,” and followed the boy out.

Hartwell and Julia were left alone. Hartwell sat on the small Sheraton couch near the fire, on which Lady Wisden and Bobbie had been sitting. Julia stood a little way off, somewhat behind him, looking at him. Hartwell looked into the fire, leaning over his umbrella-handle, looking prim as usual, the umbrella being neatly folded, his gloves on, with all the buttons buttoned, and his beard having a vague parting down the middle from which the hair was brushed away on each side, giving the effect, of a certain provincial-French primness and neatness, especially in connection with the rather finical pressure of the thick lips, with the definite point in the middle of the upper. This parting of the beard, and brushing it aside, was a very un-Drayton-like thing, for the dead Drayton would never have done it, but it was a very Hartwell-like one; and it had attracted some notice.

While Hartwell looked at the fire in this way, Julia stood silent, scared, drawn up to her tall length, a little behind him. She had now thrown her hat from her, and stood handsomely dressed in an over-skirt of black silk muslin, her chest well bared, with heliotrope orchids at her waist, and on her neck and chest a necklace of pearls which had been given her by Drayton, and was purposely worn by her for this meeting, because she thought that it was the beloved Hartwell who had given it to her.

Hartwell, too, looking at the fire was silent, inwardly strengthening himself, thinking to himself “a man should at all costs be a man,” till Julia, making a sudden decision on the rising within her of a feeling of trust and confidence in him, went and sat on a yellow-satin stool at his feet, all her length gracefully coiled down almost to the level of his knee. And he, with a tender and relenting smile of the eye, looked down upon the soft, wave-fabric of her hair.

Nothing was said on either side for some time, till she, scared afresh by this silence, broke into a rather nervous mock-gaiety, saying gallopingly the first thing that entered her head, with apprehensive eyebrows and little upward glances at him all the time.

Hartwell hardly heard what was being said, till she went on to tell some tale about Oswald, when he more or less understood what she was relating.

“I must tell you,” she was saying: “I have had a definite ‘offer,’ if you please — your brother Oswald. I have captivated a family! Or not quite definite, perhaps, but tending that way. He stood just there — two nights ago — bowing a little, smiling a little, his hands held stubbornly behind him, even as he offered me one of them. He drawled, and he droned, and he accumulated hints, till his meaning emerged, while I tingled at the distinction. He had heard that his good James was no longer in the running. Everyone had heard, and expected it, and he hoped that he might prove the acceptable Abel to your Cain. I really thought of ‘c,a,n,e.’ Fatuity of him! I replied that everybody had heard wrongly, and I always liked elder brothers —”

But now she broke off in the midst of the unreal prattle, glancing up with a pretty dismay at him, for there he still sat, saying nothing, bent over the handle of his umbrella, and gazing at the fire. And again scared, she ran off anew into talk about his approaching cruise in the Sempronia, saying that she had asked so-and-so, as he had bid her, and intended to be charming in the smartest yachting costume that had ever been devised and built. But again she broke down in this pretence to herself and to him that nothing was the matter, and now, looking up appealingly, she said to Hartwell:

“What is all the mystery?”

To Julia’s query, Hartwell had perforce to reply. He spoke thus:

“You are dear to my heart, Julia. I cannot refuse to myself the triumph of repeating to you that profound verity. But what you expect from me now is not such avowals, but rather some explanation of my abrupt departure from Castle Moran, and of my absence from your side since then, after weakly permitting you to give expression to your gentle inclinations towards me. This explanation it is not easy to give, Julia — no, not easy. But I say now, definitely, that many things peremptorily prohibit our nearer union. Ah! I astonish, I give you pain, my dear one. I am much to be pitied that I needs must.”

“But what things prohibit?” she cried, with a terrified expression on her face, “there were no things before!”

“There always were, there are still. I say that I was never half worthy of you, nor am now.”

“Really! but surely you might permit me to decide that for myself, James, as I have the right, and the power, to do. I know you now quite thoroughly, though I didn’t before, and there isn’t any woman on any throne who wouldn’t be glad — I laugh, if that is the reason.”

“It is, nevertheless, a real, an abundant reason, Julia,” said Hartwell with great earnestness. “Your words are sweet, but let me not allow myself to be enticed by them. You have formed a mirage of me in the cells of your mind which has no objective reality. Not even in the least am I what I seem to you. I know myself, I know you, and I compare the two.” — now Hartwell proceeded to give her a lecture on her merits, with a certain professorial zest in his own choice of words— “In that glory of your eyes, now purple, now black as pools of ink, dwells all sincerity. Words which on other lips are the most trivial, have when uttered by you a memorable distinction and sweetness. What an emblem of purity to me is your soft cheek, just brushed with pollen-dusts of purplish and rose, like the colored rind of the peach! Your soft and wavy hair — dove brown — If the Madonna had been you, surely I should have been a Christian, Julia! The two delicate curves of your face running from the thick of each cheek to the tip of the chin, between which as in a sunshiny dale your smile resides. Your small-facedness, like the racehorse; the undiminished breadth of the upper part of your forehead; the marble nobility there presiding; your long-drawn shapeliness; your princess presence; your athlete freedom; the perfection of your whole skeleton; your lips compounded of the flesh of water-lily and withering petals of the rose — All these are the signs of an aristocracy of organisation, Julia, with which my gross clay must not aspire to mate itself. No! such pleasures are not for me and, with pain, I have to renounce them.”

“But what a list of me!” cried Julia fondly. “Was over woman so exalted with flattery so weighty and judicial, like blue-books and statistics? My hair, my skeleton — I am enamored of myself! — and the lips last of all for dessert, and liqueurs. But that is not how ‘I’ like ‘you,’ James, in little sips; I like you at one gallant draught, like the Three Mousquetaires.”

Hartwell had the impulse to touch her hand so strongly, that the restraint of it caused him to groan inwardly, while he made the half-absent remark:

“But we are made of little sips, we are colonies of cells.”

“No, nothing about cells, now, James,” answered Julia firmly. “How can you, when our hearts are heavy? And why should they be heavy? You have not given me any reason! You give me pain, then.”

“Let me be pitied! because I must. There are real reasons. We are not to be mated, we are different as the Poles. If you knew me, you might hate, you would despise, me. I say that I am an utterly selfish thing; selfish in principle, hard, pitiless on occasion; a — liar; what you would call an atheist—”

“You don’t believe in God, really? and the next world?” asked the excellent Julia.

“The next world is the moon,” replied Hartwell, “and is therefore moonshine. Of course, Julia, I believe in the moon. As to believing in God, I believe in nothing else, since nothing else exists; but my God, who, I assure you, is the one and true God, is so essentially different from yours, that you would, I say, assuredly call me atheist, or at least atheous—”

“What do I care?” said Julia suddenly, quietly, with a pout, “your God is sure to be the real one. I have got mine from hearsay, and you have thought about yours. Isn’t thought all mixed up with that little superior smile in the eye? and like an old monarch throned among the cares of empire on your forehead. Whatever you are in that way, it is certain that I am, too, James. What do I care? But confess, James, is not our discussion just now about atheism a trifle unreal?”

Hartwell keenly felt its unrealness, for Julia was a modern woman-of-the-world, taking the world and its good things as she found them — its balls and its villas, its hunting, fencing, and music, without giving herself any headaches about whence it all came, or why it was all here, or whither it all went. Such questions only haunt naturally inquisitive minds, or else minds wracked with pain and sorrow, and Julia had had no sorrow so far, and no time to be inquisitive about such matters. Hartwell's suggestion, therefore, that she should give him up because he was "atheous" was felt to be unreal by both of them, for the admirable Julia was herself rather "atheous." Such talk was, in fact, merely a beating about the bush, and a putting off of the hard thing which had to be said. Hartwell's eyes closed in a silent agony, his palm laid lightly on his hair, for she was driving him step by step toward the statement which he had come to make, but shrank more from than he had shrunk from Mary Liskeard's knife or Barnes' revolver.

"Not real!" he answered gruffly, with an unreal emphasis. "I am as hard of heart as Nature herself. I tell you now that every day I tell a thousand lies. I am at this moment, in a way undreamable by you, lieing to you — even, Julia, to you. I am fresh, as I sit here, from callously watching the execution of three persons who dared to wish me ill. These things, approved by my reason, must be hateful to yours. I am utterly selfish—"

"But what do I care?" asked Julia, deaf to all this. "You are not selfish. You are unselfish to me, that is all I care about. Are you not at this moment breaking your heart — I can see, you know — for my sake, because you have got it into your head that it would somehow be bad for me to marry you? Is that unselfish, or not?"

"Darling of my heart — Yes, even that is selfish for, by a mystery, I love you better than I love myself, and your hurt would be greater pain to me than this hewing off of my right arm which I now do. Julia, Julia, you must give me up. Julia, you must. I beseech, I bid you—"

"But it all sounds so unreal!" she said pleadingly. "Oh, think of my maimed life! At least, let one know some reason! I seem to be in a nightmare, I understand nothing.

"Dear! you should not, you should not! Give — me up? and part with everything? up the ghost — !"

“It may — possibly — kill me,” said Hartwell. “You are too young, too pliant, to die; and time will assuredly solace your discomfort. A day may even come when you will feel yourself disposed, Julia, to further the evolution of our human race by casting into its life-whirlpool the products of your excellent motherhood. The cells, the brain, whose purely physiological interaction causes love—”

“No cells — I won’t hear,” cried Julia! “Cells is only a subterfuge to conceal from yourself that you are bitterly suffering, and you won’t tell me why, that I may comfort you. Oh, what has happened? Why, you were always my constant lackey before the accident, running to do my whims, but now you are different — you part your beard under the chin, and brush it neatly aside, and insist on cells and apes — and now when I like like you, like you, like you, to leave me!

“Frankly I could not bear it. You don’t know what a thing is in me for you, dear. And no real reason, none — none is conceivable — it is only a love-whim. Cell me no cells! Let’s talk of prison-cells — arms that more lock themselves by pulling — Will you? See, I woo you!”

Now, in her panic of losing him, she collected and lavished upon him all her passion and power of beautiful serpent, morbid dove, and love-sick woman, pleading, fondling, tempting, laughing, crying, working hard to seduce his senses and enchain his will, with a yearning, upward gaze in her eyes— “I woo you. Be good to me now. You shall, you shall. Look into my eyes, gaze, you like them half-closed? languishing in love-liquor?

“Am I divine when I am impassioned? You never saw me — my eyes turn black. (Oh, if I were to fail — !) And the lips, you may be rough, and yet kind, Jimmy — what did you say of them? ‘composed of lily and rose-leaf,’ with a dash of woman’s blood, just to kiss with, and a snake in the flowers to infect you with the malignant sweet o’ me. No, don’t try, you can't cope with the resources of the woman you love. You may slight me till the moment I choose, and then I'll drown you in surprises. I'm wily — you remember Uncle Toby and the widow. Don't try — James, my own, how strongly you love me! With what wings I love you! Let's be chums, near and dear, shall we? Then I will cast the products of my excellent motherhood wildly into a whirlpool, if only their father be — biological. Is it agreed now, then? He likes my face on his knee, kiss — then? Now? I'll taste sweeter than honeydew and milk of Paradise! — Now? Eh? No, really, really, you should not push my head away, James, really, no. Oh! how very fatal! What, are you still stern then? But — great Heavens! — what a disastrous thing!”

Hartwell had sprung up roughly, white to the lips, she still sitting on the foot-stool, staring up in a wide-eyed scare at him, apprehensive of his next moods, understanding now that this was no dallying or “love-whim, but the wounding of her life in earnest. And, in fact, Hartwell's next words were monstrous, brutally direct and unequivocal. Turned toward the fire, with his back to her, and looking downward, he pronounced the words:

“I happen to be already — married. I had been married some years when — I — engaged myself to you. I was, indeed, merely a low ruffian. And my wife probably lives.”

It was all that was left to Hartwell to say! He might, indeed, have told her that he was not Drayton, but a poor working-man, that Drayton was married, but not Hartwell. But at that time he was certain that in either case he must lose her. Neither Drayton nor Hartwell, it seemed to him, could marry her, for Drayton was already married and Hartwell was a Birmingham working-man. In telling her that he was Drayton and married, he lost her, but kept Drayton's wealth and estate. If he had revealed to her that he was not the married Drayton, but the widower Hartwell, who was a working-man and an impostor, it seemed to him that he would have lost both her and Drayton's wealth and estate also.

Hartwell, looking down at the fire with his back half-turned to Julia, did not glance at her for a minute or so after making his declaration that he was already married. He waited for her to speak, but she said nothing. When at last the corners of his eyes did take her in, he saw that her face was laid sideways on the couch, there where she sat on the foot-stool. Her eyes were closed, and it was a face as screwed in silent pain as that of a woman pierced with neuralgia, or torture of the thumb-screw. This Hartwell could not stand, and with a severe flash of the eyes and a seizure of his umbrella, as though he were snatching it from someone, he made off, trembling, grumbling something, without having once looked directly at her.

She, for her part, must have become quickly conscious of her loneliness, for half-way down the stairs he heard her scream after him. She had leapt up with the cry: "But it couldn't be true—"

This sound only the more hurried his headlong steps. He got his hat in an agitated dream, and rushed from the house into the foggy night, shaken to the depths, horrified at his own ruthlessness, and frightened at his desolate future.

XVII. HARTWELL SAILS THE SEAS

HARTWELL'S PROJECTED YACHTING-PARTY in the Sempronia never became a fact for, five days after his break with Julia, the invited guests learned with astonishment that Hartwell had gone alone. He took no one with him save Dulaunay and a young Creole doctor, named Kinsey, whom he had got by advertising for a doctor, and for nearly three years the yacht was Hartwell's home.

Those years must be rapidly passed over, in order that we may follow what afterwards happened, and that the narrative may not become too long.

Hartwell had furnished one of the Sempronia's stately rooms with the fittings and apparatus of a laboratory, promising himself some forgetfulness of Julia, in scientific research on the sea. But this hope did not come to very much, on account of the state of his health. He was a troubled wanderer, a dyspeptic guest in the world, with a confirmed acidity of the stomach, and whatever he ate, or saw or experienced, had bitterness in it for him.

Unknown to anyone, he returned to London toward the end of the season that first year, leaving Dulaunay on the yacht, and he spent two weeks in a secluded incognito at a West-End hotel. There he made the acquaintance of a certain old major who knew everyone's movements, and by the gossip of this old major, as well as by what appeared in the newspapers, Hartwell could follow the goings and comings of Julia, who was being ground in the usual Society mill. One night he lay in wait among a mass of carriages outside the Empress Rooms where she was a hostess at a poudre-ball that night, and he caught a glimpse of her. Then, once again he saw her through a glass darkly at Newmarket, he being a long distance from her, for he did not wish her to see him. And again one Sunday on the lawn opposite Stanhope Gate he saw her, this time with a long look, for he was directly behind her. She was talking with two men, and seemed gay enough. On none of these three occasions did she suspect that he was anywhere near her.

He had put himself into the hands of a stomach-specialist when he first arrived in London from his ship, but he returned to the sea grievously ill. There seemed to be no cure in the world for his splenetic sickness.

One midnight Dulaunay and the “chief” were leaning over the taffrail of the Sempronia, smoking. Earlier in the night a troupe of dancing-girls and jugglers had been on board for a dinner given by the ship to the podesta and grandi of the white town under the hills inland, and this merriment had kept the count from his bed. The sea lay with hardly a wave on it, the ship was as dim and lonely as a cloister, the moon was in the sky, and the universe looked an Italian universe all stained in that bluest blue in which clothes are washed. Suddenly, as the two men smoked and chatted, looking over the sea, a quiet step passed behind them. Dulaunay turned and saw Hartwell, who was in pyjamas, with bare feet, and the count put up his hand to the “chief” with a gesture which meant. “You wait;” and he himself followed Hartwell.

Hartwell was asleep. He walked three quarters of the Sempronia’s length — a considerable distance, for she was a long, low craft of 3,000 tons, with three masts and one funnel. Then, as though he could see, he turned into a lane between the smoking room and a skylight, strange sounds coming from him all the time, groans, little whimpers of trouble. And back they went toward the poop, Dulaunay dogging Hartwell’s steps, step for step, to the stair, down to the main deck, and so into Hartwell’s bedroom. The electric light was shining in the room, and Dulaunay could see the blank and solemn-looking white of the sleeper's eyes as, standing before a mirror, Hartwell uttered sound upon sound of suffering. His right hand slowly and falteringly lifted, and pointing with a limp finger at his own image in the glass, he mumbled:

"I know that you are not Drayton, but myself. Let it not be said that I have ever feared you."

When Dulaunay touched his hand, Hartwell started awake, uttered a sob, and was presently induced to lie on his bed.

These nocturnal pilgrimages had become not uncommon with Hartwell of late.

Dulaunay went up puzzling his brains as to the meaning of those words: "You are not Drayton, but myself," for if Drayton was himself, yet not Drayton, who, then, was Drayton? That was a fine question in the metaphysic.

The excellent count had become Hartwell's very faithful nurse and friend. Together they went to Puyde-Dome to visit an old chateau among the mountain ranges of Upper Auvergne, where Dulaunay's mother and sister lived. They were the last representatives of the Counts d'Artenset, very poor, but very proud in a French way, and still highly honored by the peasantry who lived in those hills. The home-coming of Dulaunay, who was the reigning count, was made the occasion of a fete in three villages, and here, in the half-ruined chateau, Hartwell spent a pleasant fortnight. Three days of it, indeed, he spent in bed, but the other days were passed in the enjoyment of an old-world atmosphere of quietness and culture, and of the charms of the two ladies' society. There were other chateaux and a copper mine in the neighborhood, and to these he took drives with the ladies through natural beauties, for which he had always the keenest eye.

In going south from there to join the Sempronia at Genoa, during a week in Milan he one night caught sight of Julia and Lady Wisden at an opera at the Scala. Then a long time passed before he saw her again. The interval was filled by random cruisings; all the coasts of the Eastern and Western Mediterranean, Norway and the Baltic, from St. Petersburg to Odessa, were leisurely visited, and now Hartwell and the count were in an atmosphere of brigandage and coloured clothes in a Sicilian mountain world. Now in casinos, and now among Byzantine palaces, and tombs of the Osmanlis. For two months Hartwell was trying the bromo-iodine treatment of Salsomaggiore, but whether or no this might have done him good, if he had continued there, he had to go away to attend a series of Imperial functions at Moscow, without feeling any the better for the treatment. Hartwell was now known in Europe not merely as a rich man, but as a thinker, and had become familiar with the life of Courts, for in the second year he had published an essay on the "Causes of Evolution," and the small work had been widely translated and "crowned." This pamphlet, which was supposed to be marked by great "scientific imagination," traced in a detailed and remarkable way the probable history of the change from ape into man, the main reason, according to Hartwell, being the so-called Glacial Period, an event which forced the apes to light fires, or else be frozen. And this thesis, which was apparently new to the scientific world, caused him to be decorated at Berlin, and to be made a Fellow of the Societies.

From time to time he paid a flying visit to England. Twice he saw his son, Bobbie, once at the estate in Bucks, and once at Rugby, where Hartwell himself had been "educated." One dark midnight he stood for a long time looking at the factory in Birmingham in which he had for many years been a workman, and he dropped a ten-pound note into the letter-box of an old workman friend.

He was now free of “business,” save of such as arose from the estates and from a continued stream of correspondence. He had pensioned all the older members of Drayton’s staff, and he could be liberal, as not only the widow McCalmont found, but as the hosts of begging letter-writers — the hospitals, societies, missions, etc. — sometimes found: but, on the whole, the saying went that Drayton had become “more close-fisted” with his money.

As to Corton Chantry, in Norfolk, Hartwell knew nothing of it, save that one of his agents paid taxes for a comparatively unimportant property in ruins somewhere down there. No woodman, no servant there had even called upon Hartwell to recognise his or her existence. He assumed that the old place was given over to the bats, and practically forgot that there was such a place. But one day when he was in harbour at Ajaccio, for the second time within three years there reached him a letter from a Norwich Bank reminding him that “the second £400 deposited for the use of Steve Anderson was nearly exhausted,” and again he wondered, as he had wondered before, who this Steve Anderson could be, and sent a cheque for a further £400 to the bank for Steve Anderson’s use.

Sometimes a hope would strike like lightning through Hartwell’s breast; “Perhaps ‘the wife’ is dead! She gives no signs, no sign, that ‘wife’ who ‘screams.’” If “the wife” was only dead, Julia was still unmarried, and might still be his. At the end of each year he had searched the newspapers for every day of it, to see if Julia was engaged. Her movements were recorded, he followed her in fancy wherever she went, from country house to casa, from city to kurhaus, but she remained unengaged.

Sometimes he had another hope, vague enough, that “the wife” might not really be a wife. But one idle day — it was in Bucks — while rummaging in an old trunk full of papers in a bed-room once used by Drayton, he came upon a marriage certificate, the certificate of Drayton's marriage. Drayton had married his wife in the town of Colesburg, South Africa, fifteen years before, she at the time of her marriage with him being a widow of twenty, named Martha Harper.

If Hartwell happened to stay a few days at Addison Road, he saw the bald head of Oswald, who was every month a more fossilised dawdler toward old fogeyism and an empty old age. Oswald, is the "villain" of our history, and we may wish that we had a more terrible and orthodox villain, but we must represent him as he really was. Always still embarrassed for money, Oswald lived in a weary limbo of clubs, bets, debts, and other people's dinner. The Gissings seemed gone forever, Oswald's dreary brain could get no nearer the implication of his brother in the murder of Letty Barnes. "James'" indigestion of body and mind would permit of no further "reasonings" for the present on that fascinating subject, "James'" visits to town were too flying for reasonings, and "James'" cheque-book remained a dream to Oswald.

Oswald had only this one spiteful joy, that "James" and Julia were, evidently, permanently parted. Oswald did not yet despair of Julia, he saw her often. She even seemed of late to like his society in a special way. Someone had suggested to him that this might be only because he was "James'" brother, but Oswald knew better. He had a queer, fixed figment of a thought in his head that, since she had accepted Cain, she must needs accept Abel. He meant to try Julia again some day, and this mania, which was destined to bear him disastrous fruit, grew in Oswald.

Once when Hartwell was spending a night at the house in Addison Road, Oswald said to him:

"There is Corton Chantry, why not let me renovate the old shooting-box, Jimmy, as my man, Magee, suggests — it would cost precious little, I suppose — and call it my country house for the present? It will be mine some day by the entail, of course, supposing I outlive you, and you leave no heir. Those unpreserved old coverts must be running wild with pheasants and poachers. I might take some men down there for a month's fun. May I?"

And to this Hartwell answered:

"I suppose you may, if you like."

Hartwell went away that time very sick, weary of Europe and of life, and determined to start for the Far East from Marseilles, where the Sempronia lay. In order to get to Marseilles he went to Paris, where he met Dulaunay and the mulatto, Dr Kinsey. He had thought that Julia also was in Paris, but when he got there he learned that she had left Paris two days before, for her Cannes villa. Upon this Hartwell, Dulaunay, and Kinsey set off for Cannes, neither Hartwell himself nor either of the two at all knowing why they were going to Cannes but, in fact, a whisper was growing urgent and more urgent in Hartwell's mind, which said to him:

"Suppose you tell her that 'the wife' is dead or suppose you tell her that it was not really true that you are married, and so save your own life, even if you ruin hers." This temptation, which was as strong as a rope that drew him, more and more, drew Hartwell toward Julia.

The three men arrived at Cannes, and on the second night after their arrival, Hartwell was on the grounds of the Villa Borgia-Costi, where Julia was. It was already a late hour when he entered the grounds, but after prowling for another hour about the olive grove and elaborate "water works" of the villa, he got a sight of her, as she sat alone in a boudoir, writing letters. By leaning aside on a water-butt, with his weight supported by his left palm, he could peep in at a window and watch her, but even as he looked, her face was hidden from him, for she laid it on the table at which she was writing, and kept it so a long time. About her bent form fell the draperies of a white tea-gown. He saw the bare back of her neck, and her bare forearms which were crossed over the table, on which also he saw his pamphlet on Evolution, and Hartwell's heart beat wildly against his side, as all the trees of the grove seemed to whisper him: "Tell her, since she will like the lie," and the cicada chirped to him, "Tell her, Hartwell, and get some sleep for yourself," but when she raised her self with a despondently-shaken head, suddenly his eye flashed severely, he muttered: "No! let this be the last of such fooling," and he went away.

That this unfed hankering near about her must sooner or later bring him to the hospital or the grave the worthy Hartwell saw, and now he made haste to put the breadth of the earth between her and him. He went, as he had intended, to the Far East, peeped at the Mongolian Courts, saw the reproachful eyes of old Gissing at Hong Kong, visited the islands of spice, and after nine months of the East returned with a dark pale face, thinner cheeks, and health so broken, that only a mulish power of will any longer kept him on his feet. Weary of the barren world of the sea, he now settled awhile in a feudal rocca, or fortress, small but impreguably perched among mountain crags not far from Siena, and here again he heard of Julia. She had come to Siena from Venice for the July festival which they call "Palio delle Contrade," and was occupying with her aunt one of those grim palaces of the fourteenth century — a vast, dark block of building, near the centre of the town.

XVIII. HARTWELL GETS A NURSE

INTO WHATEVER TOWN Dulaunay went, if there was no gaiety there, his mere presence evoked it. Hartwell's bankers and letter-of-credit connections presented the count among the best people; he went out and was gay, while Hartwell secluded himself at home, throeing with his indigestion of the world; and everywhere the count left behind him at least one love-lorn lady, one sighing heart.

Dulaunay met Julia for the first time at a function at the Palazzo Pubblico in Siena, and returning to the castle among the hills at three in the morning, found Hartwell in a dressing gown pacing the flag-stones of his bedroom, which was on the ground floor of the little moschio (or donjon) of the fortress. A large book lay open on the stone table in the room, which was lighted with four tallow candles stuck on an iron bar.

"Mon Dieu, sir!" murmured Dulaunay, stopping short with bated breath and a rueful face, "but this is not that which you promised me as to going to bed."

"Let it not be said, Dulaunay," answered Hartwell, still pacing, "that the servant is above his Lord. I act as I please, sir."

"Good! very good." The count threw himself upon a wooden settee, tired out and there was silence for a time, till, deliberately collecting his five finger-tips into a bunch, the worthy and excellent count put them to his lips, kissed them away, and sighed.

Hartwell's eyes softened into their genial smile, and he said:

“Dulaunay, I see that you have been losing your heart for the thousandth time.”

“Ah, “Draytong”, there are not but the English women, after all,” answered the count.

“Are there, then, some English in Siena?” asked Hartwell.

“Imagine, sir, the head of Aphrodite on the body of Artemis! Figure yourself, “Draytong”, a human woman whose father was a dove, and whose mother was a peach—”

“Ah! she is cross-bred.”

“But, sir, I do not say it to make laugh! It is really so in a certain sense! whose father was a mourning dove, and whose mother was a peach: whose grandfather was a swan, and whose grandmother was a violet: it is too strong, you know.”

“Do not add that the great-grandfather was a pork-man, Dulaunay,” said Hartwell.

“And she waltzes! ah, she waltzes! like a trailing long wisp of hay in the arms of the whirlwind! and her hair cannot be kept from growing loose, as she dances.”

“Well, then, may the fervor be reciprocal.”

“But I think it: I have reason to think it!” cried the count: “I know the signs — . She is not one of them who will be too difficult to the favorite, provided he be not a novice, while all the rest of the men would only lose their Latin with her. I have already my plan of siege laid to the last detail. Three things, “Draytong”, make the women ours — the gratitude, the pity, and the vanity — in exciting the gratitude in a young girl of family, the pity in a married woman, and the vanity in a widow. The first I make gay, the second I make sad, the third I make to blush — when that is possible: if I make her to blush, the hour has struck, she is mine. Now this divinity is a widow: but a wise general knows how to change his tactics in the different cases——”

“What, by the way, is her name?” asked Hartwell suddenly:

“Lady Methwold.”

“Ah?”

“But, sir, you find yourself bad — ?” Hartwell had not known that Julia was near to him: he stood a minute with closed eyes and his palm laid lightly on his hair; then, sitting on the settee, he rested his forehead on Dulaunay’s shoulder, for he was not strong at that time.

Dulaunay had no suspicion that Hartwell even knew Julia, and during the two weeks which followed that night, the count brought home daily news of his progressive love-story. At first Hartwell heard it absent-mindedly: but when it became evident that Julia must really be quite unusually intimate with the Count d’Artenset, Hartwell’s interest quickened: and from that hour the situation became charged with danger. In Hartwell’s nature ordinarily jealousy had little place, but from day to day he now more than ever sickened; he could hardly eat anything; his nights were more than ever dark and wretched; life seemed to his atrabiliar eyes a thing all crape and gloom; and he lost all taste and interest in everything, save in Dulaunay’s intrigue, to whose details he would hearken with a flashing eye and a lip white with agitation.

Wherever Julia was or went, there, it was evident to Hartwell, the count also was to be found: Julia herself seemed to desire, and devise this. Dulaunay was almost daily at the old palazzo, grim With its barred window-slits, where Julia lived: he would stroll up with her to the cathedral, or to the church of St. Dominic, among those steep and winding alleys of Siena, whose succession of arches make them mere arcades of mediaeval dimness, haunted, as it were, by the ghost of Dante; they met at hill-picnics and dances, or strolled together at sunset among the meadows, orchards, and mulberry groves of the valley; there was also the July race, and there were card-parties, and functions in August at the Palazzo Pubblico, which constantly threw the count and Julia together. It was clear that this time Dulaunay was in earnest; all the ladies in Siena could not turn his mind from the siege of Julia. One night he whispered to Hartwell the great tidings:

“To-day, for the first time, I kissed her hand.”

“There, I think, you made some progress, count,” said Hartwell: “did she — you know what — did she blush, and mince, and cast down the eyes?”

“Ah, not yet. It is that which is going to arrive. She only smiled in a certain little way. But the intrigue is now in that stage which does not let itself accelerate.

“Well, you may succeed, my good fellow, you may, you may: but, seriously, I doubt it. She seems slow, she is dallying with you, Dulaunay. Have a care, my friend! she’ll eat out your vitals like a wolf!”

Dulaunay was so taken up with his intrigue with Lady Julia that he did not notice the tragic strangeness of Hartwell’s tone and look; he replied:

“Oh, I have no fear of anything: I am on the road, and the end is in sight. I attack both her vanity, her gratitude, and, little by little, her pity also. She becomes conscious of my misery, and is going to learn that she alone can cure it. These two consciousnesses will give to her, firstly, a highly pleasant sense of her own importance (for which pleasure she will be unconsciously grateful to me), and, secondly, a sentiment of sublime pity for my pains: then she will stretch her hand to save me from the abyss—”

“Excellent!” cried Hartwell with a laugh: “you’ll win her yet, by Heaven! An Apollo like you, born for conquest. It is well to be young, and French, and handsome, sir.”

“He is queer to-night,” thought Dulaunay to himself, adding aloud: “By the way, she has heard of you, sir, and demonstrates the keenest interest in your personality—”

“In mine?”

“But yes: often she invites me to discuss you and our life here: our plans, our voyages, your health — Wonders for what you are a hermit—”

“Oh, she does?” said Hartwell, stopping in his restless pacing. “Wonders why I am a hermit! Well, then, all I can say is that you seem to me to be in a bad way, Dulaunay; it is evident that she is hankering after the — unknown: look, therefore, to yourself, my friend, and let it not be said that a sick hermit beat a gallant in love!”

“But “Draytong”, you are queer tonight. No sleep at all, then, no sleep, no sleep? What to do there, mon Dieu! You should make greater efforts, however, sir: you should compose yourself to sleep. Kinsey does not like to give you the drugs two nights in succession. But if you sleep, you immediately somnambulate — What vexing circumstance! This morning at three o’clock you were out in the courtyards without slippers—”

“But when you kissed the hand — tell your tale right through. She made no remonstrance? did not pout up her lips and look vexed?” queried Hartwell.

On the contrary, replied the count, “she smiled, I repeat, in a certain little way.”

“Then, let doubt be dismissed! you have carried half the fort, Dulaunay. Why, kissing is kissing, man! if you have only touched her hand, the — the lips come next; there’s hardly a step. And such lips! The child of a dove and of a peach, you said — excellently said! You are a genius, you know, for expression, and they love a glib, expressive, French tongue.”

“No, “Draytong”, come, come,” said Dulaunay, springing up with decision: “never again will I converse with you at this late hour” — and after a long argument and almost a struggle the count got Hartwell to go to bed.

It was two nights after this that the count told to Hartwell the story of how that day at the Isituto, while he and Julia were standing before a famous picture, looking at it, Julia called him no longer “monsieur le comte,” but “Emile,” and he had called her “Julia.” This must have deeply affected Hartwell in his then morbid condition of mind and body; at all events, he disappeared from the rocca that same foreday; Dulaunay, Kinsey, and a sort of abbe who was a hereditary fixture in the rocca, together with the steward of the Sempronia and a little porter called Pini, searched the district with lanterns in a heavy rain for two hours: but it was not till daybreak that Hartwell was found lying on his face in a thicket of sarsaparilla near the outer ditch of the rocca; he was shivering with cold, though burning with fever; by noon he had delirium; and Dr Kinsey believed that he would die.

For the next two days Julia did not see Dulaunay; for now that Hartwell was actually stricken down, Dulaunay was like his shadow, and would not leave his side. He sent Julia a note, folded in a special way at right angles, excusing himself from being with her on account of the illness of Hartwell; but on the third day Julia wrote pressingly to him, to see her at the portal of the city called the Wolf; and that afternoon Dulaunay went to meet her.

The sun had set, and they strolled for an hour or so in a scented evening air among orchards, summer villas, and hedges which were now heavy with brown grapes, for about there the vines run in the hedges. Dulaunay considered that the intrigue was now ripe, and had decided to declare himself more definitely at that interview.

“I have no necessity,” he said, “to tell you that my heart is in flames — Ah! you blush divinely. I dare to hope that I, on my side, am not altogether indifferent to you.”

They were sitting at that time in an arbor of vines behind a little inn on the Empoli Road; he took her hand, and she did not withdraw it from him; her face hung pensively in the twilight.

“What is it all about, Emile?” she said: “if you jest, you choose a singular moment when you see me so sad.”

“Sad? are you sad? But have I, then, the air of someone who jests? I am at your feet—”

“And on my nerves, too,” said Julia quickly. “I never expected to see you mal a propos. Whatever has got into your head to-day, you who are always so charming?”

The excellent and worthy count sat one moment aghast, then, sudden and quick to take offence, he sprang up and bowed stiffly.

“Madame, if I have dared to flatter myself with the hope—”

“Of what?” asked Julia with a perplexed brow. “Don’t be fantastic. Haven’t I always gone out of my way to show how much I like your society? Wasn’t it I first called you by your Christian name? That ought to have shown you that I wished to be friends. I thought everyone could read my secret, Emile: I have been a hopelessly infatuated woman for years—”

“Mon Dieu!”

“Oh, look at him! he can’t conceive it lasting for years — dreadful man. It can, Emile, it does, let me tell you, it is the worm that dieth not. Some day when we are still closer chums, I will tell you about it, and you will know.”

“Madame, my felicitations. But, as for me, am I, then, annihilated?”

“I thought you would guess! Why else should I have liked to have you always about me at the first, except to hear you talk about someone? I saw that you liked him awfully, and that was at once a sympathy — . You do love and honor him an awful lot, Emile, don't you? Tell me."

"It is "Draytong" that she wishes to say!" exclaimed Dulaunay: "I am, then, annihilated!" But he added in a lower tone a moment after, "all the same, if I had to be supplanted by another, it is he whom I should have chosen."

"Of course, it is. I can't imagine anyone troubling to be fond of anyone but him, Emile: and he has been dying, three days, and you didn't tell me. Suppose he were, in truth, to die?"

"Ah, but tears! Pardon me, adorable Julia, I knew nothing — do not cry, do not cry, I implore. He will not die! it, is no one but Kinsey who talks of the death, the doctor of Siena laughs—"

"And as to the nurse, who is she?"

"She is of the Ospedale of the University: but I, for the most part, nurse him myself."

"Yes, you look rather worn. You are awfully enamored of him, really, I can see, Emile. You and I shall be the nurses, Emile! We can't trust anyone's care but our own, and you will procure me a room from to-night in some house not too far away from the rocca. I foresee that we are going, to be the very best chums, you and I, if you have thoroughly dropped the fantastic part. Shall it be so? then, shake hands: that is a compact for always on my side — Do you know that La Forli is miserably in love with you? I shall procure you meetings with her at my palazzo when he is better, and any other of them that you care for; you must tell me, and I will help you, and be always your friend. Have you any rooms to spare in the rocca itself? or is there a tavern near by? I am afraid my Aunt Margaret won't like going out to the hills, but I daresay I shall manage her."

In the end it was arranged that Julia and Lady Wisden should stay at a lonely tavern half-a-mile down in the valley behind the rocca. There they took up their abode, and thence Julia climbed up to the rocca during the first two days; but on the third day a different arrangement was come to, and Julia took up her residence in the abbe's room on the first floor of the fortress, Lady Wisden remaining at the tavern in the valley. Meanwhile, in that little room under Julia's, Hartwell's deliriums went on.

XIX. HARTWELL MAKES A PLUNGE

“IT IS A good thing that it is not but during the day that you are with him,” said Dulaunay to Julia: “from one to four o’clock in the morning he is even violent.”

They were seated in a square well under a sycamore tree, which stood in the space between the two barracks, and the sun was at noon, burning the stones in the court-yard hot. Julia was dressed in plain grey and white; purposely, perhaps, looking like a nurse, with the softest light moss of hair protruding from under the edges of her cap. Her attendance at the bedside had made her lips look still dryer than usual, and had paled to a mere vision of color the fruity dry carmine with which her cheeks were brushed a little.

“Is it ever going to stop?” she asked; “and are Kinney and Calvo really good men? This is the sixth day, and the temperature still at 105.”

“He will not die, have no fear,” said the count: “but it will be a struggle. Last night he was alarming and amusing at the same time, oh, la, la! It is some years ago he had a vexing accident in a motor-car, and of this, not for the first time, he raved. At one moment it was the perplexity the most acute depicted on his visage: ‘Am I Hartwell?’ said he, ‘Or am I “Draytong”?’ His perplexity! that made me smile. ‘The faces are one,’ said he, ‘how if the natures be one also? and which of the two am I, am I?’ At another moment it was the agitation the most breathless, the staring eyes, the sighs, the hoarse whispers, mon Dieu! ‘I will change the clothes, I will change the clothes,’ he whispers, dreadfully: ‘Hartwell shall be “Draytong”, and “Draytong” shall be Hartwell; the millionaire shall be the beggar, and the beggar the millionaire; no one on the road, McCalmont dead the coat — the waistcoat — now the collar: the dead know not anything, the dead know not anything' — And so on for two hours."

"And what does all that mean? Do you know any Hartwell? That is the name of his ward, Bobbie."

"No, I know no Hartwell except Bobbie. But thrice when he has somnambulated I have heard him employ that name of Hartwell. There is here that which is droller than you think."

"How do you mean?"

"I know not how I mean: but I will apply my mind there. There are things which have perplexed me. Is it not droll, for example, the infinite difference in physique, in mentality, in all, between "Drayton" and his brother, Oswald?"

"Yes, that is a rather queer story. Their mother was frightened with a gun on board a ship by some splendid madman, named — I forget what — some time before James' birth; and when James grew up he turned out to be like this splendid man, while Oswald is like his father."

The subject then dropped between them, these ravings of Hartwell falling for the present from the surface of their minds like water from a duck's back, without finding any root there, seeming to be mere ravings and nothing else; but in the case of Dulaunay, the still unexplained mystery of his relation with Hartwell was too astonishing, and he had heard those ravings too near and often to forget them entirely; when, at a later day, circumstances recalled them to his mind, and forced him to reflect on them, he not only remembered them clearly, but understood them thoroughly, as we shall see.

"Well, that explains it," he said now to Julia.

“Oh, there comes the abbe,” said Julia. “I’m afraid he, too, is a little in love with me.”

Already, within the last twenty minutes the chef had peeped round the corner of the barrack-house after Julia to see where she was; and now also came the abbe, peeping after her, saying that the one o’clock dinner was served.

Nothing could be quainter than that life up there in the rude little rocca, and when Hartwell’s crisis was once past, Julia was constantly amused by it. There were seven males and she, beside a very young nurse from Siena, and the consciousness of the seven was turned at all moments toward the one, as sunflowers follow the sun; the fact of Julia’s presence fully occupied every mind; the chef cooked for her, the abbe talked at her, Dr Kinsey giggled toward her; and in this mental mood their existence up in the rocca went on as remote from the present age as the voyagers to the moon of M. Jules Verne, living in their steel box in the midst of space.

The moschio was a squat low tower which stood sheer over a precipice a thousand feet deep, upon which it looked by the one small window of Hartwell’s room, and by no other. From some little distance off it looked almost as much like a piece of the mountain as like the work of man. The moat, or ditch, round the moschio was crossed by a drawbridge, then came some outhouses, barracks, and paved courts, with the well under its sycamore tree, all shut in by a fortified wall, which was provided with covered ways and parapets, to protect the defenders in a siege: outside this fortified wall was a larger drawbridge, called the “outer drawbridge,” which crossed the outer ditch.

Julia and the count followed the abbe into the moschio to dinner. At table the talk was mostly with the abbe, a man of stale and wandering eye, with nothing to do but bask in the sun, and once a day fuddle himself with muscat wine. "I could have been anything, madame," he would say to Julia in very Italian French: "preacher (predicateur)! architect! statesman! cardinal! in short — any thing. Yes, my talents were made to declare themselves. But in the rocca, what scope? In the barrack yonder I was born, and here I am destined to close my eyes."

This was the abbe's grievance, that he could have been anything, if only he and all things else had been different.

Of a moonlit evening sometimes all was interest, laughter, and "bravos" in the courtyards, when everyone came to watch Dulaunay and the graceful Julia fencing with two maple sticks; or when the sun set behind Siena and the hills, they two talked together on the parapets, or on the well, or strolled down by the chestnut lane and the vines running in the hedges over a carpet of yellow and purple maple-flowers to the tavern where Lady Wisden wearily dreamt of Ascot.

"It looks as if to-morrow will be my last day," said Julia one evening, when Hartwell had passed from delirium into a state of coma.

"How!" exclaimed the count: "you go?"

"The moment he becomes conscious, of course," she replied.

"But why? I understand nothing there. Does not "Draytong" adore you? He pronounces your name always—"

"But surely you know that Mr Drayton is married?"

"But not married? "Draytong" is not married!"

"He is, Emile."

"Not possible. Where, then, is that Mrs "Draytong"?"

"Ah, the 'where' is the least of her. She is somewhere, and may she live long. I myself have never quite believed it, but three mornings ago I heard, him say: 'the wife — is she mine, or his? I have no wife but one' — whatever that may mean."

“There is something very droll somewhere,” mused Dulaunay: “I understand nothing there. I know “Draytong” very well, he would not, he could not, have affianced himself to you, if he was married.”

“He did though, Emile,” — Julia said in a low voice with a hung head, “yes, he did that to me.”

“Mon Dieu! but this is an infamy!” exclaimed the worthy count. “I am afraid that this good gentleman will have to cross swords with me when he re-establishes himself.”

“And yet you pretend to be my friend. Don’t be extravagant,” said Julia.

“But how! I understand nothing there, then! Did you not find it difficult to pardon such a conduct?”

“Oh, I! no, quite easy. Don’t you understand? — till seventy times seven. And remember that he did not let me marry him: he was tempted, he yielded, but he pulled up in time, like a brick. Better not go crossing swords with him, for, if you were to hurt him, you know that you can’t parry my flanconnade attack.”

“Ah! to be the man beloved like that, and by you, adorable Julia!” sighed the count. “But then since it is so, why not rest at the rocca?”

“As if I dared! I owe that much to myself, and I have solemnly promised Aunt Margaret, not to stay. And you are never to let him know, Emile, that I was ever near the rocca. Promise me that. I had better go to-morrow before dinner.”

But the next morning after chocolate, she being then with Hartwell for about the last time, he knew her. The room was small and very dim to her after the boundless light outside, for she had been outside in the courtyards after her chocolate before coming to relieve Dulaunay at the bedside, and Hartwell’s room had only one small, deep window in the wall over the precipice, through which not much light came in. Dulaunay was out in the courts in his shirt-sleeves to take a breath of air after his watch before going to bed. The little nurse and Dr Kinsey were in their respective rooms, and Julia was alone with Hartwell. Hartwell lay quiet, the picture of muscular waste, on a square, squat bed, with a wooden tester, and no curtains; he had so far seemed to recognise no one. Julia poured out some digitalis into a glass at a stone table, and was going to present it to his lips when she started violently; he had turned over to his left side had been looking at her. She saw humor, intelligence, in his eyes, spilled some of the medicine, stood in stone, and suddenly fled from the room.

She hurried out in great agitation to Dulaunay in the yard, saying: "It has happened! I am sure he has noticed me, and I should have given anything — ! Go to him, will you? And Pini must be told — about the cart. I shan't stay another minute, not even in the valley, nor in Siena, nor in Italy — I turned towards him to give him the digitalis, and, good gracious! there was he looking side ways, with his left, eye all wrinkled up and smiling! What shall I do now, Emile? It is so agonisingly delicate!"

"Come," said Dulaunay, calmly, "go make your trunk, and I will tell Pini, rouse Kinsey to stay with him, and go down with you to the valley."

"No, you are too tired. But isn't it vexing? I never felt so mean" — and off she ran into the moschio faster than he could follow, and hurried up the hopelessly-worn stone steps to her room, where she at once cast her odds and ends pell-mell into a portmanteau, and locked it. She then sat down on a cypress coffer, that had lovely little glances of gilt among its rough carving, waiting with alert ears for Pini or for Dulaunay to come. Hearing a rumbling of wheels, she ran to the one window of her room, which looked down upon the yard of the moschio, and saw the mule cart coming over the inner drawbridge. The little Pini, who was called "the facchino," then ran up to her, lifted the portmanteau on his back, and she saw him place it on the cart in the yard. She then caught up her hat and hurried to an alcove to pin it on, for in the alcove there was a mirror on an altar, half hiding two blue and gilt frescoes of angels in old canopied frames; but when she had pinned on the hat, she stood uncertain, hesitating, partly waiting for Dulaunay, and partly for she knew not what.

Presently the count came in a flurry, saying in an earnest and secret voice: "He has spoken—"

"Not of me, Emile," said Julia.

"Yes, of you; 'Tell her,' he has said, 'that she should not go, without saying me adieu.'"

"Oh, you told him that I was going!" said Julia with reproach.

"He asked it! and I replied: 'Her portmanteau is even now on the cart.' Then, after a long time, he said: 'She should not go without saying me adieu.'"

Julia shrunk from him, and stood waiting in silence for her mind to speak to her and suggest something, then, subsiding into a chair at her table, she supported her cheek on two fingers of her right hand, gazing fixedly at Dulaunay ten minutes, lost in a pre-occupation which did not hear one word of his running chatter of advice.

"Tell him no!" she said suddenly, with determined lips: "tell him no."

"Well, if that is your will—"

"Yes, tell him no."

He started off, she started stealthily after him, and caught him at the head of the stairs with the whisper: "Let me know quickly what he says," then back to her room with like stealthiness she ran, and stood at the window, waiting and looking out, without seeing the cart under her eyes, nor hearing the blithe little Pini whistling like a thrush.

A long and trying interval now passed for her, full of emptiness and mystery, for Dulaunay did not return in a hurry, and she could not guess what could possibly keep him. The hour grew from nine to ten, then to ten thirty. Julia paced about the room, peeped and listened at the door, bent down her ear towards the flooring, which separated her from Hartwell's room below: but there was no sound.

At last, however, the count came, yawning even as he dashed up the little stairs, for he was very sleepy.

“Why, what could possibly have kept you?” she asked.

“He would not let me depart!” protested Dulaunay. “After a long reflection he gave me a message, but immediately changing of advice, he said: ‘No, let me not again be rash: you must wait, Dulaunay.’ Then, after another long reflection, he said again: ‘Tell her that, if she leave me thus suddenly, I shall surely die.’”

“Surely die?” breathed Julia, shrinking palely, with suspended breath: “why should he surely die? Tell him — I owe it to myself — No, he won't surely die, no he won't. Tell him no, he won't Emile!”

“Good! but I think—”

“No, you tell him that. Tell him no, he won't no, he won't. He has no right to send such messages! Say just as I bid you, word for word: say, no, he won't: and then — let me hear.”

Away, therefore, ran Dulaunay like Mercury, destined to little sleep that day; and again Julia waited a wearily long time at the window, opening and shutting many times an old ivory casket with evanescent glints of gilt among its carvings.

The fact was that Hartwell had fainted, or sunk into an exhausted sleep, when Dulaunay returned to him from Julia. The little nurse, roused prematurely from sleep, had not yet come down, and Dulaunay, every moment expecting Hartwell to come to, could not leave him. After half an hour of impatient waiting on the part of the drowsy count, the nurse came down, and he then sent her up to tell Julia that Hartwell had fainted. Julia pouted and waited.

When Hartwell at last opened his eyes, he said in a feeble voice:

“Well, what does the lady say?”

“That good lady says that you will not die, sir,” replied Dulaunay, “and she attends your response.”

Hartwell pondered that answer and the whole situation with a piercing and crafty eye; anon he drew his brows together with his fingers in a painfulness of thought.

He had her there; he had opened his eyes and found her there; and now he felt her slipping from him. In his feebleness of body and mind he felt an absolute lack of grit to face the cheerlessness which she would leave behind her when she went away. All his craft and sagacity, therefore, were at work.

“What response must I bear her, sir?” asked Dulaunay: “she waits to go, and I who have not slept must accompany her to the valley.”

“You must wait; let me think,” answered Hartwell.

There came in an odor of the one o’clock dinner from the hall, for the table was served. The abbe ran up to tell Julia that there were truffled pates which she liked, but she would not stir to come down, for the dinner table was too near to Hartwell’s door. The others ate their dinner, sending up meantime plates of food to her, but she did not eat anything. The count dined sitting in her chair, and had not quite finished when Hartwell called him.

Then the lingering interchange of messages went on.

Hartwell prayed her to stay three days.

She sent to ask: Why so?

It was in order that his recovery might become more definite.

But that was no reason, Julia answered: he must know that that was hardly generous to tempt and trifle with her, yet he did it; he was taking advantage of her foibles and of her position; his recovery would become definite in any case.

The afternoon shadows lengthened; the portmanteau lay on the cart; the mule's head hung; Hartwell groaned on his bed; the worthy and excellent Dulaunay plied up and down the stairs like the messenger of the gods; Julia from time to time proudly absorbed the moisture that stung her eyes; her throat was dry and aching, but she was unconscious of that fact; she stood near the window, rather haggard at the long strain of the duel.

Would she not see him to say goodbye? then she might go: so Hartwell sent to say.

No: that was hardly a frank and fair request, Julia replied.

Would she not wait three days, in order that he might weigh a communication which he had to make to her?

No: let him make the communication now.

He could not now.

Then she would go; she owed it to herself.

Well, then, if she would go, she might go.

So at last, near five in the afternoon, the protracted campaign was over. Julia dashed a passionate tear from her eyes, and descended with a veiled face on Dulaunay's arm. Hartwell's door lay wide open, and he saw her hurry through the sala. She did not glance his way at all. The cart rolled away at last with the portmanteau, Julia and Dulaunay walked across the inner court over the inner drawbridge, and yonder by the barrack-house saw the chef and abbe lying in wait to say their adios.

But before Julia had quite come to where the chef and abbe waited for her, Dr Kinsey came running after out of the moschio, bearing yet a message from Hartwell: if she would go to him, he would make now the communication which, as he had said, he had to make.

She looked appealingly to Dulaunay, saying: "What can one do?"

The count pressed her hand. And all at once she was hurrying back to the moschio.

She went into Hartwell's room, without quite closing the door behind her.

She stood a yard from the bed with the Veil over her face; and she said: "I am here, James."

They were alone; he was lying on his side; his back was turned toward her; and for some time he did not answer. At last he said, without turning toward her:

"It was not true what I told you, Julia. I am not married."

Julia stood blanched, breathing heavily; his words were so immense, had in them such a world of life and salvation and happiness for her, that they did not at once find room for themselves in her mind. At last she cried out imperatively:

"Oh, tell the God's-truth, if you love me!"

"No, I am not married," said Hartwell. "I married when I was a youth of nineteen, but my wife died seventeen years ago. That is the God's truth."

It was really, as we know, the truth; the good Julia was too willing to believe to doubt; and now she broke down, taking his wasted big hand, kissing it alternately on the palm and on the back, trying to say between her sobs: "Thank you, thank you, James, thank you," as to one who had saved her life. Dulaunay and the abbe, who were just outside the door, could clearly hear that meek outpouring of her gratitude, her sobs and gasps, and her continued "Thank you, dear James," uttered in the tone of a penitent child, as she kissed and re-kissed his hand, and the strain of all that day and the pent-up grief of years broke through all restraint, and had rent. Then she half-lay on the bed with him, and for some time her sobbings, more smothered, but more regular and confirmed, came out from her buried head, and were heard by the two men outside.

Two tears rolled down Dulaunay's face; but he dried his eyes, shrugged his shoulders with "So much the better," went up, threw himself upon his bed, and at once went to sleep.

XX. HARTWELL GOES TO CORTON

HYDE PARK WAS in young leafage, a blush of colour was in Piccadilly and Dover Street, the clubs were fast filling, and the first bazaar and floral fete had come off, before the date fixed for the marriage of Julia and Hartwell — the second of June — arrived.

Julia's side had claimed some delay in view of the comedy of engagement, breach, semi-reconciliation, then breach again, and now again engagement, with the two men who passed as one. Society needed time to digest such a menu. Hence, Hartwell having definitely risen from his illness in December, no date earlier than the following June would be permitted.

No one any more recognised Julia, she was so victoriously established in happiness. To doubt Hartwell's oath that he was not married never, of course, entered her thoughts. His statement to her four years before that he was married was put down to any reason that first presented itself to the mind, or was not thought of at all.

Julia attributed it in her own mind to an unselfish whim of Hartwell, who, she thought, wanted her to make a higher match, more suitable to her rank; when she asked him if this were not so, he seemed to assent. The oath made in the little room of the rocca at Siena was too rose-coloured to be untrue; not only herself, but her aunts, her brothers, and all her friends, took it for granted that it was true beyond question. Therefore, in that "sunshiny dale," where, according to Hartwell, Julia's "smile resided," the sun never now set — it was a land "where it seemed always afternoon." Hartwell, for his part, took his joy physiologically, but his eye danced. He had yielded to the great temptation, the thing was done, there could be no drawing back now. Hartwell, therefore, shut his eyes to everything, compelled his memory to forget “the wife,” and also to forget that he was not James Drayton; and though a pang of doubt, of panic, anon stopped for a moment the beating of his heart, still, on the whole, he was deeply happy.

Julia and Lady Wisden had returned to England in the Sempronia a month before Hartwell; and only two days after their arrival at Brook Street, Oswald Drayton presented himself before Julia with the face of a man who has screwed himself to a sublime and solemn effort.

He did not know that Julia had even seen his good James abroad: and Oswald renewed to her his offer of marriage.

This seemed to her, and indeed was, mere mania. She looked at him with a certain insolent happiness — with a puckered brow and smiling lips — as a something zoological, his quixotism was played with such solemnity; then she could not resist, for his continued gravity tickled some nerve in her — she laughed. When she could speak, she asked him to excuse her levity, but said she had thought that it was written legibly all over her that she was going to be the wife of someone else whom he knew.

Oswald went away from her that day with something new and living in his stale mind; a new and vital hatred. It seemed to him that he now for the first time knew what spite was, a spite in which he included Julia, as well as his supposed brother. What he now thought of was the Gissings, with a new longing, a new zeal of discovery. Where, then, in the world were those three people? Beyond doubt the ruffian James had committed a brutal murder, and Oswald in his impotence could not prove it.

When Hartwell returned, Oswald stuck to him. There was still the hope, frail as a straw to a drowning man, almost frailer, that James might be led on to “reason” about Letty’s death with that same bravado which he had before displayed; he might, though it was impossible, just possibly tell too much; so hope, hoping against common sense, whispered to Oswald. Oswald broached the subject several times. But Hartwell had lost interest in the matter, and rather brushed it aside.

One day, however, Hartwell discussed it.

Oswald that forenoon had been riding his old trotting-park cob in the Row, and there met Julia and Bobbie Hartwell and her brother, Lord Archie Linaker: he had afterwards ridden home with Julia to Brook Street, to lunch with her; but just as they arrived at the house in Brook Street, in came the little Looloo from a promenade with her nurse, looking so lovely, that Julia at once conceived a family-descent upon Hartwell for lunch, that she might parade Looloo before her lover; and in half-an-hour they set out in the carriage, Julia looking like a charming dream in heliotrope voile, with a large picture-hat which could not be described, and with her went Oswald, Lady Wisden, and the pretty Looloo.

They found Hartwell in a silk jacket and a skull-cap in the laboratory at the back of the first-floor, with his bared right arm red to the elbow in blood, he being now almost well again, though somewhat yellow under his coarse freckles. Lunch was already served, and in that jacket he first lunched with the party, and afterwards took Julia back to the laboratory, where he was alone with her for some time, showing her different objects of interest, such as the still-beating heart of a dead frog, a protozoon under the microscope, a headless Lancelot "whose goul was a spine," and Hartwell explained to her how and why the "immortality of the soul" is a "groundless thesis of the childhood of man," so that the admirable Julia, who had come to the lunch an immortelle, went away rather a sun-flower. With all this talk, there was no word of love between them, no contact of the hands. Their "engaged manner" was not demonstrative. If by chance some evening their lips touched, it was in one of those sudden tempests in which, as in the typhoon, the elements seem to groan; but that hardly ever happened. Usually they lowered their eyes, suppressed the mutiny of their bosom, and waited. But that day when he put her into the carriage, Hartwell kissed her gloved hand; and just this little act made the corners of Oswald's square jaws, who was looking on from the outer hall, stiffen and rib themselves with bitterness.

When Hartwell returned into the house, Oswald followed him into the morning-room. They were alone in the house, for Dulaunay was temporarily in Paris, and Bobbie Hartwell was living in chambers in St. James'. Hartwell, as they talked, was half sitting on the edge of the table, with his two hands in his trouser-pockets, watching two sparrows among the hyacinths in the window garden: it was suddenly summer; a branch of lilac in bloom brushed the window pane; but there was still a fire in the grate, which seemed to blink at all this unusual new light; and near the fire stood Oswald a little behind Hartwell.

"I was wondering, Jimmy, by the way," said Oswald presently, "whether you had thought any more about the case of that poor murdered girl?"

"Which murdered girl?" asked Hartwell— "Ah, I remember; Letty Barton. But why ply me with such a matter, as though I were a specialist in that sort of research?" — the last three words perished in an exhaustive great yawn, which dragged the poor Oswald into its abyssmal mood, making him too, half-yawn— "I have almost forgotten the details."

"Forgotten? Really? So soon?" said Oswald. "But in a few minutes you once threw more light on the matter than all the police and people in a year. That's why I ask you. There's one point, too, which I think, I didn't mention; a shred of the letter which she wrote to her lover's other lover has been found. Don't you think that might be a clue to hang the ruffian, James?"

"Surely. But why didn't you mention that before? Where was the shred found?"

"In — on — well, on the ground where the tragedy happened."

Oswald lacked the audacity to say "in the lover's coat-pocket," and Hartwell wondered vaguely, "Why did he stammer?"

"And where is that shred?" asked Hartwell.

"I myself have, it."

"It was not, then, found by the police?"

"No, by my private, agent, who gave it me."

"Singular. Let me see it."

Oswald produced it, and Hartwell, reaching aside for a magnifying-glass on a side-table, looked through it at "cruel bru" lying on his palm, thinking, as he looked: "This fragment of paper was never found on the ground: either he to me, or his agent to him, has therefore lied for some reason; probably he to me — from the stammer; I suppose of no importance—" He said aloud after an examination of the shred, which lasted several minutes:

"Well, what, does this fragment reveal to you, Oswald?"

"I don't know. Does it reveal things?"

"A more proper question," said Hartwell, "would be, is there anything which it does not reveal? — to a consciousness sufficiently large. It seems to reveal at least, firstly, that the letter was torn into shreds by the murderer himself: secondly, that the other shreds are still probably in some pocket of that murderer: and thirdly, that it should not be difficult to discover that pocket, and so end your researches."

"Yes?" said Oswald, with bated breath, and again, "yes?"

Hartwell, suddenly looking at his watch, said:

“I have to go out, I must go and dress. Come up to my bedroom with me, and we will discuss it there.”

He then returned the shred to Oswald, and they went up, Oswald following him greedily, hastening, alas, to his own ruin, and not dreaming it, but full of a vague expectancy, of a hope against hope, that this mad murderer would reveal all his own crime.

In the bedroom Hartwell threw off his working jacket, and began to dress; and even as he put on his boots, or buttoned his collar, or washed his hands, he went on speaking of Letty Barnes.

“She seems to have been a girl of specially strong physique.” he said, “this shred rather proves it. You knew her — am I not right?”

“I daresay you are. Er — would it entertain you to look on her photograph, my good James?”

“Show me.”

Oswald slowly picked the photograph from a neatly-bound packet of papers, gave it to Hartwell, and looked to see at least one twitch of Hartwell’s face: but of course, he saw nothing of the kind.

“This, then, is she, poor unfortunate,” said Hartwell, studying the photograph; “I seem to have seen a face somewhere which she recalls to me” — he meant Barnes, Letty’s father— “but can’t remember where. Well, her eyes look out bravely and cheerily enough, poor girl. The shred which you have shown me shows that it was not pulled off from the letter in the course of the struggle, but one torn when the letter was being torn up by the murderer.”

“Where and why did he tear it up, James?”

“He tore it up, apparently, on the very spot where the tragedy took place and as to why, there could have been only one reason — an exhaustion of body and therefore of mind, approaching sheer imbecility; the idiot seems to have been about to commit the folly of throwing the shreds upon the winds, but recollected himself in the nick of time, and put them into his pocket: put all of them, by the way, not all but one, as you said, my friend.”

“Your certainty is very curious—” began Oswald, who was slowly pacing about in one part of the room.

“But why so very curious?” protested Hartwell; “this impression of yours is merely an illusion of a more or less hibernating consciousness, if I may say so; you had only to open your eyes, and examine the shred in order to be quite as certain as I am. If it had been a shred pulled off in the struggle we should most probably have had a shred pulled from an edge, but this is a triangular shred, with pretty straight edges, but no smooth edge, a part of the middle of the letter, torn when the letter was being deliberately torn up. But torn up by whom? By her, perhaps? No! for the night was rainy — observe the running of the ink on the shred, probably dark then, perhaps windy; even supposing that it was not windy, the shreds would have been more or less scattered, if she had torn up the letter and thrown them abroad, and a man fresh from her murder would have fled rather than submit himself to the discomfort of searching for them, each and all, in the dark! five, three at least one, would have been found afterwards; but none, I say, were found.”

“But I said, my good fellow, that one of the shreds was found on the ground.”

“Your agent has misinformed you as to that; I don’t know with what motive, but with a motive which, you should warn him, Oswald, it may not be difficult to find out. That shred has never lain on the ground through a rainy night, I will swear; it was put into the murderer’s pocket with the others when he tore up the letter, and then recollected himself; and that brings me to my second point, that those others are still probably in some pocket of the murderer — not in the same pocket, I think, into which he put them on the scene of the murder, but in another pocket, to which he transferred them in a day or two after the murder — during which transference the shred which you hold was either dropped on the ground, or more probably left behind in the original pocket. In that second pocket, and nowhere else, I believe, that the other shreds still are; and I will now give you the evidence offered by the shred, which leads me to think so.”

Hartwell at the moment when he said this was washing his hands, his back turned towards Oswald, who was pacing the other end of the room before a large wardrobe Henri Quatre; in a narrow compartment of this wardrobe hung McCalmont’s coat, prominently among other clothes, where it had hung forgotten for over four years — that coat of McCalmont which Hartwell had put on the day after the murder and the motor-car accident, since Drayton’s coat had been too soiled with blood to be worn.

Now Hartwell had just virtually told Oswald that the shreds of Letty’s letter were in this coat — told him, for what to Hartwell was reasoning, to Oswald was mere information given, most strangely given, but still heard with Oswald’s ears; and Oswald suddenly became quite gaunt with agitation, for by reaching out his hand he could take the shreds, if they were in that lower pocket of the coat which lay outermost and near his hand. And “James” was washing his hands, not looking, his back turned; in a thousand years such a chance might not recur to Oswald; and as Hartwell began to tell why he concluded that the shreds had been transferred from one pocket to another on the day following the crime, Oswald rose to the occasion, and, looking away at Hartwell’s back, put out a stealing hand sideways, felt the shreds in a lidless envelope in the pocket, and was about to take them, when Hartwell spun round. Oswald snatched away his hand quickly from the pocket, without having the shreds.

But Hartwell had seen — seen in a mirror which stood in a curtained alcove behind the washstand, and his eye had flashed.

Oswald continued to pace slowly about with his little limp near the wardrobe, unconscious that he had been seen, while Hartwell now sat on a settee, saying, “Excuse, me, my good fellow, from continuing my argument for the moment: these boots pinch” — and he proceeded to take off his boots which he had just put on, a perfectly false train of thought, meantime, going forward in Hartwell’s mind; for what he was thinking was this, whether Oswald did not suspect that he was not Drayton, whether Oswald was not hunting for some proof that Hartwell was not Drayton in that coat worn on the day after the metamorphosis of Hartwell into Drayton; Oswald’s remark at Aylsham about the watch: “Why can you not open it?” with another remark once made by Oswald: “You are no longer James Drayton,” had never been forgotten by Hartwell; as soon as the boots were taken off, he walked to the wardrobe in his socks, opened the other leaf of the wardrobe-door, and standing there with his back turned to Oswald, opened a little drawer in which he often kept some bank-notes. Even if Oswald had looked to see, he would not have seen what was being done, but, all occupied as he was with his own agitation, he did not look. Hartwell found an envelope containing bank-notes, drew one of the notes from the envelope, noticed the “number” of the note, then making a sideward step to the compartment of the wardrobe containing McCalmont’s coat, he felt in the pocket in which he had seen Oswald’s hand, felt the envelope with the shreds, transferred it quickly from that pocket to the pocket of another coat hanging there, slipped the envelope with the notes into the pocket — where the envelope with the shreds had been, then, turning round, said to Oswald, “Excuse me, I must go out; I shall be back in two minutes.”

The room had two doors opening upon a corridor. Hartwell walked to the one more remote from the wardrobe, near which Oswald was pacing, and with the deftness of a thief quickly drew out the key from the key-hole without seeming to pause a moment in going out; then, slamming the door after him, he went out, and now at once he flew noiselessly in his socks over thick carpet along the corridor to the stair, saw a servant girl coming up the stair, beckoned to her eagerly with his finger placed on his lips, so that she should not make a sound, caught her by the arm, and hurried her to the bedroom door; he first stooped and peeped himself through the keyhole from which he had removed the key, saw Oswald at the wardrobe, then pushed the girl's head downwards to the keyhole, whispering: "Peep to wards the wardrobe," then peeped himself again, and saw Oswald smuggle the envelope into his pocket. Hartwell then whispered to the girl "Go away," and he re-entered the room.

Now, when Oswald had first put his hand into the pocket of McCalmont's coat, he had felt that there was only one envelope in it, an envelope which contained some shreds; and he now undoubtedly believed that was the same envelope which he had put into his pocket.

Hartwell put on again those same boots that "pinched," all unnoticed by Oswald, who was far too wildly preoccupied to notice anything, and too eager to be gone with the precious shreds; and presently, as Hartwell continued to dress, Oswald said, looking at his watch, "I must go, James."

"I shan't detain you three minutes, if you will wait for me," said Hartwell. "You will thus save your cab fare."

He now rapidly finished off his dressing. The supposed brothers went out together. In Addison-road Oswald put up his hand to a passing hansom to stop it, but Hartwell would not take it, saying that he wanted a four-wheeler. "But why so?" asked Oswald. Hartwell replied that he had a reason. They walked a little way, till a four-wheeler came along, when they got in, and drove towards Holland Park. The afternoon was like a summer holiday, full just there of leafage in maturity, and with the cries of little birds.

Oswald's nose, which had been as white as death, was now somewhat less white, and he smiled, saying by way of conversation:

"I am having that shooting-box at Corton Chantry looked after, Jimmy, as you said I might."

"Ah, I sometimes have weaknesses, I fear, Oswald," replied Hartwell.

"But surely that was months ago that I gave you permission to do that — to me it seems years. Isn't it done yet? You are a slow coach, Oswald."

"Well, I suppose I am a slowcoach," said Oswald; "I like things to develop themselves, and come off when they are ripe. People in a hurry are really hurrying to the grave, and I find life moderately livable. I shall have Corton finished for September, though. Perhaps if you tipped me five or six hundreds, Jimmy, that might help with the repairs."

"Decidedly that would help," said Hartwell; "let doubt be dismissed as to that. But being on the eve of marriage, I am thinking of curbing my prodigalities."

The corners of Oswald's jaw stiffened bitterly, and he said:

"I will ask you again at this hour to-morrow, my good fellow; and I wager you that you will do it then."

"But, Oswald, that is a hard, unbrotherly saying, surely?" cried Hartwell, loudly. "How is that, then. Oswald? And how much will you wager, my friend?"

"I'll wager you £500 that you will."

"And I'll wager you £500,000 that I will not, on this favourable condition to you that, if you lose, sir, you pay nothing, whereas, if I lose, I pay all. Stop, cabman! Here — officer — !"

The cab stopped; a policeman who was standing near by came to the door.

“I have to charge this gentleman with a felony,” said Hartwell to the officer. “He has just stolen the sum of £700 in notes from the pocket of a coat in my house; he has them now on his person. I can swear to the number of at least one of them, and he was seen in the act both by myself and one of my servants.”

Oswald could not answer. He put his hand into his pocket and felt the notes in the envelope; he was like a dead man, if death could utter sighs of disgust and woe.

The officer got into the four-wheeler — it was in order for him to have room for him that Hartwell had refused to take a two-wheeler-and they drove to the High Street police station. The charge was taken. Hartwell gave the “number” of the note; it was found on Oswald. Oswald could not be bailed, the case being a felony; and when he was being taken to a cell the poor Oswald uttered a deplorable little giggle of delirium.

That night Hartwell had to deliver a lecture on the “Ions of Electrolysis” at the Royal Institution, and after the lecture to go to visit Julia. He delivered the lecture, but sent an excuse to Julia, shrinking from seeing her during the first flush of the disgrace; but late in the night he received from her this telegram:

“IS IT TRUE? FOR HEAVEN’S SAKE, AND MINE, SPARE POOR OSWALD, IF AWFUL NEWS BE TRUE. TO ME INCREDIBLE. PRAY COME EARLY TO LUNCH TO-MORROW. MY LOVE. JULIA.”

The news, then, had already got about. Hartwell’s eyes flashed severely; he had warned Julia years ago that he was hard, that he was not one of the “sparing” sort. He meant to damp Oswald Drayton’s zeal for research.

The next forenoon he drove with the servant who was his witness to the court. Oswald sat in the dock, the picture of sighing, sick disgust, one side of his upper lip lifted a little, a sight to pity. The court was rather crowded with ladies and men-about-town, for the incident caused a three-days’ flutter, and may, perhaps, be still remembered by some readers, since it was not very long ago. Oswald’s advocate earnestly pleaded that the whole thing was a storm in a tea-cup; the accused was a well-known member of Society, a man of high honour, as he would call several gentlemen to prove; he had meant to take from his brother’s pocket a letter having no direct pecuniary value, and had taken another envelope instead. The magistrate, too, tried hard to smooth down the scandal; but Hartwell was not to be moved to forgive; he did not find it “compatible with his duty.” The prisoner was sentenced to four months in Holloway gaol.

When, on the pronouncement of the sentence, a policeman touched his arm, the unfortunate Oswald went temporarily crazy.

Hartwell still shrank from seeing Julia that day and night of the trial, and did not go to her: and again the day after the trial he did not see her, for that morning he received a letter which caused him to take a journey. The letter was from one Walker, that same Walker who was Oswald’s occasional shorthand man, and doer of odd jobs; he was down at Corton Chantry, disbursing moneys, and watching the progress of some work for Oswald; and Walker wrote to Hartwell:

“Dear Sir,

“I have just read of the committal of my employer, Mr Oswald, and as I do not know what to do now about the repairs on the Pavilion, or even about money for me to get back to London, I write to ask you what I am to do. You may know that there are a foreman and five men on the job, which is in a half-finished state, and I have only a few shillings left out of the current fund. This savage, Steve Anderson, refuses even to let me sleep in either of the chalk cottages, if I do not pay down cash every night. Awaiting your favoured advice. I am, dear sir, yours faithfully,

“R. Hamilton Walker.”

Hartwell's eye flashed with anger at his own weakness in granting a privilege to Oswald, and he had an immediate impulse to hurry on to Corton and bundle those workmen off the place — an impulse which would no doubt have passed away had it not been strengthened by the occurrence of that name “Steve Anderson” in Walker's letter, a man whom Hartwell had been paying for years through a bank, without knowing who, what, or where Anderson might be; and the impulse was further strengthened by his reluctance to face Julia's reproach for a day or two. He decided to go down to Corton that same day after lunch.

But he had a strange feeling of depression all that forenoon, while looking down at a table glittering with wedding presents, he had one of those brief pangs of doubt and panic which sometimes turned his heart cold. The wedding was not far off. The bride, who was a god-daughter of Royalty, had already received two presents from the Throne.

However, after lunch he started for Corton. In this way things come strangely about: Hartwell's re-engagement to Julia had roused Oswald's malice to renewed activity about the tragedy of Letty; this renewed activity of Oswald had brought about Oswald's ruin: and Oswald's ruin was the cause of Walker's letter, which in turn caused Hartwell to go down to Corton where “the Drayton wife” lay hidden.

Hartwell had told Julia that he was not married; that this was the God's truth; so that in what awaited him now the worthy and honest Hartwell was not to be envied.

XXI. HARTWELL FINDS A WIFE

IT WAS NOT without difficulty that Hartwell was able to penetrate to Corton Chantry; from Felmingham, the nearest station, it was a long and lonely drive, during which he thought that this must surely be one of the most thickly-wooded spots in England, and the journey was made still slower and more gloomy by the fact that it was raining. However, at about eight in the evening the basket-chaise, in which he was, arrived at a cottage from a chimney of which smoke was coming out, and Hartwell alighted amid the loud excitement of a fox-hound or harrier, and of a spaniel, at the door.

The cottage was of hard chalk with a red-brown old roof, and was built in two telescope-pieces, one slightly larger than the other; it stood almost under a ruin whose proportions could just be made out in the dark air; some distance away another white cottage with a red-brown roof could also be made out; and up to the very walls of the ruin, which stood on a low mound, and to the walls of the two cottages, thick wood and thicker coppice grew rank.

At the cottage door stood a creature peering out under a lamp at the chaise, and holding a fowling-piece in one hand; another man was peeping over his shoulder; and Hartwell, as he alighted, said to himself: "The man is 'Walker,' and the monster is 'Anderson.'"

"It's him," said Steve Anderson aloud to himself in a voice whose rumble resembled that of a running anchor chain. "A' knowed he'd be looking in some fine day."

“Well, Anderson; well, Walker,” said Hartwell, going in, and immediately on his entrance he turned to Walker, saying: “Here, Walker, is a sovereign; you will go away by the chaise that brought me.”

The room in which he stood was cosy and pleasing, but over-hot with an applewood fire; it had two windows with crimson moreen curtains, three wolf-skins on the floor, which was made of hard earth, and a singing kettle hung up in the fireplace.

“But, sir, am I turned off like this with a sovereign?” asked Walker, turning pale. “Mr Oswald owes me—”

“Then, let Mr Oswald pay you, my friend. Go away.”

Hartwell stood on a stool at a rude table made of logs, on which were two unplucked teals and a water-hen, with five or six large loaves, a black bottle which contained rum, and a small lamp.

“But aren’t you going to give me any more, sir, for a fact?” asked Walker.

“No. Well, now, Anderson, how is everything at Corton?” Walker, stared at Hartwell, then walked out of the room into an inner one. Anderson, a mound of misshapen flesh with an expression of face unmistakably daft, sat over the fire, his back turned to Hartwell, treating the master with scant ceremony. His arms hung at his sides as massive as two ordinary legs; his head resembled a mat of rough hair: he had, moreover, quite the air of a Crusoe; he wore Wellington boots, and a red shirt open at the breast; and something shy and untamed in his glance and address told of a wild man who had long inhabited a world apart, in which any other presence was an intrusion.

“Aye, a’ thought he’d be looking in some fine day,” he said when Walker had gone from the room; “but look ‘ee here, ma man, never ye send the likes o’ them meddlers and muddlers here again, flushing the coverts, and starting the water-fowl — . Is it me or them, a'd like to know? It can't be both. One o' them working-men shot his gun at a young rocketer yesterday, and if a'd er caughted him, a'd er split his head as clean as a log, a' would. And how was I to be sartin" — his eyes swam cautiously round— "that that there youngster would be getting on the scent o' her?"

It needed an accustomed ear to catch much meaning in that chain which rumbled in Anderson's voice, but Hartwell heard that word her. There was a she in the matter, and a secret she.

"Ah," said he, "and how is she?"

Anderson stretched his face closer to Hartwell's, with the grim whisper:

"She don't scream out any more; but a' had to scorch her hands at the fire afore she dropped that game."

Who "she" was Hartwell now knew; the word "scream" informed him; and to his inwards he felt the dart of fate strike coldly, inflicting a pain at which he could have cried aloud; but he made no sound; only his lips whitened.

At this moment Walker returned from the inner room with his bag, and a mackintosh on, saying:

"Well, I shall consider myself very badly used, that's all, Mr Drayton, between you and your brother—"

Hartwell flurriedly handed him a ten-pound note, bribing him to go and leave him alone, for he felt weak and ill. Walker took it, thanked Hartwell, and went out to the chaise, while Anderson drained a tumbler of rum, and set his big body before the fire again.

Hartwell and Anderson heard the chaise roll away amid the pelting upon the window panes of handfuls of rain, also a noise of swollen running waters.

"Is 'she' well?" asked Hartwell.

“Same as when you seed her last; only she don’t scream out any more: A’ put a stoppage to that game.”

The questions were asked in a low voice, but the answers were given in a tone of indifference.

“You alone know, Anderson?”

“Know what?”

“That she is here.”

“H’m! Who else was to know, master?”

“Is she — weak?”

“She wouldn’t be what you might call an ox for strength, ye know. Ye should give her some clothes, ma man. A’ made a camlet gown for her with my own hands three weeks ago: yes, cut out and stitched it together myself, A’ did, seeing as her hands are shaky to stitch for herself; the money won’t run to more ‘n that, A’ doubt: but, come winter, she’ll be freezing. A’ looked to see you turn up some fine day afore this.”

“Take me there.”

“What, now? in the pouring rain?”

“Yes.”

Anderson got up, took a horn lantern from a number of mattocks, adzes, and rifles in a corner, lit it, and said: “A’m ready.”

But Hartwell, on rising, found that his knees could hardly bear him; he said: “I will be with you—” and stood with his palms on the table leaning on it, with a hanging head.

Anderson waited, and presently Hartwell was able to rouse himself, and move toward the front door. They then went out. The ruins were not more than four or five yards from the side of the cottage. They went up to it by a steep little path covered over with dripping leafage, and now were within an enclosure of old walls. Even here there were trees and bush; they felt the rain still spraying upon them. Anderson went, a little in advance, swinging the lantern in his hand, with the harrier and the spaniel at his heels; a few startled birds took to flight or stirred among the bush, as the two men went forward. Twice Anderson stopped short, peering earnestly about, but without any sign of fear, and stamped as if to frighten something away.

They went on darkly in this way — for the horn lantern gave little light — till they came to the north-western part of the ruins, where there were four old worn steps, with a stone balustrade to them, leading up to a deep-set door under a Norman portal, the door itself being modern, and made of rough logs, like Anderson's table in the chalk cottage. Anderson drew a bunch of keys from the bagging part of his red shirt, went up the four steps, and opened the door. Hartwell who was as pale as a dead man, and trembling all over, followed him. They entered a spacious hall with a groined roof and a floor made of stone flags, an empty and hollow place, which re-echoed even the patter of the dogs feet; at its further end there was another stone stair, steep and narrow this one, without any balustrade. They walked across the hall to it, went up, and at the top of the stair Anderson opened a small Gothic door, which they had to stoop in order to pass through; they then found themselves on a stone landing, semicircular in shape, where the lantern showed the foot of a spiral stair which went up from it to the top of a high tower; and up this stair they now plodded, going round and up between spiral walls, where the damp struck cold, and the feet seemed shod with echoes, to another landing, and then to another, and finally to an old Norman door at the top, which Anderson opened.

They now went into a good-sized square chamber with a vaulted roof, and, as they entered it, a rat dropped massively from a table which stood in the middle of it, and ran away.

“She’s yonder, abed,” whispered Anderson, pointing to a Gothic door which stood opposite to the door by which they had come in.

Hartwell, seeing a key sticking outward in the door to which Anderson had pointed, walked quickly and quietly to it, and locked “her” ‘in. He then looked round the room by the light of the lantern. There was a small deal table, without any covering, and on it was a cup-and-saucer, a crust of bread, and a little lamp, not burning; under one of the window slits was a small sofa covered with very faded old pink damask, also a cane lounge, an old oak chair, an old coffer, and a lot of old torn books on the floor, nearly filling the hearth; the floor was of uncarpeted wood, very dislocated so that pieces of it creaked and shook under the feet.

In the wall which contained “her” chamber door there was another door through which Hartwell looked, and beckoned to Anderson to show him what lay beyond it. Anderson went through it with the lantern into another room and Hartwell followed.

This second room was similar to the first, but had nothing in it, was windowless, and must therefore have been dark even at noon. And here the floor was even more shaky and creaky.

“Does she come here?” whispered Hartwell in a hoarse voice.

“Only to pass through to yonder,” answered Anderson, pointing to the further doorway of a cabinet that had once been a bartizan, with oylets.

There was silence for some minutes, till Hartwell gave utterance to the terrible words:

“But she owes her life to you, Anderson.”

“To me?” said Anderson, showing the brown fangs in his mouth in a daft sort of laugh.

“Let us not think what might have happened, if you had taken up two or three of these old boards one night.” Hartwell said this in a base low tone of voice shivering at the same time as if with intense cold.

“Now, hark at that,” said the great hunchback, with his rumbling voice: “did not you tell me with your own mouth that I worn’t never to go as far as that?”

“I have said so,” replied Hartwell, but without expecting to be obeyed. “I saw that your interest lay in drawing the salary, without having the work, Anderson.”

The daft Anderson scratched his rough head a little under his deerstalker cap, thinking of it, and the conclusion at which he arrived was uttered in these words: “A’ could use this place for a apple store, and to put up the marjoram, southernwood, and artichokes — . No one would never be the wiser, as for that.”

Hartwell laid his hand on Anderson’s shoulder to uphold his weak knees, and he said, apparently speaking to Anderson, but really to himself:

“Let each act according to the dictates of a pure reason, Anderson, in every case. It is the only morality. And do it with decision, without a tear, I implore you, without one qualm.”

He patted the hunchback’s arm admonishingly as he said this, and at the same time the sob of a whole manhood in convulsion broke from the ill-fated Hartwell.

“A’ll do it,” said Anderson, “nothing couldn’t be easier done. Not but what A’ll be lonesome, for lack o’ her, and her poor harmless ghost ‘ll be haunting me for a morsel o’ bread. But A’ tak’ no more notice o’ ghosts than o’ sparrows: they come and they go, in broad day sometimes, just to keep ma company; and I tak’ no notice. A’ll do it this self-same night.”

At these words Hartwell suddenly fled from the hunchback, and was gone into the outer room, and thence down the dark spiral stair. Something or other in Hartwell could not quite stand this: “perhaps it was that non-rational love of righteousness” which he had “got from his forefathers;” whatever it was, he fled down the stair like an escaping thief, with a bent back, with white lips pressed together, and with a wild eye.

To this point fate and pure reason had brought the worthy Hartwell to murder most foul.

He had sworn to Julia that he was not married: he could not outrage and massacre that beloved life by marrying her now, while this woman, lived; and the day after the marriage the existence of this woman, who was his wife, so long as he was Drayton, might become known; he had hoped, had permitted himself to believe blindly, that the woman had somehow thinned into air; let her be thin, then! — rather her than Julia.

But she had never hurt him, not wilfully, this already wronged woman. Hartwell understood that if she suddenly thinned to nothing, then he would not be happy afterwards; there was even a grumble somewhere within or without him, which said to him:

“Dare but to lift your little finger against her, Hartwell, and there is that in Nature which will not fail to bring down your gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.”

Even the robustious Drayton had had pity on her — had said “Don’t kill;” even the daft Anderson would miss her, and see with compunction her harmless ghost; was Hartwell, alone, then, to go ruthlessly, following “reason,” calling himself “the best and choicest kind of man,” calling Drayton “ruffian” and “clown,” though, in fact, he and Drayton were as twin in conduct as they were in face, when it came to the push?

After wandering at random in unknown paths for some time, Hartwell butted upon an old wall buried in a spinny, and turned in a new direction, with the vague purpose of returning to the cottage; but both the cottage and the ruin were now lost to him. He did not know where he was, and did not care. The forest here was primitively savage and profound. There were caverns of bush, little homes of darkness, full of the stirring of birds, where the pouring rain penetrated only as a slow dripping. Hartwell did not cease to wander for hours, wet to the skin through his overcoat, with water pouring over the rim of his silk hat. About midnight he came to a Moorish looking lodge or shooting-box, which was called "the Pavilion," with a portico running all round it, and facing the forest in all the four directions, with a series of light arches supported on slender pillars. On one of the pillars, which was covered with honeysuckle, Hartwell leant his forehead, thinking now of the old Birmingham works, the purring of the dynamos, and how well it was with him then; and how he had pitied a man named Ediss who, happening to touch the switchboard one day, started a little, and dropped dead — pitied him then, but envied him now, that light surprise of death. He could not go to Julia and say: "I am married after all, though I swore to you, and it would have been better for you if you had not been born." Nor could he say: "I am not Drayton; Drayton is married, But I am not Drayton; I am Hartwell, a working man." Quite so much courage no man had; either way it seemed to him that she and he, too, would die of shame. It was better that "the wife" should die. Reason sentenced her.

But she, already so wronged, had not done him any harm.

Hartwell's brain ached miserably; seeing a bench in the portico where he stood, he lay on it, and soon, being wearied out in body and mind, fell asleep.

He was not long lying there, however, before he was away sleep-walking in the forest; and, walking in his sleep, Hartwell had a dreadful vision that night. It seemed to him that Drayton was walking with him in a wonderland of the dead; the stirrings of the trees of Corton became a shivering of many grave-clothes in his dream; the rain drops turned to a sweat of that place; and with blank eye whites Hartwell groped through a mystery of shadow, solemnner than over entered into any living, happy heart to conceive. He thought that Drayton said to him: "Act well, Hartwell, that you may shorten my hell," and that he answered: "Which hell, Drayton? There is no hell: I am only dreaming," and Drayton seemed to say again: "Hell is the evil that men do: and the continuance of that evil in the world is the measure of their hell;" and Hartwell thought that he asked: "What is it to act well?" and Drayton seemed to him to make the answer: "To act well is to crush one's self in the effort to do to others as one would have them do to one." On this Hartwell dreamed that he said "That is an ancient precept impossible to fulfil;" to which Drayton seemed to answer: "Impossible to fulfil, but not impossible to try to fulfil."

Hartwell dreamed that they debated for a long while on that high plane in such a mood of awe as tongue cannot tell; Drayton's every word was like a god's to the dreamer's consciousness, never to be forgotten, and his voice like winds when they surge bleakly and die away in November. Dreams, however, cannot be told: in the morning we tell the details of our dreams, and think that we have told the dream, but any other details would have been equally true, equally false; the real dream was a mood among the gnomes, a trouble in a sea shell, or starlight in limbo, and words cannot express all that. So in a special degree it was with this long dream of Hartwell's: augustly beyond words he walked and mused in that strange country, and anyone looking at him would have seen him at one moment shaken by the fluttering of his breath at his lips, and at another moment would have heard him whine thinly. He thought that he said to Drayton:

"Nature takes the line of least resistance; man is part of Nature; selfishness is his law. Streams flow downward."

To this Drayton seemed to answer in a very solemn voice:

“Hartwell, they flow upward, all streams, all things, full of labor they climb, they strain. Could they even incidentally flow downward, if they had not first climbed high? — by the toil of the sun, and the aspiration of the sea, and the achievement of the clouds.”

Hartwell now dreamed that he said to Drayton’s ghost: “Are you really Drayton, or are you only one part of myself talking to another part of myself? I do not believe in ghosts, with cavernous, oracular voices. Yet my heart aches at the incubus of your presence, Drayton; you oppress me, Drayton, to death and the grave,” to which he thought that Drayton answered:

“This is the last time that I shall visit you in your sleep; and this last time I only pray you to shorten the buccaneer hell which I have made on the earth, not prolong it by an added scientific hell of your own.”

Hartwell’s sleep-walking had now led him into a glade in a pine-wood, ten or twelve minutes’ walk from the Pavilion; in the middle of the glade was an old well surrounded by ferns; and to this he happened to walk. When the brickwork stopped him, this seemed to break the thread of the dream for a time; he groped with his palms on the well, and then sat on it with his face turned upward, staring blankly, perhaps more or less conscious of the full moon which was making her way among dark clouds just over the opening in the pinewood. The smell of the pines may have come to his nostrils and soothed him, for what he next dreamed was that he had rather laid down his arms before the authority of the ghost, and was saying to Drayton, “But if I crush myself, Drayton, in the effort to do good to others, what is my reward?” to which the answer suggested to his mind was, “The reward is happiness, a kingdom; and unchallengeable authority, though your hair turn grey with troubles. On that road you shall run and not be weary, Hartwell: in it all the systems troop, and that flying moon, see-yonder! seeming to soar on her orbit beyond the flying clouds; with songs and everlasting joy on her head.”

The dream alter this gradually lost definiteness, though it lasted through other scenes to the time when Hartwell awoke. He was then lying without a hat, and very bedraggled, under the portico of the pavilion, to which he had returned from the well. The sun was well up; before him was a small lawn enclosed by forest, and in the middle of the lawn was a statue of Pan on a pedestal. He lay for some time, stiff in the limbs, thinking of his dream, living through it again, seeing the scenes which he had seen, and hearing again the words which he had heard. The effect of it upon him was extraordinary, not only upon his nerves, but upon his memory; for he found that he could remember the very order in which what he had said, and what Drayton had said, had been uttered; two or three of Drayton’s phrases seemed to be burned into his brain as only words heard in dreams can be; anon a subdued groan came from the prostrate form, as lying there in the portico on his face, Hartwell reconsidered the universe. What thoughts then passed through Hartwell’s mind? It is useless to follow them, if we could: but his “pure reason” had brought him to the verge of a terrible deed, and the conclusion at which he seems to have arrived was that the Drayton of the vision was his own purer and purest reason, roused by the disastrous fix in which he now stood, to a debate with his pure reason; that his cut-and-dry theory of the world was hardly complete; that there must be some thing inside or outside of the atoms more than he had accounted for; and that, consequently, his life must begin afresh. At all events, when he suddenly saw a workman with a hod and a trowel standing by the statue of Pan on the lawn, and staring at him, Hartwell sprang to his feet as if this sight terrified him, and ran past the workman, wildly seeking the ruin.

XXII. HARTWELL LIES LOW

AFTER RUNNING UP a steep path in the forest, Hartwell saw Anderson standing with his harrier, spaniel, and fowling-piece under a tree on the rising ground where the ruin stood; he joined the hunchback nearly breathless.

“Did you remove the boards from the flooring?” he asked in a secret and agitated voice.

“A’ did,” said Anderson, with a nod of the head.

“Give me the keys quickly!”

“Wherever did ye sleep — ?

“The keys!”

Anderson slowly drew them from his shirt: Hartwell caught them from the hunchback’s hand with a severe flash of the eye, and instantly was running again. He entered the ruin, ran to the door made of logs, opened it, ran across the empty hall to the flight of stone steps with the low Gothic door above it, opened that also, then ran up the spiral stair, never pausing to take breath, till he reached the top; he then opened the door at the top, and entered the vaulted room of untooled blocks.

There at the little deal table sat a woman eating porridge out of a pewter plate — her breakfast, which Anderson had just brought her.

The moment her eyes rested upon Hartwell, she uttered a short cry, and fled with a fluttering sort of motion first toward her own room, then, with a sudden change of direction, toward the room where the boards had been removed. Hartwell started after her, hissing under his breath the word “Stop!” He almost caught her during the delay while she opened the door, but she was gone again before he could touch her.

Immediately afterwards he was aware of a scream, of an effort to stop himself, of a life passing beyond his power; and almost without knowing what he did, he was on his face, half hanging over an opening in the flooring four feet square, and in his left hand the woman’s left arm and her hanging weight.

For a moment the strain was severe, and the issue doubtful: but as soon as he had her held by both hands and began to draw her cautiously up, he found that she was wonderfully light; he got her to the flooring, picked himself up, and bore her in his arms to the outer vaulted room; there he laid her on the old pink sofa, and threw himself upon the lounge to take breath.

She, for her part, had fainted, and with his thoughtful smiling side-look Hartwell looked at her during some ten minutes. At once something struck him — a certain resemblance of her face to his own: she might have been his sister; and at once, too, there was at work in him a sympathy with her, a compassion for her, instinctive and sudden, such as he had never yet felt for anyone.

She was of middle height, very slender, with very thin cheeks, and dressed in a manner grotesque to the point of comicalness, for she had on only a robe that was really a nightdress, but with a waist to it, this waist being loose and low down at the hips, and one of the sleeves was much larger than the other (this robe was the handiwork of Anderson); and through a large rent in her right slipper (the left had fallen through the hole in the flooring) her dirty toes were seen.

Presently she opened her eyes, started, and stared at Hartwell. She had a commonplace, but rather pathetic face, once, perhaps, more or less pretty; there was something pathetic in the sideward way in which she held it always. Her hair was gathered up in a knot, a quite little knot no bigger than a ping-pong ball or large marble; it had “dropped,” and from jet black was now well-sown with grey, though she was hardly thirty-six; her face was very blanched, with the palest washed-out freckles on it. Only the upper part of it resembled Hartwell’s, for her lips were not thick, and the upper was short, with a tendency to stand a little open.

Her surprise and fear of him rapidly vanished. Looking downward with her head held sideward in her habitual manner, she said:

“So you’ve come at last, James.”

“At last,” replied Hartwell: “never more, I think, to leave your side.”

“I hope you’ve not come here to murder me.”

“No! but to save, to liberate, and to avenge you.”

“Ah, nice tale.”

Her talk was slightly nasal, with a countrified drawl, and, like all about her, was the very embodiment of the commonplace.

“Let it not be doubted,” said Hartwell, with a vivacious eye. “I come back to you, though late, a changed man, a different man — Martha, sorry for my grievous offences against you, and sick to the heart that I have been, and may still be, the ruffian you have known me; but I come — no longer, indeed, your husband, nor disposed ever more to aspire to that title, but as a suppliant friend, beseeching you to forgive, and to permit me to prove my penitence by a lifelong devotion.”

Sideward she held her wearied, uninterested face. She made no answer to this, but said musingly:

“How came that hole in the flooring in there, I wonder? Nearly broke my poor neck—”

At this Hartwell’s lips pressed vindictively together.

“What’s brought you here?” asked Martha suddenly: “it’s only to do me some harm or other, I know. You might as well leave me in peace after all this time, James. I shouldn’t be surprised if you only want to murder me to marry some other woman; or p’raps, if the truth were known, you’ve done it already, and that’s why you locked me up, so as I should not show you up to everybody.”

“No! I have married no one, nor ever shall — take my word for it! — while you live. Nor have I come now to murder you, but, I repeat, to crave your forgiveness at your feet, and to comfort you, Martha, with my respect and love.”

“Fine tale,” she went on wearily; “you’ve got some new move on the board, I suppose. It’s all very well to come now with your pretences, James, when I don’t care whether I go out or stop in. You could kill me, if you like, and I shouldn’t care now. I want none of your false-hearted respect and love, all I want is my little Rosie.” Now the poor Martha began to cry into her hands.

“Your little-Rosie?” said Hartwell with a stammer. He was appalled, for he knew nothing of any little Rosie.

“Oh, of course, you don’t know where she is, do you? Oh no! you wouldn’t, of course,” said Martha. “How could you be so cruel, after all, so cruel, cruel, cruel, oh, my good God, as to take away my little girl from me?”

Hartwell now knelt on a sudden, with a bowed head and back, at her feet.

“She shall be recovered—”

“How do you mean ‘recovered.’ Where’s she, James?”

Hartwell had no idea! He could not answer.

“You may as well let me have the child,” she said. “What have you done with her? You may as well let me know at once. You should never have taken her from me. I always said: ‘He’s a right to do what he likes with me, because I’m his wife, and I came from Africa against his orders, but he shouldn’t separate mother and child; oh, no, he shouldn’t do that: that isn’t hardly right.’ You may as well let me know what you’ve done with the child. Have you locked her up in a tower, too, with never a sight of God’s sky, and not a rag to her back five long years? She won’t know her own mother when she sees her. You may as well let me know if the child is well.”

“She is well — forgive me — she is well.”

“Is that the real downright truth, James?”

“Yes — forgive me, forgive me.”

“All right, I forgive you, if you give her back to me. You know you never liked the child: anybody could see that much. You may as well tell me whether I shall ever see the child again, or whether this is only some new move on the board—”

He kissed the back of her hand several times with quick-repeated pressures.

“Trust me, trust me this once,” he said: “I really make no new move on the board, having, perhaps, made enough. On the contrary, my heart so yearns with fatherly pity for all your forlorn and unprotected helplessness, that I present you my life as a sin-offering for my sins against you, Martha. You shall see her — let doubt be dismissed! — you shall certainly see her, if you will but bear with me.”

“It’s too good to be true. You were always such a one for telling lies, James. Shall I see her to-day?”

“Not to-day, I fear.”

“Oh, then, go away” — she pushed his head— “it’s only some new move you’re at: some other woman in the case, I’ll lay.”

Hartwell kissed her hand again, and rose, saying:

“You shall see her, believe me. But now, come; and let these prison-walls hear your lifelong farewell. Allow me to bear you in my arms—”

He lifted and bore her down, step by step, through the darkness of the spiral stair. She showed little interest, little joy, at crossing that threshold; but when they emerged from the ruin, and the full morning splendour struck the eyes of Martha, she gave a little cry, wriggled from his hold, ran a little way with her bare left foot through the dripping underwood, plucked a cowslip, and then ran back from the excursion with a sort of Chinese woman flurry in her shivering dress to his arms: thus Martha had her momentary happiness.

Hartwell took her to Anderson’s cottage; at the door of the cottage he met four of the working men who were engaged in making repairs on Oswald’s behalf at the pavilion, and he ordered them to finish the repairs, meaning to live there some time; then, depositing Martha at the table, which was already laid, they sat to Anderson’s excellent breakfast of teal, with several sorts of eggs, bread, butter, lettuce, and coffee.

After the breakfast Hartwell changed his wet clothes for some of Anderson’s, and after a search in the cottage for writing materials, which ended in the finding of a pencil and some old foolscap paper, he sat to write a number of letters, while Martha sat on the outer step in her grotesque garment, wondering at the sky, herself a wonder to the hunchback, who saw her at liberty from that day forward with a stare of surprise.

Hartwell first wrote to Miss Scatchett, his housekeeper, telling her to send him a trunk of clothes, also a certain packet of papers in a certain drawer in his study, and instructing her also to buy and send down a complete outfit for a lady of middle size. Miss Scatchett, he said, was not to reveal his whereabouts to anyone.

He next wrote to Bobbie Hartwell in St. James Street, saying: "I want you to come down here immediately. You are not to reveal my whereabouts to anyone."

He also wrote that day a letter to one Bathright, of Hong Kong, enclosing a draft to pay for the return of the old countryman, Gissing, to England.

He also wrote to the Chief Superintendent at Scotland Yard asking for information as to the whereabouts of a man who one night over four years before had received a mysterious wound in the temple at No. 7, Twyford Buildings, W.C., which wound had made the man dumb. He meant Barnes, the father of the murdered Letty.

Kirk, the stableman, who had tried to blackmail him, and Mary Liskeard, who had wished to stab him, were dead: Bull, the mastiff, which had taken him for a ghost, was dead; and because he could not recall them, Hartwell's eye, as he thought of them, flashed severely.

He also wrote next day to the Home Office, and to two London morning papers, stating in equivocal language that Oswald Drayton, condemned to four months' imprisonment, had not meant to steal the bank notes found on him. The notes had been purposely placed in the hanging coat by him, James Drayton, in order that Oswald might mistake them for a letter which he meant to steal.

And now it occurred to Hartwell that he had not examined that letter which Oswald had meant to steal. He had intended to do this on the day after Oswald's trial, but the hurried trip to Gorton had caused him to remit it. He now resolved to see, when he was next in London, what that letter could be which Oswald had so wanted.

These letters, at any rate, Hartwell wrote, crushing himself with grim lips; and Anderson took them on his cover-hack to Felmingham.

The day after the liberation of Martha, in the afternoon, the outfit for her and the trunk of clothes, for Hartwell, together with the packet of papers which he had asked Miss Scatchett for, arrived from London. He wanted that packet of letters because it contained an old letter from one Elizabeth Seward, which said that “the girl” had run away, “to go to her mother,” but had been recaptured. It had no address, no date, but the postmark on the envelope indicated a village (Birdlip) in Gloucestershire: and Hartwell knew that one Elizabeth Seward drew the half-yearly interest of a fund placed by Drayton in a Cheltenham bank for her use. He had never been able to find out who, or precisely where this woman was; had once determined to go down there and seek her out when he got a chance, but had never gone; and for over four years he had had no word from her. At any rate, he concluded that “the girl” with her must be Martha’s daughter.

Two hours after the arrival of the packages at Corton, arrived Mr Bobbie Hartwell, who was now grown into a slim, rosy-faced Adonis of nineteen years, but an Adonis unrural to his glove-tips, tintured by Rugby, retintured by Mayfair, and tintured all through again by St. John’s Wood and the Quartier Latin — a rather complex Adonis of nineteen. The young man was supposed to be studying electrical engineering, but his hair was worn in longish waves, and his father, who had seen his name in an art journal, darkly suspected that Bobbie was more given to verses than to volts.

Bobbie and Hartwell walked for an hour that evening in the forest, where the father impressed upon the son the task that lay before him: he was to start at once, and, making Cheltenham his centre, search the country, especially about Birdlip, till he found the girl, Rosie; the name “Elizabeth Seward” was to be Bobbie’s clue and pole-star; and he would take with him a trained investigator from London.

“You will use your wits, and not fail me,” said Hartwell; “it is essential to my tranquillity that you find her within the week. I may mention that she is black-haired, and her age under sixteen.”

But these details were quite wrong. Hartwell assumed that Rosie was Drayton’s daughter, and, since he knew the date of Drayton’s marriage, he could thus fix Rosie’s maximum age; also, since both Drayton and Martha were black-haired, he assumed that Rosie would be, too; but, in fact, she was a daughter of Martha’s first husband, one Harper, was over seventeen, and fair-haired.

“And what do you say her name is, sir?” asked Bobbie.

“Rose Drayton.”

Here again was a fatal direction, her name being Rose Harper.

“Some relative of yours, perhaps, sir?”

“Perhaps.”

“Quite so, sir. But I suppose you see, sir, that it will be deucedly odd if I don’t turn up at your wedding in three days’ time. I had to take Miss Aimee Drummond—”

“Yes, deucedly odd, my friend if you don’t turn up at my wedding,” answered Hartwell, “nothing so odd. Let it not, however, be said, Bobbie, that you have a larger consciousness than your protector. Do as I bid you — do as I Did you.”

Hartwell’s head dropped to his breast with a deep frown of pain, his palm laid lightly on his brushed-back hair, which was growing rather thin now.

“Do you feel bad, sir?” asked Bobbie.

“No! I feel well. Let us return to the cottage. I have only this further hint to give you, Bobbie, which you may have already gathered from my manner, that, in seeking this Rose Drayton, you seek your wife; and, in finding her, you find what is a good thing for youths of your age and hers — a mate.”

“By Jove, sir — you — you, really, sir,” went Bobbie, with a lovely blush, “you — you overwhelm me with distinction — Ah, Heaven! this is why I am sent to Birdlip! I shall say Roselip — !”

“You displease me, Bobbie,” said the lad’s father: “I require you to take my serious communications with a more becoming gravity. It is my wish that you marry this girl, and at once, if she be healthy — if she be alive! (She is, she must be, alive). Will you marry her whom I wish, or whom you wish?”

“Whom you wish, sir, with pleasure,” said Bobbie.

“That’s a man. Let us return.”

XXIII. HARTWELL IS TEMPTED

THE “DISAPPEARANCE OF Drayton,” of course, caused a flutter, especially in the west end of London. When the day of his marriage with Julia arrived, and no one could guess what had become of him, it was generally supposed that he had met with an accident, and, perhaps, was dead. But the morning after that sad wedding day, it was seen that he could not be dead, for there appeared in two of the morning papers his extraordinary letter, exculpating his “brother,” Oswald, from intending to steal the bank notes. Still, it could not be guessed what had happened to upset the marriage, or where “Drayton” was.

Hartwell, meanwhile, remained at Corton, where he took up his residence with Martha in the Pavilion. During the first three days after finding Martha in her prison in the tower, he wrote several letters to Julia, letters which were like groans expressed in words, but he tore them all up. Only four brief lines on the day before the wedding reached her from him: “It is better to say briefly what has to be said. I cannot, after all, become to you what I have hoped. And this is the last ill-usage that you will receive at my hands.”

Julia spent the forenoon of her wedding day in a long and solitary ride over the downs, after which she returned to Garlot Croft unwell, and was put to bed by her relatives in a sort of sleep.

It was not till about a week after that disastrous wedding day, that it got into the stream of general knowledge that “Drayton” was at an out-of-the-way place called Corton, the information having by then got abroad through Hartwell's several letters to the Home Office, etc. By that time Julia, her aunt, and some other relatives had gone away to the South of France. June, the month of the marriage, passed into July. Hartwell, meanwhile, at Corton, was looking out anxiously to see his son and Rosie, expecting their arrival every day. But, strange to say, neither Bobbie and Rosie came, nor Bobbie by himself.

Hartwell had received only one letter from Bobbie, dated at Birdlip, saying that the search for Rosie was going forward: then had followed a most mysterious silence.

At this delay Martha could not be consoled, could not be won, by the excellent Hartwell; "You may as well tell me what you have done with the child," said Martha wearily ten times a day in her little nasal drawl; "you'd better tell that to the marines that you don't know where the child is, James."

But Hartwell's patience with her little vulgarities of thought and speech never failed her deadness to him, her continued lack of any spark of gratitude or amity, had no influence on his dogged devotion; like an automaton of chivalry he still hung about and fostered her; and the more he served her, the more the reward of having a genuine pity and affection for her was given to him.

From the first he had observed a certain facial resemblance between her and himself, and had felt toward her some sort of special affinity and friendship; and one day, a couple of weeks after coming to live in the pavilion, a possible explanation, of this was offered him: for she had an album brought from her empty trunk in the tower, full of the faded photographs of some rather obsolete people, the leaves of which she was fond of turning; and, looking over her shoulder in the portico one morning while she was going through the album, Hartwell, seeing an old daguerreotype photograph which, being very much like himself, he took to be a photograph of Drayton, said to her: "Ah, there I am, then," but she replied: "You know very well that's not you; it's my grandfather. Denner, that shot at your mother on the ship."

Hartwell now for the first time saw into the mystery of his bodily twinning with Drayton, having never before been struck by the possibility that another mother might have been affected in the same way as his own had been by that old tragedy of the sea. He now saw that this must have been so; and since that Captain Denner, the quasi-father of his and Drayton's body, was also Martha's grandfather, from that hour Hartwell looked upon the good Martha as kith and kin, and added to his fatherly affection for her a brotherly friendship.

He believed that Drayton, too, may have felt, something of this affinity for Martha, and under its influence may have married her. But, in Drayton's case, time and "the world" may have turned the positive liking into a negative sentiment of actual dislike.

During all those weeks of June and July, while he waited for Bobbie to come with Rosie, Hartwell did not weary of trying to call up in Martha some little interest, trust, or affection toward him: but it was always in vain; and her carping unfriendliness became an added care to his great sorrow. Always she said to him. "You may as well tell me where she is, James, and not be such a brute;" but he could not tell: Bobbie Hartwell seemed to be dead; a letter addressed to Bobbie at Birdlip was returned by the post office to Hartwell and Hartwell would even kneel to Martha and say: "Bear with me."

He spent nearly all his days with her, though he had now his books in the pavilion, as well as the necessary apparatus for research-work arranged in a back room on the first floor. The house was a square, yellow-white building, moderately large, in a Moorish tone, surrounded by a portico of arches on slender pillars; it lay somewhat in a valley, all shut in by old forest, about a quarter of a mile from the ruin. Some of its lonely, large rooms contained furniture, faded tapestries and carpets, an old organ, cracked spinets and pianos, historical Chippendales and Davids, coffers, cabinets, bronzes, and a library of books which were just visible through dust. Hartwell made five or six of the rooms habitable, and had down three of the servants from Addison Road, with a young groom named Gloucester, who brought down two of the horses, the landau, and the trap. Sarah Gissing was made Martha's maid, and Steve Anderson became the commissionaire of the establishment, doing whatever odd jobs were to be done, but never losing his look of wonder at the change in the aspect of his world. When Mrs Gissing and her daughter Sarah arrived to await the coming of Gissing, and occupied the second of the two chalk cottages, Steve appeared before Hartwell to complain that things had now reached a climax, that the water-fowl would be flushed, that the sky would fall — But Hartwell was a new kind of Drayton, made to be submitted to. "Let it not be said, Anderson," he said with a smiling eye, "that the hare hunts the harrier;" and this was an allusion which Steve could appreciate; but even so long as a month after her liberation, if the sullen and daft Steve by chance saw Martha alone in the forest, he would make a startled step, as if to seeing a runaway; and a rumble was always in his chest at the way things were looking.

Martha was, however, seldom to be seen alone, for her legs would not bear her far; her vitality was almost gone.

Sometimes she would turn white, with flustered breath, as if from heart-failure; she was quite light to lift. Suddenly she would fall asleep, physically and mentally enfeebled and washed out. Always it was Hartwell's arm which supported her, and his bosom was her pillow.

Sometimes she had childish moods, picnic-fancies, and he would take her all the summer's day to where the natural profusion of the estate was wildest with flowers and fruit of blackberry and honeysuckle, or into the depths of the pinewood where in some parts the underwood was very thick and the scenery very romantic, or to the north-east reaches of the estate where there was a frog pond in the gloom of the forest, and all thereabouts festoons of dog rose rioted over hedges that were three yards thick — rambles from which Hartwell might return with Martha asleep in his arms, and in her arms a load of flowers, roses and tall sunflowers which nodded above their heads, and clematis and red-berried briony which trailed on the ground, destined to fill her vases and her dark-blue china bowl in the drawing room of the pavilion.

“Is it true,” she asked one sunset, “that you got so rich, as I heard before I left South Africa?”

They were sitting on the banks of the mere under the west wall of the ruin, fishing, for Hartwell had tried to teach her angling, though she always sailed the float of her rod about on the surface of the water in an uninterested and very grotesque fashion; but they often came and sat just there in the long twilights under a gigantic old willow by a ground-baited patch of the mere.

“Yes,” answered Hartwell, “I got rich; hence my revolt against my humble past when you were my lawful companion; and hence also that lawless sense of power which you have bitterly felt, poor woman;” with closed eyes he passed his hand back ward over his hair, which had grown markedly more grey within the last four weeks.

“At any rate,” she said, ludicrously sailing the float about, and fingering a new pearl necklet which lay over her muslin bodice, “I haven't got much of the riches. That's been for other women, I daresay, if the truth were only known. I think a husband should act better by his wife than that, James: not lock her up in an old tower five long years, and take the child away. If you'd only tell me what you've done with my little Rosie, I'd let bygones be bygones. Whatever has that poor child done to you? You may as well give her back to me, James. Oh, my good Lord, I'd just like to lay eyes on that little girl once again! I wonder if she'd know me?"

"She is coming, she is assuredly coming, she is being earnestly sought," said Hartwell.

"Ah, fine talk, no doubt: always coming but never come. You may as well tell me what you've done with the child. Sought for what? You know very well where the child is all the time: but you always took the cake for telling lies, James."

The last rose and primrose blushes of the sunset faded in the west, but still lingered like fragrant memories in the spirit of the twilight; a faint evening breeze stirred the reeds and bulrushes, where a few grebes and herons loitered, and the wild duck suddenly shot up a bluff stern, like ships that dive when they are about to sink, while yonder a little red woodcock "roaded," giving out in a strange language a sound which meant that that day was done, though the air was still all alive with twitterings. Martha pinned her sailor hat over the paltry little knot of her hair, while Hartwell, putting together the rods and tackle, the can of red worms, and two breams which he had caught, said to her: "Take my word for it, Martha, that the greater number of the lies which I was to tell you have been already told. As for the riches of which you speak, they are yours, all yours, and have in store for you a greater sum of pleasures than you at present dream of. I am only waiting for you to grow a little stronger in this bracing air of Corton, before presenting you to the world as my wife, and settling you in that sphere which is yours by right; nor ever again are you destined to find yourself without a protecting husband at your side — take my word for it! — nor ever again will he willingly cause to those eyes that have wept, one tear — If only you will give me your pardon in return for my strong and tender affection, Martha. Yes! you are rich enough: you possess an excellent seat in the county of Bucks, one in Salop, houses, a million at least in cash —”

Martha was not much interested; her confirmed insensibility to him could not be moved. “You can keep all your grand things,” she said, leaning on him, as they walked down the steep forest path from the ruin to the pavilion: “I want none of your palaver and soft-soaping, you know; you’ve got the gift of the gab, since I knew you, haven’t you? and have learned to talk like grand people; but that isn’t going to get over me, James. I’d be quite happy where I am, if you’d only give me the child to run about with me, and pick the flowers. My goodness! that would be a treat.”

“You shall have her — never fear! (Such an added calamity could not befall me —)” Hartwell’s eyes closed in pain. What had become of Bobbie, he could not begin to conceive. The thought that Bobbie had met foul play, that he might be dead, had occurred to him, and at one time he had thought of giving notice of the lad’s disappearance to the police, and having him officially searched for. But he had first written to Bobbie’s man at Bobbie’s chambers in London to see if the man knew anything of Bobbie, and it turned out that the man had quite recently received some instructions from Bobbie, who was therefore apparently alive and well. Why, then, even if his quest had failed, did Bobbie not write to his father? It could not be guessed; but with that faith which believes what it hopes for, pushed to make some promise, Hartwell now said jauntily to Martha: “Yes! you shall have her. I have even to tell you news the most auspicious! I have lately arranged for Rosie to marry one of the healthiest, handsomest, richest, and smartest young men in the Kingdom—”

“You have? Is that the downright truth?” she asked, agaze.

“The gospel truth — let fears be dismissed! All is arranged, and the wedding bells as it were already ring out! It is only a matter of days when you will see her with her ideal bridegroom, a young man as like a fairy prince as you can imagine — a poet! rich! handsome.”

“My goodness!” cried Martha, animated and laughing: “why couldn’t you tell me that before?”

“I had reasons—”

But now at once the worthy Martha fell into melancholy again, saying “Seeing is believing; I’m not going to pluck any more chickens before they’re hatched: we’ll wait and see.”

After this they went in silence down the path to the pavilion, till presently Martha said sleepily, with her head on Hartwell’s shoulder:

“Yes, you took away my few little jewels, didn’t you, when I came from Africa? and what have you given me since? this paltry necklet and four paltry rings—”

“Stop!” cried Hartwell: “you shall be well pleased.”

He had discovered that she had a fondness for jewels, and one day had gone to Cromer to buy her a few; he now determined to choose her himself a load of the brightest and best the next day in London, where he had also an appointment at the Home Office concerning the case of Oswald.

After dinner Martha played, usually, a few old-fashioned airs on the old piano, or they played cards, or he read to her, till she fell asleep. The surrounding forest, which was grand with many huge old trees, lay only a few steps away round the portico, and its sombre presence, never unfelt, at all hours pervaded the faded old house with some impression of mystery and enchantment; but this was deepest at night, and often Hartwell and Martha sat silently watching it in the portico all the evening till ten o'clock, hearing two nightingales which lived near to the house, and sang every night to the moonlight.

The morning following Martha's reproach to him for his meanness in the matter of jewels, Hartwell, after recommending her to the care of Sarah Gissing, started off for Felmingham and thence for London. But in the train he read a newspaper, and that day forgot Martha and the jewels, forgot where he was, awoke as from a dream when the train stopped; he had read in the newspaper a rumor, a gossip, that Julia was engaged to the heir-apparent of the hereditary Arch Duke P — of B — a "brilliant" young soldier in the Austrian army, three years younger than Julia.

Hartwell had seen the young prince at Vienna, and considered him a mere clockwork made of moustaches and spurs, who danced at state balls. Julia's marriage with him would be like the marriage of a peach with an artificial peach of cloth and stuffing; and Hartwell felt that he would hardly be able to live and see it.

He could not suspect Julia of ambition. Her motive for entering into such an engagement could only be resentment against him, unless it was brought about by the pressure of her relatives. In either case his pity for her and for himself now ached afresh in his breast, as if no days had passed since the breakdown of their hope.

Her resentment, her disdain: Hartwell had the thought that it might not be so deep, if she only knew, if with the secretest of whispers he went and whispered to her, "I have failed you because of a living wife: yet she is not my wife — Drayton is married — but I am not." Then she might think less ill of him — at present her mind was wholly without explanation of his conduct; she might even dare to give him a boundless forgiveness, and say:

“I will have you so;” and that would avert the Austrian tragedy.

But if he thus saved Julia and himself, he abandoned Martha: Martha was wronged again. At the stubborn fact of Martha, Hartwell groaned. He had vowed to himself that, while he was Drayton, Drayton’s wife should not be a wholly desolate widow. With the name and estate henceforth Hartwell took the burdens.

But how if he threw off the name and estate of Drayton entirely? — stood forth to the world as the penniless Hartwell, exposed to scorn and punishment? It could be done — given a courage such as did not at all belong to average man. Yet it could be done. To lose all, yet thereby lessen the disdain for him of one woman became Hartwell’s temptation. Martha would then be a widow like other widows, knowing that her husband was dead, and rich with his wealth, not a widow thinking that her husband was alive; and thinking herself abandoned by him; and Julia might even dare to say, with a boundless bosom, “I will have you so.”

But Hartwell could not face it absolutely naked. He had once been very poor, and to men who have once felt the stark nakedness of penury, it never quite ceases to be a motif of shame: he could not present himself as a wholly upstart beggar of the working-class. He thought that if he could slip off Drayton, and yet be a passably rich and respectable Hartwell, then he might dare. And now he remembered an electrical invention of his working-days which he had lacked the money to patent. He reconsidered and still found it a good thing, which is rare when one reconsiders old ideas, unless they are genuinely good. The sale of that invention might bring him in sixty, a hundred thousand pounds, honestly his own.

The first night in London he sat up till near morning drawing two plans of it in a warmth of new nope. Dulaunay, who had lately gone from his chateau in Upper Auvergne to spend a week with Julia at Cannes, was now again loitering in Addison Road; and he and Hartwell the next morning went together to the city, where Hartwell left one of the drawings at a model-maker's, the other one with a patent agent, and afterwards had two interviews with business men on the commercial aspects and floating of the invention.

Hartwell and the count then drove in a cab to the Home Office, Dulaunay not knowing why, for, having been abroad, he had heard nothing of Oswald's disgrace. At the office Hartwell learned that the revoking of Oswald's sentence was under the consideration of the secretary, but that, since Oswald had meant to steal some thing, his term would almost be up before the necessary machinery for his release could be got in motion. Hartwell, on rejoining Dulaunay in the cab to drive home, was again thinking of that letter which Oswald had meant to steal, and determined to see that day what the letter could contain; but again that day something prevented him, for as they turned westward into Cockspur Street en route for Addison Road, Dulaunay nudged Hartwell with the whisper "look," and Hartwell had a glimpse of Julia driving fast eastward in a landau with her eldest brother? Colonel Lord Forlong.

Hartwell had not known that she was in England (she had arrived in London the previous night); and on a pretence of work, he shut himself in the laboratory at Addison Road, sitting like a frowning statue with a bowed head in one position till near nine in the evening, when he suddenly went out in great haste, brushing aside Dulaunay who tried to speak to him at the foot of the stairs. Hartwell took a cab for Brook Street, driven by the uncontrollable impulse to see Julia, to tell her something, he had not decided what. But when he reached Kensington Gardens, he turned back, saying to himself: "Let this be the last;" and he determined to fly from any further temptation of the sort by returning to the country early on the morrow.

But he would not have found Julia in Brook Street if he had gone there; for when he had seen her that forenoon in the landau with her brother, she was driving to Liverpool Street in order to go down to Norfolk, and at about that hour of the evening when he was in the cab going to her, she and her brother were moving down an avenue in the Corton forest in a Felmingham basket-chaise. Julia had now come from the Continent, a month after the breakdown of her marriage, humbly enough to discover an explanation of Draytonism, for none so far was conceivable to her. He had said to her that evening in the rocca near Siena: "I am not married, that is the God's truth;" and Julia still had no doubt that the God's truth must be true.

Her brother's hand lay on hers in the chaise. They did not speak a word to each other.

There was not a breath of wind, the birds were asleep in the trees, the avenue was dark, save where, in bands and patches, moonlight lay on the mossy underfoot.

Lord Forlong drove. They assumed that they would come to somewhere, if they kept on, but they were not sure of the way: presently, however, they came to an alley on the left, at the end of which they could spy a glade in the wood; in the glade was a well, a woman sitting on it, a girl, and a dog — a scene of quiet moonlight and underwood; the dog was barking, and this attracted the attention of the two in the chaise; whereupon Julia, led by some instinct, as well as by the desire to learn the way, said to her brother: "Stop, I will go and ask."

She got out and walked to meet the woman, who had now risen from the well, and was coming to meet Julia.

“We want to come to Mr Drayton,” said Julia, when they met: “do you know in what direction he is to be found?”

For some seconds Martha could not answer; her breath was, as it were, so taken away by this astonishing womanhood with the dainty shoes, who was suddenly standing before and above her.

“You are going right,” said Martha finally, “but he isn’t here now, he went to London this morning.”

“That is disappointing, then. Is he gone for long? But perhaps you don’t know—”

“Well, of course I know, if he’s my husband. He’s only gone for the two days to buy me some jewels.”

While one might count three, there was a pause, a shock, and a silence; then Julia said with a sweet smile:

“That seems devoted.”

This simple remark loosed Martha’s tongue: her surprise at the patrician presence before her was now abated; and Martha could not let it be thought by anyone that James was devoted.

“Seems devoted is right,” said she: “to seem is one thing, and to be is another. It is only pretence, if you knew all. I’d say to you what I’d say to any woman younger than myself: never let a man get over you by his hypocrisies. It comes and it goes by fits and by starts, and the men are all the same.”

“Oh — but-when a man takes a train, he means business!”

“To tell you the truth, I take little notice of what he does mean,” replied Martha with an indifferent laugh, glad of someone new to talk to, and rushing at once, like a Boer-wife on the veldt, into gossipy familiarity with a perfect stranger of her own sex: “but after all, nobody can know a man but his own wife. He's one thing to the world, and another thing to her. If I were to tell you some of the things that that man has done to me—"

"Ah, no, better not."

"Oh, I am not going to screen him: how would you like to be locked up five years in an old tower?"

"Oh! I mustn't hear!" cried Julia, laughing, with a pretty movement of the palms towards her ears.

"And how would you like to have your child taken?"

"No, no, no, really, really, I mustn't hear!" laughed Julia animatedly, with comic, self-protecting gestures: "he's an awful friend of mine—"

"Oh, he is. That accounts, then—"

"Good-bye!" Julia put out her hand with sharp decision, and Martha had to take it.

"What name shall I say?" called Martha after her, as Julia walked away.

"No name. I may write to him."

With rather a stumble in her walk she went back to the chaise, got in and sat down with a sigh.

"Well?" asked her brother.

For a minute Julia did not answer. She sat with her chin supported on her palm and a gaze into the distance of her long-lashed eyes, in a posture habitual to her in pensive moments; and presently she said:

"That lady is his wife."

Nothing more was said. The chaise turned round, and drove away from Corton.

The brother and sister took train the same night for London. But the colonel found some pretext for accompanying Julia only as far as Norwich; she went on to London, but he returned northward toward Corton. He had a cane with him.

He slept at Felmingham that night, and the next afternoon at three o'clock sent a stable-boy to inquire who was at Corton.

At that very hour of three Hartwell and Dulaunay, just come from London, were driving down the forest lull from the ruin to the pavilion. Hartwell sat silent in the trap, wondering how he was to present Martha to the count. If he had really been a friend of Drayton's he might possibly have known that Drayton was married. He said presently:

"By the way, Dulaunay, do you recollect how long previous to my motor car accident our friendship began?"

Dulaunay bridled with a grimace.

"But, sir," he now said boldly, "you are droll! I have never of my life seen you before that night, when we met the one the other at the station of Liverpool Street."

"Ha! What, then, were you doing in my brougham, my friend?"

"But I had put myself there for the shelter from the rain!"

"I see, I see. But is it possible, sir, that you have enjoyed bed and board, salary and world-wide travel at my expense four years and a half without the least formal claim upon my purse?"

"But! — has not sir enjoyed my society in return?" cried the excellent Frenchman. "Devil! you are droll, "Drayton". How possibly did you think to know me that night, when you never saw me of your life before?"

"Let that remain unexplained, count, and do not puzzle your brains in vain," said Hartwell: "I had reasons. As for your society, certainly it has been worth the money, and, I sincerely hope, will not fail me now or henceforth. If we are not quits, I admit myself your debtor. But be that as it may. I am now, Dulaunay, about to present you to my wife."

"Your wife! but no!" went Dulaunay, in a maze at all the impossibilities which confronted him.

“Yes, sir.”

“But, sir,” said the Frenchman hotly, “permit me in that case to warn you frankly that your conduct to Lady Methwold excites the resentment of a man of honor.”

“Say nothing, my friend,” — Hartwell patted the count’s hand, his manner now much more elderly, sorrow-stricken, and humble than heretofore— “say nothing: you are not my judge; and He will take care that my sufferings are adequate.”

The carriage containing Hartwell and Dulaunay drew up between the Portico, and the statue of Pan, and there was Martha in her lounge under the portico, roused from sleep to an instant thought of her jewels.

She was duly presented to the count as Mrs Drayton, and before dinner poured into Dulaunay’s ears the whole story of her wrongs, the tower, the child. After dinner she strolled, glittering with the new diamonds, accompanied by Hartwell and the count, in the forest; they sat for a time on the old well between the last of the sunset and the pale risen moon; after which, as they were strolling again, Martha said to Hartwell:

“I forgot to tell you that two of your friends came to see you in a chaise last night. It’s little wonder you left me to follow those sort of women, they’re all so grand and fetching. Dear me, they do know how to get themselves up, and no mistake! I never saw such a creature, so tall, she seems to carry a wind with her that blows people away — But I’ve let her know pretty plainly how you’ve acted by me, James. Don’t think I’m going to screen you, for I’m not. I told her right out about the tower, and about taking that poor child away—”

Hartwell stopped still, with a face in which the deepest pain and shame were visible, for he guessed at once that “the tall creature” of whom Martha spoke must have been Julia.

“And there, I believe,” went on Martha, “comes the very gentleman that was with her.”

Hartwell, looking up, saw Colonel Lord Forlong coming down the avenue in which they stood, and quickly he whispered to Dulaunay: “Take her down that alley—” He himself then walked quickly to meet the colonel, while Dulaunay and Martha walked back toward the well. The colonel was a very tall man of forty, with a certain straddle of the legs in his walk; his chin was a mere aristocratic bone with a dent in the middle of it: he had cold grey eyes; and Hartwell’s eye flashed a little when he saw the expression of that face of the colonel.

They met at a spot where the faint light that was neither of day nor of night made a pattern through the leaves on the moss, for the day was done, but the night was only so far come that the bright colors of poppy, gorse, and tassels of the silver lime were going out in a monotony of shadow.

The two men stood face to face, and looked at each other.

“Well, Drayton, is it true you’re married?” asked the colonel, whipping his right leg.

“Yes, my lord.”

“How long since?”

“Oh, a long time.”

“Well, you escape with your life, Drayton; but you owe it only to the fact that we are Englishmen, more’s the pity for this once. On the continent a mad dog like you would certainly not be permitted to live. As it is, I’m sure I don’t know what to do with you, except flog you.”

The cane lifted.

“Ah, my friend, wait, wait,” said Hartwell quietly: “I see that your cane is slender, and my jacket is thick—”

In two sharp movements Hartwell had his jacket off and dropped to the ground; he then stood in his waistcoat and shirt-sleeves, with a slightly bowed head and hanging arms, waiting. He had on no hat; and his hair was now growing thin and grey.

Swish! the cane cut him on the head, with a flagrant brand all down the left cheek; the colonel concentrated into it all the rage of his arm, and struck as if to annihilate, with his lips nailed together; Hartwell just winked a little.

Again it came, cutting the left arm; and again, at the neck.

Once more the cane lifted — But Hartwell's hand now went up checkingly, and he said: "Enough — you are avenged:" nor was there any disobeying that almost fatherly mildness and authority; no further blow was struck; the colonel looked contemptuous, turned and strode away, more caned perhaps than caning; and still like a statue with a bent head Hartwell stood there with the wheal ablaze on his cheek, while a breath of wind stirred his hair; all the little birds, the reed-wrens and titlarks and thrushes, tweeted sleepily their last lingering good-nights in the nooks and cradles of their great dormitory, where the lights were going out: and the worthy Hartwell heard in these little voices a new tone that night.

But before the wheal on his face was quite faded, on the fourth day after his flogging in the avenue, strange new bitterness was raised in the cup of which Hartwell had to drink, for he received a letter from Julia, dated at Berlin — a long and rambling letter, which, though it said nothing in particular, and said it in a cynical one, was yet touched with a great despair; ostensibly the letter was only about the few presents which he had given her, but between the lines he saw her desolate, overtaken by trouble, she who had always fared prosperously through life and never known a great sorrow; he could picture her sitting by herself for hours, leaning forward with her chin on her palm, with an absent gaze of her long-lashed eyes, in a posture habitual to her in certain moods; and Hartwell asked himself as he read her letter, "Am I to suffer her to die?"

The whole letter showed to Hartwell that she suffered greatly. The temptation to see her, without any self-avowed object, now again assailed Hartwell, stronger than ever before. He spent half a day with her letter, hidden in the forest, reluctant to return to the house, lest he should put on a coat, and take a train to go to her; he felt that the power permanently to withstand this impulse was not in him; that he would surely go: that it was only a matter of time. On the other hand, to leave Martha desolate revolted him; he wished desperately to stand by Drayton's wife; and in this war-tug of motives his brow grew wrinkled with care and long deliberation.

If only the young Bobbie would bring the girl, Rosie, then Hartwell felt he might abandon Martha, and abandon her happy; each day he expected Bobbie anew, or at least, a letter: but Bobbie did not come, and did not write.

He returned toward evening to the pavilion on the day when he received Julia's letter, determined to bear and wait, but to despatch Dulaunay to seek Bobbie: and that very night Dulaunay started away from Corton on that quest.

XXIV. HARTWELL WAITS IN VAIN

IN ORDER TO see what evil effects had befallen the poor Bobbie Hartwell, that he did not write to his father, we must go back some weeks to a slumbrous June afternoon, when Bobbie was walking along a country road on which he might have imagined himself the only living being in the world, it was so lonely there though only two mites behind him lay Birdlip, a village in the mountainous part of Gloucestershire. Not a cloud was in the sky, and hardly a breath in the air: dust lay visibly on the wayside cowslips and buttercups; the poet was in undress, scarfed at the waist with something rare in silk with a Tyrolese hat on the back of his curls, but his light boots, unsuited to that climate, were growing hot; in his hand was a note-book, in which, as he went, he pencilled down every fugitive thought which occurred to him; in English elegiac verses.

After this he turned down into a shaded and secluded path, steep and rough with stones, where he met a flushed tourist toiling up, rolling his bicycle, proving that there was at least one other person besides Bobbie in England; Bobbie and the bicyclist even passed each other without any greeting, which they would hardly have done on a really desert island. At the bottom of the hill Bobbie saw an unpretentious but solid house a little to the left of the path; and he opened the gate, went up the garden walk, and rapped at the door. Here in this secluded dell was just where the Chancellor of the British Exchequer comes to bury himself when the House rises, though Bobbie did not know that; he asked a very neat young girl who answered to his rap whether by chance one Rose Drayton lived there; her glance at his pretty face was approving, and she smiled as she answered: No; my name is Rose, but not Drayton.” Did she by chance know the name of one Elizabeth Seward? “No,” she said.

They exchanged a smile as they parted, a Marconi kiss of their lips and eyes; then Bobbie went on his way on the same path which he had descended.

He went on up the path, till he came to an avenue of Spanish chestnuts, with a stile at each end; beyond the further stile was a wood on rough hilly ground; and into this wood Bobbie came. Here was a bit of true England. Bobbie’s heart was young: and, stopping over his notebook, he scribbled an appropriate verse.

But as Bobbie scribbled, he walked on, not looking where he was going to, and while scribbling the last word he was startled by a silvery voice which cried out:

“You’d better look out, sir!”

Bobbie did look out, and in doing so, saw a sweet girl of seventeen years, a mystery of muslin, roses, and a Dolly-Varden hat, standing beyond a stream into which he had been on the point of tumbling: and breathlessly Bobbie muttered under his breath: “By Jove, that’s rather a picture!”

“I am extremely obliged to you, he said aloud,” catching off his hat and they stood silent, she like an Etna of blushes, and he like Vesuvius. She had rumpled reddish hair, some freckles, the bluest eyes cast down, and seemed to him the sweetest loaf of of home-made that the collusion of that Gloucestershire sun and earth could ever have kneaded, baked, and turned out.

He suddenly remembered that he had a subject for talk ready-made, though the stream was not very narrow, and one had to lift one’s voice a little.

“I have to ask, if I may,” he said, unable to look directly at her, “whether you know a black-haired girl hereabouts called Rose Drayton?”

“No,” she answered, her eye resting aside on his silken girdle: “but, then, I know hardly anyone. My name happens to be Rose, but not Drayton; though I know that name, too, for my step-father was named Drayton.”

Bobbie hesitated a moment after this, and then remarked:

“One guesses your first name.”

“How does one?” asked Rosie, and there was something very shy, fresh, and wild about her, like the first snow-drop peeping through the grasses, shy, yet quite brave and unashamed.

“If you had not been called Rose,” answered the young poet, “roses would have craved a new name so as to be like you in all things.”

Rosie very gravely pondered that answer, and gravely she replied: “That doesn’t seem very serious talk.”

“It is absolutely serious talk,” replied Bobbie with considerable earnestness; “to express half that is in the heart, the tongue must often be content, to seem extravagant.”

“And what, then, sir, is in your heart, which makes you say that roses crave to be like me?” asked Rosie.

“Why, admiration of you and of roses.”

“It occurs to me to say that you admire me too quickly.”

“Not quickly at all,” protested Bobbie, “for I know you well, since you are in all the woods and on the hedges, being a rose, and I have plucked you and kissed you since I was a little chap.”

“I felt nothing of it, then,” said Rosie gravely, with a shaken head, tearing a rose to pieces.

“No,” explained Bobbie, “because I had to do only with copies of you before, and my kisses were cold; but now, you see, I have found the original of the roses.”

“It may be possible that you don’t mean quite so much as you say, sir — not that I suppose that you would say it otherwise.”

“The truth is, that I do not say so much as I mean. But am I permitted to come over to your side?”

“To mine?”

“Yes.”

“How could you?”

“Is there no bridge anywhere?”

“There is one up yonder, but it does not lead into these grounds. These grounds can only be got into by the gate in the front wall, and that is always kept locked.”

Two hedges, twenty yards apart, came down to the very brink of the stream at right angles with it — hedges yards thick, all bound up in bindweed and clematis; joining these two ran a similar hedge parallel with the stream, with a white gate in it; and in the space between the three hedges, the charming girl stood. Beyond the cross-hedge could be seen a neat red cottage, breathing an azure-grey smoke which no wind routed that day.

“Then, you are rather a prisoner,” said Bobbie.

“I am afraid I am, sir.”

“Shall I cross the bridge, up yonder, and go round to the gate?”

“You would not be allowed to come in.”

“Then I must only walk through the stream, if I may.”

“You?”

“Yes.”

“Ob. no! If I had kept indoors, you would not have wished to — I hardly know you yet—”

“But it is simple for you to know me instantly through and through,” said Bobbie. “As for my name, it is Robert Hartwell—”

“Then we have the selfsame initials to our name, sir!” cried Rosie with meeting palms: “for I am Rose Harper, and we are both R. H.!”

“Now isn’t that an odd thing?” said

Robbie, “and you are a Rose and I am a Robert, for Robert means the same thing as a Robber.”

Rosie cast a shy, pleased underglance at him, for instantly to the lively organs of her fancy he appeared in the light of a robber of old romance, adventurous to the death, and gallant.

“Is it not strange? It seems to me now that half-an-hour since I was just like those benighted savages that we send the gospel to, who never heard of the fullness of life, but that now I know and have everything. But — I will come over.”

“Oh! I don’t know why you wish to! Perhaps if you had never come—”

“But—”

“You would get wet.”

“I might: but what can that matter?”

“No! — I don’t know what to say to—”

“Then, trust to me.”

“Oh, I do! But why should you come to this side?”

“To hold your hand, and kneel, and kiss it, just once: then I will call you the dearest saint—”

“I am so certain that you will get wet — !”

“I think not,” and now Bobbie no longer hesitated, but went down the bank and waded to the knees through the stream to the other side; and there he knelt in the blossoming grasses, as he had said that he would, and kissed the little hand of Rosie, who looked down at him with the demurest and gravest eyes.

“Come, here, then,” slid said, suddenly brightening, and went before him to an inner corner of the orchard, where there was a slab of sandstone, supported askew on two low posts in the grasses under the shadow of two of the hedges and of an apple-tree; the rill flowed near it, and was at their feet when they sat on the slab.

“Well, I said that you would get wet,” remarked Rosie.

“One must cross Jordan to get into the Land of Promise,” answered Bobbie; “and I was not even aware that I was wet, till now you remind me; I rather thought that the waters had parted before me. Isn’t this a charming retreat in which you live? — so shaded, so cool, so full of trees and flowers; and you in it. Oh, I couldn’t tell you what this day and the chance it contained is to me! I never was half so much in luck’s way, I never was half so happy, and I do thank you for letting me be where you are. I think you live in Heaven. I wonder if I shall be able to come again, every day, for a long time, and just sit near you without saying a word, and be blessed?”

“I don’t know,” answered Rosie: “I hope so, since that would please you, but I am not free to do all I like. If we were seen now, I should be kept even more a prisoner than ever.”

“How a prisoner?”

“It has been so with me for five years,” she said, “I don’t know why. My mother brought me from South Africa when I was twelve years old, and since then I have been kept a kind of prisoner, for I am never allowed to go beyond the front gate, except to church on Sunday mornings, and then I am led by the hand like a child. My step-father, who was a terribly big man with a black beard, was very angry with my mother for coming from South Africa when they met in London, and—”

But at this point the interview was cut ruthlessly short, for Rosie started and turned pale, and Bobbie's eyes, following hers, saw a large, florid woman with her bare arms akimbo, standing at the white gate in the cross-hedge, watching them. Rosie got up in a scare to run to her, but understanding that this was the end of her episode, unless she was both bold and cunning, with the swift artfulness of her sex she turned back a little to Bobbie in the nick of time, and whispered to him: "I shall be watched now: don't come in the day, sir, but at night — when the clock strikes twelve—"

The caught miss then ran with light heels toward the woman, in a poetry of motion, as Bobbie thought, for he stood up to look after her flight among the fruit trees; he saw the woman seem to scold Rosie, though he could hear nothing, for the white gate was some distance away from the slab, and he also saw her shake her finger at himself; then she disappeared with Rosie a prisoner; and Bobbie sat again on the slab alone for a long time, a new-hatched chick fluttering in his boy's breast, and squalling with a wide bill after Rosie, its little mother, for food.

Bobbie scribbled in his note-book no more cynic elegiacs that day, finding Venus a "stern mother," not to be taken airily; that notion which his father entertained for some time soon after this date that the young man may have met with foul play was thus true in the sense that Bobbie was seriously wounded, not in the head with revolvers, but in the veins with an arrow. He forgot the smart Mayfair mood, he forgot his father's mission, nothing was important and fair to Bobbie but Rosie. Something of that affinity which Hartwell felt toward Martha for reasons which have been hinted at, undoubtedly made itself felt also between this son of Hartwell and this daughter of Martha. They met again that midnight, "when the clock struck twelve," as the romantic Rosie expressed the solemnity of that hour, and at the sandstone slab, where the ooze from the rill caused a growth of moss and violets between the stepping-stones, Bobbie knelt to her again, and prayed to her, "Tell me how to love you and thank you deeply enough for this deigning;" and Rosie answered gravely to this, "Does it seem to you so much that I come here to meet you, then, sir? It seems to me that the way would have need to be long and rough, but I should tramp all of it to meet you.

"Oh, immense of you to say it, really!" whispered Bobbie at her ear. "Greatly good and sweet of you! you love me, too."

"Well, I think that I love you, sir," answered Rosie in a low voice, while Bobbie felt her bosom struggle passionately like a captured wild-fowl upon his heart, "if this giving up of myself is loving."

They parted when the moon sank behind the west hedge, leaving the orchard in shadow; but the next night they met again. Bobbie then heard the little history of Rosie's life from the time when her stepfather had separated her from her mother in London, brought her to Gloucestershire, and committed her to the care of a woman, on the understanding that Rosie was never to speak to anyone, except to the lady who came thrice a week from Cheltenham to give the girl her schooling; Rosie had twice run away from her "Aunt," or keeper, but had been retaken, and since the failure of her second flight, had lived as shut away from the world as some fair Rosamond or damsel enchanted in a maze.

The lawless and robustious Drayton had in fact, locked away from the world the only two persons who knew that he was a married man, namely, his wife in the tower at Corton, and her daughter in this Gloucestershire nook, when they suddenly presented themselves before him in England, he just at that moment being on the heights of elation at Julia's astonishing consent to marry him.

While Rosie was telling her history to Bobbie, she happened to mention her “aunt” (i.e., her keeper) by the name “Miss Seward;” whereat Bobbie said, “Ah, if it were only Elizabeth Seward,” and to this Rosie replied, “Her name is Mary; there was an Elizabeth, my aunt’s sister, but she died years ago.”

On the whole, no shadow of a suspicion that here might be the very Rosie whom he was sent to seek occurred to Bobbie: for one Rosie was objectionable, had black hair, under sixteen, and named Drayton, the other was sweet, fair, seventeen, and named Harper.

They met four midnights in all, and sat on the sandstone slab by the rill in the shade of the hedges and the apple tree; and at the darkening of the moon Bobbie kissed her goodnight, waded back into the regions beyond Jordan, and trudged home to his inn at Birdlip, unconscious of his wet trousers and of all the length of that lonely walk: but on the fifth night when the excellent fellow waded back through Jordan, he waded with Rosie in his arms. A vehicle was waiting for them down in the glen, and they drove to Cheltenham.

And so it was that when Dulaunay, despatched by an agonised Hartwell, came down to hunt for Bobbie a month later, no trace of Bobbie could be found. Bobbie was a married Adonis, occupying an apartment in the Rue de Rome in Paris, and the charming Rosie was learning to conjugate the verb “aimer.”

Hartwell had said to Bobbie:

“Will you marry her whom I wish, or whom you wish?”

And Bobbie had replied:

“Whom you wish, sir, with pleasure.”

Hence Bobbie was in a quandary. Each Sunday night, on returning home with Rosie from some party or cafe, he resolved to make a clean breast of his marriage that week: but he always put it off, and after a month, still the more he delayed, the more ungrateful became the task. The truant boy had a profound awe of Hartwell, who, he felt, would be terribly outraged, and must, moreover, be in trouble on account of the mysterious miscarriage of his own marriage; and possessing, meantime, a substantial balance at his bankers, Bobbie still put off the day of accounts, forgetting the flight of time, or shutting his eyes to it, as people in such a state of mind always do. Finally, he determined that before writing the news of his marriage to Hartwell, he and Rosie would return to Gloucestershire, together seek out Rose Drayton, and with her as trophy and douceur, make their way, erring but still useful, to his guardian. The young husband and wife accordingly started back for England toward the end of September; but they could find no Rosie Drayton; soon gave up the search; and returned to Paris for a while.

XXV. HARTWELL MARRIES A WIFE

OSWALD DRAYTON'S IMPRISONMENT was shortened only two weeks by the Home Office, so that he did not get out until the middle of September. On the morning when he emerged from the Holloway gates, there was Hartwell and a carriage waiting to receive him, and Oswald said "You?" with a curl of the lips.

The old club-land life was rather over for Oswald now, for though some in that land do make short-cuts to fortune, and save time by stealing, between saving and serving time a distinction is made, the maxim being, as among the Spartans, "be not caught," or as in the fairy-tales, "the hand of the princess, if you do it well, beheadal, if you miscarry." Oswald, therefore, when Hartwell asked him and insisted, went down to stay at Corton.

"How did the wedding come off?" he asked in the train; and his mood of weary disgust was penetrated with astonishment when Hartwell replied:

"I did not marry Lady Methwold, Oswald."

This was amazement enough, but at Corton amazement after amazement awaited Oswald, first when Hartwell made the introduction: "My wife, Oswald — my brother, Martha;" then again, the same night, when Oswald met Barnes, with a paralysed right arm, and saw Hartwell cutting Barnes' meat for him. Hartwell, after an elaborate search, had finally unearthed Barnes in a wayside alms house near Northrepps, and, almost by force, had brought the afflicted inn-keeper to Corton. During the day Barnes was under the care of Mrs Gissing in one of the two chalk cottages, but he dined every night at the pavilion with the gentry: and though he still dumbly scowled at the supposed slayer of his daughter, that constant frown was growing day by day less fierce.

But still greater was Oswald's astonishment to meet the next day a woodman felling trees, with a beard grown back from the chin, who, when asked his name, said: "Gissing."

Oswald's cigar brightened and burned quicker.

"Was it you, Gissing?" he asked, "who once lived with a wife and daughter in a cottage called the old Manor Farm, near Overstrand?"

"It wor, sir," said Gissing.

"Then, where have you been?"

"Been out to Hong Kong."

"What on earth for?"

"Seeking a bit o' work, sir; seeking a bit o' work."

Oswald threw out a breath of pleased laughter. Gissing, at any rate, was now here; and Gissing, his wife, or his daughter would furnish quite as good proof that Drayton had known Letty Barnes as the shreds of Letty's letter which Oswald had tried in vain to steal.

But for some days, Oswald's amazement was so engaged in watching what seemed the dementia of Hartwell, that he did nothing with regard to the Gissings: for a rapid series of events had caught Hartwell, as it were, in a whirlwind, and hurried him into action the most outre, as we shall now see.

The first of these events was the definite news, on the day after Oswald's release from prison, that Julia was really affianced to the young prince of the archducal house of M —— ; it was no longer a mere rumor, but was soon the chatter of society over Europe; for this high marriage of a subject with a prince, of course, could only be solemnised by a special dispensation of the Emperor. Even the date was now fixed for the February of the coming year.

Hartwell's eye flashed with the old vigor as he read it in his study at Corton, and, pacing rather wildly, he thought to himself, "Ah, she'd leave them all for me, if I only go to her. She'd leave them all for me; and I I know that I shall go, too."

Hartwell's temptation to go to Julia was strong that day: for Julia happened to be near him in London, whither she had just returned from somewhere in Warwickshire.

But he decided to sleep, or rather to go to bed, upon it, and as the next morning the same evil mind possessed him, he began to make arrangements to go to her, not leaving his room meanwhile, nor allowing himself to see Martha.

But at eleven o'clock Dulaunay arrived suddenly with the news that neither Bobbie nor Rosie could be found in all Gloucestershire after three weeks' search by himself and a hired agent: and at this disaster Hartwell bowed his head.

Martha was every day growing more insistent for the promised appearing of Rosie and the "fairy prince."

And that same afternoon that Dulaunay came back to Corton a letter with the Birdlip postmark reached Hartwell, through London, from one Mary Seward, who said:

"I have to tell you, sir, the sad news that your Rosie has disappeared from the house, no one knows where to, though it is supposed to be with a young gentleman whom I saw in the orchard with her one day two months and a half ago. Five mornings after this she was missed, her bed had not been slept in, and Britton, the stableman at West Bridge House, says that one foreday he drove her and a young gentleman, who had hired a carriage at West Bridge to Cheltenham. I should have written you this sad news long before, sir, but to tell the truth, I was afraid you would say it was my fault, which, God knows, it was not, and besides I did not despair of finding the child. I hope you won't put the blame upon me, or won't think much harm of it because I did not write to tell you of the death of my sister Elizabeth four years since, as I am a poor woman, and did not know but what you might be taking the child from me and giving her to someone else, my sister being dead. I have drawn the bank money in her name, and that, I know, was wrong, but I hope, etc., etc."

A long rigmarole followed this.

Rosie, then, was gone; Bobbie, too, by the way, was gone; and Hartwell's mind, numb with its constant care, did not once conceive that Rosie and Bobbie may have gone in the same boat.

Hartwell had embarked on the grim task of "acting well:" he wished to stick to the wronged and bereaved Martha. If he abandoned Drayton's wife, he now felt that he must publicly abandon Drayton's name and estate also, much as these had become part of himself by old possession. That abandonment, too, of name and estate could be made, should be made, if only he would not be left quite nakedly poor: and that day when he received the news that Rosie had run away, he telegraphed to Birmingham to know definitely the date of the trial of his electrical invention.

After several failures he had got an efficient working-model of it, though a certain bird of ill-omen, an expert, had predicted a breakdown when the trial on the large scale should come to be made. However, the thing was being installed, and was to be tested before a board of experts that year: but the answer to his telegram that day was that the trial could hardly take place before the end of November.

That was two months away, and seemed two ages.

He felt that long before then, still retaining the name and estate of Drayton, he would abandon Drayton's wife, who was not his wife, in order to go to her, whom he loved; he felt that nothing could save him from this — unless he married Martha before witnesses who knew him well. And within five days after hearing anew of the engagement of Julia and of the loss of Rosie, he had, in fact, become Martha's legal husband.

He had taken Martha's hand two evenings after hearing of the loss of Rosie, as he and Martha were sitting on the well in the glade at sunset, and he had said to her:

“Martha, I have to make a painful confession to you, and to ask you for what, I think, will not be denied me — your sympathy and help. I am at present, Martha, in the pangs of a really serious temptation, the temptation to abandon you again, as I abandoned you before—”

“Then, why don't you?” cried Martha. “I want none of you, so don't think it! Go — go — don't you stay for me.”

“No! by your side I stay — And do not be angry that I am even tempted, Martha, but let me be pitied, let me be helped. The temptation, I say, is not slight, and without support I must needs succumb to it, in spite of my sincere affection for you. And since I feel that this support would be furnished me, if I marry you afresh?”

“Marry who afresh?”

“Marry you, Martha.”

Oh! the excellent Martha clapped her two hands to her sides! pierced and twisting with sudden, high laughter.

“Oh, this is rich!” she laughed. “Why, what’s the matter with the man? people will say I’m gone crazy or turned spooney in my old age! a man of your age having these harum-scarum larks running through your head! You ought to be ashamed for your grey hairs—”

“I am delighted to have made you merry,” said Hartwell, with a smiling eye, “which you too seldom are, Martha. My decision, however, in this matter is fully formed, and cannot be laughed away. The day after tomorrow we take a picnic to Norwich, and there we will be married before a Registrar, you giving your self as a widow, and I as a widower—”

“But what’s the matter with him?” she cried. “Think of my doing such a ridiculous thing as that-my own lawful husband! This is only some new move!”

“No! no new move. Say nothing, but listen to me, since I work, not for myself, but for you. I am a new man to you of late — admit that, Martha and though never again can those closest relations which once existed between us be renewed, let a new binding be effected since there are reasons which suggest it. As to the assumption of people’ that you were not married before, only Oswald and the count will know of the new marriage, and whatever they may tacitly assume will not, I think, much trouble you or me.”

In the end her merriment died wearily out, and two days later, the party of four, Hartwell, Martha, Oswald, and Dulaunay, went to Norwich, a special licence having been procured. Hartwell was particularly careful that Oswald, whom he believed to be still his enemy, should be there to see, so that no evasion of the bond might ever be possible to him; and with grim lips and a bright eye, wantonly throwing away his life, he went through that ceremony. Oswald stood agape with mere wonderment at this rite in the Registrar's room; Dulaunay was like a machine made to mutter to itself a periodic "mon Dieu," but done before their eyes that strange deed was.

Like people with a weakness for the bottle, Hartwell had "signed the pledge," never more now to leave tea for wine, or Martha for Julia.

XXVI. HARTWELL SENDS DULAUNAY

AUTUMN BURNED WITH slow combustion within the forest; “the season of mists and mellow fruitfulness” passed into chilly October, stripping the trees of their leaves, and turning the brackens brown; but still Oswald Drayton could not reach the end which he strove after.

From the first Gissing proved intractable, could not for the life of him remember ever to have seen the master and any young lady at Overstrand. “But, my good sir, I understand that they stayed a week with you,” said Oswald. “Not with me, master, not with me,” said Gissing, washing his hands of all knowledge of the matter, whispering of it sparingly even to his good woman in the dark nights on their bed.

“But you saw my man, Walker? You told him so?” said Oswald; and Gissing thought to himself: “If Walker was his man, that only proves that he don’t wish no good to the master. Lord be praised, I ain’t let out aught.” He denied that he had ever seen Walker, cleaned himself of the whole matter, as one picks burrs from the clothes: for in this old man’s bosom was now a deep-seated fear, reverence and gratitude for Hartwell.

Oswald, in his slow way, set himself to the siege of Gissing. He would stroll out in the mornings after breakfast through the forest and home coverts in the direction where Gissing, alone or with Anderson, was engaged in trimming, clearing, felling or making solid huts of dry twigs, and he would enter into leisurely chats about the winter prospects, the harvest, the weather, east-coast fishing, mould and bone dressing, Hong Kong, or how the birds were. Gissing could talk with considerable information, and even as he worked on, let his tongue run freely, but when it came to be a question of his two lodgers of live years before, he shrank like the sensitive plant, and lost his memory.

One evening, at the end of October, on returning home to his chalk cottage, whom should Gissing meet but Oswald. At a table covered with a clean, coarse cloth, on which were shrimps, water-cress and bread and butter, sat Oswald drinking tea out of a delf cup, and Mrs Gissing acting as the hostess. On the bench under the ivied lattice window, through which the very last beams of the sunset shone, sat Barnes, leaning forward with his left elbow on his left knee, all his paralysed right side seeming to hang behind, as if reluctant to follow the lead of the left: and there was a curious eagerness in his eyes, as if what had been said between Oswald and Mrs Gissing interested Barnes.

“Good evening to you, sir,” said Gissing to Oswald, “this is an honor, I’m sure. But you’re having a late tea; it must be nigh the dinner hour at the big house.”

“Yes,” answered Oswald, “you had better take Barnes round now.” (Barnes always dined at the pavilion with Hartwell).

Gissing laid his axe and spade in a corner, saying with a certain tone of irony in his voice: “Come along then, Mister Barnes, come along” and he directed a look of warning toward his wife.

Barnes was now almost like a child, enfeebled in mind as well as body, and always meekly obeyed whatever was told him. He rose, took Gissing’s arm, and went with a trailing right leg down the two broken doorsteps, and through the woods. As Gissing disappeared, he shot one more meaning look at his wife.

Oswald lit a cigar, while Mrs Gissing, a large clean-faced country woman, moved round the table, making a rattle with the crockery, looking flushed and uncomfortable, for she could not prevaricate reposefully, and the questions already asked before the entrance of Gissing had flustered her. Such a visit, however, as she was now undergoing had been foreseen in the household, and her proper course of conduct in such a case had been frequently discussed between her and Gissing.

“So, then, you do not wish to tell me,” said Oswald. .

“Oh, dear! it ain’t that I don’t wish to,” she answered, sitting with an averted face, her arms rolled in her gingham apron, “but you know yourself that it happened five years ago?”

“That what happened five years ago?”

“Why, what you’re after hearing about, I should think! You want to know if ever I saw master with a lady — is that it? or if ever they lodged with us on the farm. I think that’s it. And I say it’s too long ago for a body to call to mind—”

“You admit, however, that it did happen.”

“Me? Admit? Oh, sir, don’t say that o’ me, sir! I declare he’d put a saint out — ! No, sir, it’s the last thing I’d do — admit. There were people always comin’ and goin’ at the Old Manor Farm, and how is it likely I’d call to mind what you say yourself happened five years ago? No, dunnot say that o’ me, sir.”

“But Mr Drayton’s face is one that one remembers. Be frank with me: he is my brother, you know, little as he looks it, and you may be sure that I have a good reason, for his sake, for wishing to know. Surely you remember seeing him somewhere before he brought you here?”

“I cannot say that I call it to mind.”

“Then, how came you here?”

“He wanted a hand on the land.”

“Hand on the land — How came Gissing to go to China of all places?”

“Better ask him that himself, sir.”

“You tell me.”

“Seeking a bit o’ work, sir, seeking a bit o’ work.”

“Preposterous nonsense! He has bribed you all well, hasn’t he?” muttered Oswald, rising with a flush of spite, envy, and defeat all over his shining head, while Mrs Gissing, catching the word “bribe,” said sharply:

“We ain’t received any bribe from master, sir, so don’t think that. Gissing ‘ud lay down his life any day for master, I do believe, without that, and so’d I, if it came to that, and so’d our Sarah, I’m sure. It ain’t any bribe that you, or he either, could give us that ‘ud buy what he’s gotten o’ us, and that’s gratitude and love o’ the heart: — and that’s why, sir.”

“You mean that’s why you wallow in lies?” said Oswald, flushed with envy and jealousy: “how has he got from you this infernal love o’ the heart? The man must have bewitched you, my good woman!”

“Ey, he’s a decent lot, the master!” said Mrs Gissing half to herself, with a jerk of the head.

“And little Sarah is in the conspiracy of silence, too, is she?” muttered Oswald, going out: “we shall see into that. It is their own fault—”

He decided to get the truth from Sarah. But he walked to the pavilion with a feeling of misgiving: for he had said too much to Mrs Gissing, had openly showed enmity against Hartwell, and there was the possibility that the Gissings might conceive the idea of accusing him to Hartwell, who, for the present was his protector against the world. He resolved, therefore, to hurry matters with regard to Sarah.

On Friday nights — and this was one — whist parties had become an institution at the pavilion. Martha, like many old-fashioned people, had no small skill (of a technical, hand-and-fast sort) in the conduct of her hand, and, with Hartwell for her partner, generally won her rubber, though Oswald and Dulaunay made a strong combination against them. As this was the only item in their life at Corton in which Martha displayed the least interest, the count made it a point always to be present, even if he was away during the earlier part of the day.

That Friday night, accordingly, the party of four sat in the room which was used as the drawing-room, a large, quaint apartment on the ground floor, looking through French windows upon two lengths of the portico.

Of the four only the count chattered and “made to laugh,” or rather made to smile in the case of Hartwell, for Martha did not find him amusing after the first few days, when his foreign being had ceased to excite her surprise at an undreamt-of-type. As for Oswald, he had lost his smile in Holloway, and sat saturnine, silent, prim, his handkerchief-corner stuck neatly, from the pocket of his snuff-colored coat; now he largely handled his moustache, now made a sound of lassitude or contempt of life with a corner of his mouth; and his eyes remained fixed on the cards, save when he let them rest a moment on Hartwell with an evil glance. The Frenchman he regarded with the vague contempt which he felt for whatever is more intelligent, bright and worldly than Pall Mall, and anon his lips curved slightly downward at the mere sound of Dulaunay’s chatter. The count was telling an adventure which had happened to him near Buda-Pesth with an attaman of zincali, and had got to where the gipsy’s daughter won his heart, when Sarah Gissing, about ten o’clock — for the sitting-up was late on whist-party nights — brought in two decanters, curious old cut-glass vessels with “port” and “sherry” marked on bands of old gold round their necks, and laid them on the table together with cake and biscuits; and with her came the retriever, Mascotte, a recent purchase of the count, which laid its neck on Hartwell’s thigh, and awaited a caress.

Sarah had just returned from taking Barnes to her parents' cottage, and perhaps in consequence of a sharp walk back through the wood, was already rather flushed: but this flush deepened to the deepest carmine in that moment while she stood at the table. Hartwell saw it — could hardly fail to see it — and divined that the count had touched her foot with his under the small table. But this time Dulaunay was innocent. The culprit was Oswald.

Sarah was a slight girl whose rustic simplicity one might compare to the rabbit's, in spite of her nearly five years of exile in Birmingham. She was rather pretty, though thin, and though her eyes had a rather silly stare of preoccupation or flurry, and her upper-lip only closed with effort, at all events, sufficient had passed between her and Oswald in the way of gallant patronage on his side to leave her in no doubt as to who had touched her foot, and she blushed with that virgin excess, to the roots of her hair, to the tips of her toes, a redundant flood, which is possible any longer only to the rustic in these islands.

That betraying blush was seen not only by Hartwell but by Dulaunay, who muttered to himself: "But hold, she knows to blush, that girl there!" and Sarah put down the tray with such a clatter, that Martha looked up with a suspended card, flaying, "My goodness, what is the matter with Sarah?"

During three days after that night, Oswald's intrigue with Sarah progressed apace, but into its progress it is needless to enter, since it did not advance far, for on the third evening old Gissing, returning homewards from some forest work, which lay in a different direction from his usual haunts, spied Oswald and Sarah through some bushes standing under a tree, Sarah's head bent and smiling, and Oswald's forefinger under her chin. The old man's lips set wilfully, and he called out: "Here, Sarah, I want you! — excuse me, sir."

The girl at once followed him to the cottage; no word was spoken; even on going in, Gissing said nothing to her, except with his eyes; but he took Mrs Gissing into an inner room, and there held a family council. The task of giving a piece of the family mind to Sarah was left to Mrs Gissing, and she gave it without stint, and Sarah was soon in a state of tears and filial resentment. The altercation raged for an hour, while Gissing merely paced and looked on, as Napoleon from a hill surveyed the drama of Waterloo, expressing only with his eyes his scorn and indignation.

And that night Martha and the household at the pavilion awaited Sarah in vain: for Sarah, though now a woman of twenty-two, was kept a prisoner in the cottage.

The next morning at ten, while Martha was sitting out on the well, enjoying the 'Indian summer' with a novelette in her hand, and Oswald and Dulaunay had gone out with Steve, the three dogs, and double barrels, Gissing stood at the door of Hartwell's impromptu laboratory and study. It was a small room at a back corner of the pavilion on the upper floor, hung on three sides with rugged arras, while on the fourth were some new shelves, a new table, a new installation of gas and water, with a crowd of glass objects, and the odds and ends of the apparatus of research. Hartwell sat on an old oak chair at an old desk with a pen in his hand, but with his brow on the desk, as Gissing could see through the half-open door.

Gissing cleared his throat, and Hartwell lifted his head, staring a moment without seeming to see anything.

"Come in, Gissing — What, then, has become of Sarah?" he said.

He shook the old man's hand with a long shake and a meaningful pressure. There was only one chair, so Gissing stood, holding his hat with both hands.

“It’s her I come to talk about,” said he. “I come to tell you that I don’t want her to come back here no more. My good woman is sending her down Overstrand way to stop with a friend for a time.”

Hartwell looked at him with a smiling eye, remembering Sarah’s blush; and he said:

“You shall be well pleased. Do not send her away. I will speak with the count.”

“It ain’t the count; it’s your brother, Mr Oswald.”

“Ah? Out of the dry cometh forth sweetness. Well, then, Mr Oswald must be reasoned with.”

Gissing was silent and scratched his head, seeking for expression.

“Look you here,” he said, presently, “you’ve done everything for me, haven’t you?”

“Except what I have done against you, my friend,” said Hartwell in a lower voice.

“Ey, A’ forget that, A’ forget that there! — I give it all back to ye with love and brotherly feeling. You’re a hard man, and what you once set your mind to it’s got to be done; but for every kick that ye gave to me and mine, you’ve given me a kiss for it, when we was helpless, too, and ye didn’t need to, save out o’ the love and kindness o’ your heart — God bless you, good luck to you!”

The back of the old man’s rude hand slowly wiped a tear from his eye.

“Gissing, I see that I must call you a Christian,” said Hartwell, “blessing them that have cursed you.”

“There worn’t no cursing,” said Gissing; “what you did to me, it wor my own fault, after all, trying to get money.”

“No! it was my fault: as to that let doubt be now dismissed, Gissing. What, however, has this to do with Mr Oswald’s gallantries toward Sarah?”

“That’s why I come to you, to tell you that it ain’t Sarah he’s after, not for herself, but it’s the secret that he’d be winning of her.”

“Which secret?”

“Why about you and the young lady that stopped at the Manor Farm.”

Hartwell pondered that: Oswald wished to know about that.

Gissing brought his lips nearer to Hartwell’s ear, saying in a secret voice:

“The youngster, Walker, that come at the first to the farm five year ago, seeking to ferret out about you and the young lady, he was Mr Oswald’s man! and Mr Oswald has been after me and the good woman, too, of late, seekin’ to make us own up to it, and seein’ as we wouldn’t, now he’s for pumping of Sarah. So you’d better be on your guard.”

“I will. Is that all you have to tell?”

“That’s all.”

“Do not send the girl away. Good bye.”

“Good-bye.”

“And my thanks, Gissing!”

“That’s all right between us.”

The old man went away, and Hartwell, rising, paced the room.

What he now clearly saw was that Drayton must have done some very serious wrong to this unknown girl; the fact that for five years Oswald had been seeking a witness of Drayton’s and the girl’s acquaintanceship proved this, as did also the fact that Oswald, a poor man, had originally offered Gissing so large a bribe as £200 to bear witness against Drayton.

Where, then, was the girl? what was her name? In all that time could Oswald not find her? Was she dead? What had Drayton done to her? Had he — ? Hartwell shrank from a terrible question which presented itself to his mind. If he had now remembered Oswald’s interest in the murder of one Letty “Barton,” and his own reasonings about that murder, and if he had connected this memory with Drayton and the girl seen by Gissing, the truth must have dawned upon him that Letty "Barton" was really a girl done to death by Drayton. But he did not think of that. A foreboding of calamity, however, a definite expression of spirits, took possession of him; he understood that here was a question of life and death.

And now his mind naturally recurred to the shreds of the letter which Oswald had tried, and failed, to steal: for since Oswald was so earnest in the matter of Drayton and the girl, it might well be that those shreds related to the same matter. By what series of chances, he, Hartwell, had not even now read those shreds he did not know; but he resolved to read them at once.

He resolved also to let Oswald know that his unbrotherly hostility was no secret, and that he was-disposed to resent it.

He waited till lunch-time, and while the three men and Martha were at table, with Sarah serving, he said to Dulaunay: "Count, I have to beg you to take a trip to London for me by the 2.21 train, if you will. It is a question of opening a wardrobe in my bedroom in Addison-Road with this key and searching something among the pockets of the coats in the left hand compartment, till you find an envelope containing some shreds of paper: these I want to examine at once. Will you do this for me?"

Handing the key to Dulaunay, he fixed a look upon Oswald, who became red and then white. Hartwell had not "an eye like Mars' to threaten and command," but he had an eye like Ulysses' to threaten while it smiled, an eye teeming with magnetic influence, which Oswald felt, but which, unfortunately, could not terrify the Power which arranges the course of events.

As they moved away from the table after lunch, he said close to Oswald's ear, "I desire you, Oswald, to have no further talk with Sarah Gissing."

Oswald made no reply, he had no time; he understood that the order was final; and taking his hat from the hall, he went out walking alone in the paths of the forest, with a bosom in which boiled all the poisons of rage, hatred, a sense of weakness and thwarted effort, humiliation and belittlement, shame and care. Hartwell had given him the command in the tone in which one checks a naughty schoolboy; and with Oswald's other bitterness was mingled the bitterness of an enforced change of opinion, a revolution of theory held through a life-time: for whereas since boyhood he had despised "James," Oswald now found that willy-nilly he revered "James," and suspected that he himself was despised, and rightly despised, by that "James" whom he had despised, and had believed that he had rightly despised. He had, therefore, to endure the constant whisper of his consciousness: "You have been a fool in a club, and nothing that you or Pall Mall ever thought was true;" and this added to the other shames and rages of Oswald.

XXVII. THE SHREDS

MEANTIME, DULAUNAY WAS getting ready to set out by the 2.21 p.m. train. So small an incident as a trip to London, which could not excite the most excitable of Britons, was an event to the count, brought a light to his eyes, and formed, when it was over, the subject of a detailed narrative in his journal. He came down drawing on his gloves, in a frilled shirt-front, and a large hat somewhat cocked aside, said a formal good-bye to Hartwell and Martha in the portico, promised to be back by eleven p.m., and, as the trap was not ready, went in a heat and hurry to the stables, though there was no need for haste. He waited in the stable-yard, a small quadrangle of red-brick in the heart of the forest behind the pavilion, and hurried the young groom, who was called Gloucester, in harnessing one of the two horses which were kept at Corton. Gloucester then put on another jacket, and they set off.

But in the second avenue from the stables, a stoppage occurred: for, in passing Oswald, Dulaunay waved a good-bye, and, as if this action had inspired Oswald with the devil in the shape of a sudden thought, he called out when the trap had passed six yards beyond him: "Hi! I think I'll go with you—"

The trap stopped, Gloucester got out and sat on the drop-seat behind, and Oswald drove to the station, where they took the train for London, bidding Gloucester be there for them with the trap at 10.45.

Oswald could hardly have explained to himself this sudden impulse to go to London: he had no definite object; a moment before he had seen the trap in the avenue he had had no thought of going from Corton; but precisely like an inspiration it had entered his head, and there he was in the train.

It must be that the brain works independently of one's will, as in dreams perhaps. Oswald's consciousness had contained in it the fact that the count was going to bring those shreds of Letty's letter, so long coveted, so greedily coveted by him; and his brain must on a sudden, as a trap passed him, have evolved the conclusion that it might possibly be as well if he were near Dulaunay during the next hours.

During that journey to London some strange mists of thought floated through Oswald's mind — thoughts of chloroform, of knocks on the head, and main force. He saw himself holding a saturated handkerchief to Dulaunay's face on the journey back to Corton, or inflicting a blow with the head of his stick, or wrestling with the Count in panting agony for the shreds of Letty Barnes' letter. All the way such visions infested his spirit, even as he smoked and chatted. But he knew that they were visions and nothing more: Oswald was not made for such deeds; the most that he could do was to conceive them, and be guilty of them in will. So much was no different in action from his dead brother, James.

When they arrived it was not far from dinner-time, and not expecting much in that way at Addison Road, they walked down the Strand and dined in an underground club of Dulaunay's. There they took a cab for Kensington, and, arriving there, were welcomed by Miss Scatchett, who said to them in the inner hall with a certain smirk of mystery:

"You are just too late, gentlemen, to meet the young married couple: they had an early dinner, and left twenty minutes since for Corton."

"Which young married couple?" asked Oswald.

"Why, Mr and Mrs Hartwell," answered Miss Scatchett, with the same smirk of mystery.

Silence fell, while the minds of Oswald and Dulaunay digested the words. Dulaunay's eyes travelled quickly to and fro between Oswald and Miss Scatchett.

"But hold," said he, "is it Bobbie that she wishes to say?"

"Yes, sir, Mr Bobbie Hartwell!"

"Is Bobbie, then, married?"

"To as charming a bride as you could desire to see! I almost imagined that you would know by this time, though I understood from Mrs Bobbie that there is some difficulty. He was extremely nervous about going down, but I have not the least doubt, as I told him, that all will be well, if he allows his bride to plead his cause. She really is charming — rustic as a wood-nymph, yet quite well-bred — in short, charming."

"Well, I was never so astonished," cried the Count; "that lost Bobbie married! This, then, explains his long absence and silence, Oswald: he had fear of what 'Draytong' might say. And now at last he returns married. It is as though the 'Prodigal Son,' returned to his father with a lady on his arm, followed by a valet and a chamber-woman — Have they attendants, Miss?"

"Oh, yes," said Miss Scatchett, "a man and a French maid, of whom the man remains here and the maid has gone with them. They came direct from Paris, intending to stay here only a few hours before proceeding to Corton, but they stayed three days, hesitating to face Mr Drayton. I understood in private from the bride that Mr Bobbie had been intended by his guardian for someone else, and hence the trouble. What makes the history delightfully romantic is that Mr Bobbie appears to have been somehow despatched into the country to 'seek' the lady who was intended for him — 'seek' is the word that was used — and while seeking her, he found the actual Mrs Bobbie all too charming to be resisted, and—"

“It is so, then: Bobbie is married!” exclaimed Dulaunay, with a buffoon laugh; then seriously: “I fear that “Draytong” will not be disposed to show himself content there.”

“Serves the clown right,” muttered Oswald, “this may check his zeal in going about adopting strange boys.”

“Well, so much for Mr Bobbie and his sweet bride!” said Miss Scatchett. “But you, gentlemen, have you dined?”

“Yes,” said Dulaunay, “we are not here but for a few minutes, to get some papers from Mr “Draytong’s” wardrobe, so we will not need to give you any trouble. That would have been interesting, Oswald, to witness the reception which “Draytong” gives to the two young married! but they will be at Corton by ten, an hour before we arrive there.”

Little Miss Scatchett now rushed off in those brown silks which were part of her personality, and the two men moved into the morning room, where Dulaunay half sat on the table, his mind all occupied still with the marriage of Bobbie, while Oswald threw himself on a couch, palish and inwardly agitated at the thought that those shreds of Letty’s letter, which he had so longed for, were about to be brought out from their secret place. The disgrace and ruin which his attempt to get them had cost him only made them the more infinitely an object of his greed; and they were about to be carried carelessly in Dulaunay’s pocket! yet Oswald’s goaded brain could invent no means of touching them.

Dulaunay’s tongue still kept on running on the subject of Bobbie’s marriage, saying:

““Draytong’ will assuredly be very angry, I know it. He was most eager that Bobbie should marry Rosie whom he sent him to seek, and I believe it was the failure of Bobbie to return with her which pushed him to the marriage with Martha.”

“But who the deuce is the ‘Rosie’ whom he sent Bobbie to ‘seek?’” asked Oswald, reclining with his hat over his brows: “what is it all about?”

“Have I not explained it to you? Rosie is the good Martha’s daughter—”

“My dear sir, I take, of course, no interest in the family-tree of the good Martha,” said Oswald with that half yawn of indifference which men make when they are secretly agitated, “but how on earth came this ‘Rosie’ to need any ‘seeking’? There seems to be a very absurd tangle somewhere.”

“But have you not heard the good Martha recount her history?”

“I may have,” answered Oswald: “but one does not give oneself the pains of storing up the gabble of low women like this good Martha. I find the creature very offensive.”

“But no, she is not offensive! at least I do not find her it! What would you have? the average of humanity is not sublime, my friend. At any rate, Martha has recounted me that the Rosie whom Bobbie and then I were sent to seek is a daughter by her first marriage, her first husband’s name being Harper, so that Rosie’s name is Rose Harper. But here is that which is odd! that “Draytong” was apparently ignorant of that fact, until I myself told him! for he sent both me and Bobbie to seek this Rosie Harper in the name of Rosie “Draytong”! What can be more singular, my friend?”

“Oh, the man’s mad,” said Oswald.

“Or is it not rather Martha whose mind is not of the strongest?” asked the Count with perplexed brows: “it is certain that she has made me statements which cannot be credited. She has said to me, for instance, with insistence, that she and “Draytong” were really married before the ceremony which you and I witnessed at Norwich. This surely is among the things which do not permit themselves to be believed! — that a man should remarry his own wife. The truth must be that “Draytong” and Martha were together before marriage, and only married when we saw them marry at Norwich. And yet — strange circumstance! “Draytong” himself, on the day when I was about to see Martha for the first time, said:—‘I am about to present you, Dulaunay, to my wife.’ Moreover, “Draytong” once long ago told the Lady Julia that he was married. Does not all this confirm that which Martha says, that she was legally married to “Draytong” long years before the ceremony which we witnessed at Norwich? Only, it is not credible! One does not remarry one’s wife at any cost. If one commits the bigamy it is always with a third person. And yet, if “Draytong” was not already married, what possible power could have caused him to abandon the marriage with his beloved Julia? mon Dieu, I understand nothing, nothing, there!”

Dulaunay’s two hands rose toward his head, as if inclined to tear out his hair in an access of puzzlement. Oswald, too, who understood nothing there, made a sound of contempt with his lips, saying: “Queer people ought to be put into asylums. I have long since ceased to puzzle out the vagaries of my excellent brother and his distinguished wife. But very likely they were married before. I have heard the woman say that she is from South Africa, and the man was there a long time in his youth, I believe.”

“But, if they were married before, what, then, could be the motive of a second marriage? It is not conceivable!”

“Heaven knows. I don’t care. Better go and get the shreds of paper he sent you here for—”

“But hold — you say that “Draytong” was in South Africa in his youth? But no; there, I think, you are mistaken: for I remember distinctly that Drayton said to me, when we were discussing a voyage to South Africa in the yacht, that he had never been in South Africa—”

“He lied for some reason. He once lived there.”

“Lied? But permit me to be frank, Oswald, and to say that the tone which you adopt in discussing your brother is not pretty, my friend. Mr “Draytong”, I am able to assure you, is a man of strong honor, though there may be some mysteries in his life. If we consider his abandonment of the excellent Julia, it becomes clear that his motives, whatever they may have been, were motives of the highest sublimity, and so difficult to accomplish that, as we see, they have even silvered his hair. To me personally “Draytong” is, on the whole, the most venerable human being, the heaviest brain and the strongest heart, which it has been my destiny to encounter: and, you will admit, I am not without experience of men. As to his statement that he had never been to South Africa, I am forced to believe it, for I now remember several incidents which, when we reached Cape Town, prove that he was a stranger to the country. If, therefore, he did marry Martha before that inexplicable ceremony at Norwich, it was certainly not in South Africa.”

“My dear sir, think as you like; it is of no importance,” murmured Oswald.

“No, the fact is,” pursued Dulaunay, “that the good Martha is not entirely credible on all points. She may have had an illness which has weakened the mind, and indeed, she shows the traces of it in all her air. The history, for instance, which she daily repeats of having been locked up in the old tower five years by “Draytong” belongs to the ‘Thousand Nights and One Night.’ It is not compatible with “Draytong’s” present devotion to her.”

“But I have asked the man, Steve, if it is true about the locking up in the tower,” said Oswald, “and as far as I could understand the fellow, he rather seemed to admit it. Beautiful mediaevalism of the gentle James, that imprisonment in a tower! But I think that I should myself have kept Martha under lock and key, if she had been mine: the wonder is that he ever let her out to bore the world.”

“But I find her very well, the good Martha!” cried Dulaunay with opening arms: “we cannot all be brilliant wits and great minds like you, Oswald. But I see you are of a bad humour to-day. Well, then, I will now go up and get the shreds of paper, and we will then at once return to Corton, that we may hear how the two young married have been received by “Draytong”. That would have been a situation worthy to be seen! “Draytong” will not have permitted himself to flame into an anger, I think, but he will have looked at them sideward with a certain vivacity of the eye, the significance of which the gallant Bobbie will perhaps be likely to remember, oh, la, la! Well, I go up — But no, you are wrong, Oswald, to credit the statements of either Martha or Steve as to that imprisonment in the tower. Steve is toque, maboule, loufoque — how do you say?— ‘daft.’

“No, that would not have been able to happen, my friend. The unfailing chivalry of “Draytong” to the somewhat commonplace Martha is in reality one of the sublimest of spectacles, and for us, who daily witness it, it is not possible to imagine that he once shut her up five years.”

The Count said these last words on the stairs, going up for the shreds, for Oswald had followed him out of the morning room, rather to Dulaunay’s surprise, since Oswald did not usually give himself any unnecessary trouble; and still discussing “Draytong,” Martha, Rosie, Bobbie, and the position of affairs at Corton. They entered Hartwell’s room on the first floor, with Oswald, who was a shade paler now, at Dulaunay’s heels. And Dulaunay inserted the key which Hartwell had given him into that wardrobe which contained the shreds of Letty Barnes’ letter to Julia.

XXVIII. HARTWELL IS TRAPPED

IT WAS NEARLY night, and as Dulaunay opened the wardrobe, and began to feel in the pockets of the garments hung up there, he reached aside and pressed down an electric switch, filing the large room with light. Meantime, Oswald paced to and fro between the heavy Henri Quatre bedstead and the wardrobe, conscious of the preciousness of the seconds that were even then passing over him, but conscious also of his lack of power to rise to the height of their importance. He felt that if now, while the wardrobe was open, and while the shreds were not yet found by Dulaunay, he could invent some means of making Dulaunay go out of the chamber for one minute, some excuse, some ruse, in that minute he could secure the shreds: here was the "Golden Opportunity," the chance that comes only once for over: but even as the chance passed and passed, Oswald was unequal to it. The flying moments, compared with the action of his intellect, were like race-horses compared to an ox stuffed with grass which heavily trots after them. The finding of the shreds, meantime, was no momentary matter: Dulaunay dived into pocket after pocket, sometimes bringing out other papers or letters, which he opened to see if they contained any shreds, half-absently running his eye over them, and still chatting about Hartwell, Julia, Martha, and about Hartwell's great electrical invention, the testing of which was to take place in three days' time, on the Tuesday of the following week, this day being a Saturday. Oswald, pacing to and fro, uttered not a word, nor heard a word of what was being said; even his footsteps were inaudible in the thick carpet; so that all at once, when the Count's talk was arrested by one of the papers over which he had glanced, perfect silence was in the chamber for a minute or two, broken only by a whisper of "Mon Dieu!" uttered under his breath by Dulaunay.

The paper at which Dulaunay was then staring was a marriage-certificate. He had found it in a breast-pocket of a coat of Hartwell's; and it recorded the marriage of James Drayton and Martha Harper in the town of Colesberg, South Africa, over sixteen years before.

Hartwell had found this certificate of marriage a couple of years before this time in an old trunk of Drayton's at the estate in Bucks; it had happened during his long yachting cruise over the world, before he had fallen ill at Siena, had there seen Julia on opening his eyes, and had become engaged to her; he had put the certificate in the pocket of the coat in which it was now found by Dulaunay, and had left it at Addison Road on his return journey from the estate in Bucks to the yacht.

Again Dulaunay breathed the exclamation, "mon Dieu!" as during a minute or two he stared at the old marriage lines. He had, as he had just said to Oswald, proof on proof that "Draytong" had never been in South Africa, apart from "Draytong's" own assertion that he had never been there: yet, here was an equally strong proof that "Draytong" had married there.

Now, two seeming facts, mutually contradictory, yet each equally proved to be certain, always pressingly spur the mind to prove to itself its own sanity by getting at the actual truth: and this was what now happened to Dulaunay. He put the certificate into his pocket, then after another half-minute's hurried search found the shreds for which he had been sent, put them, too, into his pocket, said to Oswald, "I pray you to wait me here some minutes, Oswald," and, going out of the door, again murmured blankly to himself, "mon Dieu! I understand nothing there."

He ran up the stair as if in haste to catch or find something that was eluding him, entered his own room, closed the door upon himself, threw himself upon a couch, shut his eyes, and lay frowning with thought. He felt that he was on the verge of unravelling some extraordinary thing, and that the darkness which still surrounded his mind was like that dense darkness of the foreday, when men yet have an instinct, of the coming light, and wait with assurance for its appearance.

He lay in deep thought a considerable time with one hand on the certificate of marriage, while below Oswald continued to pace, thinking bitterly that now the shreds were in Dulaunay's pocket, and the great chance, never to come again, had been allowed to slip; there now occurred to Oswald more than one plan by which he might have secured the shreds while Dulaunay had the wardrobe open, and not only had he now the plans, but now, when it was too late, he felt the courage, the capacity, the address, which three minutes previously might have been sufficient to secure him the shreds, while his breast broadened at the feeling which he spurred in himself that for the future he would not fail to be equal to all the exigencies of life; but at the very same time a remorseful whisper of his consciousness — that whisper which is said to increase the torments of hell — said within him: "A fool is a man who is wise too late; and if you had a second chance, or a hundredth, you would still be your self, and would still lack a capable soul."

He waited so long, that he grew weary, stopped pacing, searched without motive in all the pockets of the clothes in the wardrobe, found nothing of any interest, and finally went to one of the front windows of the room, looking out, leaning on his stick, with his hard-felt hat, which was a delicate shade of brown, tilted on his forehead. It was night now, the street lamps lit, and a pelting shower of rain was falling; he saw the yard and the breadth of the street beyond looking like a plain grown with a thick short crop of white grass, caused by the rebound of the splashing rain; there stood the cab in which he and Dulaunay had come, waiting for them; and on the top of that, too, and all along the top of the front wall, sprouted the crop of white grass; in dashed the cringing figure of a butcher's man with a tray of meat for Miss Scatchett's household, and disappeared behind an angle of the house; it was a quarter of an hour before he dashed out again: and still Dulaunay did not come. Oswald looked at his watch: it was ten minutes past eight.

The Count still lay in the dark room above, thinking out the mystery of Hartwell's life, and before his mental review passed nearly every incident of his connection with Hartwell, begun just about five years before, one rainy night at Liverpool Street Station.

More than anything else the strangeness of that meeting now struck him. He had sat down in "Draytong's" brougham to escape from, the rain; and "Draytong," suddenly appearing, had proffered him his hand. "Draytong" had asked him about things at Addison Road, about the health of Miss Scatchett, had taken him for an old acquaintance — . Was it not odd? Where could the mind begin to penetrate a mystery so dark? The strangeness of the thing had more or less faded from the consciousness of the Count in the course of years: but when one sat and reconsidered it, then that strangeness was even wild, was even exasperating to the reason. Reason said, "It never could have happened"; but memory, at war with reason, replied, "I did happen."

"Draytong" had said in the brougham as they drove toward Addison Road: "You do not ask me anything about my motor-car accident—" and at one time Dulaunay had thought that a blow received in that accident may really have injured "Draytong's" brain, as "Draytong" pretended, causing him to mistake Dulaunay for someone else; later on Dulaunay had believed that “Draytong” purposely played a comedy, pretending to an old acquaintanceship with the Count, through having taken a fancy to him at first sight; many theories, in fact, had at one time, or another been built up by Dulaunay to explain that singular commencement of the friendship between himself and Hartwell: but none of those theories had been satisfactory, and they seemed wild enough this night when a host of other incidents, all evidently connected with one great original mystery, were called up in his memory, and passed before his criticism.

There was the motor car accident— “Draytong’s” mind had not been injured thereby: that was certain; no sounder intelligence existed than “Draytong’s.” But something had occurred at that accident! some imbroglio with a man named “Hartwell!” There were the ravings of “Draytong” during his illness at Siena; there, was that perplexity depicted on his face when he had said: “Am I Hartwell; or am I Drayton?” and when he had said again: “The faces are one — how if the natures be one also? and which of the two am I, am I?” Those had been words of no meaning then, either to Julia or to Dulaunay; but Dulaunay remembered them, every one, and now, when he faced and questioned them stubbornly, they seemed to whisper to him a truth, though afar off, as it were, and in a language which he did not understand. There were also the delirious man’s moments of agitation, his hoarse whispers: “The dead know not anything — I will change clothes — Hartwell shall be Drayton, the beggar the millionaire — the coat, the waistcoat, now the collar — no one on the road, McCalmont dead!” And there were the somnambulisms, those haggard, wandering nightmares, when, staring blindly at the mirror, “Draytong” had often again repeated in pain those names of Hartwell and Drayton, and been uncertain which of the two he was.

The mystery seemed to be the mystery of two men, then, not of one: two men “whose faces were one.”

Dulaunay had been so sure that “Draytong” had never been to South Africa before that trip in the yacht! but, the marriage certificate proved that he had been there. As soon, however, as Dulaunay took it for granted that “Draytong” had certainly been there, had married Martha there, he found himself confronted with a host of dark facts, such as that “Draytong” had not apparently known that “Harper” was the name of the daughter of the woman whom he had married as Martha Harper: “Draytong” had apparently supposed that Rosie was his own daughter, and was named Drayton! How account, moreover, for the fact that “Draytong” had remarried that same Martha who had already been married by him in South Africa? How account for the fact that “Draytong” had sworn to Julia in the rocca at Siena that he was not married? Was “Draytong,” then, infamous? No, the truth must be that “Draytong” had never married in South Africa, and “that the marriage certificate related to another man who had taken the name of “Draytong.” And Dulaunay at once rushed to the conclusion the name of that other man must be Hartwell.

And “Draytong” and this unknown Hartwell were so precisely alike that Martha, the wife of Hartwell, believed that they were one.

That was odd! and yet not so odd; the Count remembered how “Draytong” came to be so unlike his brother Oswald. Julia had told him the story — How “Draytong” was the image of a captain who had extravagantly terrified his mother. But since this South African Hartwell, having “the same face” as “Draytong,” must also be the image of that captain, then there may have been two terrified mothers — Dulaunay decided that this must really have been so.

Hartwell, therefore, had taken the name of “Draytong” in South Africa, and there married Martha Harper. This was what the Count at first concluded; but at once this theory was faced with a great number of difficulties. With what motive, then, had “Draytong,” the rich man, permitted Martha to think that he was Hartwell, the poor man? With what motive had he abandoned the beloved Julia to marry Martha, Hartwell’s wife? How came Oswald to be so certain that “Draytong,” his brother, had not only been, but had lived, for years, in South Africa? The Count felt that his theory was wrong somewhere.

For some twenty minutes his thoughts toiled, without progress, in this strait. Then there came a moment when he said to himself: “Since one of the two men, Hartwell and “Draytong,” has lived in South Africa, but the other has never lived there; and since the one who lived there was Oswald’s brother, and the one who never lived there is the man I know as “Draytong,” therefore the man I know as “Draytong” is not Oswald’s brother; but Oswald’s brother is certainly named “Draytong”; therefore the man I know as “Draytong” is not really named “Draytong”, but is really named Hartwell; and Hartwell took the name of “Draytong”, not in South Africa, where he never lived, but in England, at the motor-car accident, where the real “Draytong” was killed, where ‘the dead know not anything’ where ‘the beggar became the millionaire’ — and ‘the clothes were changed’ — the coat, the waistcoat, now the ‘collar’ — ‘no one on the road — ‘McCalmont dead,’ and ‘the dead know not anything.’”

At this thought Dulaunay sat electrified, pale but for a stain of crimson on one side of his face, as “when a great thought strikes along the brain, and flashes all the cheek.” The mystery lay solved, and every incident which had arisen out of it, every motive of Hartwell’s conduct, was now clear to the understanding, which was henceforth like a vault flooded with light, the key having once been found to throw open the door.

Thus, with hardly any new facts to guide him through the maze, Dulaunay, by the mere passage of time and ripeness of his consciousness, together with a little thinking, came out into daylight. He even wondered now why he had not seen, years before, what he now saw; but this would not have been possible for that very reason, that his consciousness had not been ripe, that a sufficient length of time had not matured the fruit of knowledge, even though he had had clues to the mystery of Hartwell's life which no one else possessed. The knowledge of the truth is, really, like a fruit which cannot be plucked much before it is ripe. It was always, for instance, an open secret that it is the earth, not the sun, which goes round: but men greater than Solomon could not attain to it, till it somehow bent down to the grasp of men. The fruit may, indeed, be plucked a little before it is ripe by the "men in advance of their age," etc., but these Galileos suffer those sharp cracks on the knuckles which one Mother Eve suffered, whereas, if she had not plucked, but waited, the fruit of knowledge would of itself, in time, have dropped over ripe, into her lap; she might then have eaten it, and nothing would have been said. Dulaunay, however, was not of this aggressive Galileo-type, but simply a vivacious mind, receptive of ideas when they were presented to him, so that only in the fullness of time was the knowledge of the whole truth about Hartwell born of itself, after a short travail, in him.

His first feeling was a natural exultation at his discovery, the chuckle of self-congratulation, and the busybody zest of one who alone holds the key to a scandal of great magnitude; he laughed flippantly within himself, thinking: "Here is a history, this affair here, oh, la, la!" Then, when the levity of his first amazement passed off, he was struck by an impression of the greatness and pity of it all, of the gravity of the issues which spring from human action, and the abyss which the heart is. Hartwell, whom he still in his thoughts called “Draytong” — Hartwell, the respected, the grave thinker about man and God, whose work had been crowned, whose tone suggested a moral strength incapable of frailty, who was adored by one of the most admirable of patrician women, this Hartwell was one of the great impostors of modern society. Indignation and shame now flushed Dulaunay’s brow. He did not understand that Hartwell was not bound by the moral code of “a good Catholic” and “a man of honour” like himself; the excellent Count had accepted without question “a moral code” and “a code of honour” which had been made for him long before he was born, and he did not reflect that a man of profoundly original and vigorous mind like Hartwell cannot consider himself subject to any ready made code, but must needs start afresh, as though he were the first man who ever lived, looking into the nature of things with his own eyes, and making his own code, which may be right or wrong, according to the depth of his insight. Hartwell had never suffered one qualm for assuming the name and estate of Drayton; the word “impostor” was a less contemptuous word to his mind than the words “dervish” or “curate”: but to Dulaunay it was a word full of shame.

But that was only the first glaring fact about Hartwell which struck the mind, that he was an impostor: there were other facts of a different sort; and lying on the sofa in the dark room, the Count saw them all in a clear light — saw them with murmurs of reverence, and with pangs of pity. The motive with which Hartwell had married Drayton’s wife was no longer obscure: it was in order that he might cut off with a ruthless knife from his heart the temptation to abandon her for the beloved Julia; “In which case,” thought the Count, “that is not astonishing that the hairs of that erring, but venerable head, have silvered themselves.” The truth of what Martha constantly asserted, that she had been isolated from the world for five years in the tower at Corton was now for the first time believed by Dulaunay; it was the dead Drayton who had thus isolated her, and it was Hartwell who had set her free, at a moment when her freedom meant the ruin of all his hopes. The Count was able to guess that at the time when Hartwell vowed to Julia at Siena that he was not married, he probably did not know where Martha was, or if she were dead or alive, though he must have known of the fact of Drayton's marriage to her; then, on the eve of his marriage with Julia, Hartwell had gone down to Corton, and had discovered Martha in her prison. What a war in the mind or the ill-fated Hartwell must then have taken place! The contrast between the two women — Martha and Lady Julia — presented itself strongly to the Count's mental vision: the one so special, and also so beloved, the other so common and cheap, and hard to love. If on that discovery in the tower at Corton, Hartwell desired, even to madness, the death of Martha, that would have been only natural; he must have desired it: it required no very deep sympathy to be able to perceive what at that time could not have failed to transact itself in Hartwell's soul. He had vowed to Julia at Siena that no impediment existed in the way of their marriage, and the continued existence of this Martha, this pseudo wife suddenly discovered in the tower, meant not merely the wreck of his and Julia's happiness, but it meant that Julia and all who knew of his vow, must needs despise him as the most perjured of ruffians. What even "a man of honour" and "a good Catholic" might, in so harassing a situation, have done, or might have been tempted to do, was terrible to think of; at least he might have left Martha in the isolation where Drayton had placed her, running the risk of her existence some day coming to light, and he might still, in spite of her, have married Julia; this, indeed, would have been very natural: for Martha at that time was nothing to Hartwell; she was Drayton's wife, and Drayton had isolated her. But Hartwell had compassionated her, had liberated, married her; and these reflections stirred emotions so lively in the Count, that he had an impulse to hasten straight way to Hartwell, to kiss his hand like a disciple, and to say: "I know all! and I condemn, I pity, but above all I revere you."

How and why that marriage with Martha had been made necessary was now very evident: Bobbie had been sent into the country to seek, the girl, Rosie, in order that, when Rosie came, Hartwell might be able to desert Martha without leaving her desolate; the rash engagement, meantime, of Julia with the Arch-Duke's heir must have powerfully spurred Hartwell to cast Martha to the winds, to prostrate himself at the feet of his beloved, and to tell her that he was not so perjured a wretch as she could not fail to suppose him; but Bobbie had not come with Rosie: Bobbie had, apparently, been occupying his time in conjugal escapades with another than Rosie; and finally Hartwell, finding his human nature all too weak for the task which he had assumed, finding that he could not be a faithful husband to her who was not his wife, had brusquely ended the conflict with in him by a suicide of his heart and hope, and had made Martha his legal wife.

No great effort of penetration was needed on the part of the excellent Count in order to make these conjectures about Hartwell's late sufferings and motives; within the last few months he had seen as it were years added to Hartwell's age, a resignation in Hartwell's smile, a silent experience of grief in his glance, the tufting of his hair with grey, and a stooping of his shoulders as under a heavy burden. The Count had inwardly bemoaned his friend without fathoming the full cause of all this: and now, fathoming it, he muttered to himself at one moment: "Here, then, I think, is a piece of human clay not without cracks, yet a master-man (un homme maître), and worthy to be loved."

His first practical decision was to hie straight to Julia and tell her all: and as this occurred to him, he leapt up from the couch, at the same time hearing Oswald's voice outside on the stairs calling: "I say, aren't you coming? We shall miss the train." To which Dulaunay called back: "I come at the instant even! Wait me!"

He stood a minute longer where he was, confirming himself in his decision. Yes, he would go to Julia. Two days ago she was in London, he knew, and probably still was. He would tell all that very night. This would cause him to miss the train, but there was no necessity for him to return to Corton that night: he would give Oswald the shreds for which he had been sent; Oswald would take them down to "Draytong," and he himself would at once call upon the admirable Julia.

His nerves danced with excited anticipation at the greatness of the effect which his revelation must produce upon Julia; the zeal of a disciple to preach Hartwell to her so possessed him, that his Gallic impetuosity forefelt the impatience which would be his during the slow cab drive between Addison Road and Brook Street. He knew that in preaching Hartwell to her, he would be preaching to ears eager enough to hear; nor was he under any obligation to Hartwell to keep secret what his own wits had unearthed. Next to "Draytong's" friendship, his intimacy with Julia was the most precious of his flighty life's experiences; here was the first lovely woman whom he had learned to love without desiring for himself; he desired her for another; and this unselfish flame had long been the source within him of much pure, and rather novel, emotion. She had taught him long before the rupture with Hartwell to regard her as a dear friend and sister, unique among women, and high aloof from his ordinary gallantries; but since the rupture she had become to him that which is more than a friend — a friend in despair, for whom he could do nothing, and her image in his heart had now acquired something almost of saintship, halloed with the sacredness which a great misfortune, borne with resignation, confers. Since the rupture he had been much in her company, both in London, and abroad; at a score of meetings had they discussed in private intimacy the strange, disastrous conduct of Hartwell; but the Count's words of consolation, in the dark as he himself was, had had only the value which friendship and sincerity gave them: to say and many times repeat that "Draytong for ever adores you, Julia," or that "Draytong is the soul of honour," or that "Draytong if not deranged" had not been to prove that it was true. He had seen Julia desperately drifting into marriage with the Gross-Herzog P ——, and for her sake, not for Hartwell's, had tried his best to warn her back, but without effect. He now hoped that what he was about to tell her might even yet avert that marriage. He felt himself the good Providence of Julia and of Hartwell, and, full of this busy, self-important feeling, he rushed out of the room and down the stairs: Julia should know the whole shameful and sublime truth of how "Draytong" had sinned, had achieved, and had suffered: and she should judge him for herself.

He met Oswald awaiting him below at the door of the morning-room, and he said hurriedly:

"I regret to have made you to wait, Oswald. Something has arrived to me which will prevent me from returning to Corton to-night."

"My dear sir, you are erratic," said Oswald: "I am not going to stay here. I shall simply go back to Corton with out you."

"But, yes! why not? It is even that which I supposed that you would do, my friend. We have little need, I think, of the protection one of the other? I, of my part, will sleep here under the auspices of the good Miss Scatchett, and perhaps you will tell her this presently for me. On Monday, in the afternoon, I will rejoin you at Corton. Only I pray you to let me take the cab which waits us at the gate, and to find yourself another, since I am pressed to arrive somewhere; you will perhaps also be good enough to place in the hand of “Drayton” this envelope which he sent me to seek, and to make for me my compliments and excuses to himself and to the excellent Martha.”

In saying this, he had taken the envelope containing the shreds from his pocket, and he handed it to Oswald; nor would he have believed even an angel, we may suppose, who had said to him then: “This act of yours is a stroke of destiny by which you work the total overthrow of him whom you love.”

Oswald’s hand went out and took that envelope which by no use of his wits he had been able to touch, but which now of its own accord came in to his possession.

He had learned at least one good habit in the distinguished circles in which he had moved, the habit of hiding his emotions under a reposeful exterior; but he was unhinged in a rather singular way by this event, it was so great and sudden: he neither reddened nor turned pale, but he became quite awkward; he took the envelope sheepishly, like a man detected in a theft, and, having taken it, still held it out a little toward Dulaunay, as if offering it back, or as if afraid of seeming to be too greedy to rush it into his pocket; and he smiled a maudlin smile, which, put into words, would have said: “It is nothing to me, this envelope; I am not really so very anxious as you may imagine to take charge of it, nor so overjoyed to have it burning between my fingers; my blood is not tingling with suppressed elation, nor shall I laugh and shout the moment your back is turned, when I shall fully realise that you are really gone, and have really left this thing with me; no, all this is only your fancy, and you have still a chance to change your mind, and take the envelope back from me.”

But Dulaunay did not even notice that shamefaced smile, much less understand its meaning. He even now did not know anything about Oswald's imprisonment by Hartwell, he had been abroad at his chateau at the time, and the sensation caused by the scandal had been mostly local in the West End clubland; nor had Hartwell mentioned it since to Dulaunay, nor had Julia, nor Oswald himself. Even if the Count had known it, he might still have given the envelope to Oswald, for he had no reason to think that the shreds were of any special weight or secrecy; he knew, indeed, that Oswald did not seem to love his supposed brother; but then Oswald, who had been specially glum of late, seemed to love no one with much heat. On the whole, Dulaunay handed the envelope to him without a doubt or afterthought in his mind, said au revoir, ran out into the rain to the waiting cab, and started for Brook Street, in order to tell Julia all.

Oswald, for his part, re-entered the morning room; threw the envelope on the table; and began to pace with his usual limp, his hat pushed back on his head, his two hands in his pockets, and a flush now on his bald brow; for the moment he looked like an elated book-maker, who has won something; as he paced, his glance rested frequently on the envelope; and suddenly one breath of laughter, which was hysterical in its essence, broke from his lips.

"James, James," he murmured presently in a deep voice, and suddenly again gave vent to a short laugh.

In those minutes the whole look of life was moving before his consciousness into transformation, like the gradual working of the shades, of night into morning. This was the hour of Oswald's exceeding satisfaction. After a life which had been hampered by a chronic lack of funds, he loved money for its own sake, and that simple-looking envelope on the table made him very rich. And beyond the actual facts of his great luck, his fancy, becoming exalted, painted him with a rapid brush many warm visions of happiness and power: he hoped that by a display of his new wealth, he would now regain a footing in those empyrean circles from which his false step in attempting to steal the shreds had cast him like some Lucifer; there even floated through his mind a thought of Julia, and the possibility either of winning her after all, or of being somehow revenged on her; but dearer than all else was the luxurious power which he now held in his hand of crushing him whom he supposed to be his brother.

His feeling toward Hartwell at this date was entirely different from what it had been toward the real Drayton. He had disdained and also disliked Drayton with a certain distinguished weariness; but he respected and truly hated Hartwell. This new feeling was more complex and far more heartfelt than the old. In real hatred — though the statement may seem strange — there is much of love; for hatred and love are different forms of the same sickness or infection, and are so near akin that the hand that is raised to strike sometimes falls with a caress. The fact about Oswald was, that he had been caught in the draught of Hartwell's stronger nature, as a boat is sucked into the wake of a ship: he was compelled to feel deeply in some way toward Hartwell, to love or to hate, and he hated; but this hatred suffered many of the pangs of love. When, for instance, Hartwell had caused him to be cast into prison, Oswald's heart had been wounded in a manner in which the real Drayton never could have wounded it; he had sobbed to himself: "I never supposed that he would crush me so; he forgets; he does not care, that I am his brother." By the time he had come out of prison, a settled venom against "James," a longing for revenge, had taken possession of his mind; but this ill-feeling was not a simple, but a complex, feeling: he had been glad to be taken to Corton because Hartwell was at Corton, he liked the whist party nights when for two hours and a half he might sit morose in Hartwell's immediate presence; he was as jealous as a jealous lover of the count, of Martha, of Julia, of Bobbie, because they occupied some of Hartwell's thoughts; he was morbidly sensitive if Hartwell in any trivial way in the routine of daily life at Corton seemed to slight or despise him; Hartwell had become his heart's disease, haunting all his emotions: and if Oswald had not wished to stab his "James," he would have wished to embrace him. Hence the doggedness with which he had questioned the Gissings in order to obtain the desired clue about Letty Barnes; for it was now necessary to his peace to be in some sort of relation with Hartwell, to act upon him, and be reacted upon by him in some way, to touch him at one point, to be his master somehow, or his slave somehow: he was inversely "in love" — epris, as the French say, "taken" or "captivated," as we say; and because his hatred was this inverse sort of morbid love, therefore it was all the more genuine, heartfelt and terrible.

He rang the bell, and sat to the table. A footman in half-dress came in. "John," said Oswald, "I want you to find me some gum and a pair of scissors, — as quickly as you can."

The man went out and in a few minutes returned with the gum and scissors. Oswald then spread the shreds before him on the table, and began to fit their edges together. He found the work deeply interesting, every fit being to him a childish pleasure of achievement. He cut with the scissors small oblong patches from a letter taken out of his pocket, put gum on them, and fastened the shreds with them, without letting the patches cover any of the writing. In the end he got a nickety, stiff letter, but easy enough to read. Only one shred was missing in the centre, the one on which was "cruel bru," and this he had safe, though not with him.

He now read the letter through. It was all that was needed to prove Drayton's intimacy with Letty Barnes, and its nature. Letty warned Lady Julia against marriage with Drayton, sketched the history of her own relation with him, spoke of their meeting on Cromer Pier, of their stay at the Gissing's cottage, of the "scream" which she had heard coming from the tower at Corton — just such a letter as a wronged and jealous girl would write to her lover's future wife, full of self-pity, of over-anxiety for the future wife's welfare, and an unbridled animus against the wrongdoer. Adding to the letter the points which Hartwell's own frequent reasonings on the murder had made clear, the chain of proof against Hartwell as the author of Letty's death was complete.

Oswald again paced the room, feeling now ill-at-ease, almost wretched, the reason being that in this new world of happiness in which he suddenly found himself he stood with nothing to do, while all his being demanded instant and boisterous action. He did not know how he was to live through the night, and longed for the morrow. A rush of happiness always has this restless effect, as if an increase of vitality were pumped into the limbs, impelling one to run and exert one's vigour, but one finds oneself bound and must remain inert: by the time one can act, one has worn oneself out with inward fretting, and the pleasure of action is spoiled. Oswald longed to fly to Corton; but he could hardly go that night, had missed the train, and if he took a later train, Gloucester would not be at the station to meet him with the trap. He thought of telegraphing to Hartwell, and at first the telegram was short: "Sleep well," then it grew in his thoughts into "Sleep well for my sake, James," and then his thoughts added and added to it, till he had quite a long telegram in his head, but he did not send it, uncertain whether he should sign it "Oswald," or "your brother," or "your dear brother."

After half an hour, in order to do something, Oswald rang again and when the footman appeared, said to him, "You might send Miss Scatchett to me John."

Presently the alert, bird-like figure of Miss Scatchett looked in. There was always something out of joint between this lady's littleness on the one hand, and the queenliness of her position; on the other, she seemed ever stretching to be taller than she was; her silks, however, her mistress air, and the real dignity of her old-established maidenhood, combined to keep her on her throne of state. She had been the real Drayton's housekeeper for seven years before his death.

"Miss Scatchett," said Oswald, "I wish to speak with you. Sit down." He was now reclining on a lounge, pretending to himself and to her to be languid and uninterested. "I wanted to know how many servants you keep here."

"Five at present," she said, without showing the surprise which she felt; "the normal number is—"

"Well, you may at once send two of them away," he said wearily, interrupting her: "treat them liberally, you know, but you have no need of them. I have to tell you also that in a month or six weeks I shall be shutting up or selling this place, and then, I suppose, our connection will terminate, Miss Scatchett."

She perked the head as a somewhat startled canary might, and with eyes just so innocent and mild as a bird's looked at him with grave interest; The words seemed crazy to her, and she said: "I'm afraid I do not quite follow you, sir."

"I suppose not. Well, then, I must tell you that you are no longer in the employ of my brother, but in mine, Miss Scatchett. This place is mine, all that he ever had is mine. I need not be at the pains to explain how this has come about, but it is so. My good brother has got himself into certain embarrassments, and has transferred everything to me. I mean to make some enormous changes — But do not let this upset you. I shall settle upon you personally a substantial annuity, and probably get you another place as good as this, or better. I mean to be liberal to the bounds of dissoluteness. Mr James Drayton has rather collapsed, Miss Scatchett."

She continued to look with grave interest at Oswald; he seemed sober, he seemed sane: yet in the words, even in his calm air, there lurked something of lunacy, limbo, and intoxication. Miss Scatchett had to believe, yet did not quite believe. "This is surely surprising, sir," she said, at a loss what to say: "I heard from Mr Drayton on Wednesday, and he said not one word—"

"No doubt. Yet it is as true, Miss Scatchett, as that that light is shining. Who lives will see! My brother has run too far and too fast, Miss Scatchett, and now has got into difficulties. He has pretended to think nothing of me, to despise me; but now all, all, depends on my whim. That's rather a good thing, don't you think? where it says, 'The stone which the builders rejected, the same is become the head of the corner' — that's rather good. Well, that is all I had to say for the present, Miss Scatchett. Good night — . Who lives will see."

Miss Scatchett stood with a suspended air and mild eyes of meditation; then she started slightly, and said: "What you say is certainly startling, sir. I only hope that nothing lamentable has occurred. But at least may I await instructions from Mr Drayton himself before dismissing the two servants?"

"If you like," said Oswald, with a very heavy sigh and sudden weariness of this playing at action: "be good enough to leave me now."

"Do you sleep here to-night, sir?"

"No, I go home to my chambers."

"I presume that Mr Dulaunay has returned to Corton?"

"No. I believe he's coming back here to sleep. But you won't see much of the Frenchman for the future, I fancy, Miss Scatchett."

Miss Scatchett went out musing with a sideward head upon this extraordinary interview; and a few minutes afterwards Oswald, to avoid a meeting with Dulaunay, left the house.

He arrived in a cab near ten at his chambers, two top-rooms in a small street of small houses running parallel with Piccadilly on the south side. He found his Irish servant, Magee, whose only work of late had been forwarding letters, entertaining two men and a woman in the sitting room with Saturday night cordiality, whereat Oswald grumbled, but not very loudly, for he was afraid of Magee, whom he could not live without, whom he had thrice turned away, only to take him back after a few days' misery in some new servant's hands; and ordinarily the word "Magee" was the word more frequently uttered by Oswald's lips than any other.

After the rout of Magee's party, Oswald threw himself into the semi-circular lounge which shut in the copper-vaulted fireplace, sighed, and seemed lost in reverie, while Magee, a handy, small fellow, born to be a valet, stood expectant of orders. The small room, in which taste was the rather self-conscious mistress, was cosy with the red glamor of the lampshade and the fire flickering on dull-red tiles; all was primly elegant; the few unobtrusive pictures exactly fitted into the wall-spaces in which stood the oak, the plain Donegal carpet, and the terracotta walls made a harmony of color.

"I am sleeping here to-night Magee," said Oswald after a time. "I suppose you wish me to the devil, if the truth were known, but I am independent of you now, my friend. Why didn't you come down to Corton to me?"

"Had no orders, sir," said Magee on one knee, unlacing Oswald's boots.

"You don't wait for orders, when you want to do anything, Magee. You didn't want to leave town, I suppose, of you would have come. But I mean to make you skip for the future, if you don't look after me. What's all the news about?"

"Only old news, sir—"

"Yes, I believe your bulls are a pose, my friend. You are conscious that if you didn't make bulls I should have kicked you to the devil years ago, Magee."

"Sure, sir," said Magee, "you couldn't make a bull out of me not if you were to kill me just now. I've been that put about by what happened to you, sir. Thank God to see you looking so wonderfully hearty, sir, after the miserable treatment you've been put to, sir."

"I suppose you guessed that I was innocent, Magee. It wasn't banknotes that I wanted to take, but a letter which I knew would convict the ruffian of a crime. But I've got it now at last, Magee."

"Sure, I knew that you were innocent, sir," said Magee, putting Oswald into a dressing gown: "I knew it very well even before your brother's letter to the paper saying that it wasn't any banknotes that you were after taking from his wardrobe—"

"Which letter to which papers, you idiot?"

"Sure, I thought that you would know, sir! That's funny that your brother himself hasn't told you, sir. He wrote to the papers saying — well, I've still the papers put up in some hole in my bedroom and you can look through them with your own hands, sir. It is supposed that it is this letter of your brother that was the means of narrowing down the length of your sentence at the tail-end, sir; but, as I said to Lady Methwold's Thomas, 'It is all very well for him to be writing letters to the papers now, but all the ink in the world shall not whitewash Mr Oswald—'"

"Better hold your tongue, Magee," said Oswald, whose lips from old habit seemed to find a pleasure in uttering that word "Magee" on every occasion. "I suppose you are more or less drunk again. I smell, it on you. Haven't I many times forbidden you to carouse in my rooms with your friends, and drink my spirits?"

"Sure, sir, I know that that much is all right between us," answered Magee. "What can you expect? when the cat's away, 'tis but natural if the mice take a few liberties with his tail, sir."

"With his cocktail, you mean. Better hold your tongue, Magee. What, by the way, is all the news? Is anything going on?"

"Nothing special, sir. You must 'er heard sir, of the bankruptcy of Sir Aubrey Payne; then again, on Tuesday evening last Lord Cyril Letchford struck her ladyship a back-handed blow with the palm of his hand, as they were going up the great staircase at Rodeleigh Hall after dinner, and her ladyship is reported to be laid up and ear-marked for some time to come with a handsome black eye, sir; then again, Lady Methwold and her aunt, Lady Wisden, left town yesterday afternoon to spend a week at Marston House, in Norfolk, with the Farnums—"

"They, did, did they?" muttered Oswald. "Lady Methwold is a subject which will have to be considered; Magee, you had better go to Pagani's and tell them to send a supper."

"Yes, sir. Supper for breakfast tomorrow, sir?"

"No, for supper to-night. I could eat something now, and drink, too. I will have a bottle of Yquem. The little economies are over now, Magee. I happen to have become a rich man since you saw me last, so you can look out."

"A rich — ? You, sir? Sure, I congratulate you and myself, too, sir, if that's so?" said, Magee, standing in suspense.

"It's as true as that, that lamp's burning."

"Sure, this is a bit of news, then! How did it happen, sir?"

“You will see, if you live. Go and get me the supper. First of all bring me the newspaper that you say contains my brother’s letter.”

Magee hurried out, soon returned with the newspaper from his room in the basement, and hurried out again for the supper; and while he was gone Oswald eagerly perused Hartwell’s letter, exculpating him from the full scandal of the charge which had been brought against him. The letter was a short, and formal statement of facts, in which, however, Hartwell did not spare himself for his share in the false impression produced as to Oswald’s guilt; and, as he read it, strong emotions of hatred, not untinged with emotions akin to love, like darkness streaked with fireflies, boiled in Oswald’s breast. He saw that “James” must have felt sorry for the unbrotherly wrong done, and bitterly he murmured: “Too late, James! too late!” The fact that “James” had felt sorry for him stirred up afresh Oswald’s self-pity and sense of injury; and the fact that “James” had not felt sorry in time gave rise to a tyrannous longing in Oswald’s mind to teach “James” a lesson for some vague “next time.”

“Too late, my friend! I’ll teach you for next time,” such was Oswald’s thought. He would crush even to the dust; he would not spare; “James” should be without a five-pound note. But mixed with all this spleen was the warm, tearful, maudlin feeling that, as James had felt sorry, so at some distant day he, Oswald, too, would relent, and be sorry; and he forefelt already the melodramatic joys with which in that day he would turn again to James, shower royal mercies upon him, and say: “You are my brother, after all, my own flesh and blood.” Such are the pranks which the feelings play in a smitten and poisoned heart.

He went to bed somewhat heated with wine after the supper; but there was no sleep for him, his brain was so plagued with fiery thought. After some hours all the food in his stomach was used up by this work of the soul, and about four in the morning he had to get up hollow with hunger, and eat a crust of bread, which was all he had, in spite of his new riches. Thus the greatness of his happiness, joined with nothing to do, became to, him a care to groan at.

At sunrise he was up and writing in his dressing-gown to Hartwell, though it was Sunday, and the letter would not pass through the post for many hours; he covered three sheets with writing, pouring out abuse, upbraidings, threats, a river of bile, though he knew all the time that he would never let such a letter go from him into the post. He tore it up presently, and afterwards wrote a short command to Hartwell to meet him at his chambers at two on Monday afternoon: and this was duly delivered at Corton on the Monday morning.

As for the Count, he had returned to Addison Road soon after Oswald left, and spent, for his part, almost as sleepless a night as Oswald, thinking over that secret thing which he had found out about "Draytong's" life, thinking, too, of his disappointment in not meeting Julia, for, on going to her house in Brook Street, to tell her all, he had heard that she had left London the day before to stay at Marston House, in Norfolk, an estate only six miles from Corton; and he was kept awake, too, by the strangeness of the fact, of which Miss Scatchett had told him, that Oswald had not taken down to Hartwell the envelope entrusted to him, but was sleeping at his chambers in London.

XXIX. WHERE WAS HARTWELL?

ABOUT THE SAME hour that Dulaunay came back to sleep at Addison Road that Saturday night after failing to find Julia, a chaise containing Bobbie, Rosie, and Rosie's maid was passing along the dark road from Felmingham to Corton. It was not the Corton trap, for that passed them on the road at a slow walk with Gloucester, the groom, who was going to Felmingham to bring Oswald and Dulaunay home to Corton, though he was destined to await them in vain that night. Bobbie's chaise was one of the peculiar basket-chaises of Felmingham, which he had procured with some trouble at that late hour, and the journey to Corton was long drawn, for speed was not exactly the strong point of that particular horse and driver of Felmingham; the road, moreover, was not good and very gloomy of a dark night like this. That half-hour of rain between eight and nine, when Oswald at a bedroom window had seen the breadth of Addison Road like a plain sprouting with a crop of white grass, was long since over but the forests here about Corton still dripped with it through all their depths, the air was still haunted by a drizzle, and the party in the chaise were in waterproofs. Even where the sky would have been visible at another time, neither sky nor star was now to be seen; the eye could not pierce the darkness two yards ahead; and the silence was broken only by weird sounds in the woods. The young bride, who was now wearing loose jackets, clung to her husband's side, and when, they spoke it was in melancholy murmurs.

"Perhaps he will be asleep, Bobbie," murmured Rosie, "he" being the word by which Hartwell was now named in all their talk — that terrible

“he” who had, sooner or later, to be faced and confessed to: and now the hour for it was come.

“He may be asleep, darling,” said Bobbie, “people in the country do go to sleep early, I know, though I don’t feel that he is asleep. It would be rather a good thing if he were, don’t you think?”

“Do you feel that you would like him to be, darling Bobbie?” asked Rosie in a subdued voice.

“Yes, for then I should have one more whole night in which to think out what I am to say to him.”

“Haven’t you thought it out yet, Bobbie?”

“I am afraid I haven’t, darling. I have thought, of course, for months, but not thought out. Nothing possible has occurred to me to say. The difficulty is to avoid being blatantly ridiculous! ‘How do you do, sir? this is my wife’ — one can’t say that, you know: it is portentous, it really is bete. I do wish now that we hadn’t brought Ernestine with us, Rosie. I tried to hint to you not to bring her and you would. It looks like springing a whole heavy family, with hat-boxes and nursemaids upon him, I confess, I — I — feel absurd.”

Rosie had a minute’s silent reflection, and then said:

“Miss Scatchett thinks — that — it! would be better, if I go in first alone, and see him, while you pretend to be busy outside with something. I — will, if you like, Bobbie.”

“But do you think you could?” asked Bobbie, sorely tempted to hide himself behind her bravery: “You might find it trying, darling.”

“But, I ‘will,’ Bobbie, if you like.” she repeated, with a catch of the breath, clinging to him: for she had never seen Hartwell, who was to her merely some vague dragon.

“But what would you say, darling? How would you present, yourself?” asked Bobbie, with a perplexed brow.

“I should say: ‘I am Mr Robert Hartwell’s lawful wife, and we are come home,’” said Rosie bravely.

Bobbie could not resist a twinge of laughter at the “lawful,” it sounded so aggressive; and he said:

“No, I don’t think that would do, Rosie. It might be the most diplomatic way, but it would be too great an ordeal for you. No, we will go in together, I a little in advance — ah, Heavens! I do wish the thing was over, don’t you? I shall say: ‘Allow me to present you, sir, my—’ If we could only find some equivalent to ‘wife!’ it sounds so deplorably heavy!”

“I don’t see anything so very wrong with ‘wife,’” remarked Rosie. “But couldn’t you say: ‘How are you, sir? I am the husband, sir, of this — ?’”

“Oh, but ‘husband’ is worse! I’d rather say you are my wife than say I am your husband: there is something apologetic in ‘wife,’ but ‘husband’ sounds like a challenge. Our tone must be calm, but not self-assertive. I wish to goodness it was over, don’t you? I wonder what he will say! He wouldn’t dare be cross with you, I think: if he is, you won’t say anything, but leave it to me to answer him — Oh, well, I don’t care: we must only trust to Providence.”

“I wish it was over, don’t you?” sighed Rosie for the tenth time. “I only hope he will be well asleep when we get there. Is it far now?”

“It can’t be very far now, I think,” answered Bobbie: “I have only been down here once and he told me then that he was going to live in a place buried in timber which they call the Pavilion. So that must be where he is. If he is asleep, we can probably get in without his knowing till to-morrow: the servant who opens to us is sure to know me.”

“But perhaps the servants are asleep, too,” suggested Rosie: “in knocking them up, we may wake ‘him.’”

“Heaven knows. I don’t care, dear. We must only sit tight, and trust to Providence.”

“You see what a heap of trouble I have brought you into, Bobbie. He must have had some deep reason for wishing you to marry the other Rosie, and he will be terribly angry with us. He may cut you off with a shilling.”

“Let him do his worst. ‘I’ had a deep reason for wishing to marry this Rosie, and no other, that’s all. I only wish the dreadful business was over. It can’t be very far now.”

“I am sorry now that I brought Ernestine, or wore this hat,” said Rosie, after a silence: “he will think that I am fond of dress, and can’t move without a maid. But I didn’t wish to leave poor Ernestine by her self at Addison Road, where no one speaks French. Oh, dear darling Bobbie, we must be getting very near now! Just give me your hand — feel my heart, how it is beating. I wish an accident would happen to the chaise to keep us back.”

“Don’t be afraid, dear, you make me nervous,” said Bobbie.

“How cold your hand is!” murmured Rosie: “I can feel, it through my glove; keep it here under the jacket to warm it. Don’t be too nervous, darling! perhaps it will be all right — Oh, dear! we were too young to get married — What would dear Lulu and Paul Schrapps and all those Paris people think to see us quaking in this way to come home? That old Spanish fortune teller in the Rue de Moscou told me that a calamity was hanging over us, Bobbie, and that is why I kept you from coming; I am sure that my influence helped to keep you from coming, but I am terribly sorry now, dear, I ought, to have made you come long ago, and then it would have been over now, and we should not have had to suffer to-night!”

“It will be all right; don’t be afraid; we can’t be far now,” said Bobbie in a tone of nervous preoccupation. All their remarks were disjointed and abrupt.

“His brother, Oswald, and Count Dulaunay may be up and with him,” remarked Rosie, “and they will be a protection perhaps. He would hardly be very cross before them. I don’t think I shall like Oswald much from what you tell me, he is too short; but I shall like the Count. Is it far now, I wonder? I wonder if Mr Drayton will notice me, or like me?”

“He notices every earthly thing the moment his eye rests on it,” answered Bobbie: “he’ll probably know how long we have been married, where we have lived, and all about us in a wonderful way by his first glance. That would be quite in his manner. He is a man of science, trained in what they call ‘expert observation—’”

“Oh, he must be very terrible, dear darling Bobbie!” murmured Rosie.

“But he is not — don’t think that,” said Bobbie, patting her hand absent-mindedly “you mustn’t be afraid of him, darling. He is only cold in manner. Remember all that he has done for me: I was a poor working boy, as I have told you, and he—”

The chaise began to bump down the steep forest road that passes by the little lawn where the statue of Pan is, before the Pavilion. They were at Corton; and suddenly their hearts got colder as the chaise stopped, and at some moment they saw a single light in the Pavilion near by on their right.

Bobbie said something to Ernestine in French in a hushed voice, she seized a valise and a hat-box, and the party got out; the driver was then dismissed and, turning on the narrow road with difficulty, rumbled very slowly away into dense darkness. The night was indeed very dark, and the forest seemed to hide within itself some unspeakable secret; from the Pavillon sounded the baying of a dog.

The young husband put his arm round his wife's waist, and held her to him, as if to protect her from the spirit of awe which was in their situation and in the greatness of the gloom about them.

They walked by the statue of Pan across the lawn to the Pavilion. The single light came from the drawing room on the ground floor, the old room used for the whist parties and for living in; but it was so dark in the portico which surrounded the house, that Bobbie stumbled over a cane chair there. The dog now bayed close and angrily within one of the doors opening upon the portico, and at this door Bobbie knocked with his umbrella; but he had to knock thrice before a girl came rubbing her eyes — Sarah Gissing, who had been sitting asleep in the drawing-room. She did not know Bobbie, and stared at the visitors; as though they were part of her late dream.

“Is Mr Drayton still awake?” Bobbie asked in a low confidential tone.

“Yes, sir,” — Bobbie's and the poor Rosie's hearts sank — “at least he has not gone to bed.”

“Is he — there?” asked Bobbie in a low voice, indicating the drawing-room.

“He isn't, sir. We dunnot know where Mr Drayton is, nor Mrs neither. They must have gone out after dinner somewhere; but they didn't say they were going, nor where they were going to. And I'm sitting up, now, waiting for them.”

Bobbie's and Rosie's hearts rose again: the ordeal was put by at least some moments.

“But Mr Drayton's not married,” said Bobbie: “you speak of Mrs Drayton.”

“Yes, sir, Mr Drayton is married.”

“To whom?”

“To Mrs, sir.”

“I see. But where would, he be? can’t you guess?”

“I can’t, sir,” said Sarah. “There’s nowhere for them to have gone to. Gloucester — that’s the groom, sir — has been searching about the woods for them, but he couldn’t find them; and I’m sure there’s nowhere for them to have gone to.”

“How do you mean? they must be somewhere, you know. They haven’t gone in a carriage apparently, but mightn’t they have gone on foot to pay a visit somewhere?”

“No; sir, they never pay any visits.”

“And Mr Oswald and the Count, are they up?”

“They went to London to-day, sir. Gloucester is gone to fetch them, and they’ll be here after eleven.”

“Well, I don’t seem to know you, but I am Mr Drayton’s ward, and this is my lady, and her maid. We are going to stay here, so you will prepare us two rooms, and meantime we shall sit up till Mr Drayton comes home.”

The party of travellers had now entered the drawing room; Ernestine was sent up with Sarah to see to the rooms; Bobbie and Rosie sat in their ulsters, and waited, with silent glances at each other. It was half-past ten; it became eleven; and still Hartwell and Martha did not appear. Bobbie poured some wine from a decanter, with a gold ring marked “sherry” round its neck, and made Rosie take it, with a biscuit from the whist table. Then Sarah and Ernestine reappeared from above stairs, sat at a respectful distance, and all waited as silently as a party at a wake. Rosie sat with relaxed bent shoulders, and occasionally glanced at Bobbie with a glance which said nothing but the obvious fact: “Well, Bobbin, here we are, then, waiting. Destiny has brought us to this point, so far and no farther;” and Bobbie’s eyes rested on her with a glance which said precisely the same obvious thing. Their sense of relief at Hartwell’s absence gradually ceased to be acute, and even as they sat indolently enjoying that absence, they began almost to wish that he would come; and the candles in the candelabra burned lower.

“I suppose he is quite certain to come some time to-night,” called Bobbie to Sarah.

“Oh, certain, sir,” answered the good Sarah, who had very little reasoning power, and, besides, was dying with sleep.

Ernestine, too, seemed very sleepy, and so did Rosie. At half-past eleven Bobbie sent the two servants to bed, saying he would sit up, and he wished to send Rosie also, but she would not go; before midnight, however, she had thrown off the splendid hat, and was asleep on his lap with her head on his shoulder, while Bobbie watched alone.

A minute before midnight Dulaunay’s retriever, Mascotte, which had been asleep in the fireplace, again began to make a noise, and soon a man’s head peeped in at one of the windows — it was Gloucester’s, who had just returned from his useless drive to Felmingham to bring home Oswald and Dulaunay. Instead of Sarah, whom he expected to see in the lighted drawing room, he saw a young gentleman with his lips laid on the forehead of a girl asleep on his lap. Gloucester knew Bobbie, however, and called out: “Beg pardon, sir, is Mr and Mrs Drayton come home yet?”

“Not yet, Gloucester,” answered Bobbie, wondering who on earth “Mrs” Drayton could be, since he knew that it was not Julia.

“It seems funny, sir,” said Gloucester: “you not long come, I suppose, sir?”

“I came by the 9.50.”

“Everybody gone to bed, sir?”

“Yes, I sent off the girl. What, then, can have become of Mr Drayton?”

“There’s no telling, sir. I was wondering, sir; whether anything couldn’t be done?”

“In what way do you mean? I suppose, Gloucester, that he has gone to London or somewhere?”

“He’d hardly walk to Felmingham, sir. Mrs Drayton she couldn’t half walk it, I know, if she tried.”

“Then where is he?”

“No telling, sir,” said Gloucester, scratching his head.

“What about Mr Oswald and the Count — not turned up?” asked Bobbie.

“No, sir, I went to fetch them, but they haven’t come — I feel a bit queer about Mr and Mrs Drayton, sir.”

“But why so? there are no wolves to eat him, or precipices for him to fall over. He must be somewhere, Gloucester.”

“Can’t think where they could have got to, sir — But no doubt it’s all right — Well, good night to you, sir.”

“Good night.”

Gloucester departed to the stables; put up his horses, and sought, his bed with a head nodding toward sleep. And ten minutes after him, Bobbie, too, gave up, took a candle, and, following the directions which Sarah had left him, found his room, and was soon floating in cloudland in the affectionate arms of a being who was half Rosie and half Morpheus.

Where, then, meantime, were Hartwell and Martha?

After dinner that evening, at which he, Martha, and Barnes had sat alone, Hartwell had gone up to his study to write a business letter to Birmingham about the trial of his electrical machine, which was to take place on the Tuesday following; he had left Martha with Barnes in the drawing-room; she was then reading a novelette at the dying fire — dying, for the night was very warm for November, though inclement; but when Hartwell had come down again near eight, Martha was no longer there: he had questioned Barnes, and Barnes with his left hand had pointed dumbly out ward, to show that Martha had gone for a stroll. Hartwell then went into the portico and paced about, glancing anxiously anon at the clouds, or peering down the path in the forest. Sarah Gissing came presently and took Barnes, and Hartwell saw her lead him slowly across the lawn to the edge of the forest on the left, where the path commences to mount steeply toward the ruin and the chalk cottages. Ten minutes passed after this, and still Martha did not appear. Then suddenly that rain which in London, too, Oswald had seen from Hartwell's bedroom window, came pelting, whereupon Hartwell ran in, seized his hat and an umbrella, and ran down the forest path to the right to find and cover Martha.

But he could see no sign of her in any direction.

One of her favorite spots for sitting and reading was the well in a glade of the pines, and to this glade he went. It was a very solitary spot, though only a ten minutes' walk from the Pavilion stables, and here could be heard the many sounds which went on in the pines, and the music that was made in there always, as it were great choral happenings taking place far away in Heaven, the shout of numbers without number, strange rumours of which seemed to be brought on the breezes to the ear of the listener; one of the pines, in fact, was so close to the well that Martha, sitting on the coping, would often hear queer rumbling noises going on within its trunk when the breezes swayed its tall top. The well had long fallen into disuse, and was almost hidden by the grasses, nettles, and coarse fern, which nested in it. On the side where the half lid was, the ground was quite a swamp, but on the other side two slabs in the mud made the approach dry. Hartwell had not liked Martha to be there, for a mist arose from the depths of the well, and he had even thought of filling it in, but had hesitated to do so, since she seemed to like it.

When he now entered the little glade, which was called the Round Point, Martha was not to be seen. He called to her in the pouring rain, but received no answer. The night was getting very dark. He ran from the glade in another direction.

XXX. IN THE WELL

HARTWELL SEARCHED FOR an hour, till near nine, but could not find Martha. He thought that she might have gone, not down, but up hill, and up there might have taken shelter from the rain in the Gissings' cottage or in Steve Anderson's; but she had not been in either of them. He returned to the Pavilion with a flash in the eye. The rain had now almost ceased. He went into the drawing room; she had not come home. He stood in the middle of the room, thinking it out; and there an intuition of the truth for the first time flashed across his mind.

Martha's vitality, as has been said, did not amount to much: she often fell asleep, or fainted, at hardly a moment's notice; and Hartwell now thought that she might have sat to read on the well alone, there fallen asleep or fainted, lost her balance, and tumbled into the well.

He was not a man who easily lost command of himself, but this thought turned him white, and his lip trembled. The instant feeling in him was the ugly one that she might be dead, and that it was not he who had killed her.

He was agitated inwardly; but his actions were cool enough! He felt in his jacket-pocket, and found that a box of matches was there; he then walked into the next room across the passage, searched in a drawer, and found a ball of twine. He then came back to the drawing room, took a candle, puffed out its light, and now hastened out with these things through the drizzle toward the Round Point.

As he made his way thither in the now confirmed darkness, some sinister thoughts, or feelings rather than thoughts, like unclean snakes lifting their heads, occurred in his mind. If he did not let them speak aloud, they at least whispered and hissed in his consciousness. Human nature has not yet rid itself of the traits of its brutal ancestry, and is often not pretty, in spite of one's long effort to live well; Hartwell was surprised and shaken by the suddenness of this thing, and what he felt was that, if she were dead, then he was free; that, if she were dead, he had not killed her with his own hand, and yet he was free.

He felt that Julia's engagement with the young Archduke was of no importance; that in the face of his freedom, of his resurrection, all that would vanish out of existence like a mist.

He did not know that at this very hour of 9.15 the shreds of Letty Barnes' letter were already in Oswald's hands in London, and that he, Hartwell, stood that moment in peril of losing all, or of being hanged. He made towards the Round Point, and his pace quickened to a run.

Stopping over the two slabs in the mud, he stood by the well, and gazed into its depths; and as he gazed, stooping over the brickwork coping, the gold pin that was in his tie, shaken loose perhaps by his run, fell out, and, down there below made a faint splash and echo. He called down once the word "Martha," but the well called back only the echo of his own voice.

He straightened himself, and tying the candle tight with the twine at a point somewhat nearer to the wick than to the bottom end, lit it under his hat, for it was drizzling; and he proceeded to lower it carefully into the well, peering over. The candle, as it went down, lay obliquely between upright and horizontal, but the flame turned upright, and was scorching the string, seeing which, Hartwell quickened the rate of paying out. In the impure air down there the light burned feebly, but still it lived, and was a yard or so from the surface of the water when the scorched string parted, the candle splashed, and all was blackness down there again. But for one moment

Hartwell had seen something white — a guess of the eyres, a mere glimpse of something; and this convinced him that Martha was there.

Dead probably — but also possibly not. The well was hardly so deep that she would necessarily strike the east side of its wall in her fall; the water, he knew, was hardly so deep as to prevent her from being broken to pieces on the bottom. It was possible that she was not dead; she certainly soon would be — if he waited — thinking about it — wilfully wasting time: and from his bosom there came a growl of disgusted self-conviction which uttered the words: “Robert Hartwell!”

He now ran fast enough — up a rising path in the pines, over a ditch and a stile, down a stony way, to the stables; and as he entered the quadrangle he called out sharply, angrily, with flashing eyes, “Gloucester!”

Gloucester, however, did not happen to be there; he had been smoking in the kitchen at the Pavilion since dinner, and at this very time was out with a lantern and umbrellas, searching for the master and mistress, Sarah Gissing having just before discovered their absence.

Hartwell called him several times, and, not receiving any reply, understood that whatever was to be done must be done by himself alone; only one man, Gloucester, was on the place, beside Steve Anderson, Gissing, and Barnes, who were far enough away. Oswald and Dulaunay were in London; and Hartwell, not sure whether Gloucester was at the Pavilion, would not spend the four minutes necessary to run there, but, plunging into one of the stables, came out with a coil of small new rope on his arm, and then started back again, through the pines with running feet, which trod on a carpet made of tiny stems, the dry stems of the pine-leaf; and as he ran he cast away his jacket, and then his waistcoat, first placing the matches in his bosom. His plan of action was already formed in his own mind. He intended to let down over the axle of the old windlass a length of the rope sufficiently long for the two ends to be within his reach when he stood at the bottom of the well. He would then fasten one of the two hanging ends under Martha's arms, and hauling at the other part of the rope would thus hoist her to the windlass. For his own descent into the well, he would cut off a length of the rope — he had a penknife in his trouser pocket — and tie one end round the axle. When he was down, and had Martha hoisted to the axle, he would go up again by his own rope, grasping not only it but Martha's rope as well, so that she should not slip down again meantime. This would be almost equivalent to taking his own weight plus Martha's up a swinging rope. But, he was still very strong, though not what he had been, and, she being very light, he was confident that he would manage it somehow, even if she slipped back down a little as he climbed up. He might even possibly find a projecting stone or something at the bottom, to which to fasten the rope after she was hoisted, while he climbed by his own rope.

Coming therefore to the well, he set hurriedly to work. His first care was to ascertain the depth, and this he did by tying a stone in an end of the rope, lowering it, listening for the splash, and marking the depth by a knot in the rope. He then proceeded to cut off from the rope a length equivalent to double the well's depth; but, having done this, he found that only about two yards of the rope was left for his own descent. He had not thought of this possibility of the rope running short; and he was eager now to have the poor Martha safe in his arms.

For a moment or two, he did not know what to do: to run back to the stables or to the Pavilion was to lose another fifteen minutes; he soon remembered, however, the old rope attached to the wheel and axle, reached out and felt it; a chain and hook hung at its end; and there it had lain coiled round the axle under its tin hood for many years. Hartwell had a doubt whether it would bear his weight. It was so rotten and frayed, though quite three times stouter than the rope from the stables. He set to turning the wheel, letting the old rope move down through his outstretched left hand. It was certainly thin at some points — he could not see, but he could feel. That, however, was the only alternative to going back to the stables, and he was afraid to go back lest, on the way, he should feel glad at the delay. He decided to run the dreadful risk: and in the depths of the soul, something darkly whispered him that, if instead of killing Martha, as he had once thought of doing, he should happen to die for her, then somehow that would not be a bad thing for the stars above the glade to see, or for that music in the pines to make a theme of.

Sitting on the brickwork he quickly had off boots, trousers, shirt, threw the new rope over the axle with its two ends let down to the bottom, and, as gently as he could, he hung his weight on the old rope. He was very brawny, and in his working man days in the Birmingham factory, had often tackled weights and tasks that others had shied at. His descent into the darkness was attended, therefore, with little trouble, save a growing unease in breathing the stagnant air down there, and his feet safely touched the water and the bottom slime.

Now, at the actual experience of that place, he no longer believed that Martha could be alive, its mood was so chilling to the lamp of life like caverns of the deep sea and the raw breath of mermaids; an impression of awe touched Hartwell; his lips pronounced in a low tone the name of Martha.

There was a slow dripping sound in the darkness. He did not know whence it came; but it was water dripping from Martha's hat, and from one end of the new rope.

He had the matches under his vest, and after some efforts got one of them alight; it burned quite feebly, but he saw her; and at once, seeing her, he realised afresh that she might be alive. She seemed to be on both knees, with her back against the wall, her head and neck above the surface of the water, her eyes closed, her mouth open, her hat still on her head. He concluded that, after falling, she must have been more or less conscious of drowning, and in her struggles must have instinctively taken that position at the moment of fainting; whether the water had protected her limbs from fracture on the well's bottom, he could not tell; the expression of her face was like death, but he saw no blood, and life was at least possible. As the match went out, something half-floating touched his left thigh. It was her handkerchief.

He lost not a moment now, but, putting back the matches under his vest, where he also had his penknife in case of need, he made a loop at one end of her rope with a knot that would not run. As he now moved to take her into his arms, his foot struck upon something, and slipped: It was a wooden pail or bucket, water-logged and sunken to the bottom, there long years before. He recovered his footing and standing over Martha, soon had her in his left arm with a sense of surprise at her lightness, which the pressure of the water caused to seem still greater than it was in reality. Without stopping to ascertain if she were dead or alive, he pressed her to his heart, for dearly Hartwell loved her, now that he was there to save her, dearly "as a father pitieth his children," and as he passed the loop under her arms, with her back toward the length of the rope, his lips found and pressed her cold cheek in a kiss more blessed than any which he had ever given to Julia; more blessed and more blessing, for it is scientific to say, that magnetic virtues streaming from so pure and fervent a kiss may have given to Martha a fresh lease of life.

The loop having been well adjusted, under her arms, Hartwell proceeded to hoist her up by pulling downwards at the other part of her rope. The axle was smooth and the rope came easily, but his difficulty was to keep on his legs; the ground was so slippery. Several times there were jerks and narrow escapes from falling, and when she was gone some yards up, as he was moving backward, to prop himself against the wall, a nail standing in the mosses, on the bottom, ran far into his left heel, causing him such pain that he had to hold her weight with one trembling arm, while with the other hand he slowly drew out the nail, which he put inside his vest. He then continued to haul her up, and soon could dimly see her form as she rose higher and still higher in to the less dense darkness, up there above, while the well resounded with echoes at the continued rain that dribbled down from her clothes and body into the water, resounded too with echoes at the labor of Hartwell's breath; with echoes even of the movement of the rope on the axle; he started with something like a fright at the dropping of one of her shoes when she was nearly up, it came with such a sudden hum, and then a splash, and long reverberation; at last he felt the check up there above and saw that she had reached the axle.

He now moved round the wall this way and that, the rope grasped with the double turn round the right hand, feeling with the left to see if he could find any projection such as are seen in some wells, suitable for him to make the rope fast to; but he found none, and lost little time in searching. He next groped with the left arm, till he found the old bucket, against which he had stumbled; it had an iron handle, and lifting it by this, but holding it still under the water, so that its weight remained almost nil, Hartwell contrived with his left hand to tie the rope to its handle; he then let Martha down two or three feet, whereupon the bucket rose full of water, above the surface, its weight now acting as a considerable counterpoise to Martha's weight, for it was of large size; so that Hartwell could now climb up his own rope with less difficulty in holding Martha from slipping back down.

Grasping now his own old rope and Martha's new rope also in both hands, he put his foot in the hook at the end of the old rope, and began to climb — with a renewed misgiving in him as to whether his rope would bear him, though he now thought of this with a less chilly sense of peril than before, for use gives confidence. Up then, he went, hand over hand, each clutch of the hand grasping not one rope, but two — a -much more earnest business than his coming down, more jerky, more swayed, more doubtful as to its issue. The well was now full of sounds, hoots, omens; the bucket was slipping up and up, foot by foot, drawn up by Martha's weight in spite of his grinning effort to keep Martha steady, and he could hear the water in the bucket wash over its rim, as it swung to this side or to that anon, to splash in a mass into the water of the well, these sounds interrupting the steady watery sound of the wet which dribbled profusely down from his own clothes, and from Martha's; he could hear, also, the echoes of his own respiration, the echoes of his palms clapping in turn upon the ropes; the well seemed to listen to everything, to mock everything, and to be a gnome enjoying itself with banter at Hartwell's vain struggle to escape and reach that remote top; terribly remote it more and more seemed to him — a goal for a Hercules to reach, and then drop dead at. When he had got to the middle of the height, it looked no nearer than before; Martha had then slipped down several yards, and a sort of rage to reach the goal akin to madness by this time possessed Hartwell's whole being. With a wild face, with jerks and gasps, and staring eyes, and a gaping mouth, he struggled on.

But a little beyond the half-way point, the old rope parted at a thin place, and cut his labours short.

What now followed happened perhaps in two seconds, though it cannot be so rapidly described. Hartwell felt that his rope was gone — the instant splash into the water of the lower part was reported by a shout of the well — yet he felt that he was not all unsupported in empty space, though he was descending, for he was clutching still to Martha's rope with one hand, and her weight was counterbalancing his; if he had continued to hold on, slipping meanwhile down Martha's rope, he could have reached the bottom with perfect ease and safety; but he was instantly conscious — as his own rope snapped — that if he clung on to Martha's rope, his weight, and the weight of the bucket, would in some seconds drag her back up the axle, from which she had slipped down a few yards, and there crush in her chest, or break her back. At this half a thought in that wild moment, his fingers relaxed from her rope — and with a loud shout he fell back ward.

And at once up there above, at the axle, would have been audible, but for the watery uproar of Hartwell's splash, a humming which grew in vehemence: it was Martha coming down, and the haste of her rope running over the axle made the humming. But though she fell from the top, and Hartwell only from half-way, her fall was much less terrible than his: for she was counterbalanced by the weight of the bucket of water which, as she came down, moved up with increasing speed. The bucket was tied near the middle point of the rope's length, and happily she reached the water half a second before the bucket reached the axle — happily, for if the water had not broken the impetus of her fall, before the bucket struck the axle, the shock of the sudden stoppage of the bucket at the axle must have killed her; and as the water protected her, from the shock of the bucket's stoppage, so the bucket as well as the water protected her from the shock against the bottom of the well. For though the bucket's handle was torn away from it by its impact upon the axle, yet that temporary check must have lessened the force of Martha's impact upon the bottom; however it was, she received little or no injury from that second fall.

And she had no sooner struck the bottom than she was up again, for Hartwell lifted her. He was still under the water, momentarily stunned, when she had come; she had come more or less upon him, and as he rose with a dislocated left shoulder, he brought her with him on his breast, uttering a bubbling sound of calamity and pain, as his head emerged from the drench.

He rose to his feet, but tottered, slipped, floundered, and then knelt with her against the wall, a long time, gasping, his eyes closed, his face leant against the mosses and weeds, which all down there covered the wall of the well.

While he knelt there, the facts of his situation passed dismally and wearily through his mind; there were only two hopes: that the bucket had been stopped at the axle, in which case, since the bucket was at about the middle point of the rope's length, both ends of the rope would still be at the bottom of the well; he could thus draw Martha up again into the pure air, and find or invent some means of making fast the end of her rope below while he slept; for he knew that he must soon sleep, and then slowly die of the narcotic poison contained in the air which he was breathing; it was true that the candle and match had burned in it, and that where a candle burns a man may breathe; but where the candle burns very dimly it is certain that the man will not breathe very long. He felt already that he would have sooner or later to give in and sleep, as Martha slept, and his hope of finding the other end of the rope was his only hope for her; for himself, he had no hope, except a rather faint one, that they might be discovered and rescued in time, either by Gloucester now, or by Dulaunay and Oswald later on when they returned from London. He had little hope that the women servants would have the instinct to make an organised search because of the temporary absence of himself and Martha; and as to Gloucester, he was a rather slow minded fellow. Hartwell's hope in this direction, then must rest on the return of Oswald and Dulaunay; they would hear from a servant of his absence; might then very possibly come to the round point and would at once see his clothes by the well. They would be at Corton by 12 — two hours and a quarter; he believed that he might keep awake till then.

But, as we know, they did not return to Corton at all that night: Dulaunay's discovery of Hartwell's secret, and his drive to Julia to tell her all, had made him miss his train; Oswald had the shreds of Letty's letter, and instead of coming to Corton wrote a command to Hartwell to come to him. Instead of Dulaunay and Oswald, came Bobbie and his charming Rosie, but Bobbie, knowing nothing of the habits of life at Corton, of its seclusion and uneventfulness, did not see that the absence of Hartwell and Martha at that late hour necessarily meant danger; he supposed that they were paying some vague visit, and were "somewhere," while Sarah Gissing, on the contrary, was of opinion that they could not possibly be anywhere.

At the moment when Martha dropped back to the bottom of the well, at about fifteen minutes to ten, Gloucester had actually been seeking the missing pair with umbrellas, but had not come to the round point, where he could not suppose them to be, since he knew that in the round point there was no shelter from the rain which was falling; he had now returned to the Pavilion, had left the umbrellas there, had hurried to the stables to harness the horse, and without discovering the removal, by Hartwell, of the coil of rope from the stables, was off to Felmingham to bring home Oswald and Dulaunay.

Whatever hopes, therefore, Hartwell had in Gloucester, or in Oswald, and the Count, were not to be realised; his hope, also, of hoisting Martha up again into the fresh air came to nothing: for, when he painfully lifted himself from his knees, and groped for the rope end knot attached to Martha, he could not find it, since, in fact, it was yards above his reach, Martha having dragged considerably more than half the rope's length over the axle with her; nor did Hartwell need to grope long to guess how things were, for his foot again struck on the bucket, which now again lay at the bottom of the well, and he understood that, since it was there, its handle must have been wrenched off at its impact on the axle, and the rope must then have run well beyond its middle point on the axle after Martha, taking the handle with it on one side of the axle, while the bucket fell down on the other side.

He thought, however, that there was still a possibility that the missing rope end might be within his reach, and with Martha at his bosom in his right arm, he moved blindly about, forging through the water which reached to his middle, feeling for the rope end with moans and groans. He did not yet know that, even if he found the missing rope end, he would be unable to draw up Martha a single yard, since his left arm hung useless at his side; but there was nothing else for him to do, except to seek and seek the rope with hopeless obstinacy throughout the small circle of his dungeon. He made no attempt to strike any of the marches under his vest, for he knew that they were soaked, and the permanence of the darkness of that place, where no ray came, soon had an inner darkening effect upon his mind also, quenching the mind's power to hope, or to picture to itself any reality save the well, and the water and slime in it, and the dark sounds that had their old home in it remote from light and the human world. The task of bearing Martha on his bosom, and searching in the dark for the rope end, seemed to have been born with him, while Gloucester, Oswald, Dulaunay, became to his mind like people known an age ago in another state of being, and the possibility that they might come to rescue him and that burden which he bore like a doom on his breast seemed more and more visionary to him. The semi-circle of only half-darkness above, between the lid and the coping, ceased as the hours passed, to speak to him of nearness with the upper world and the one star visible in it to him not visible that dark night to people above, finally seemed as more remote from his hopes and his powers than the Pavilion, or Gloucester, or the coming of any human aid. He could do nothing but grope, and groan and stare upward. A tight feeling, as if his chest was tied up, oppressed him; at one time, for about half an hour, he became conscious of great agony in his left arm; but this gradually passed off as the narcotism of the carbonic gases worked upon his senses. He became very heavy, more and more disposed to give up and die.

But he endured till some time after Dulaunay and Oswald should have come, till some time after Bobbie and Rosie and Gloucester went nodding to their beds about midnight; and then he could sustain his own weight and Martha's no longer; he mumbled something, and abandoned himself to the charm of what was wooing him.

In a sullen way, to save himself and her from death from drowning (though he did not know at all if she were dead or alive), he pulled down the rope from the axle, and placed the bucket with its bottom upward against the wall; he then sat on the bucket, his back to the wall, his head and part of his chest above the water; and placing Martha between his legs with her feet on the well's bottom he tied her to his body round and round with many whorls of the rope, her face to the wall, and a considerable part of her body above the water; so that, so long as he did not fall off the bucket during sleep, she could not fall either, but if one drowned, both would drown. And this done, Hartwell leant his head on the mosses of the wall, and the well echoed his last waking sigh.

XXXI. THE SEARCH

THE NEXT MORNING at an early hour there was discussion in the servants' room at the Pavilion, between the women servants, when Sarah announced that the master and mistress had not come home; and at first the discussion was marked by mere surprise, at a casual event, till the most original of the three uttered a word of misgiving, whereupon it was not long but that misgiving proved catching like fire or fever, a fear that had been asleep in them all woke up, and finally they were telling to one another their certainty that something was wrong: which proves that truth is rank, and a gram of it once cast forth will grow.

"I'd better go and see if Gloucester has anything to say about it," suggested Sarah.

Gloucester was sweet on Sarah, so that her errand to the stables would combine something of coquetry with business; her mood at the moment was grave enough, but the heart is deceitful, and subtly mixed its own undercurrents in her motives. At once Sarah started off with her rather silly scare of flurry, calling back over her shoulder: "You had better take up the hot water to the young gentleman and lady, Ethel, and try to wake up that lazy French girl again." She ran to the kitchen door, where she met the milkman with his hand raised to ring, dropped to him the news that the master and mistress were missing, and ran up an alley in the pines toward the stables.

It was a bright Sunday morning, after the rainy night, everything, including the air itself, looking washed and fresh, and the smell in the pines full of health and liveliness; but Sarah's anticipated pleasure in rousing Gloucester to give him startling news and saucy smiles was dashed by the appearance of Gloucester himself in the alley bearing a sack of fir cones for the kitchen fires.

"Master and mistress got home?" he asked at once, before Sarah could speak.

"That's just what I was coming to you about," she replied: "you ought to have searched for them when you got back from the station last night, for something dreadful has happened."

The consensus of opinion in the servants' room that something dreadful had happened was the same thing to her simple mind as a proof that it had happened.

"What's happened?" asked Gloucester, startled.

"Something dreadful," she repeated, with certainty.

"That's only what you think," said Gloucester; "I had a talk with young Mr Hartwell, who was in the drawing-room when I got back from the station last night, and we both agreed that there wasn't anything that could 'er happened" — and the mere agreement between Bobbie and himself was as good proof to Gloucester of the one view as the agreement in the servants' room was proof to Sarah of the opposite view.

"Girls always know too much," remarked Gloucester.

"As much as the men, I dare say," said Sarah.

"Yes, they think so," retorted Gloucester.

"You must have had your head full of them last night, I should think, or you would 'er done something," said Sarah.

"Well I don't know," replied Gloucester; "I might 'er had my head full of them. I looked up to your window to see if I could see any light—"

“I didn’t come here to hear any sauce,” said Sarah, not quite truly. “Something must be done at once.”

“I don’t know what to do, then. Nothing that I know of couldn’t ’er happened to them, not at Corton.”

“But it stands to reason they must be somewhere, Gloucester,” protested Sarah, though she had previously laid it down as a dogma that they could not be anywhere; “and they haven’t gone off the estate, or master would have had the carriage, Ethel says, so they wouldn’t be far, and ought to be looked for.”

Gloucester walked by her side with a puzzled brow; to seek them on the estate, two grown up people, where there were no wild beasts, except poachers, seemed to him childish; he could imagine nothing, save the possibility that for some queer reason they had slept at the Gissings’ or at Anderson’s cottage; but, as he and Sarah came in sight of the back of the Pavilion, they saw old Gissing, to whom, at that early hour, the day was already old, for he was always up and abroad with the lark; he was now trudging towards the kitchen, in his Sunday waistcoat, but without any jacket, for a good morrow to his daughter and the others, when Gloucester and Sarah came upon him, and told their tale of the missing two.

The old man thought it over deliberately, with his wrinkled, lax brow bent toward the ground, and the first thing that came into his head was the possibility that Oswald had done some evil to his brother.

“What does Mr Oswald and the French Count say about it,” he asked.

“They aren’t at home,” answered Gloucester, “They went to London yesterday, and last night when I took the trap for them, they hadn’t come back.”

Gissing thought it over again, and said: “Seen Anderson yet this morning?”

“Not yet,” was the answer.

“He’d likely be at that broad on the yon side of the ruin, Gloucester, you run and fetch him, and I’ll wait about here till you come.”

Gloucester hurried off, Sarah went into the house to wait on the young married couple, and Gissing paced up and down the alley with a look of care on his face till Gloucester returned with the sullen Anderson striding like a giant in his top-boots. The three men then held a council on the state of affairs, or rather, two of them, for Anderson contributed only grunts, and finally Gissing said:

“Anderson ‘ll search all in them woods to the west of the ruins: I’ll take them grouse and low ground shootings to the north; and you, Gloucester, will go all through the pines and the coppice wood, down beyond that frog pond to the shooting range; and we’ll all meet again on the lawn in front.”

The three men then separated, and spent three hours of search without their breakfast, each in his agreed part of the estate.

Bobbie and Rosie, meanwhile, breakfasted gaily in the dining room, inwardly enjoying the respite granted them by Hartwell’s absence with a childish zest in the present, and a child-like freedom from the troubles of the future, and of the past. Unused to the sorrows of life, they had no fear that any calamity had happened to Hartwell; Rosie occupied most of her morning in going over the old house, admiring its shabby antiquities, and feeling the charm of its romantic situation there in the heart of the forest.

Bobbie was looking out upon the portico near ten, when he saw Steve Anderson come and take his stand near the statue of Pan on the lawn, then in some minutes Gloucester, and finally Gissing; he saw them lay their heads together, and understanding that they had returned from the search for Hartwell, hurried out to join them, leaving Rosie in vague misery.

When he came up to the men, he heard Anderson saying, for the third time:

“I’ll swear they aren’t anywhere down there.”

“No, and they aren’t in the pines neither,” said Gloucester.

Gissing said nothing; the old man’s face was the very expression of care; and at no time was he a waster of words.

“Searched in the Round Point?” asked Gissing of Gloucester presently.

“I looked into it,” replied Gloucester: “they’d not be there, you know.”

Gissing looked hard at him, and after a minute said:

“Wait you here till I come back.” He trudged away down the forest path, and turned into an alley to the right, towards the Round Point: for an instinct of the truth had been for three hours ripening in the old fellow’s mind, and now had ripened into a thought.

XXXII. HARTWELL GOES UNDER

BOBBIE, GLOUCESTER, AND Anderson waited Gissing's return for about fifteen minutes, wondering whither he had gone, dropping occasional remarks and guesses. The sun was now high and bright, with few clouds in the sky, and though winter was near there were still many of the sounds made by birds and wildfowl in the woods.

Then a running figure was seen in the shadow down the path, beckoning, while still far off, and it was Gissing. When they hastened to meet, him, they saw him pale with that touching pallor of the flesh of an agitated old man. He gave no explanation, but said hurriedly:

"Gloucester, you run and put the horse in the trap, make paces for Felmingham, and fetch the doctor; tell him it may be a case o' drowning; you, Anderson, and the young master, go with Gloucester to the stables, and bring, between you, to the Round Point, them two ladders, and all the rope you can find. Look sharp, now, I'll be at the Round Point when you come."

The other three ran off behind the house, toward the stables, while Gissing retraced his steps down the path; in the alley to the right he unswung the door of an old hut, and took it with him; when Bobbie and Anderson ran down the footpath in the pines to the Round Point with the ladder and rope ends, they found Gissing bent down over the coping, with a lost stare into the depths, and on the coping they saw Hartwell's clothes, which the ferns and grasses had hidden from Gloucester's running glance earlier in the morning.

The two ladders were lashed together, and lowered into the well; but they did not reach the bottom; and it was necessary to lower them with a rope, the other end of which was then made fast to the nearest, of the pines. Few were the words spoken; Bobbie's face had lost its roses, and was stamped with a painful distress; anon Anderson growled to himself; Gissing seemed stricken dumb, and when he wished anything done, made signs with his hand. Sweat-drops stood on the old man's white brow, as he stripped off his Sunday things, put his box of matches between his teeth, stepped over the well, slid down the rope to the ladder, and thence went down to the bottom.

He found Hartwell sitting just as he had set himself on the bucket many hours before, and Martha lashed to him with her face to the wall; Gissing struck a match, peered at their faces, and cast up his eyes to heaven. There was some blood in the water.

He quickly found the rope end, unwound the rope from them, and taking Martha with the rope under her arms to the foot of the ladder, laid her on it, and, leaving her there, ran up with the other rope end, which he threw to Anderson from the ladder head, calling out: "When yon feel me jerk the rope, then pull away."

He then went down again, placed Martha with her back to the wall, and jerked the rope; Anderson and Bobbie pulled above, and Martha went up, raining her wet into the well.

Gissing next supported Hartwell in his arms, waited till the rope came back, and getting the loop under his arms, jerked the rope. As Hartwell, too, went up, but more slowly than Martha, the old man accompanied him all the way on the ladder, step by step, his eyes fixed loweringly on that pathetic figure, once so vigorous and masterful, but now so helpless, so drenched in disaster, and apparently in death.

At the top the faces of Hartwell and Martha were seen to be of a fixed expression, with a bluish tinge in their pallor; there they lay, Martha on the door in the grass, Hartwell on the coping with some froth on his white lips, both with the look of the drowned.

Not a word was spoken now, Gissing signed to Anderson and Bobbie to take up Martha, and to Anderson to help him take Hartwell upon his own back, though Anderson would have been far better able to carry all that weight than the old man, and it would have been better to carry Martha on the back, and Hartwell on the door: but Gissing arranged it otherwise. They then set off, Gissing bent under his burden in front, the others bearing Martha on the door behind. As they drew near the Pavilion, Bobbie wanted desperately to put down the door a minute, in order to run and get Rosie shut away from the terrible sight, but he could not venture to do this, and when they came to the lawn, Rosie, who was looking out, tearfully for Bobbie, saw the scene of tragedy slowly coming, and while they were tramping by the corridor stairs, she caught a glimpse of the two blue faces, and nearly fainted. By this time the women servants had got a scent of the horror, by seeing Gloucester dash off in his trap for the doctor, and they were in the corridor. One of them relieved the winded Bobbie of his end of the door at the foot, of the stairs, but Gissing bore his burden to the very couch in Hartwell's room, where he deposited him, and then dropped into a chair, panting painfully.

Martha meantime, was taken to her own room; brandy was poured between the teeth of both, and they were in bed in dry clothes before Gloucester arrived at noon with the doctor.

The doctor told Bobbie that Martha would not live, but that Hartwell would do well, though his arm was seriously injured; little could be done till the nurses, for whom he had sent from Felmingham, should arrive. He himself waited at the Pavilion most of the day, Gloucester meanwhile taking journeys to bring the objects required by the doctor, and in the afternoon to bring the nurses. Bobbie and Gissing sat with Hartwell, while Sarah and another servant was with Martha. Rosie was below, looking out in low spirits through one of the French windows of the drawing-room, occasionally catching a sight of the Parisienne, Ernestine, enjoying the beauties of nature down an avenue of the forest. Near three, Rosie was called to a tardy lunch. In crossing a passage, she saw Bobbie and the doctor coming down the stairs, lingered till the doctor went into the dining-room, and retaining Bobbie outside asked him in a low voice: "How are they Bobbie?"

"Looking better — You oughtn't to have peeped, you know, Rosie."

"But, Bobbie, I have something to tell you: you mustn't laugh — promise me first that you won't laugh, if I am wrong."

"Well, I promise."

"Bobbie, you promised not to laugh," replied Rosie, "but when I peeped and saw them, I seemed to recognise them both; she looked something like my mother, and I'm sure he is the image of my stepfather, for I remember him very well — and the same name, too, 'Drayton.'"

Bobbie, after staring at her a moment, said: "That seems odd."

"I am sure that there's a great resemblance," said Rosie.

"It must be some coincidence, I suppose," said Bobbie. "My guardian has only lately married, apparently, so he couldn't very well have been your stepfather five years ago; and yet — by Jove, if it were only true! No, it is only some coincidence. Come, have some lunch."

The coincidence, however, haunted the young couple that night, and was much discussed between them; accordingly, the next afternoon, three hours after Martha had opened her eyes, Bobbie let Rosie go into Martha's room:

for just the opposite of what the doctor had foretold came true, since Martha recovered herself more quickly than Hartwell, the fact being that Hartwell was a very strong, still breather, so that during the hours in the well he had breathed more of the poisonous air, and far more deeply, than the worthy Martha; hence, by four o'clock on the Monday afternoon, Martha had Rosie locked in her arms, but it was not till after five that Hartwell became conscious.

Hartwell lay still for some time, till, turning his head a little, with a twinkle in his eye he saw Bobbie, who was reading a book by the bedside; in a far corner, looking down at the floor, sat the old Gissing; a nurse was at the dressing-table, tidying. So far Bobbie had heard nothing of how Rosie had fared in Martha's room, which was some distance away: for Rosie was lying in bed with her mother; who, all taken up with the gladsome fact of her daughter's presence, would not let Rosie depart in order to call and exhibit Bobbie to her; and presently Bobbie, looking up, beheld the knowing twinkle in Hartwell's eye.

"Well. Bobbie, is that you?" asked Hartwell.

"I am glad to see you so well, sir," said Bobbie, springing up.

"What about my wife?"

"She has recovered consciousness, sir, and is doing very well.",

"Excellent. When, then, were we brought up out of the well?"

"About 11 o'clock yesterday morning, sir. This is Monday evening."

"Not till 11 in the morning? Who discovered us in the well?"

"Gissing, sir."

Hartwell's eye turned and dwelt with a grave meaning in it upon Gissing in his corner, who made a sudden, glad gesture of greeting with his arm toward the bed.

"And Martha is really doing well?"

“Yes, sir.”

“What became of you, Bobbie?”

“I was in Paris, sir.”

“Kidnapped, my friend? Imprisoned?”

“No, sir.”

“Why, then, did you not write to me?”

“It is rather a long; story, sir. I know that I was wrong, but perhaps if we wait until you are a little stronger—”

“No, tell me now.”

“The fact is, sir—”

“That’s a man: don’t be afraid.”

“I was married, sir.”

“Ah! married! that solution never struck me. Of course, that was it. I also — I also got married, Bobbie.” And in these last words was, a sorrow and reproach which wounded the young man, though he did not understand why.

“I do hope that you will be able to forgive me, sir,” said Bobbie, earnestly. “I feel terribly that I have been undutiful and a coward. I made you a promise which I have not kept; but in looking for the girl of your choice, I found my wife, if one may say so; and I was terribly tempted to disobey you by the love—”

“Say nothing, my friend,” said Hartwell. “Your existence was probably not allotted you with the sole design of accomplishing my wishes, and accordingly you do nothing of the kind. You have done as your father before you did, married unadvisedly in your youth, and as you have sown, so you will reap.”

“I have hoped that you will be able to forgive me, sir. I think if you only saw—”

“You have displeased and ill-used me, sir, more than you dream. I had pledged my word that you should marry her whom I sent you to seek; this marriage of yours places me in a doubly false position; and at one period of my life — take my word for it — you should have bitterly experienced my resentment. A letter from you some weeks ago might have — well! but what has to be will be. You are forgiven, if your companion proves to be as healthy in mind as she seems to be in body.”

“You are awfully good and kind, sir, really,” said Bobbie, warmly pressing his father’s hand with a light feeling that the ordeal was nearly over.

“I am sure that you will be fond of her, sir: she is quite as healthy in mind as you seem to know that she is in body.”

“I know from one of her red and crisp hairs, which you carry about on your person, my friend. I will see your agreeable companion, if you will bring her. First, go to Martha with my compliments, and ask her how she does.”

Bobbie turned to go, but before he had made a step, one of the two doors of the room opened, and in the opening appeared Martha, looking very weak and white, with a dressing gown thrown round her, supported by Rosie and Sarah Gissing, and anxiously followed by a nurse. Martha was all sighs, and yet was smiling. Hartwell sat up on his elbow, considering her and Rosie with a vivacious eye, while Bobbie ran to them, brought Martha, and placed her in the easy chair, in which he had been sitting by Hartwell’s bedside.

“Well, James,” sighed Martha— “Rosie, is this the young man?”

“Yes, mamma,” answered Rosie, her eyes fixed upon Hartwell with a rather scared and stand-offish expression, even though she now knew that it must have been herself whom Bobbie had been sent to seek; but she had acquired the habit of thinking of Hartwell with awe ever since her marriage, and moreover now saw in him the terrible stepfather who had separated her from her mother, and had shut her away from the world five years ago.

As for Hartwell, when he heard Martha say “Rosie,” and Rosie say “Mamma,” he understood all, that Bobbie had unknowingly married the girl whom he had been sent to look for; and at once a feeling of lightness and warm happiness, which communicated itself to every heart, became his mood. He put out his hand and shook Rosie’s, saying, “I am glad to see you,” while Rosie smiled and blushed like a fresh rose.

The good Martha was sighing as much for joy as for her feebleness, saying incoherently: “Well, he seems a nice young man — Why don’t you come and kiss your mother, boy? Look at the pair of them! People say that marriages are made in Heaven — but there’s no love like a mother’s love. James, why ever didn’t you tell me they were married!”

“I wished to surprise you, Martha,” said the worthy and ever artful Hartwell, with a benign and dancing eye.

“My goodness, that little girl, who would have believed it?” sighed Martha: “Can you see how it is with her, James? It’s a pair of them, my goodness; I only hope that that young man is legally married to her. I hardly know her, she’s that grown, and such a pretty girl she’s got, too.

“Look at her colour, and her eyes, the image of Harper’s, and red hair like his; it used to be as black as mine when she was a child. Boy, why don’t you say something to your mother, and let me hear you talk? He really is a very nice young man. She couldn’t have done much better. Well, everything turns out for the best, after all. I never felt so strange and happy as to-day, like my first find second wedding days, the third don’t count, for though I’ve been married thrice, I’ve only had two husbands — enough to make anybody laugh—”

Martha laughed droopingly and faintingly; she was in a species of happy distraction and flightiness of mind, almost, resembling hysteria.

“Well, I am glad to see you happy, Martha,” said Hartwell, “and your happiness makes me happy also. Rosie, are you glad to have found your mother?”

“Oh yes, papa, thank you,” said Rosie with a curtsy.

“Bobbie, I congratulate you on having found a charming wife and an excellent mother. Let me now see you embrace your mother.”

“I’m charmed, sir, I’m sure,” said Bobbie, with his little superior smile, and kissed Martha on each cheek.

Martha now began to cry for joy, saying:

“Oh, yes, it’s good of you, James give the devil his due, after all. You didn’t act well by me, locking me up in that tower five long years, and taking the child away. No one could say that you did, James; but still, give the devil his due, you’ve made up for it now; oh, yes, one must say that much for you, James.”

“I have done nothing,” said Hartwell, frankly, now, “the young man will tell you that it is all a happy chance—”

“Oh no, it isn’t,” answered Martha, blindly: “you’ve given her back to me, and married her to the fairy prince, as you said you would. I never believed that you would, because I know that you are always such a one for saying what you don’t mean. But you’ve done it right enough; and I daresay you’ve thought hard of me for nagging at you when you meant all the time to do it. Oh, yes, there’s no saying but what you’ve acted well by me lately. I know what you did in going down that well, after me, and nearly getting drowned your self; for Rosie has told me; and you look about as pale and weak as I do, I’m sure—”

“I couldn’t help myself—” began Hartwell.

“Oh yes, you could,” drawled the worthy and excellent Martha. “It’s a wonder to me that you didn’t leave my poor old bones down there, so as to marry that other tall woman, got up like a princess, who came to see you that night, for I shouldn’t be surprised if you have one of those sort of women in your eye all the time. But you thought more of your old woman, than of all the lot of them, when she was in danger, didn’t you; and risked your life, too — Oh, no, I’ve got to kiss you for that, James.”

Martha at last gave to Hartwell her first kiss since he had released her from the tower, lifting herself slowly on the arms of the easy chair, bending over and laying her lips upon his — a kiss so sweet to Hartwell that his eyes closed with rapture.

But Martha had not much room in her mind for any of the many emotions which thronged in it that day, except for her love of Rosie, her pride in her, and that sense of novelty and excitement with which one receives a fortune or a rich present. She turned from the bed to receive a cordial, which one of the nurses had brought, and drank it, looking up into the charming face of Rosie, with her arms around her; while Rosie looked at Hartwell — her awe now partly gone, and smiled to him, and Hartwell returned her smile with a beaming eye.

“And as to the Count and Oswald?” asked Hartwell, “where are they, Bobbie?”

“They went to London on Saturday, I am told,” answered Bobbie, “and haven’t come back yet.”

“That is odd; haven’t they written?”

“They may have: some letters came this morning.”

Among those letters was one from Oswald, commanding Hartwell to be at Oswald’s rooms in London that (Monday) afternoon at three; but as Bobbie made a movement to go and got the letters, Hartwell said, “well, never mind, we shall see later,” for at that moment Rosie was at his head with a brush in her hand, about to brush his rumpled hair, and Hartwell took her little hand and kissed it, saying at the same time to Bobbie, “All’s well that ends well.”

“I’m charmed, sir, I’m sure, to have so exactly carried out your wishes,” said Bobbie, with his little smile of self-approval. “Saul went out to seek his father’s asses, sir, and—”

“And became one of them, Bobbie, though he found a kingdom. Let nothing be said, my friend — Well, this is charming to have my hair brushed by such interesting hands.” Hartwell looked up at Rosie, with soft eyes, and she smiled with him. “But you were a naughty girl to run away; I heard all from Mary Seward, and was cross with you.”

“It was he who carried me away,” answered Rosie, slyly, all blushes and lowered lids, indicating Bobbie with the brush handle.

“Ah, ah, it was he; let the blame be with him, then. But, tell me, were you, on the whole, moderately happy with Miss Seward?”

“Yes, papa, only I was lonely sometimes. I wanted mamma.”

“I see all; but you are to believe that if it were to do again, I should not do it, but should keep you by my side, to protect and cherish you.”

“Yes, papa. It is all right now, since you sent Bobbie for me in the end. But why did you tell him, papa, that I had black hair, and that my name was Drayton?”

“You had black hair at one time,” said Hartwell, for he had just heard Martha say so, “and as for the name, let nothing be said; you can readily conceive that since I now consider you my own dear daughter, you were no longer Harper to me, but Drayton.”

This equivocal answer fully satisfied the mind of Rosie and of all, for they were all in that mental state in which the present alone seems of importance, and whatever points remained mysterious to any of them, were put in the background as of little moment in the face of their actual happiness.

Martha meanwhile was plying Bobbie with questions as to the place and date of his marriage, as to the strangeness of its privacy, and of his long absence from Corton, or praising his good looks and sprightly air, or giving vent to proverbs such as that there is no love like a mother's love, and that marriages are made in Heaven; then she turned to Hartwell, laying her cheek affectionately on his right hand (the left was in a sling), causing Hartwell's eyes to soften; and immediately afterwards, in her happy restlessness of mind, she was ogling with mock propriety at Rosie's condition, pretending to be scandalised that that little child, who was only so high a short time ago, should think of being a mother.

In the midst of all this, Martha's nurse came interposing with the demand that Martha should return to bed. Martha protested, but Hartwell said: "Go, Martha, and I will rejoin you presently in your room." Whereupon Martha was lifted by Bobbie and accompanied out by Rosie, who at the door, turned to give a parting smile to Hartwell, for between her and him there had already sprung up a secret understanding of amity and love.

When they were gone, Hartwell lay on his bed with closed eyes, drawing together the frown of his brow with his fingers, feeling that he had never been half so purely and deeply happy as in that hour; for as it were, a taste of sweet waters was in his breast, and a sound of that rhythm, which leaves the creation in a dancing march; he called the old Gissing to him, after some minutes, and with out saying anything, held the countryman's hand in his.

While he was doing this, there was a tap at that door of his bedroom' which opened into his little laboratory and study, and in came Dulaunay, with excited eyes, his hat on his head, and a hand-camera in his hand, for, fresh from London, he had just heard below, for the first time, the story of Hartwell's and Martha's night in the well. Hartwell called out, "Ah, Count, here we are, you see," and Dulaunay, going to the bed, took the sick man's hand with a gaze of new interest in the "Draytong" who was no longer "Draytong" to him, new interest, reverence and curiosity.

"I have heard — But, mon Dieu! you have the pale air!" breathed the Count; "is the arm, then, broken, sir?"

"Is the arm broken, nurse?" asked Hartwell.

"Only dislocated at the shoulder, sir; it will be all right in a few days," answered the nurse.

"I am conscious of no pain," said Hartwell: "I am well! I am strong!"

"How many hours, for example, were you there — down in that well," asked Dulaunay.

"Over twelve, my friend. If you had come back, as you promised, you would have drawn me out."

"Yes, I avow my fault, but how could I have been able to divine that which would arrive? In that which I did, my intention was good. But as to the excellent Martha?"

"She goes well also."

"It is very well. But that which astonishes me is your audacity to descend that well alone. I can feel the terror of it in my nerves — phrrrrr. And it was Martha that you went to seek?"

"My wife, Count."

"Precisely sir, your wife."

The excellent Count said no more, but taking off his cap laid his lips on Hartwell's hand.

"And as to the two young married!" he cried, with fresh animation when this deep act of homage was over; "have you then seen them?"

“Yes, I have seen them,” said Hartwell, smiling.

“Oh, la, la, have you been, then, angry?”

“No, I have been content. The lady whom Bobbie has married is the same whom I sent him and you to look for in Gloucestershire.”

“Not possible!”

“Yes, thank God.”

The Count gave vent to a buffoon laugh, crying out:

“Oh, la, la, it is even the history of Oedipus. He has, then, married, rightly, by mistake, the young Bobbie. Here is that which it is to be tricked by the destiny. He wished to play the prodigal, and finds himself, probably with disgust, the good son. Miss Scatchett told me in London — By the way, “Draytong”, have you received the envelope with the shreds of paper from Oswald?”

At this question Hartwell’s eyebrows lifted.

“You don’t mean that you have given them to Oswald?” he asked, struck by a pang of vague apprehension.

“But yes,” answered the Count. “I was pressed to arrive somewhere Sunday night, and gave the envelope to Oswald that he might bring it to you, that which he undertook to do; but when I returned to Addison-road more late, Miss Scatchett said me, to my astonishment, that Oswald had not gone down to Corton, but had the intention to sleep in London. Yesterday, therefore, I rendered myself at Oswald’s apartment in order to ask him why he had not brought the envelope, since I knew that you wished to receive it at once, but Oswald was not at home; this morning again I went to see him, and again he was not at home—”

“Well, let us hope that the matter may not prove serious, Count.”

“How? Do those shreds contain anything of secret, then?”

“I have no idea what they contain,” said Hartwell. “I only know that by this time Oswald has read them, and that that may mean mischief.”

“Oh, my head of magpie!” exclaimed Dulaunay in despair. “What vexing circumstances. How could I have been able to be so stupid, so—”

“Well never mind. Perhaps it is not of importance,” said Hartwell. “Oswald may even have sent the shreds, for I have not yet seen my letters to-day. You might look for me, Count, on my desk in the study, and see if there is anything in Oswald’s writing, also any Birmingham letters about my electrical machine, to be tested to-morrow. Bring those, and leave the rest.”

Dulaunay hurried into the next room, but immediately returned, saying that there was no letters, for they had not been put, as usual, on Hartwell’s desk that morning, but handed to Bobbie, who had put them somewhere else.

“Well, never mind; another time,” said Hartwell, who was too happy in Martha’s happiness to be greatly troubled by vague possibilities. “I have to go to Martha’s room, where I hope you will join us all, Count, after dinner.”

By this time it was six o’clock, and the lamp was alight. Dulaunay helped Hartwell to rise and dress, conducted his rather feeble steps to Martha’s room, was presented to the blushing Rosie, and felicitated everyone. Then those that were well went down to dinner, while Hartwell remained by Martha’s bedside, till later on all reassembled to spend the evening in Martha’s room, an old-fashioned apartment looking by two windows upon the lawn and upon the forest, lighted by candles in sconces, and panelled in old brown oak. Martha wished for whist, so a small table was drawn to her bedside, where she and Hartwell played against Bobbie and Dulaunay, while Rosie sat with her head on Bobbie’s shoulder, and one of her hands in Martha’s. The Count acted the wild boy, with a touch of the buffoon for Rosie's benefit, telling droll stories, which when they tended to become too French were checked by a glance of Hartwell's happy but doubtful eye, while Rosie had only to lift her eyes to meet the Count's musing gaze of admiration. The blinds were drawn, and a bright fire burned in the grate, for outside a wintry moaning of the wind was heard. In a far corner of the room sat the dumb Barnes, who had been brought upstairs after dinner to see Hartwell, and had remained there ever since without a movement, watching the family party at their game.

Martha for the first time played loosely, and lost a rubber. "I can't believe my eyes," she said constantly. "Here have I been expecting to see the same little girl that I lost five years ago, and look at her now. Why, the boy and girl ought to be at school instead of thinking of such things.

"No," said Hartwell, who approved of early marriages, "they have done well."

"They are even in an excellent school," said the Count, "in which they are the teachers one of the other. Bobbie, my friend, my compliments. Your taste is even exquisite, if madame will permit me to say it. I raise my glass to you both."

The Count clinked his glass with Bobbie's and Rosie's, then with Hartwell's and Martha's and all round the glasses clinked. On the table were the old decanters, with loose gold rings round their necks marked Port and Sherry, together with cake and biscuits.

"Martha, I drink to your excellent health," said Hartwell with a lifted glass.

"Thank you, James," replied Martha, "and I drink to yours, too, James."

"Shall we always live here, and never go away anywhere, or be separated?" asked Rosie.

"Would you like that?" asked Hartwell, gently.

“Oh, I should, papa,” cried Rosie, “for I do so like Corton. I never dreamt that there could be such a nice old place, looking just like a fairy place. I hope that we shall be always here, and just like this every night, you and mamma, and Bobbie and Monsieur le Comte and I, and no one else. Bobbie, listen to the sound of the wind in the woods.”

“You shall be well pleased,” said Hartwell. “Here we will stay, and you shall be the young Queen of Corton, and we all your court, for I see that you are fully worthy to be our Queen, and our darling also.”

Bobbie’s eyes rested a moment on his guardian’s face with a grateful and reverent look.

“James, don’t fill the child’s mind with flattery and fancies,” said Martha. “You are going to spoil her; I can see it already. I daresay the child knows how sweet and pretty she is as it is, without any telling. Just look at her!”

While Martha was saying this, Dulaunay was leaning over the table towards his partner, Bobbie, asking in a low voice, “Do you know, by chance, where is Marston House? Somewhere in Norfolk—”

“Someone told me yesterday that it is about six miles from here,” answered Bobbie. “Are you going to see Julia there?”

“Sh-h-h,” went the Count, for Martha had just finished occupying the attention of Hartwell, who, however, had heard the whispered word Julia, and lowered his eyes awhile.

The lateness of the sitting-up that night was without precedent at Corton. Dulaunay sang the Toreador’s song without any accompaniment, and Rosie, in a frail, sweet voice that trembled, sang “La Bondeuse,” in French. Several times the glasses clinked together all round. Even to Dulaunay the charm of the domestic pleasantness and peace in which he found himself communicated itself.

Between all of them were continually interchanged fond glances, smiles full of gentle meanings, pressure and touches of the hands, and words of kindness and affection. Martha saw her James in a milder light, with forgiveness and remorse for having so long misunderstood his repentance and change of heart toward her, while upon Rosie and Bobbie she looked with the fullest satisfaction of her maternal yearnings. Hartwell, for his part, felt a pious joy at Martha's friendship for him, which almost repaid him for all the sacrifices that had at last won him it. He could easily forgive Bobbie the pain and anxiety which Bobbie had caused him, seeing that the young man's escapade had turned out so fortunately; while, as to Rosie, every hour that passed seemed to water and endear the happy understanding which had sprung up between Hartwell and the charming girl.

The two nurses at last combined to interpose, and put an end to the family reunion.

When Hartwell, after saying goodnight, had reached the beginning of the corridor leading to his chamber, Rosie ran after him, and embraced him there in the dark with an upturned face, for all her fear of him had now turned into a hearty and sweet familiarity.

"My dear one," murmured Hartwell, as he strained her to him with his right arm, and laid a kiss on her forehead.

The next (Tuesday) morning, every one met everyone else at breakfast, for the new happiness had given to Martha new life, and the night in the well was already being forgotten; after breakfast the family went out, Martha among them, to the glade in the pine, wood where the well is, that all might look down into the dark depths, and enjoy a shudder at the contemplation of what had been, and of what might have been.

They were all still there at half-past eleven in the forenoon, when the Count proposed to photograph them in a family group, for the excellent and erratic Frenchman had lately taken up photography as a hobby. His proposal was hailed with delight by Rosie and Martha, and Dulaunay ran away toward the pavilion for his camera, plates, cloth, and tripod. It was a bright November day, a little less than five years since Hartwell had taken upon himself the name of Drayton; the air was rather crisp, and masses of cloud in the sky betokened rain before very long; but still the day was sunshiny and pleasant. Dulaunay returned with his apparatus, planted the tripod amid the fern, and placed the party on the coping of the well; Hartwell sat with his arm round Rosie's waist, and Rosie's head on his shoulder; Bobbie, smiling the little smile with which he scribbled his smart elegiacs, held Martha's hand, and waited. The worthy and excellent Count, who was as busy and flushed as though the fate of kingdoms hung upon the outcome, dived under his cloth, re-emerged, called out directions, pleaded with silent motions of the palm, and subsided again under his cloth; he had just cried out: "Now, rest tranquil, all!" and was about to let fly his catch, when Oswald suddenly appeared on the scene within the scope of the camera, spoiling everything.

Oswald had just arrived from London. He looked at all the members of the group, and without a word or gesture of greeting to anyone, to the alarm of all he said to Hartwell:

"James, I wish to speak to you at once."

Hartwell was about to tell Dulaunay to finish taking the photograph, but a second glance at Oswald's face, which was as pale as death, caused him to change his mind; he pronounced the words: "I come," rose, said to the ladies, "You will excuse me," and went after Oswald, who had turned again into the alley leading to the road in the forest, which runs past the lawn before the pavilion.

Up to this moment Hartwell had not read his Monday's letters, nor those of that (Tuesday) morning, he was so preoccupied with the new charms of family and home-life which had just arisen for him like a little oasis in his desert; he was intending to read the letters after lunch in his study, where he meant also to await the telegram from Birmingham, which was to tell him the result of the trial of his electrical machine. He had not therefore seen Oswald's letter commanding him to go to London to meet Oswald; but judging from Oswald's face and manner, and knowing that Oswald held those shreds of whose contents Hartwell knew nothing, save that they must be very important, Hartwell had a foreboding of calamity, as he followed Oswald through the forest.

Oswald walked some five or six yards in advance, never looking behind. His limp seemed to be accentuated that morning: he leant markedly on his stick; his hat was tilted forward on his forehead. Hartwell came behind, he too limping a little (on account of the nail which had pierced his foot in the well), in a long silk jacket and a broad hat, his left arm in its sling. The alarm uppermost in his mind was that in some unguessable way the shreds had revealed to Oswald that Hartwell was not Drayton: but he was about to find that the reality was even worse than this.

They passed across the lawn into the pavilion. Oswald turned into the drawing room; but Hartwell, looking in after him, said, "Come up to my study," and went up the main stairs. Oswald followed to the back of the house. In the little study, or laboratory, Hartwell sat on the chair before the desk, which was the only one there, pushed up his hat from his brow, and said: "Now, Oswald."

Oswald limped twice through the room before answering; in fact, he could hardly speak at first, his breath was so short. He had come to the great moment of his life, and it was too much for Oswald. The previous night he had written a second letter to “James,” ordering “James” to come to London; but early that morning he had been unable to bear his impatience any longer, and had taken a train for Norfolk; and now that he was here, he could hardly command his breath sufficiently to speak; the mounting of the stairs had had upon him the effect of the climbing of an Alp; his chest heaved; his face for a minute or two was the picture of agitation.

“That’s a man,” said Hartwell, encouragingly, “let us hear.”

“I wrote you,” panted Oswald, “why did you not come?”

“I have been ill; you see my arm in the sling; I have not seen your letter,” replied Hartwell.

“Oh, well, worse luck for you: you have kept me waiting and looking out; you have made me suffer” — and as Oswald said this, a little colour returned to his face, he got some breath, and his agitation at the presence of Hartwell’s personality began to change rapidly into a mood of fierceness and tyranny.

“I am sorry,” said Hartwell, to have made you suffer. But what is the matter?”

“You know: the Frenchman has told you that I have Letty Barnes’ letter.”

Hartwell’s mind was clear, for his pulses continued to beat quietly: and he at once concluded that this “Letty Barnes” was the girl with whom Drayton had stayed at the Gissings’, as Gissing had told him; that Drayton may have murdered her; that she must have been Barnes’ daughter; and that this explained Barnes’ old mania for taking his life; but he said, in order to be sure:

“Who is this Letty Barnes?”

Oswald put his hand to his breast pocket, drew out Letty’s old photograph, which he had one day stolen from an album at the Anchor Inn, five years before, and held it some distance from Hartwell's eyes, with a cruel smile, saying: "I think you know her, James?"

"Letty 'Barton!'" breathed Hartwell, remembering with a pang all his reasonings about the murder of that girl.

"You have yourself told me, and proved to me, all the facts about the murder which are necessary to hang you," said Oswald; "all that was needed was some proof that you were acquainted with her on the night when you stopped at the 'Anchor' in your motor car, and her letter proves that you were then her lover. You haven't a leg to stand on. Why didn't you burn those shreds long ago, James? What a fool you are, after all! Oh, you are a fool — you are, you know, you are. Writing pamphlets on evolution! turning man-of-science, eh? adopting strange boys? but what a fool you are! Will you ever put me into any more prisons again, James? — for doing nothing? Couldn't you see how rash and blind that was? Didn't you understand that my day would come? that though I might wait for years, yet I never, never fail in the end? and that when I strike I always strike dead! Ah, you are a fool!"

Oswald limped about striking the floor with his stick, beside himself in a rage of wounded self-love, as he pronounced this speech; all his pallor was gone, and his face was now flushed, though even so, he hardly looked like one who "always strikes dead." As for Hartwell, his lip trembled a little; with a rapid mind he had already reviewed the facts of the situation, and, without having any need to read Letty's letter, he understood that the net of proof was complete about him, that at last the evil doings of Drayton had brought him into a fix from which there was hardly any way of escape: for, from Oswald's intense words, he saw that Oswald was in a state of mind morbidly inflamed, jealous, and spiteful, and would not spare. Hartwell's shoulders seemed to bend lower under this sudden infliction of fate; he smiled steadily, mincingly, as usual, but with paler lips; his eye wandered to the side of the room, at which the research apparatus stood: all that was over for him now; he thought of the dear ones whom he had left in the glade of the pinewood: that was over, too; in a singular way he saw the complete vision of his history so far, what he had done, what he had suffered, the course in which his life had been destined to run, and had run; and this was the end. He stood confronted with the gallows.

“So, Oswald, you accuse me of the murder of Letty Barnes?” he said, quietly.

“You are merely a poor fool,” answered Oswald, with a laugh, revelling in this abuse, in this word “fool,” as men sometimes rush in and trample with a profane joy on what they have long been forced to revere, and revelling all the more in it, because he suspected that Hartwell considered him to be the very thing which he called Hartwell, and that Hartwell’s silent opinion was worth something, whereas what he himself loudly insisted on was worth nothing. “You are merely a poor fool; why that shred with the ‘cruel brute’ I got out of a coat that you gave me yourself, and all that about a struggle for a letter and the rest might never have been discovered, if you hadn’t blabbed it.”

“Well, then, I have been a poor fool, as you say, not only in respect of this matter, but in others, in all others, perhaps—” Hartwell said this with a bowed head, and an almost elderly meekness and resignation.

“You put me into prison, James,” said Oswald, smiling: “was that sweet to you? Did you forget that I was your brother? That first night in the cell I felt sure that you would do something the next day to get me out; but you stuck to it, Jimmy; even the magistrate tried to turn you; everybody felt pity for me; only you, who alone knew that I was innocent, were hard. Are you sorry, now, Jimmy? Do you bitterly repent now? Down to your knees, you beast! Too late! Too late!”

Oswald’s fist suddenly lifted to strike, while Hartwell held his head away from the blow with winking eyes; but it did not descend; Oswald turned and limped about the room, all breathless again.

“Do not any more embitter yourself by such reflections, Oswald, than you are already bitter,” said Hartwell: “I understand your resentment, and consider it just. Tell me now how you intend me to expiate my transgressions.”

“You wrote a letter to the papers, clearing me,” said Oswald; “Magee says that you got my sentence shortened by two weeks. Yes, you did that. For that I don’t mind letting you live; and if you have any cash here at Corton you may keep that much. All else you will hand over to me to-day, all scrip, title deeds, banking accounts, ownerships, and policies. I have stamps with me for the conveyance and authorisations; and you are not to leave this room without me, or send any letter or telegram, until all is duly done.”

There was a silence when this was said. Hartwell was bent over his knee, his brow on his hand; he turned upon Oswald a look, not fierce, but full of power and import; and he said:

“But, Oswald, the terms are hard.”

“Pretty ruffian you must have been, ah Heavens! to maul in that way a poor girl!”

“Let my transgressions be admitted. But, Oswald, you reduce me in one day to poverty.”

“To the very dregs of beggary!”

“You forget my wife, my ward, and my ward’s young wife, who will be left unprovided for.”

(In his prison in Hobham House five years before this, the old Gissing had once used almost these identical words to Hartwell, which Hartwell now used to Oswald).

“I cannot forget what I never remembered,” answered Oswald. “There is no question of those people, who ever they may be. Let them work, or beg. Your wife is almost worthy of you—”

“She is more than worthy of me: as to that say nothing, my friend, lest you incur my displeasure. But, Oswald, I say that the terms are cruelly hard: you must modify them; you must relent and be merciful.”

“I am sparing your beastly life; don’t flatter yourself, my good fellow, that you have anything more to hope from me. You might as well plead to that wall. I detest you cordially, and should enjoy seeing you starve on the streets; I daresay Lady Methwold would, too, and might toss you half-a-crown.”

“Be that as it may — But, Oswald, your terms are hard.”

“We had better get to work. You are not to argue.”

“But, Oswald, I am a crafty man: are you not afraid that, if you pressed me so hard, I may do something to baulk you of that affluent future to which you now confidently look forward?”

“No, I am not afraid, Jimmy. A ‘crafty man,’ are you? — impotent fool. Show me one sign of your craft to day, and I break off everything, and send a telegram to Magee to hand over the girl’s letter to the police. Come, we had better get to work.”

“No, you must give me time. I am not alone concerned. I refuse to decide without reflection. I will tell you my decision at five this evening, if you will so far accommodate me.”

“I don’t see why I should, but I suppose that I may,” said Oswald.

“You remain a prisoner here though, if I do; you are not going to send any messages to your bankers; I shall lock these doors.”

“I have no intention of sending any message to anyone, I assure you. But lock my doors, if it pleases you to make me your prisoner. When I have come to a decision, I shall ring for you.”

“No, you won’t be able to ring, I am going to break the bell ropes,” said Oswald: “I will come to you at five.”

By this time Oswald was quite calm and well mannered again. He locked the study door, broke the bell ropes in the study and in the bedroom, locked the bedroom door on the outside, and put the two keys in his pocket.

As he passed by, the study door again, on its outside, to descend one of the back stairs of the house, he saw the back of Dulaunay hurrying away down the stairs: for the Count had been listening outside the study door to what had been said. Alarmed by Oswald’s sudden appearance in the glade, and by Oswald’s order to Hartwell, Dulaunay had followed them, understanding that something grave must have happened; and since that something undoubtedly arose out of his own fault in handing over the shreds to Oswald, the Count had thought it within his right to listen to the outcome. He went away from the study door appalled by what he had heard, made his way to his own room, and there remained in great distress of mind a long while.

Hartwell, meanwhile, sat a prisoner where Oswald had left him, with a back bent as it were under the load of sorrows which the dead Drayton had left behind for him. He found himself touched by the grim Hand.

Death stared him in the face. His enemy was as relentless as Hartwell himself had once been to others.

However “crafty” he might be, there seemed to be only two possible courses of action open to him now, apart from consenting to Oswald’s terms; firstly he could declare that he had not killed Letty Barnes, that he was not Drayton; or, secondly, he could shoot himself. Any of the three would save him from the gallows, which he had no intention of undergoing: and between these three he had now choose.

If he chose to declare that he was not Drayton, nothing could be easier for him than to prove it: there were those who had known him familiarly as a working man in Birmingham, while Drayton was a financier in South Africa and London; as to that there was no difficulty. There were a thousand proofs, if he chose to call them up, any one of which would be conclusive, that he was not Drayton.

But if he said he was not Drayton, then Martha, Bobbie, and Rosie would be beggared: for Martha was no longer Drayton's widow, she was Hartwell's wife; Oswald had seen her married to Hartwell; and the moment Hartwell, Martha's husband, ceased to possess Drayton's wealth, Martha would possess nothing; Rosie, Bobbie, would possess nothing; everything would be Oswald's, who was Drayton's heir.

Willingly enough would Hartwell have cast off Drayton's name now, and have returned to the working man life in the old scenes, in order to clear himself of this loathsome charge; he was weary of all the cark, which Drayton's name had brought, him, all the frustrate longing, the hunger of the heart in the midst of wealth, the indigestion — staring at a banquet; even the laboratory he could now have left with little regret, for at the age 43 he already felt elderly, and he knew that Nature will not show Her secrets to weary men, but only to “the violent.” He could have cast, it all off with a sigh of relief, or at least of resignation. But, if he escaped from the fix in this easy way, he saw in fancy his dear ones suffering that poverty which he had known well and still remembered, whose cruel spur had urged him that, night on the Norwich Road to put on the clothes of the dead Drayton.

That way of escape, then, would not do. It would not be right for him to be Drayton so long as that was convenient, and cease to be Drayton the moment it became a question of bearing the brunt of Drayton's crimes at the expense of others, who were innocent; nor could Hartwell let his marriage with Martha prove Martha's ruin, and the ruin of her daughter, and of his son.

If, again, he accepted Oswald's terms, still retaining Drayton's name, and bearing the stigma of Drayton's crime, that, too, was a way of escape; but the result to the others would be the same: Oswald would have all, the others nothing. The third way of escape was suicide.

Hartwell sat several hours brooding over all this on his chair by the desk: but all the time he was conscious of what the end of his reflections would be, nor was he the man to shirk that terrible end. Suicide was not immoral, to his point of view, especially such a suicide, not committed for his own sake. He would die that day as Drayton. His will was already made, leaving all to Martha.

But there was still one other loophole of escape — his electrical machine.

He expected to hear the result of the testing not later than 4.30 that day, and hence had put off giving his answer to Oswald till five. If that turned out well, he could declare himself not Drayton, and still be fairly rich; Martha, Rosie, Bobbie, would still have an arm to protect them; and somewhere in Hartwell's mind was even a thought, a hope, illogical and vague, of Julia.

All, then, depended on what, even as he sat a prisoner, was going on in Birmingham.

Between twelve and three o'clock, he heard three several tapplings at the locked study and bedroom doors, the handles of which were turned by someone. The first time it was a servant who came to call him for lunch; the second time he heard the call, "James," in Martha's voice; the third time it was Rosie, who, in a low and awed voice, called, "papa," and afterwards went away on tiptoe. Hartwell did not answer any of them. About three o'clock he got up, his decision fully formed: if the news from Birmingham was good, as he quite hoped, that would be well; if it was bad, he would end his life, and that might be well also. He went into the bedroom, and stood at a window looking from the east side of the house upon the forest quite near it. It was now raining heavily and drearily. Hartwell tapped idly upon his teeth with the handle of a pen, watching the rain beat on the flat roof of the portico, and on the sodden bed leaves which were everywhere; a few wet sparrows on the portico and in the branches moped like children in punishment, and seemed to wait upon heaven for the rain to pass, before resuming their life of movement; there was no wind, and no sound in the house or without it, but the sound of the rain and the rain water in the spouts.

Hartwell presently turned to get what he had come from the study for, his will. One by one, during the course of months, his trunks had all found their way down to Corton, and now rather cumbered his room; from one of them he took out a cash box which contained his will and three five-pound notes, this being all the money which he had with him. He put the notes on the mantelpiece, intending them to be useful, till the household should adjust itself to the fact of his death, if he died; as he was doing this, he heard a tap at the bedroom door, and a voice say at the keyhole, "'Draytong', can I speak with you at the hole of the lock?" It was Dulaunay. Hartwell stood quite still; looking at his door, without making any answer. After waiting two or three minutes, he went softly into the study, sat at the desk, spread the will before him, and read it.

During the next hour he was adding codicils to it, which he knew that the main legatee and executors would carry out. To Bobbie, personally, he left an annuity of £1000; to Oswald, one of £800; to the Count D'Artenset-Villiers, one of £500; to the Gissings and to Barnes, conjointly, one of £300, directing that Barnes should continue to live with the Gissings; to Miss Scatchett one of £100; to Steve Anderson, one of £70, with some other small bequests to his captain, stewards, Drayton's old mistresses etc. To Julia he left the manuscript of a half-written book, which he was writing at the time when they were to have been married, but had not continued since, also some little things which she had given him; to Rosie he left the ring which he had worn for years on his little finger; and he directed his body to be cremated three days after his death.

When this was done, he wrote a little note to Rosie in a tone of gallantry, telling her to be as kind and good as she was sweet and charming; he added in a postscript that health was the main business of a human being, and gave her a few simple rules how to keep healthy and live happily; and under all he put three crosses, meaning kisses. He then took the will back into the bedroom, locked it in to the cash box, and the cash box into the trunk, for he had told Martha where he kept it; and now again he stood by the window, looking out at the rain.

It was now past four o'clock, and already the day was darkening. He began to be rather anxious about the expected telegram from Birmingham for, assuming that by now everybody in the house must know that he was Oswald's prisoner, whoever took in the telegram might hand it to Oswald and Oswald might not give it to him. But his doubts were laid to rest at 20 minutes past four, when there was a tap, and he saw a telegram envelope pushed under the door. He went softly, and picked it up. The envelope had been torn open by Oswald, for below Oswald was playing the tyrant, and ordering everything with, a high hand; but he had not probably understood the meaning of the words on the telegram, and not caring, had let it come to Hartwell. Hartwell's hands trembled as he picked it up, and, seeing this, he would not read it at once, but put it on the table, went and stood by the window till he was quite calm, and then returned and read the telegram on which his life hung.

When he understood its meaning, his eye flashed, he pressed the leaf of paper to his lips, and looking away towards the forest, he pronounced the two words: "I come."

The telegram consisted of the words:

SURPLUS WORK COUNTERBALANCED MORE THAN 5 PER CENT BY FRICTION. CONDENSERS DO NOT ATTAIN LIMIT OF CHARGE. TENSION TOO GREAT, QUANTITY TOO LITTLE. CRANK BROKEN. BROWN AND LISTER WITHDRAW. FULLER DETAILS TONIGHT AFTER INTERVIEW WITH GANOT. PRICE.

This as much as to say that the invention had not been a success in practice.

Hartwell looked at his watch. In half an hour his time of grace would be up, and Oswald would come. He did not mean to see Oswald again and at once, lifting a big trunk off another, he unlocked the bottom one; it was full of things and he could not see well, for though it was only half past four, the day had turned out very cheerless and wintry, and the room was dim. Hartwell placed two old brass candlesticks on a chair by the trunk, lit the candles, and sat on the floor to search the trunk. After throwing out some of the clothes, he found a brace of revolvers, which, he knew were ready loaded, and these he took.

In putting back the clothes he saw some rude clothes of his working man days a pair of boots much worn and torn, cord trousers, a greasy old jacket, a cloth hat, a dirty old scarf, and two red handkerchiefs; Bobbie had had them five years before, as the last relics of the father whom he supposed to be dead; and Hartwell, who prized them, had taken them from Bobbie. His eye smiled now upon them, and he replaced them carefully. In putting back the tray of the trunk into its place, his eye rested fondly upon the little packet of letters in it which Julia had written to him. He took off the elastic band from them and read them over by the candle light.

Among them was her last letter to him, written at Berlin, weeks after the rupture, and this, too, he re-read, till he came to where she said "We seem to be the perfectly helpless victims of some freak which has occurred somewhere; we can't help anything, not being born or dreaming, nor crying, nor dying," and at this Hartwell's heart was wrung, some travail in the nerve of tears overpowered his hard-headedness, and for the first time since boyhood the strong man gave way to weeping which distorted his mouth and shook his frame; he laid his forehead on the trunk and wept; nor was it mere self-pity that so keenly and deeply probed the worthy Hartwell, but pity for the littleness of man, and the bigness of his care; in his thoughts was that old haze of fire, that "nebulae," the living Father of our world and of ourselves, which held in the humor of its loins every tear that has since been shed, every frenzy every oddity, every rhythm, and all the pathetic tale of our earthly lot; and since it had held those very sobs which shook Hartwell, those sobs were too potent to be choked down, and had to break out. He was hungry, too, and cold, for there was no fire in either of the two rooms.

He got up presently, took the two candlesticks, and one of the revolvers, and, going into the study, put them on his desk. He sat to the desk. He had little time to lose before Oswald should come. His eye rested fondly a minute on his letter to Rosie, which lay on the desk before him. Then he drew, or tried to draw, two deep breaths, and, without looking at the weapon, he put out his hand, and took it up. The bitterness of death made him sick. But his face was grim, though a little pale. He opened his mouth and pointed the revolver into it; his eyelids were closed, and winked a little.

But he was interrupted by a violent shaking of the study door; and by the shout: “‘Draytong’, ‘Draytong’!” Dulaunay had been peeping through the key-holes, from which Oswald had removed the keys, had heard Hartwell’s sobs by the trunk, had seen the revolvers taken out, and the sitting with one of them to the desk in the light of the candles. All the afternoon, in fact, the Frenchman had been spying with a boundless agitation upon Hartwell; he had spent a day of flurry and distraction of mind, trying to soothe the two distressed ladies, trying to reason with Oswald, who, however, had insulted him, trying to torture out of his own wits some plan of action. At his call Hartwell started and sprang to his feet, shaken with ague from his head to his feet, shaken even more violently than the Count was shaking outside the door: for the nervous disorder caused by the interruption at the moment of death was, of course, shocking, and nearly deprived Hartwell of reason.

“Let me speak with you! come to the keyhole!” pleaded the Count in French.

Hartwell could not have answered, if he would, and would not, if he could.

“In the name of God, Drayton!” pleaded the Count outside.

Hartwell did not answer. He fell again into the chair, and his head dropped upon his arms over the desk, his right hand clutching the weapon; and so he remained several minutes, while the Count stooped at the key hole, trembling violently, and staring at Hartwell.

But all at once the Count was gone from the door under the impulse of a sudden decision; with a wild face, without any hat, he flew out of the house toward the stables, found Gloucester in his room, made him saddle quickly one of the two horses, and, while Gloucester was doing this, made him describe carefully the way to Marston House, where Julia was, six miles away to the east of Corton; and Dulaunay set off at a gallop through the wet and now dark evening.

XXXIII. A FORTUNATE MEETING

HARTWELL, MEANTIME, SAT with his head on his arms, incapable, for the time being of accomplishing the act of self-destruction, not only because he thought that Dulaunay might be still spying, and there is something immodest in the act of suicide before a witness, but because he was so unmanned by the interruption. But as he sat so, a key was put into the study door, and Oswald, again with a very agitated face, entered the room. “Now, James,” said Oswald, with his hand on the inner handle of the door.

Hartwell had quickly pushed the revolver into a pigeon hole, where it was hidden; and he turned a haggard face to Oswald.

“I say no, Oswald,” said he. “Oh, you do?”

“Yes, sir.”

“Aha!”

“My friend, is their no compromise possible?”

“None, by God! your chance is past—” At once, Oswald slipped quickly out of the door in a flame of rage; locked it again upon Hartwell, and, almost as wildly as Dulaunay had run, ran to the stable. There, Gloucester, at his command, put his own saddle on the other carriage horse, and Oswald galloped away to ward Felmingham to charge Hartwell with the murder of Letty Barnes, and bring about his immediate arrest.

Hartwell, for his part, knew why and in what mind Oswald had gone, and did not intend to be arrested. Those unexpected words “I say no” had shattered Oswald’s dream of affluence, and he ran from the study door a mere missile of hatred, forgetting or ignoring everything, except the hunger to be avenged which drove him. But however he might hurry, Hartwell knew that he could not return with the police in less than two or perhaps three hours. Hartwell, therefore had that much space to live in.

He got up and paced the rooms. To the most jaded man, to the man of strongest and coldest mind, suicide must be bitter when it comes to the point; but tenfold bitter must it be for a man who has come to the point, and been baulked, to come to the point again. The instinct of escape now arose in Hartwell; but it arose without any accompanying hope. He had the thought how excellent that would be, if he could get to the coast, escape to France, Belgium, or Holland, and in some obscure country place make his living as a laborer. But he almost knew that it could not be done: his appearance was too well marked, the police of the country too well organised; and he would not put upon himself the indignity of shaving off his beard. If he put on his working man clothes, however, that might prove a slight disguise.

About half-past 7 he decided to try this, taking with him a revolver to be used against himself at the first sign of any danger of arrest. He went back to the trunk from which he had taken out the revolver, took out his working-man clothes and boots, and, after undressing put them on. He tied the old scarf round his neck, put on the old cloth hat; and, looking now into the mirror, he smiled, recognising his old self. He then put into his pocket one of the three £5-pound notes, which he had laid on the mantelpiece for Martha's use; and in one of the two old red handkerchiefs, he tied up his watch and chain, two books, a few trinkets, and some biscuits from a box which he generally kept in his room to eat out of during the night. He ate some the biscuits. He then took his oak stick, hung the little red bundle on it, shouldered it. He gave a last look round the bedroom and stood a minute by his laboratory table; he took the revolver from his jacket pocket, examined it, replaced it; lastly, he put out the candles, and stepped from a window on to the roof of the portico on the east side of the house. The leap from there to the bottom was considerable, nor could he climb down by one of the slender pillars which supported the portico arches, for the roof projected somewhat; but he ventured the leap and came down safely in a patch of fern and mimosa.

He sat some time where he had fallen, listening if anyone had heard, for the kitchen was not far from there; but no sound save the rain fell upon his ear. He went under the portico, stepped on tip-toe northward along its east length, until he came to the drawing-room windows, and between the curtains of one of them he warily peeped. The candles were alight in the rooms, and there was Martha asleep on a couch with her head on Rosie's shoulder, and Rosie looking disconsolate with inflamed eyelids, and Bobbie sitting near her. Hartwell looked at them sorrowfully, some minutes, and then went away eastward through the forest, shouldering the bundle in his working man clothes, as on that night five years before when he tramped the Norwich Road, before he had seen Drayton: but this time he went with his left arm in a sling, and a limp in his walk: for after five years no one is the same man, but the hand of God has been upon him, and has changed him.

He went, however, with some buoyancy, glad that at least one more night was left him to continue to live in.

This night was quite as dark as that night on the Norwich Road five years gone, and much more rainy, though the air was very still, and, as it were, breathless, with that breathless stillness which suggests the phrase "a dead calm." It was about 8 o'clock; the forest was black, desolate, and dripping, and brought back to Hartwell's mind the impression of one of the scenes in that terrible long dream, in which the spirit of Drayton had seemed to converse with him in these woods six months before. He passed through the Round Point, with its well, and thence onward through the pines by a narrow path, soft though uneven underfoot, which mounted till he came to a ditch and a stile, and from that point bent downward. The dullest yokel, if he were belated thereabouts, must have been touched with some awe at this place, for few things could be more benighted and awful at such an hour than that congregation of pines with no leafage but at their tops, towering among the fern in a sort of lank stand-at-ease like a host of sentinels, and though no wind blew, there was still an everlasting echo of music among them, if one listened reverently to hear it; and anon a cone dropped and broke the stillness, as though one of the strange great sentinels spat.

After 10 minutes, however, as Hartwell trudged on, the pines became sparser, and he entered upon a fairly large open space, surrounded by pines, on the outskirts of the estate; in the middle of the space being a frog pond covered with moss, and not far from the pond an old hut. Hartwell had hardly entered this open space, when he was startled by the neigh of a horse; he stopped and listened, for there was no question of seeing anything move more than 6 yards from the eye; but the neigh was not repeated; and hearing nothing, he continued on his way, which leaf him close by the hut, between it and the frog-pond; but as he passed the hut, a figure peeped out of it after him, ran softly after him, and, peering into his face, put a hand on his shoulder.

“James,” said the voice of Julia, for it was she.

“Julia!” breathed Hartwell with a lifted hand.

At the ‘same time Dulaunay came out of the hut and joined them.

The Count had gone to bring Julia from Marston House as the last possible means of stopping the suicide of Hartwell, and she had promptly ordered a horse and come. On the way Dulaunay had told her all, how that Drayton was dead, and Hartwell was not Drayton, but a working man; how and why Hartwell had married Martha; how Drayton had murdered Letty Barnes, and how Hartwell was reduced to suicide by Oswald's terms, for Martha's sake; all Hartwell's motives had been made clear to Julia; and the telling of all this, on horseback, had left them no time to discuss what Julia should do when they came to Corton. They had therefore dismounted on coming to rough ground, tied their horses among the pines, and taken shelter from the rain in the hut, while they spoke of what should be done. Dulaunay was about to run to the pavilion to see if Hartwell still lived, when Hartwell's step was heard by them, and Hartwell passed the door of the hut.

"Where are you going, James?" asked Julia.

"I — But how and why are you here?" asked Hartwell.

"The Count fetched me to stop you from suicide, James. Am I able?"

"Julia, the Count does not know my reasons."

"He does, and he has told me, everything. I still call you 'James,' but I mean 'Robert—'"

"Ah? the Count knew that. But you are getting wet, let me take you back into the hut."

They turned to the hut, and stood at its door discussing what could be done, Dulaunay in a hat borrowed from Marston House, Julia looking tall and shadowy in a waterproof which she struck with her whip, for she was high-strung, and her words came fast from her lips, though with a perfectly business-like detachment; some strings of her wet hair draped her face under her hard felt hat. She led the council, and on her shoulders mainly the burden of the situation seemed to rest; Hartwell only spoke when he was asked a question; Julia, and the Count briskly exchanged their views.

“He will be caught not later than to-morrow,” said Julia, “if he attempts to escape like this.”

“He should accept the terms of Oswald,” said Dulaunay; “Martha and Bobbie will not starve.”

“Will you, James?” asked Julia, “and I undertake that your wife and son shall be suitably provided for.”

“You are kind,” answered Hartwell, “but that must not be.”

“What is far better,” said Julia, “would be for him to say openly that he is not Drayton, and snap his fingers at everything.”

“I divine that he does not do that,” answered Dulaunay, “because Martha and the rest would equally in that case be reduced to poverty.”

“If you are arrested, James, do you mean to do what the Count stopped you in doing this afternoon,” asked Julia.

“That might be wise,” answered Hartwell.

Julia after a short silence said:

“If you will undertake, James, not to do that in case you are arrested, but to declare yourself innocent and not Drayton, then I make you the business offer to become your wife.”

“You cannot become my wife,” answered Hartwell, “for I am married.”

“Oh, I understand that that has been a merely formal marriage,” said Julia; “I should not hesitate on that account to become your wife in fact, though not in law, if that will induce you to keep alive. I make you the offer, if you will undertake.”

“You are kind. But Drayton’s widow will at once be reduced to poverty, the moment I say that I am not Drayton.”

“But you would have me. And as my husband you would be rich.”

“I thought you were affianced?” said Hartwell, with some touch of chronic irony in his tone.

“Oh, do not jest. I can manage that, then. Do you undertake?”

“No!”

The decision came sharply, whereat Julia, in a hurried movement, stopped and laid her lips on Hartwell’s hand, understanding the terrible strength of the temptation which he had refused.

Then at once the busy discussion recommenced between her and Dulaunay, a mere series of remarks revolving round a few ideas, without reaching any end, while all were conscious of the preciousness of the moments that were being wasted. Finally, the Count said: “Oswald must be returning with the police or it may be, has returned,” and at this Hartwell, who was inwardly distressed, and ashamed at this discussion of his hapless lot, and was eager to be gone and alone in the dark, said: “I will go.”

Julia now turned ghastly pale, and her womanly strength giving way, she suddenly cried out, “Oh, is there no way out?” and began to weep with her forehead on the Count’s shoulder.

“Dulaunay, you are to blame!” murmured Hartwell, with some bitterness. “I thought, my dear Julia, that I had caused you the last distress which you were to owe to me,” said Hartwell, “but there was still this last. Let me be forgiven .”

He could say no more. Julia had now sat down on the stump of a tree with a smooth top, which was used as a seat, in the middle of the hut: she had soon dried up her tears, and with her chin on her palm, sat gazing out. Hartwell stood awkward and burdened, not knowing whether to go or stay, and for some minutes nothing was said. Then, suddenly, Julia rose, and without, saying a word, walked suddenly out of the hut, looking meditatively downward with a bent head. She went toward the frog pond, and was soon lost to the eyes of Hartwell and Dulaunay, for her walk quickened, and the rainy murk of the night was so thickened, that all that the two men could guess of her movements was that she was about, for some reason, to make a circuit of the pond (she wished, in fact, to be alone to carry out a thought which had risen in her mind). She was absent five minutes. Neither of the men cared to follow her; and Hartwell was again reproving Dulaunay for bringing her there, when Julia was again with them, re-appearing even more suddenly than she had gone, for she had come running a little, and was rather breathless.

“I have it,” she said, in a rapid speech, laying hold of Hartwell’s sleeve. “Emile, be prepared for a long ride to the coast. James, this is what I think is the way out: to-night you, as Drayton, commit suicide. I and Emile will take a hat and coat of yours to the cliffs at the coast, and leave them there with a confession of the murder and its discovery by Oswald, written by you, in one of the pockets, to explain your suicide; I know a spot near Happsburg, where the sea washes high up to the cliffs. Your jacket and hat will be found there; you will be supposed to have thrown yourself into the sea, and your body lost, as it may well be just there; you, as Drayton, die; you will, as Drayton, be made. Drayton’s widow inherits; to-morrow morning you, as Hartwell, turn up again in Birmingham, mix with your old acquaintances—”

“Oh, adorable Julia!” murmured the Count, at Julia’s ear.

“Now, that is feasible,” said Hartwell, reflectively: “it never occurred to me.”

“Let us not lose time,” said Julia: “has anyone got matches to write the confession by? You, Emile, will hurry to the house, and get the hat and jacket. I will await you here; and then we two will ride to the coast. James will walk all night, making westward, and take a train in the morning at some village station for Birmingham. After a month or so in Birmingham among his old friends, he can fearlessly emerge upon society, as Hartwell; and then, if he does not still consider himself married, he can marry, or take whom he pleases.”

“You are ingenious,” remarked Hartwell, at Julia’s ear, in a confidential tone of banter.

“I derive it from contact with Birmingham, James. But what about matches?”

“See, here are some matches!” answered the Count, “also a pencil, and the white half of a letter.”

“That’s splendid. Be careful, Emile, to bring a jacket with some Drayton papers in it, so as to heap proof on proof. Better run now. The only thing is the sick arm; that may identify Hartwell with Drayton; could you manage without the sling, James?”

“Yes, that is of no importance. But you are very ingenious.”

“I do not desire any ironical flatteries, Robert,” answered Julia, ironically; “I might have been ingenious before, if you had done me the honour to make me your confidante; but you chose to be reserved. Now, Emile, you are to run.”

“You can easily break open the study door to get the hat and jacket, Count,” said Hartwell.

The Count wrung Hartwell’s hand, and crying: “Till we meet again!” vanished into the darkness.

“The farther westward you are when morning breaks the better, James,” said Julia; “let us hurry with the confession.”

Hartwell stood silent in the darkness, strange motions at work in his breast, and then said: “You are in the right. I will write.”

Julia struck one of the matches, and handed him the paper and pencil. Hartwell put the paper on the stump, and knelt at it to write. Julia knelt beside him, and struck another match. Their faces, beshone by the faint light, were close together. Hartwell began to write in Drayton's hand. The match went out, and Julia struck another.

Their silence was full of ecstasy, Hartwell was amazed at his salvation, and foresaw a wonderful future; while Julia marvelled at the happy clairvoyance of her own heart, for she knew that she was out of the maze by the womanly instinct of a heart driven to bay and at its last resort.

"Have I won you now, James?" she asked in a strained low voice, "in actual truth, at last?"

"Let me write," said Hartwell with a certain mock dryness: "I am an imposter."

The sound of water dripping from the eaves of the hut was heard, the rushing sound of the rain, which was just then pouring hard, the dark sound of a frog splashing in the pond, and no other sound but these watery ones; a drop of water from the not very sound roof fell upon Julia's cheek, another in the dry dust, another on Hartwell's old greasy jacket; they were very alone there together, and might have fancied themselves the only survivors of a flood which was not yet over, and might last for ever. Their hearts beat, poignantly. When the matches went out, Julia struck another, and held it in a hand which rather shook.

"Oh, as to that," she said, "what Emile has told me has caused me to know no more of you than I knew before, only more of your history. I knew you were in proportion as I liked you, and two weeks after that night when we first met in Garlot Park I knew you inside out. Nothing could add to that knowledge. If Emile had proved to me that you had committed crimes, I should still know of you what I know, that you are a great mass of integrity."

"Well if ever I have meant well, and have suffered for doing it, this is my consolation," said Hartwell, more to himself than to her.

“Oh, I am not blinded by any infatuation,” said Julia presently: “Emile or my brothers, for instance, would certainly condemn what you have done in taking Drayton’s place and all that, and I should think the same as they, if you were not you: but what my heart knows is that you could not have considered it wrong, since you did it, and that your opinion of right and wrong must be worth very much more than theirs or mine.”

“That may be,” said Hartwell: “but having once admitted that anything can be wrong, as I do now reverently admit, a wrong does not become right because one considers it right. I say that my iniquities have been many, Julia.”

“But still grand, dear, as your confession of them is grand, and your suffering for them. It is all very well for shallow people — No, don’t be humble before me, I beg of you, or I shall cry for pity. I heard, you know, of my brother Charlie’s escapade with you down here, and how you took it; he meant well, but I told him after I heard it that it was merely upstart of him in your case just when you were sacrificing everything, too, for that poor woman; who was nothing to you, as if some quixote had taken upon himself to cane Jephthah—”

“Let that be forgotten,” said Hartwell: “your brother did well, nor was his action a discomfort to me, but rather brought me something of the relief which lies in an expiation. But I cannot at present look behind — It seems incredible, Julia, that such a future as you present to me can still be mine.”

“We have deserved it, James, if patience is anything,” said Julia, striking a match: “does it, seem, then, very bright to you?”

“It seems bright enough!”

“What, to have me always with you?”

“Julia, no, let me write.”

“Just think, I shall have a stool in your study, if I ever let you go there; I shall cook; and make your slippers, and pamper you; we shall live a year on an island; at midnight if you are haunted by a ghost, it will be I; in the morning on opening your eyes the first thing which you shall see will be my smile. I shall be with you; you shall be mine — no more biology—”

“Julia, you talk. Julia, sweet name, graven in my heart — but, you see, I cannot write—”

“We have waited enough. We have lost life. It is time now — I do so love you—” Julia whispered this, as it were secretly, in a voice of passion; her face happened to touch Hartwell’s; a heavy drop leaked through the roof, splashed upon the match, and put it out, for outside the deluge of water now washed down lavishly with a loud noise, so that at several points the leakage, more and more invading and menacing their little island of dryness, was going on actively, dripping upon their hands, their heads, the paper, the dust, and trickling down one side of Julia’s face; in that wet darkness their breasts caught fire; suddenly their lips met by an impulse beyond the power of their wills; and for some time only the noise of the storm of water was heard, and a dark splash in the frog pond.

When at last Julia lighted another match, no more was said for a long while; they breathed hard, their faces were pale with only half-smothered emotion. Hartwell wrote the confession of murder in silence on the wet paper; and Julia, like a bondmaid, struck matches, from minute to minute to see to write.

XXXIV. HARTWELL RE-EMERGES

THREE PAGES OF notes, taken down from the mouth of my principal with regard to the history of Hartwell still remain to me: but they do not seem to me to contain anything of great importance. It need only be stated that the admirable Julia's plot was duly carried out; the next day at noon, Hartwell, on stepping to the platform at Birmingham from his train, was arrested as Drayton for the affair of Letty Barnes: but he was once and for all liberated, two hours afterwards, for the proofs which he had that he was not Drayton were overwhelming; moreover, by the hour of his liberation the jacket and hat of Drayton, who had "committed suicide," were found at the coast: if Drayton was dead, and Hartwell was alive, then Hartwell could hardly be Drayton.

Some time before the marriage of Hartwell and Julia, it was a disputed point between two lawyers, to whom a supposed case had been put by Julia, whether Hartwell was legally married to Martha. Even if this had been so, it would not have prevented the union of Hartwell and Julia; but the lawyers differed; for the law on the point is far from clear. The fact that Martha supposed the man whom she married to be another than he really was made the marriage invalid in the opinion of one expert especially as it had never been, as lawyers say "consummated," but from this view the other expert differed. However the truth was, the death of Martha a month before the marriage put an end to the importance of the question, Martha's vitality, never strong, was reduced to a thread by her night in the well, and the excellent woman passed quietly out of life in a sleep.

She left all her recently gained wealth to Bobbie, the husband of her daughter: whereupon Bobbie, who was soon let into the secret by Julia and Dulaunay that his guardian was his father, insisted upon making over the whole, with Rosie's consent, to Hartwell. So that Hartwell in the end rightly possessed all that wealth of Drayton which he had so wrongfully possessed; and Corton became the favorite residence not only of Rosie and Bobbie, but of Julia and Hartwell, and of their respective families.

As to Oswald, when he saw his dead "James" re-appear one night before him at a dinner, calling himself Hartwell, with Julia on his arm, the astonishment in the jaded brain of the poor Oswald may be imagined. In spite of all the explanations that were heaped upon him, he spent the rest of his life in an uneasy sense of bewilderment at this matter. Hartwell gave him a considerable annuity out of the widow Drayton's estate, and had him often with him at Corton and elsewhere.

So much has been given me to write, and I have cast it into the conventional "novel" form, with conversations, chapters with titles, etc. If in this form the facts do not give that sense of romance which properly belongs to fiction, I have at least tried to effect this by the addition of fanciful details here and there, and my failure, if I have failed, must be put down to the essential difference of aspect between a chain of invented details and such matters of fact as happen in our midst. Still, fact has always a certain value of its own, nor are our characters mere cut-and-dried photographs of living people, but to whatever extent they are lifelike, the author is deserving of some of the credit, for though they have been described to him, he has seen only one of them in the flesh (the one called "Oswald"), a short time nine years ago, together with a photograph of Hartwell (or rather not of Hartwell, but of Captain Jenner, of the Africa), and a miniature of the really beautiful Julia. Nor, on the whole, is it of much importance, so long as an indulgent reader has been amused, and has understood the moral significance of the man's fate which has been sketched.

CHAPTER I

“YES, A GRAND night,” was the thought in Miss Kathleen Sheridan’s mind, as she passed into the west lodge-gates of Orrock Park on the evening of the 21st of November, ‘98: an evening of storm, with the roar of the sea in the ear. The young lady stopped at Embree Pond in the park to watch the sheet of water shivering to its dark heart under the flight of the squalls; then with her long-legged walk (she was a hunchback), went on her way, showing in her face her delight in this bleak mood of nature.

Some way further, however, on hearing the hoofs of a horse, her expression changed to one of very real fright, for she had a thought of one Sir Percy Orrock, beheaded by Cromwell, whose ghost gallops about on a headless horse in rough weather; but this turned out to be only Mr. Millings, the land-steward: for, on coming round to the manor-house, the young lady found Millings there talking to Sir Peter Orrock, who at a window was holding his ear forward to hear the land-steward’s news.

“Good evening, Mr. Millings,” called Miss Kathleen, laughing from ear to ear, with strings of black hair draping her face. “Well, uncle, I have been sketching it all on the heath — witches on broomsticks, ‘strange screams of death in the air.’ That silver lime of Farmer Carr’s is blown flat. Uncle, if you ask me to stop and dine, I may consent.”

“Hm,” muttered Sir Peter to himself, “better stick to your own dinner. Go on, Millings — same old story, eh?”

“Same old story, Sir Peter,” answered Mr. Millings: “there won’t be any of Norfolk left soon, at this rate. Mrs. Dawe’s cottage gone, and with it her son, James Dawe, and three of the boats—”

“Well, it is their own fault!” called out the little maid, “living on the edge of the cliffs, when they know—”

“Got nowhere else to live,” muttered Sir Peter. “Dawe drowned, Millings?”

“No, Sir Peter, but I’m afraid I must say rescued at an awful cost: he was rescued by Miss Langler, who has just been taken home to Woodside in a dying state.”

“Hannah? Hannah Langler?” breathed Sir Peter, turning very pale.

“The lad was carried out two hundred yards,” said Mr. Millings, “where he clung to the bottom of one of the three boats; on the cliffs I found a crowd watching him, including Fagan, the coast-guardsman, who told me that the lifeboat was coming round from Wardenham; but I thought from the first that it would come too late, for I could see Dawe nearer in every time the lighthouse beam swept over him: and so it proved, for, as the lifeboat-light appeared round the north headland, Dawe was thrown up by a breaker on a strip of sand—”

“But Hannah?” said the baronet.

“Miss Langler was in the crowd with her father,” said Millings; “she had been holding up Dawe’s mother, who was fainting, but when Dawe was all of a sudden lying on the strip of sand below us, I saw Miss Langler running among the fishermen, begging one and another to save him before the next wave. ‘There’s nothing like venturing,’ I heard her say twice or thrice, but they answered that that would only mean two deaths instead of one, and I fully agreed with them. When the next breaker drew back from the cliffs we all looked to see Dawe gone with it: but there he still was, and I now heard Miss Langler cry out to Horsford, the lighthouse-keeper, ‘Now, now, Horsford, venture now,' and then, all at once, I was aware that she herself was going down the cliff-side by that little foot-path near the church-tower."

"But, God's name, man, couldn't some of you stop her, a whole crowd of you there?" said Sir Peter.

"It couldn't be done, Sir Peter, I regret to say. Two or three did make a try to hold her, but she was gone like the wind. Personally, I confess, I was rather paralyzed: she looked pretty small down there in the mouth of the sea, like a fly in an engine at work; it was rather painful. Old Farmer Langler fell on his knees; no one had a word to say. I don't suppose it lasted ten minutes on the whole, but I shouldn't care to live through it again. Dawe's a heavy lout, a head taller than she, and twice she was felled by the sea with him in her arms. When a wave withdrew, we saw them still there, and another wave coming. Two of the womenfolk fainted. I with some other men ran half-way down to see better, and got drenched. However, she won back to the path with her unwieldy prize, and there gave in. We then ran down and got them somehow to the top; Dawe was taken to the postmistress's cottage, and Miss Langler home to Woodside. Both are in a pretty bad way, they say."

"Well, it is her own fault!" called the quaint maid shrilly against the wind from the outer hall. "Hannah has a secret pride in her physical powers which stood in need of a ducking."

The baronet muttered something, turned from the window, and in five minutes was passing out of the house, well wrapped up, with his rusty top-hat pressed on his head, and a footman swinging a lantern before his steps.

"What, going to Woodside, uncle?" asked Kathleen, who still stood in the outer hall, "how wonderfully good of you!"

The baronet did not answer. She went out with him. Beyond the east gates they saw the lighthouse beam traveling over land and sea in turn, the one thing which the storm could not fluster. A drizzle, like spray caught from the sea, struck the face. It was very bleak. They met only a manure-cart whose driver saw, head-to-wind, his horses' manes, tails, and forelocks floating out at random on the streams of the storm. Sir Peter was silent, but the quaint maid had ever something to say in her laughing way. "Isn't it fine?" she cried out: "one feels as if one were oneself the storm!" Then presently: "Did you read all that about Chris Wilson? That boy is going to be the maestro of the day, you'll see. He has won the year's prize-violin, and been publicly embraced by Strauss. Yvonne writes me that he's the wildest of madcaps, and leaves broken hearts in every capital: this is the boy that I am supposed to be engaged to."

At this Sir Peter stooped sharply to her ear, saying: "Better drop that talk, and think of something besides men."

"But what do you mean?" cried back Kathleen: "wasn't it arranged before I was born that he should marry me? Not that I care at all, or would marry him, if he wanted me"; in a lower tone she added: "you have no humor, mon oncle."

"This is Hannah Langler's birthday, too!" she called out presently: "did you know? She will remember the date of her ducking. Isn't it an extraordinary thing that on each of her birthdays that girl receives a present from some unknown person? This time it is a ring that must have cost two hundred pounds."

"How old is she today?" asked Sir Peter, stooping to her ear.

"Twenty-four."

"No — twenty-three."

"Excuse me, uncle, twenty-four. But what does it matter to you, really? I believe you cherish some sort of odd weakness for this Langler girl. She tells me that every time you see her you whisper into her ear always the same words, 'Uglier than ever, I see.' Well that might be a pleasantry, if she were pretty, but as what you say happens to be true, it is hardly polite, is it? The rector has suggested that perhaps this yeoman's daughter is destined to become — Lady Orrock. I told him that things of that sort don't happen."

"Hm!" muttered Sir Peter; "talk too much."

Kathleen now went up a lane on the left leading to her own place, "The Hill," while Sir Peter and the footman went on down yew and hawthorn hedges, till the light of Woodside Farm appeared; and great was the wonder of the old farmer and of Mrs. Langler when they saw Sir Peter come to see Hannah, for the baronet was a rather crusty and rusty type — tall, with a stoop and an asthmatic chest — from whom a jerk of the head was about all that people on the estate expected in the way of friendliness.

Sir Peter saw Hannah, who lay unconscious from her drenching, stayed a little with the old couple and old Dr. Williams, and then trudged back to the Hall.

He sat up so late that night, sniffing his three dried apples, that Bentley, his old house-steward, became uneasy. He was writing a long letter; for his discovery that night that Hannah Langler was twenty-four, not twenty-three, as he had somehow thought, was now hurrying him to an action which for fifteen years had lain planned in his heart.

"Better," he wrote to his nephew Chris Wilson, "come here for two or three months, and let me see if I like you. As I have not seen you since you were sixteen, and then only for a few minutes in Paris, it is impossible for me to know what sort of being you are: but I was attached to your mother, and if you have any touch of her, it is possible that both myself and the young lady to whom I refer may care to have you permanently about us. Your income, if I remember rightly, hardly amounts to more than £500, and if Miss Hannah Langler will marry you, she will have from me a jointure of £3,000 a year, and will, moreover, be my heiress: in which case you may decide to give up scraping fiddles for the rest of your days,” etc., etc.

This letter went off to Paris the next day. Four days later came the reply, written apparently in a heat of haste:

“My dear Sir and Uncle:

“I am obliged by your most kind invitation to Orrock Hall, and delighted that I have so near a relative as my uncle to remember me. I shall certainly come to visit you, if the good people here will let me, and I will marry whomsoever you desire, since that is your caprice. You should expect me, therefore, let us us say, next Tuesday. Ever yours sincerely,

“Chris Wilson.”

CHAPTER II

THE APPOINTED TUESDAY came, but Chris Wilson did not come with it; nor did he send any excuse.

After a month Sir Peter wrote again, angrily this time; in two weeks the answer came from Vienna, saying that Chris would find it a “genuine delight” to visit so near and dear a relative as his uncle during the month of February next. But February, March, April, and May passed, and Chris Wilson did not come to Orrock, nor send any excuse.

Once more Sir Peter wrote, no longer an invitation, but a letter bitter to the point of invective; he received no answer to this, but on a day in June when no one expected him at Orrock, Chris Wilson sat in the Wardenham train from London, with the score of Fidelio open on his knees and three violins about him.

At Wardenham, of course, no carriage awaited him, and there he stood, a violin-case in each hand, looking up and down the road with a pathetic dismay. He believed that he had written to Sir Peter the date of his coming, and had perhaps expected a procession with flags to meet him, but no one even noticed him. “Well, the languid people,” he said with his meek smile, for it seemed to him odd that any one should be unconscious of his arrivals and departures.

At last one of the donkey-baskets peculiar to Wardenham was got; an old box, which was the master’s, and a more costly portmanteau, which was the valet’s, were put into it, and they set off through a land of cornfields and farms, past the lighthouse, the windmill on the hill, the village with its clothes hung out to dry in the sunlight. Anon the sea was in sight with sails on it, and the cliffs in their colored carpet of poppy, thistle, and sea-daisy; and anon the basket-chaise was among hills of heather and fern. There was hardly a sound, save the martin's wing, the bee fumbling into its lavender-bed, and dream-laughter borne from some boys and girls playing cricket in a meadow. Three men mending a net before a cottage door, among them that Willie Dawe whom Hannah had rescued from the sea, seemed to work in a doze. But Chris Wilson, who was a native of cities, and was being jolted in the lanes, had no eye for all this, and cried out anon to his driver: "Is it far, my friend?"

Beyond the ruined church-tower on the cliffs, the chaise turned inland between hedgerows full of wild yellow tulip, and in a lane promenaded by geese passed Woodside peeping through its nest of old trees. At Woodside gate stood a young lady, looking up and down the lane with shaded eyes, who suddenly felt ashamed of her hair, but the moment the chaise had passed, beckoned eagerly, whereat another young lady spending the day at the farm ran out to her.

"Too late," said Hannah Langer: "a Wardenham chaise with a young man in it, my dear! the squire's nephew, I believe, has violins — you should have run quicker! Saw without seeing me at first, then suddenly realizing a petticoat about, looked back and smiled at me with little nods in an easy, cheeky kind of a sort of a way—"

"Did you nod back, Hannah?"

"Get thee behind me, Satan! Of course not. But it wasn't done anyhow, my dear, but prince-like—"

"What is he like, Hannah?" asked Anne, highly interested.

"Not handsome, I think — broad-faced — stout — a bit overgrown — more body than head, top of his nose browned, my dear, like an apple just turning, a split cloth hat cocked well back, so that I could see his hair parted in the middle, spreads out behind in a mass of curls over his shoulders — brown, lighter than mine, his eyes blue and heavy — drowsy, tipsy-like — forehead small and flushed—”

“You saw enough of him all in a moment!”

“But it was that quietly wicked little smile, with little movements of his eyebrows —— !”

“He must be fast, Hannah.”

“But a dear boy, I should think.”

“I wonder if Miss Kathleen will be falling in love! for all that girl thinks about is love and marriage.”

“Poor little dear,” sighed Hannah, with a change from very gay to very grave: “it is her poor little body that’s to blame for that, Anne. I believe she is ever wondering if everybody finds her as plain as she finds herself: the big doubt of her life, that; so she’s ever on the watch with her sharp grey eyes to solve it one way or the other, with a fear of the verdict trembling in her poor heart all the time.”

“Hannah, sometimes I believe you see right into people’s hearts,” remarked Anne.

“Know what’s in Kathleen’s, anyway,” answered Hannah with a pleased laugh: “she would give all she is worth and a penny more to enter somebody else’s mind for one minute to watch herself, and, of course, she cares most what the male gender thinks of her, so every farm-lad she sees, she asks herself, ‘How does he like me?’ And to think that she’s doomed to stew in that pot to the day of her death! Ah, we ought—”

A voice from the farmhouse called “Hannah!” and “Coming, mother!” called Hannah— “no peace to the wicked” — and ran away inward.

The chaise and violinist, meanwhile, had arrived before the low front of Orrock with its array of many-shafted oriels; whereat Sir Peter, hearing of it, hurried from his work of docketing old documents in the library, and found Chris Wilson tapping with his foot on the floor of the inner hall.

“You Chris Wilson?” asked Sir Peter, gazing over his glasses.

“The same, sir,” answered Chris.

“Well, what do you want now, sir?”

“I don’t like erratic persons, sir,” said Sir Peter. “I don’t allow any one about me to be erratic, except myself. You promised—”

“Then you are my own uncle, sir, for I am of precisely the same turn of mind myself. If you are as erratic as your footman, I have only to wish you a good day—”

“Stop, sir; did you not promise to be here since the month of February last?”

“I’m sure I can’t remember, sir. What happened in the month of February last are among the things in which I no longer take an interest. I am here now; let that suffice you.”

“Why, he chooses some of his words something like a Frenchman,” muttered Sir Peter. “Why on earth, sir, didn’t you let me know that you were coming?”

“Didn’t I, sir? I think so.”

“Hm! memory wants brushing up. But, sir—”

“May I remind you, sir, that I am holding an Amati fiddle in a terrible draft? If you invite me to come in, I will.”

“Then, sir — come in.”

Sir Peter turned inward muttering, and the stranger was presently led to his own apartments, whence he would not stir for the rest of that day; till late into the night sounds of music — studies in chords, songs — were heard coming from behind the locked doors of the musician's quarters, so that near midnight Sir Peter stamped his list slippers in one of the library bear-skins and covered his ears with his palms.

The next morning there was much ado when Chris sent Grimani, his valet, to ask that, since dejeuner was to be “breakfast,” it should be put off to ten o'clock. The baronet at first refused, but yielded afterwards; and Chris came down in a better mood, asking as he sat to table: “Have I been in this place before, sir?”

“I think you have when a boy,” answered Sir Peter.

“Charming place! Does the whole of this place become my property at your death, sir?”

“No, sir, unless I am foolish enough to die without a will; and you should not contemplate my death, sir.”

“God retard it, sir. I don't contemplate it, I only conceive it. May you live a thousand years.”

“Hm — and you ten thousand.”

“By the way, sir, was my mother an elder sister of yours, or a younger?”

“You don't know much about your family, my friend.”

“My good sir, if you had ever produced four simultaneous A flats on the violin before the age of, say, twenty, you would understand that my time for family histories has been short.”

“Why, the fellow takes offence for nothing,” thought Sir Peter.

“So you know more about your violin than about your mother, sir?”

“My violin is my wife,” said Chris.

“Got three wives.”

“A full harem, sir! and all are sirens. But was my mother older or younger than you?”

“Younger, sir.”

“What would be my own age now, sir?”

“Memory gone crazy!” muttered Sir Peter.

“I remember my nineteenth birthday,” said Chris, “my father being then still alive, but since his death no one tells me anything.”

“You are now three months over twenty-two, sir.”

“But as to your other sisters, sir, there were — how many?”

“Your aunts Margaret and Jane, sir.”

“I remember; one married the Marquis de Pencharry-Strannik. And the other?”

“Jane married an Irish judge named Sheridan.”

“Both dead, sir?”

“Yes. Your mother, too, is dead, sir.”

“I know it well, sir, for though she died when I was quite young, I loved her with enthusiasm. Excellent woman! And my two aunts, did they leave behind them any family?”

“Each left one daughter: Margaret’s daughter is Yvonne de Pencharry-Strannik whose place, ‘Chateaubrun,’ is near Toulouse; Jane’s daughter is Miss Kathleen Sheridan, whose English seat, ‘The Hill,’ is not a mile from here. She’s pretty sure to come peeping about here today, so you’ll see her, if you don’t lock all the doors of the place!”

“Are they charming people, my two cousins?”

“I know little of Yvonne, though I’m supposed to be one of her guardians. She was here five years ago when she was sixteen. I believe she’s considered a beauty, and a leader of fashion in the south of France. The other one, Kathleen, is a spiteful little hunch-back—”

At that very moment the quaint maid herself entered, laughing with all her beautiful teeth, while Chris rushed headlong from the table to meet her, and hung over her hand in a rapture.

“Heartiest welcomes to Orrock, cousin Chris,” said Kathleen; “we have not met since you were a little thing of six—”

“That meeting is delightfully stored in my memory,” murmured Chris. And Sir Peter went, “Hm!”

“I had no idea that you were come till late last night!” said Kathleen, putting her bunch of pink hollyhocks and grasses into a china bowl. “Uncle Peter, you might have sent to tell one! The difficulty now that we have him will be to keep him!”

She played her fine eyes so coquettishly, that Chris said:

“I will stay as long as you wish.”

“That is sweet of you, then. But the wonder is that you came! Did Uncle Peter write to ask you?”

“He never told me! If I could flatter myself, now, that I was a motive—”

“Who else?” said he, half with his lips and half with his eyebrows.

The little maid’s eyes rested upon him, and she thought to herself, “Is not this a dear boy?”

“But how are we to amuse him?” she asked. “He won’t like wild flowers and sea-bathing, you know, Uncle Peter, nor Friday-night whist-parties, nor the county people, nor the Marstons and Iliffes. We must have dances—”

“Can you accompany?” asked Chris.

“Why — yes.”

“And excellently, I am certain.”

“Oh, I know that hardly any woman can accompany, but you try me and see!” she laughed, half-nervously, half conscious of a cleverness that was quite Puck-like.

But something was not right with the musician’s chocolate! he gave one sad look of reproach at Grimani, whose clasped fingers were heard to crack for nervousness; and this for some time threw an awkwardness over the breakfast.

“I don’t know how you will find Uncle Peter’s pianos,” said Kathleen when they rose, “but I think something of my own grand; better let me take you to the Hill at once!”

Chris let her do this before lunch, and stayed with her for hours. The moment he was gone the little maid flew to gaze in her mirror at a yellow face wedged between high shoulders; she smiled, and her young mouth was enclosed in a series of wrinkles, like brackets; she walked, and it was from a waist up at her chest. Or perhaps the mirror lied a little to her eyes? She had that doubt, that hope, within her. Chris had been meant for her before her birth, and she was born like this, if the mirror was quite true. She knew pain and fear in that hour. Many had been her loves and fevers before, but Chris Wilson compared with other men was like a moon wailing music in its orbit, and upon him henceforth her ambitious heart was set.

Nor was she in despair. “He is delighted with me!” she said to one Miss Olivia, her companion at the Hill since childhood. “He told me that he had rarely met an accompanist who so foreknew the ‘history of his emotions’; and in going he said, ‘Thank you very much: you are among the virtuosi.’ I never dreamt that I could play like that, Olivia; my soul seemed to mix with his, and my fingers became his.”

“What a terrible lot of Schubert!” said Miss Olivia. “But do you think Mr. Wilson really great?”

“Divine, you mean,” said Kathleen. “This boy is one of the sons of thunder, and lords of the soul, I tell you. From the moment his bow touched his Amati’s sweet, sweet A to his last note, it was all up with me, Olivia. Oh, the technicality of his infinite cadenzas, his heavenly grace — and his hands! just made for stopping intervals, with two of the fingers quite deformed by his awfully high bridge. I must go out.”

“But it is near dinner-time, and drizzling — !”

“I don’t care, I can’t stop in the house.”

It was already dark, but Kathleen went out, and within an hour a stable-boy was galloping to fetch Dr. Williams to her bedside.

“Miss Sheridan has seen Shuck, sir,” the boy answered when the doctor asked what was the matter— “Shuck” being the ghost of a headless dog which travels furiously across-country from Marsham to St. Fay’s about that hour.

“Tut, tut,” said Dr. Williams, “your mistress has caught sight of a white rabbit, boy.”

“Whatever it was,” said the boy, “she went out for a walk and ran back screaming all the way at the top of her voice, and you’ve got to come at once, doctor, for she’s very bad.”

Kathleen was subject to these transports and break-downs, and for a week she lay tossing, with those two images, “Shuck” and Chris Wilson, blazing like day-stars in her fever.

During this time Hannah Langler had been greatly exalted, for Sir Peter had had her to dinner at the Hall, and Hannah had heard his whisper at her ear, “Mustn’t tell you how ugly you are to-night, because you are my guest.” She was, indeed, from of old, quite at home at the Hall, for she would allow no hand but hers to make Sir Peter’s special pound of Jersey butter at Woodside, and liked to bring over presents of cream-cheese, lark’s eggs, sometimes helping old Bentley in the management; but dining among the great ones was rather another matter. The news of a strange creature at Orrock was abroad, the “county” was coming to hear him play, and all among the “county” Hannah found herself, with a rose in her hair, and on her finger that mysterious ring, sent her — by whom? — on her twenty-fourth birthday. It was Sir Peter's will.

"Can you accompany?" Chris asked her when she begged him to play.

"Oh!" she laughed, "Hymns New and Old is my musical level!"

"Never mind, I'll play for you."

He struck round his long Tourte clouds of rosin, tossed his hair back, chinned his thick-stringed Bergonzi, and flooded the drawing-room with Rode's air in G. Hannah gazed as if alarmed at something happening without or within her, and at one point pressed the hand of Mrs. Horsnel, the rector's wife. Chris had chosen his fiddle of greatest sonority to move her by mere power; and she, too, admitted him, in Kathleen's words, one of the "sons of thunder."

"Isn't he a dear boy?" murmured Mrs. Horsnel when it was all over.

"Yes," breathed Hannah, like one who sees the sea for the first time.

Some time afterwards when Chris and Sir Peter were alone late at night after a card-party, the baronet suddenly asked: "What do you think of Miss Langler?"

"Nice and plump," said Chris.

"That all you see in her, my friend?"

"No, not all, sir. I like her immensely; she has both power and charm. How came she by that scar on her forehead?"

"A little mule in the village which wouldn't let anyone ride it; must take it into her head to tame it — used to be a regular tom-boy, got on it barebacked, the thing threw her off, and kicked her there."

"Well, she seems nice and healthy But the English have no instinct for dress. Why on earth should she wear her hair brushed back in that fashion?"

"Free country, sir. By the way, are you in love with the Honorable Edith Cardew? I have noticed you—"

“I may have thought of undertaking her conquest, sir; it is my habit to be in love, but, frankly, Norfolk is not rich in seductions of that sort. I’m afraid I must announce my departure, sir. I came for a week, and have been here perhaps months now, kept by your own good company, and Miss Kathleen’s perfect accompanying. She is among the virtuosi.”

“You are not — er — taken with Miss Hannah Langler, I see, sir.”

“Taken? But stay, stay: didn’t you once write me something about marrying some one, sir? and wasn’t this very Hannah Langler the lady in question? It was so. I have often wondered what brought me to this corner of the world; it was that! You promised me some thousands of pounds a year.”

“Well, I’ve heard of the musician Beethoven forgetting his own name, and you are almost as bad. You can’t think much of money, sir?”

“On the contrary, sir, I admire gross, handsome sums of money to an extent that might be called a weakness; I am supposed to be a spendthrift, but I throw away only silver: I am pound wise, but shilling foolish.”

“So, if you married Miss Langler, it would be for the money only?”

“Let me see. You know, sir, that on the Continent marriages are commercial contracts, and that I have a Continental mind; but it should not be difficult to me to get fifty wives with far larger dowries than some few thousand pounds a year; so that, if I married Miss Langler, it would be partly for the money, partly to make myself agreeable to a wish of my good Uncle Peter, partly because the lady is rather pleasing to my fancy, and partly because I don’t consider the matter of great importance.”

“That ends it, then, that ends it; you take the wrong tone, sir, in speaking of that lady,” said Sir Peter, sniffing one of his dried apples quickly with alternate nostrils. “If you think, because you can scrape fiddles—”

“What horror, sir; you know nothing about bowing; one does not scrape, one strikes—”

“Hence the term fiddlesticks, sir,” said Sir Peter. “I say that if you think you would do Hannah Langer an honor in marrying her, then you shall lose her, Chris. My proposal to you arose solely from my wish to do a great kindness to my sister’s son — but I despair of making a fellow like you understand what you get, if you get her; will have to teach you that herself in time. I know her; have watched her twenty odd years; and if you love not only a bright companion, but a most faithful hand on your head when it aches, will love her. I fancy she’s taken with you, fancy so, she can’t hide much from me, and in that case you are in luck’s way. And let me tell you, sir, that in marrying her you marry no farmer’s daughter, but a lady of ancient lineage and high race—”

“Ah, I thought there was some mystery—”

“Not much mystery. I’ll tell, on the understanding that herself nor any one ever learns facts from you. Her father was an old friend of mine” — Sir Peter meant himself, for none but him was Hannah’s father— “who married a farmer’s daughter, and had this child by her. My friend’s father was a baronet, alive at the time of the marriage, marriage had to be kept secret, and five months after child’s birth its mother died, leaving child on its father’s hands. Well, my friend knew a farmer-couple named Langer in Devonshire, worthy people, who were childless, and deciding to bring up his child in the social status of its mother, status which he always considered by far the best, he fixed upon these Langers; offered to buy their Devonshire farm from them, and to give them instead the large farm they now have here, together with an annuity, on condition that they took little Hannah, and let it be understood in new county that she was their own child. All this arranged by lawyer’s-letters, and to the present old couple don't know who is Hannah's father, though they may suspect, may suspect. That, at any rate, is all the mystery; baronet's daughter instead of farmer's."

"That makes her all the more interesting, sir," said Chris. "I must take the matter seriously, I see. It might produce a rather eccentric and pretty effect, an English country-girl for one's lawful wife"

CHAPTER III

THIS THING SEEMED to stick in Chris Wilson's vague memory, for three days later he put his cloth hat on his curls, and took a stroll to Woodside, where he begged Mrs. Langler to take him to Hannah, was led upstairs to the foot of a ladder which he climbed, then stooped through an opening, and found Hannah in a sweet-smelling loft among festoons of apples, thyme, and marjoram. She let slip a cry on seeing him, rather vexed, and quickly let down her skirt which had been pinned up in front.

"Charming, this place," said Chris, panting.

"Can't shake hands," said Hannah. "How on earth came you up here, so near heaven?"

"Near Hannah," said Chris, sitting on a tub.

"Oh! a man may not flirt with his grandmother in aloft!"

"But I have come expressly to court you."

"You mayn't find that all milk and honey, even so high up! I could lock you up nicely in here till you had done every scrap of this work. I am pretty ruthless, too, if I take a thing into my head."

"Provided you lock yourself in, too."

"Ah me, how Somebody finds mischief still. You had no right up here, Mr. Wilson."

"You called me Chris last night."

"Because you had the heroism to call me Hannah! But give him an inch and he takes an ell, of course."

"L is for Langler. Shall I take a Langler?"

“His Majesty is pleased to hunt today.”

“I find you admirable.”

“Do you? If Miss Edith Cardew — but I won’t utter rashness with my lips. Come, work first and play after; help me with these artichokes—”

“You would not be jealous if you were not in love.”

“Who?”

“You.”

“But what has brought him here this day, for my sins? I’d as soon think of being in love with the Archangel Israfil! Well, no peace to the wicked, I suppose — must just make the best of a bad bargain.”

In such talk they spent an hour up there, Chris murmuring short remarks with his quiet smile and movements of the eyebrows which said for him most of the little that he had to say, till he dropped the remark, “Seriously, I think of marrying,” whereat she, with a spin towards him, said quickly:

“Seriously? of marrying Kathleen?”

“Some one else,” said Chris.

“Ah, well, now that I have the chance I am going to say my say about that. You don’t mean any harm, but you are too friendly with Kathleen, you know.

“Oh! you can’t dream what misery you may be making for this poor girl, Mr. Wilson! You have a way, for instance, of hanging over ladies when you shake hands in a sort of silent rapture; but you shouldn’t to her. Oh, my heart aches! It isn’t her fault. Promise me this now, and mean it.”

“I like the eyes; nice and clear.”

“Ugh! it is no good; he can’t be serious. I’d like to — beat you!”

“Kathleen has nothing to do with the matter. I wish to marry you.”

“Oh! that would be nice! to be Mrs. Fiddle!”

“But seriously.”

“How many strings to your bow, madame? That would be nice! With bells on her fingers, and bells on her toes, she shall have music — !”

“No, but seriously. Will you?”

“But you should not say such things, Chris, O, you should not, it is not right to me — !”

“But don’t think that I am jesting. My Uncle Peter and I have even spoken together of it.”

“You and Sir Peter have spoken of you marrying me?”

“Quite true.”

At this Hannah stood silent with her back to Chris, dashed away a moisture from her eyes, then with instant swiftness was on her knees, fondling his hands, saying, “Don’t say it, if you don’t mean it, dear; mine isn’t summer-love, but the whole silly Hannah, with her heart and everything thrown in, for good. If you knew how I have prayed to be saved from loving you, for you are like water slipping through one’s fingers; only an angel could have and hold you. Sometimes I’ve longed to beat you, and smash all the fiddles; but tell me once in my ear that you love me, that you do love me—”

Chris smiled with little nods, meaning “yes,” saying, “I like the hair, quite a burden of womanhood here behind, nice and fat,” whereat Hannah leapt up with rather a sobbing laugh, saying to herself: “It will be a work to be Mrs. Fiddle, I know; but I’ll tackle it gladly, since it is His Will.”

His Will! But while some marriages are made in Heaven, some are made on the Continent, and this of Chris was rather of this latter type. Hannah, however, could dream of no motive, except love, in the mind of Chris, for she knew nothing of Sir Peter’s hand in the matter, and in her joy believed that here was the heavenly type. When Chris returned to the Hall, he was able to tell Sir Peter that Hannah was willing to marry him within four weeks, before Chris should quite sicken of Norfolk.

Hannah had been on the point of becoming a London hospital-nurse, but all that was changed now. No secret was made of the affair, and the countryside was in a state of wonder; old Mr. and Mrs. Langler pondered it in their hearts; the quaint maid was made ill, and when she heard of the dowry that Sir Peter gave with Hannah, her amazement went mad. She now understood that Sir Peter was the cause of all, and she was as angry with the old man as with Hannah.

Everything was made ready in haste; the five villages round Orrock and the coast forefelt what was coming; great things were in the air; Woodside no more recognized itself; partridge-shooting, dancing, and guests were at the Hall, hearing strange music at night.

All this, however, was upsetting for Sir Peter, who was of a fretful and fidgety build, and delicate in the chest. Some days after Kathleen had risen from her fever, she came down to the Hall, and found the old man in an exhausted sleep. The house-party had gone out picnicking, and, hearing this, the little maid had wandered in search of Sir Peter to ply him with questions about Chris and Hannah. She found him with some documents on his knees breathing in sleep among the nine thousand volumes which made the fame of Orrock; and she made long steps from one white bear-skin to another, so as to come softly to him.

The thought came into her head, "If you slept on for a week, our wedding would have to be put off."

Sir Peter was in a nook, with an oriel window on each side of him. Kathleen softly opened a leaf of one oriel, and looked out at the autumn sunlight on the land. "He always disliked me," she thought, "and I have always disliked him for it. Why should they dislike me? I have two eyes, one nose, like human beings — perhaps they guess that I am myself, the sole of my kind, and that there's something in me that rankles and is at war; for it is all a struggle with me somehow to hold my poor head above water — a weary thing, God knows. Do they see into me at all? I should shriek with shame; but not even God could quite know this knot of nerves. Then, if they don't guess, why do they dislike me, and make me hate? As to that old man there! I'll look out through that other oriel to see the glass-houses."

She softly opened the oriel on the other side of Sir Peter, without closing the first, and looked out anew, thinking, "There is quite two acres under glass on this side. He is well asleep; that isn't my fault if he sleeps where there is a draught, and he hasn't had asthma lately, so it is nothing, and not my fault. What could have put this marriage into his head? By what witchcraft has Hannah Langler enthralled him to this extent? He has a lot under glass over here; there must be a dozen gardeners. Not that I should wish to harm any one, even if it was in my power. But oh! how I am trembling!"

She turned inward, and without closing either of the windows, fled away over the bear-skins. She reached home in such a state of panting and fever, that she had to be put to bed, while Sir Peter, for his part, slept on an hour in the draft, and awoke hoarse. The next morning he did not rise from bed; three days later he was so ill, that it was decided that the wedding of Hannah and Chris must be put off; in a week it was given out by the doctor that Sir Peter was dying.

It was in this state of affairs that old Bentley wrote the news to the baronet's niece and "ward," Yvonne de Pencharry-Strannik; and on the ninth evening of Sir Peter's illness, Kathleen, walking in Orrock Park, heard a voice scream out "Kathleen!" and, looking round, saw a chaise with two women, one of whom was leaping out to rush to her; in a moment she was being kissed by the young marquise, Yvonne.

“Yvonne! you?” cried Kathleen.

“It is I! I arrive from Paris,” panted Yvonne.

“You smell of Paris, and of all the scent-bottles on earth—”

“Such an escapade, my dear! I arrive alone with my chamber-woman, in order to see our uncle who is dying; is it not that I am good?”

“And tall, and astonishing, and most wonderfully pretty, Yvonne! It is four years since — | You know, of course, that your cousin, Chris Wilson, is here?”

“You yourself, wrote you not to me of it? Am I not here? therefore, I knew it!”

“The darling English that you speak, Yvonne! p’tite jaseuse! I believe I could never be jealous of you, you are too much like a bird-of-paradise.”

“Oh, no one is jealous of me, my dear, I have too good a heart. In effect, I am without a single defect. I am rich, I am free, I am pretty, and I have a good heart.”

“Delightful of you to say it! Are you going to stay with me at the Hill — or at the Hall?”

“The violinist, where stays he?”

“At the Hall.”

“Then, me also, I stay at the Hall.”

“But you have heard that he is to be married?”

“I have heard it! And as to the lady, is she charming?”

“A yeoman’s daughter, Yvonne — just think! — without graces, without beauty. It is such a scandal. You have just come in time to rescue Cousin Chris, thank Heaven.”

“Oh, the heavy role! I only play in comedy.”

“But you will do this, won’t you? This match is all through Uncle Peter, who has taken a crack-brained fancy to the girl, and is giving vast sums of money with her. Remember that Chris is our cousin, and not rich like you and me, so it is our duty to rescue him from this mercenary person. All she has is super-abundant health and a back-bone — I dislike her. Besides, you are about to fall in love yourself, for every woman at once says of him, ‘What a dear boy!’ He looks so meek and demure, yet one guesses the wayward fires in him—”

“Oh, save me from fires! Chateaubrun is already purgatorial! But if my Uncle Peter dies, Mr. Wilson may no more marry—”

“Uncle Peter won’t die. Ah, I couldn’t live in England afterwards.” The little maid said this rather to herself, but Yvonne, hearing it, asked:

“You love much, then, our uncle, my poor Kathleen?”

Kathleen answered by asking: “Aren’t you afraid of ghosts, Yvonne?”

“Ghosts? Not at all!” said Yvonne. “In France one no longer believes that the spirit lives after death, my dear.”

“I don’t either, not with my head, but I do with my nerves; I know that there are no ghosts, but I live in a horrible terror of them, Yvonne.”

“My little cousin droll and dear,” murmured Yvonne. “But shall we go farther?”

“Droll and little without being dear,” thought Kathleen, shrinking on a sudden like the sensitive plant.

They drove through the darkling park together to the Hall, before which they found a knot of men, Chris Wilson among them, and with an evil eye Kathleen saw Chris start at sight of Yvonne, whom he had never met before, and, on being presented, hang over her hand in a rapture. Chris had seen nothing French or dazzling for months, so Yvonne came like an armed man upon him, and he went with her into the Hall with quite a new briskness and heat in him (his hair lifting in a mass at each step), like a fresh fizzing-up and ado in stale-gone champagne.

CHAPTER IV

“WELL, IS HE a dear boy?” Kathleen asked Yvonne one evening in her laughing way.

“Of my part, my dear,” answered Yvonne, who, being in England, duly spoke in Engleesh, “that which I repeat to myself is not that he is a dear boy, but that he is dear to another. I have a good heart, Kathleen, I must not take part in a treason.”

The quaint maid, standing with her hat on beside Yvonne, whose yellow hair was being ondules, said again, “But is he a dear boy?”

“I know nothing of it — there! Leave me tranquil,” answered Yvonne.

“Tranquillity and Chris don’t live in the same parish, Yvonne.”

“Oh, pas tant que ça!” went Yvonne. “And is not Miss Langler, of her part, admirable? Why, you told me that she is without charm! Me, on the contrary, I find something of even angel-like in her eyes which twinkle and smile, and in a certain light on her forehead.”

“The beauty of holiness heightened by perspiration—”

“Well, for me she is beautiful in her type,” said Yvonne. “And her devotion to the bedside of our Uncle Peter! No one would imagine that she has a lover whom she adores. Miss Praed has told me that during three days and nights she will not once sleep, and still remains gay and fresh; what a Britannic physique!”

“And if you want to make her your slave for life, just tell her ‘How splendid and strong you are, Hannah!’ She is vainer of it than a coquette of her dresses. However, it is not her business to nurse Uncle Peter, there are the proper nurses; but Hannah knows where her nest is feathered.”

“No, she is not mercenary, my dear, I am sure of it. But a little jealousy is the salt of country-life, is it not?”

“You should be jealous!” said the little maid with lightning eyes.

“And why?”

“Isn’t there some danger? Do be careful, dear. Chris, I can see, likes her racy bell of a tongue with its touch of buffoonery, and her warm-hearted moods and changes. While she is away from everything at Uncle Peter’s bedside, you should be specially killing —

“Oh, as to that, my dear, let neither Miss Langer nor you have any delusions,” said Yvonne. “It is only because I have a good heart.”

“That’s where to fire her,” thought Kathleen— “in her sense of another woman’s rivalry: she is more emulous than she is lovesick.”

“There! it is finished,” said Yvonne before the mirror. “Is it not that I am charming to-night? Let us descend.”

All day Yvonne would lie torpid, like a Spanish woman, but began to brighten up before dinner, and shone out at night like a moon, dimming every star. Then would be the feast of music in an old drawing-room, with a gallery and a chimney-piece made of the figures of Alchemy, Astronomy, Justice, and Truth, Hannah at such times being mostly absent with Sir Peter, who had twice rallied and twice got worse; but one night, stealing into the drawing-room and sitting apart in shadow with a long cloak on, she saw and heard what put her into a heavy mood. Chris and Yvonne were sitting together, and Kathleen playing a polonaise; when Kathleen rose, Chris said to her, “Now, you played that with great fancy and virtuosity,” whereat she made a mock courtesy, and glanced round to see what everyone was thinking of her. Yvonne then said, “Chris wishes that I play with him a duet of Spohr, Kathleen, if you will accompany us,” to which Kathleen answered “Certainly,” trying to dry her palms in her already wet little handkerchief, for these evenings with Chris were to her like the hours which go before a death on the scaffold, fierce with an inward excitement which was betrayed by her sweating palms and the blaze in her eyes.

The three cousins, Chris, Kathleen, and Yvonne, then moved to the piano, Yvonne with Chris’s Nicolo, and Chris with his loud Bergonzi. Hannah’s eyes smiled with pleasure upon the smart movements of Yvonne’s body and right elbow, even while the music that streamed from Chris brought a tear to her cheek. Some genteel hand-clapping went round when it was finished; and as the three cousins sat again, Yvonne said: “What a violin, this Nicolo! Puff! one may blow it into the air; it is nothing but a soul which cries out before one touches it.”

“Pity it lacks power in the G,” said Chris.

“Where did you get it, Chris?” asked Kathleen.

“A present from the Baronne Veszcolcza, a Hungarian.”

“Ah, those Hungarian ladies!” said Yvonne in French, “they know how to give!”

“And take,” said Chris.

“Are you going to stick to your Nicolo for concert, Chris?” asked Kathleen.

“Only for chamber-music. I want to get a Joseph del Gesu.”

“Rather than a Strad?”

“I think so; more carrying and masculine. Paganini played one, which I have seen in the Genoa town-hall blushing like an angel.”

“Are there many about?”

“A fair number, with many counterfeits; but you know them at once by their grim scrolls.”

“There’s a theory that each composer is suited to a certain maker,” said Kathleen. “Handel to a Strad, Mozart to a Maggini—”

“Oh, I adore Magginis! so full and plaintive,” said Yvonne.

“It is his violas that count,” remarked Chris.

“I have seen one in London,” said Kathleen. “A queer thing with short corners and upright sound-holes.”

“Delicious orange varnish,” said Chris.

“Sweet! orange and golden; and such purfling.”

“My maternal grandmother brought into our family a viol d’amore with seven strings,” said Yvonne. “At least, they say it is a viol d’amore; oh, so quaint! But one can induce wonderful arpeggios from it.”

A fourth person now joined in to tell of another viol d’amore which he had seen, or thought that he had seen, and the talk went on about makers and labels, Mittenwald and Cremona, Joachim and Lulli, and, at last, about how Calve plays Carmen and how Coquelin plays Cyrano, till, dropping into French, it became doubly-Dutch to Hannah in her shadow under an old gallery; and sitting there with her chin on her palm, she became ever more grave, thinking: “What part could you take, Hannah, in all that chatter? Oh, I see it more every day; it will be a work to be Mrs. Fiddle! I shall have to screw all that into my hard nut if I am to keep him a year. But there’s nothing like venturing; it shall be done. French first, then music from A to Z.” She got up and stole away through a little Gothic door as quietly as she had come in.

Just then Chris was murmuring to Yvonne: “Nice moonlight, I see; I might take you out to the cliffs.”

Yvonne’s eyes mused upon him in a certain French way, and her lips formed the word “No,” with a smile.

“It is nothing,” said he; “we are now in England, not in France.”

“But I am French.”

“Kathleen might come.”

“In that case, perhaps. I wish first to go to my Uncle Peter’s room, and I may bring back Miss Langler to go with us!”

But at Sir Peter’s door Yvonne learned that Hannah was not in the house. “I have forced her out for a breath of air,” said one Miss Praed, a nurse; “she will not be back till one o’clock.”

“Is he better now, my uncle?” asked Yvonne.

“Yes, I think it will be all right now. But two hours ago it was touch-and-go with him, I can tell you. The doctor said that he wouldn’t live through the night. Miss Langler got on the bed with him again, and kept breathing into his mouth.”

“But what could that do to him?”

“What good? I don’t know. She said that she felt impelled to act in that way. Certainly, he rallied wonderfully after it, and this is the second time, too. Chance, perhaps.”

“Well, tell her, will you, when you see her, that I came to see if she wished to go out with me and my two cousins,” said Yvonne, and ran off to get ready.

It was eleven o’clock, a full hunter’s-moon was abroad in the sky, and there could be no stranger stillness than that in which the country slept, nothing stirring anywhere save ground-game, a squirrel in the fir-wood, or the white owl on a well in the courtyard of some old gabled farmhouse. Without knowing it, the three cousins chatted and laughed in lower voices, the moon and the earth were in such an elfin tryst. They passed by Woodside, lying dark but for one gleam among its old trees, then up the lane by cottages of cobble, with the mill-house and the lighthouse on the right and left. But when they came under the group of Spanish chestnuts before St. Peter's churchyard, and could see yonder the ruined tower where drowned sailors are laid, the little maid was for hanging back, not liking graves and dead people, nor had they gone ten steps further when she turned white, and whispered "What is that?" to Chris.

Chris could see only the graves in their grasses and poppies, and one ghost-ship becalmed where the moon-shine gloated upon the sea, till Kathleen whispered again, "There!" and he now saw at one point among the grasses a shade like a sitting form. Wishing to be brave, he whispered to the ladies, "You wait here," and alone went forward.

When he had got near enough to the form he saw that it was a tall woman seated in the grass in a hooded cloak, with her back toward him; just then she was gazing up into the sky, speaking aloud to herself, and he heard the words:

"Who God possesseth in nothing is wanting, Alone God sufficeth";

Immediately afterwards she melted into tears, repeating the same words with her brow on a gravestone, and was so taken up with her thoughts, that Chris was able to lay his lips on her hand before she saw him.

"Why, it is you!" said Hannah, leaping up. "I was just preparing for a tussle with a ghost."

"Extraordinary to find you here," said Chris.

"Oh, I often sit out here late at night. This slab here covers the brick grave of your mother's family; so here Sir Peter will come some day, and you perhaps, Chris, and I, too, now, no doubt, after we have had our fling. Meanwhile, it isn't a bad thing sitting out on graves. If they make you cold below, they warm you up above. I've heard 'em say some things, I can tell you."

Chris laughed at her lively tongue — as near laughter as he ever got.

“But how came you here?” she asked. “Am I to flatter myself that you followed me from the Hall? Say yes.”

“No; I came with Kathleen to see the moonlight. Yvonne came, too.”

“Ah, there they are. Let’s all run down to the sands and have a good romp.”

“But have you had any sleep?”

“Oh, I’ll sleep tomorrow or some time. Never say die when Shuck and all the fairies are about. Look, you can even read the names on the gravestones, the moon stares so, like a big baby let loose in a bazaar.” The other two now came up, and all went downward by a path on the cliff-side. Yonder, along the cliffs, was to be seen the spot where Mrs. Dawe’s cottage had been carried away by the landslip a year before, when Hannah had rescued Willie Dawe from the waves, and, ever vain of her mannish feats, Hannah wished now that Kathleen would mention this to Chris; but the little maid was mum as to that and everything in this neighborhood of graves. At one place they could see a strange thing — coffin-ends sticking out from the cliffside, and when Chris asked, “What are those things?” Hannah answered, “Coffins! All this coast is going, you know; every year the sea wears away a bit, like a cake of soap left in a tub of water. So many a poor corpse that died on its bed round about has found in the end a watery grave.”

CHAPTER V

“WELL, IT’S ALL over,” said old Mrs. Dene, the house-keeper, only nine days after that moonlit midnight in the churchyard and on the sands. “And it has been like a whirlwind, hasn’t it? Perhaps one may have a little peace now.”

“Hasn’t Sir Peter been splendid?” answered Miss Praed, the nurse. “To think that only ten days ago he lay at death’s door, and there he is now in his white waistcoat, looking as hard and dry as a pebble.”

“But he doesn’t believe that his recovery will last long,” said Mrs. Dene, “and I believe that that’s why he insisted on hurrying on the wedding. Well, it has been a trying time for us all. My dear, you can’t realize the strangeness of this marriage, not being one of us. To me it is like some great dream—”

“But why so strange? They make a fine match,” said Miss Praed. “He just wanted some one like Mrs. Wilson to keep him in order—”

“Yes; but if you had told me four months ago that some day Hannah Langler might come to the Hall to eat her wedding breakfast, I should have thought you crazy! It is true that Sir Peter always had a sneaking liking for her; used to whisper into her ear, ‘Well, uglier than ever, I see’ — he said it today again, I think, as they were sitting to the breakfast — but those were about the only words he addressed to her for years. She used to bring round a special pound of butter every three days, but seldom saw Sir Peter, though I have caught him prying after her from a library window. At any rate, no one could possibly have foretold all this sudden — And yet, do you know, Hannah has latterly been receiving rich birthday presents from some mysterious quarter? Perhaps Sir Peter — I don't know what to think!"

"But what a jolly bride!" said Miss Praed. "Between-maid Jane says that early this morning you could hear her clear voice singing hymns a mile from Woodside. Did you notice her cry once, though, during the service?"

"Did she cry, really?"

"Aye, she did — was going to, anyway — he was just putting on the ring — and I saw her face work, but she made a fight for it, and pulled through dry-shod."

"And hasn't she been blooming ever since, to be sure!"

"Hasn't she? I followed her out when she went to the villagers' marquee; she sat at one of the tables, and in five minutes had the lot of them in fits of laughter at her jokes and stories. She is a wonderful mimic and romp."

"Always was. But, between us, isn't our highly-gifted bridegroom just a little — how shall we put it — absent-minded?"

"It strikes me that Mr. Wilson's eyes have been following another woman more often than his wife today!" said Miss Praed, bluntly.

"The marquise has looked sweet, it must be admitted," said Mrs. Dene. "What a costume! and her manners have a certain absolute bouquet, to which, I think, none of our ladies ever attains: there's an equal distinction in each case, but mademoiselle's has, besides, a naturalness, an easy worldliness — the difference between very old wine and wine not so old. One can't blame the men: I've wanted to take her in my arms myself."

"But a man should be in love with his bride," said Miss Praed. "I'd just like to give the genius a piece of my mind in some quiet spot! I had a suspicion of something before, but today it was as plain as a pike-staff. And his poor, dear bride, for all her sharp eyes, quite unconscious of everything! Oh, it puts me in a rage!"

“And what a day of mishaps,” added Mrs. Dene, “all through our gifted bridegroom. First, the lack of a frock-coat, then the forgotten ring, then the missing of the train—”

The two gossips drew back from a rush of dancing couples sweeping past them. The married pair had started off on their honeymoon at four-thirty, but half-way to the station had turned back when Hannah’s watch showed that the train must be already gone — this lateness being due to the violinist’s practise after the “breakfast,” for five hours’ practise a day was his habit, and for lack of it he had felt like a fish out of water, wedding or no wedding: so he had missed his train, as fiddlers do; and when the carriage came back amid laughter, the evening had been turned into a rompball, many of the guests staying on.

Mrs. Praed and Mrs. Dene were still deep in their gossip when Kathleen in pink crepe came making her way among the dancers, to ask Mrs. Dene if she knew where Yvonne was. Yvonne was out on a balcony among some men, and out there Kathleen, taking her aside, said at her ear: “Yvonne, Chris pleads for one last word with you.”

“Kathleen, I cannot,” was the sad answer.

“He is pacing about a corridor up there like one out of his mind. We can’t let him suffer like that, dear. He says he didn’t realize that he really loves you till this afternoon when you pinned the flower in his coat and he smelled your hair, and he says that music will be hateful to him, if you don’t do something to cool his fever. Grimani tells me that he has dashed down his Nicolo, and broken one of the blocks. A boy is a strange mechanism, Yvonne, and this is the wildest and dearest of them all. Come. Won’t you have pity on poor Cousin Chris?”

“Alas, my dear, what can I do there?” said Yvonne with a sad naivete. “I too am enamored, and what may not happen if I go to him?”

“Never mind, only come, and leave the rest to Providence.”

“And this is his day of marriage, mon Dieu, mon Dieu! Where, then, is his wife at present?”

“Wife, indeed! If she is his wife, it is you who are to blame, Yvonne, for I warned you. Why, she isn’t even jealous of you; she thinks that he is hers —”

“Oh, as to that, no woman has the right to be so unconscious! But if I go, it is on the condition that you assist at the interview, Kathleen.”

“Come, then.”

But no sooner had they come to Chris, than Kathleen left Yvonne with him, though she hid behind the pedestal of a statue near enough to hear. The corridor was dim, but still the meeting there was most imprudent, seeing that in a bedroom not twenty yards away old Mrs. Langler was busy round Hannah, putting her in a gown, packing, hinting, fussing, with the tears and petty ministries of mothers at such a time. It was near eleven o’clock. In the morning Chris and Hannah were to depart for the Continent.

The French “interview,” meantime, went on in the corridor, Yvonne touching her eyes with her handkerchief, her face turned from Chris, he in a grande passion, pleading, while the little maid peeped with an evil eye. To most things that Chris said Yvonne replied ruefully:

“But your wife, mon ami, your wife. I have a good heart.”

“But one is not expected to be in love with one’s wife!” cried Chris. “Certainly not on the first day of marriage! I do her no wrong: it is the custom of the world, except in this quixotic country of Quakers. Why am I to be different from every one, merely because my parents were English people? am not English — !”

“Oh, but she is, mon ami. She expects you to love her, I am certain of it,” said the rueful Yvonne.

“And I do love her very much,” said Chris. “Dear excellent girl! But as a wife only, not, of course, as a sweetheart. How can I, when I am in flames for you? At least give me some hope. Promise to see me in Paris.”

“Mon ami, no — no, mon ami. Oh, Chris, let us love henceforth apart and in silence, carrying, each of us, the image of the other as a holy and sad symbol in the soul.”

“You do love and pity me, then, Yvonne? Tell me how much you pity me,” said Chris.

“Mon ami, you know well that I love you with all my heart.”

“But what shall I do? How can I sleep to-night? How am I to practice tomorrow? I seem to be in the greatest trouble! I have eaten very little. Can’t anything be done for a poor man?”

Yvonne’s cheeks dimpled into a smile. “The remedy is even more abstruse than the disease is painful,” she said.

“Could you not come with me and Hannah on our honeymoon?” asked Chris. “You could come in our train tomorrow—”

“Heaven! what a proposition,” murmured Yvonne, casting up her eyes. “You see, you are only a dear, spoilt child. No, mon ami, I must go now; your wife awaits you, Chris. But see, since my woman’s heart is weak, I give you one proof, the last forever.” Holding his face between her palms, Yvonne kissed him with a tender chastity on the lips, once and once again. Chris took those kisses with a blessed face, and was about to clasp her, but her caress all at once changed into a smart escape down a near stairway, whereat he, left alone, leant his forehead on the arras, and shed some tears.

Hannah, meantime, as Yvonne had truly remarked, awaited her husband in a boudoir of the suite which the married couple were to occupy for the night. She believed that he was still at the ball, and wondered that he was slow in coming, for he had said that he would be with her soon. She sat on a footstool in a flowing robe, her ears on the alert, thinking that this, then, was how it felt to be a married woman. All that day she had been riding on some dream-whirlwind — she saw it now, looking back — and marriage was going up in a balloon! But in a few days she would be on good old terra firma, and the old Hannah once more.

“Only be with me,” she murmured, “only let Thy strength be perfect in my weakness.”

But Chris did not come. Mrs. Langer, who could not be got rid of so soon, peeped in with the awful whisper, “Isn’t he come?”

“He will soon come, mummie,” said Hannah.

Ten minutes later Chris entered, and Hannah was up to him, saying: “At last! They have hardly let you speak ten words with me all day. But now I’m the woman in possession. Shall I lock all the doors of the cage? Shall I? But, then, how will the dishes be brought in? You must be hungry and tired, too.”

A table stood laid for two near an apple-wood fire.

“I can’t eat,” said Chris with a forlorn smile, kissing her on each cheek.

“Oh, I have set my mind on our supper for two, so it must be. What a day of strain — the fierce light that beats upon a bride — I don’t think that marriages should be so public. But now I feel in a nice harbor, with my captain on board, and the everlasting hills round about. Say that you will eat something, and I’ll ring: who is it that would do anything to please me?”

“I, I think.”

“Cool as a cucumber with eyebrows! genius gone weary! but so dear, so dear.”

“Do you love me, Hannah?”

“There, he asks me that. It is the one duty which I perfectly fulfil: even in God’s delicate scales I love you as much as I ought to.”

“You are very good. I’m most fond of you, too. But my dear girl, I am enerve. I can’t feel musically; I am hungry, yet can’t eat; I don’t seem to want to smoke; no one seems to know what to do for me.”

Chris threw himself upon a sofa, and Hannah, petting his hands, said: “You want a good sleep, that’s it; we won’t eat anything, then, but I will make you a nice glass of syllabub, and put you to bed; then I shall brush your hair till you go to sleep, and watch over you all night.”

“I couldn’t sleep, you know. I seem to be in the greatest trouble.”

“Trouble?”

“Perhaps the good people oughtn’t to have made me marry, Hannah. I shall probably make every one unhappy. I have begun badly already—”

“But what is it?” asked Hannah in a state of astonishment. Made you marry, Chris? How have you begun badly already? If you mean missing the train—”

“No, don’t ply me with questions. You are the last that I should tell, perhaps.”

At this Hannah did not say anything, but kissed his hand, took off his boots quickly, ran and put on his slippers; then, sitting again on the footstool, said, “Shall I make the syllabub first, or will you tell me first?”

“You had better not know, perhaps,” said Chris.

“Yes, I had,” said she, “and there’s no way of escape; you are hemmed in between the back of a sofa and a curious woman, so it may as well come first as last.”

“You would only make a conjugal scene, and give me a headache. I wish I was in Paris or somewhere. This place has brought me into foolish embarrassments.”

“But tell me; there’s nothing like making a clean breast of things; tell Hannah. That’s what I am for, you know, to bear everything of yours. I’m the sea; you can't put too much into me. I'll either bear or swallow the lot. Conjugal scene indeed! I am such a little pet, aren't I? That is just why I can't stand women, because they are all so puny and silly. Come, better tell. I can't guess — yet I thought I knew you all through—”

“I'm afraid I shouldn't tell you; and yet it might be better, for I suppose you will find out. My dear girl, I am in love.”

“And not with me?”

“My poor—”

“Not with me, Chris? not with me? on my wedding night?”

“Oh, I am most sorry!”

“Why,—” her head bent down upon Chris's leg while he, murmuring over her, kissing her hair for some time, but soon changing to peevishness again, said, “I knew that you would make a scene.”

At this she was up on her feet, and old Mrs. Langler, peeping from the inner room on hearing a river of words, saw Hannah, tall and bright, striding up and down, pouring out her anger against some “she”: it was all “she” — she going about like some one with the measles, spreading mischief and vanity, doing evil continually and not good — she using her God-given beauty and trumpery arts as a poison, not as a medicine, of life — and so on. It all fell upon the head of the poor Yvonne, who had done her best, or her second-best, to be good, while the guilty Chris got off without any blame. Hannah had never been jealous of Yvonne — for strong natures are little given to jealousy — but at once now by a flash of instinct she knew that Yvonne was the canker, without needing for Chris to name Yvonne.

“It is not Yvonne's fault,” Chris managed to say in the midst of her flow of words; but this only stung Hannah the more, that he should defend Yvonne; and “Horrid Frenchwoman!” she said, with a touch of bile now.

But in the very middle of a sentence her stream of words dried up; she turned to a window and stood there some minutes, humming to herself, playing a tune on the window-pane, till, with sudden swiftness, she was sitting on the footstool again, saying to Chris, "Let's shake hands!"

"We are friends for life now, Chris," said she, "and nothing can alter that; cut me into ten bits, and in each bit you'll find a friend cropping up: friends first, and other things after. So tell me everything, and then we shall know how to go on. First of all, are you very badly in love?"

"I'm afraid I am," answered Chris with a troubled brow. "I am like that, I suppose: I go crazy after things."

"That's the genius maggot, you see. But ah, Chris, an ounce of good conduct is worth a pound of genius, believe me."

"You are very likely quite right. Perhaps, if the truth were known, I am not at all worthy of you."

"No, don't say that to me, dear: it is because of my utter unworthiness of you that this has come about. But what I want to know is, why did you wish to marry me in the first place? Did you love me, and then change? and if so, oh, why didn't you give me some hint of it, even one day before our marriage? Then I should have saved you."

"My Uncle Peter hurried on everything so bewilderingly," answered Chris; "and it is only this afternoon that I began to be so much in love."

"Oh!" cried Hannah with a laugh, 'only this afternoon.' It is the Frenchwoman's bridesmaid's dress that you are in love with! I believe that I am the true love, really. Hers is only passion, not love."

"What difference between passion and love?" asked Chris. "That is one of those quixotic phrases which you English trot out so confidently, as though there were the least reason in them. Love is a passion."

"At any rate," said Hannah, "haven't you been in love like this before?"

“Never half so seriously, I’m afraid.”

“You have. This only seems more serious because it is the last; it will pass in its turn, and the everlasting Hannah will remain. Did I ever tell you about Mrs. Simpson in the village and her son? She lives apart from her husband, and her son, Fred, a ne’er-do-well working at Wardenham, comes to see her once a month. So the first time he came, she asked, ‘How are you going?’ and when he answered ‘Grand, mother,’ she said, ‘Well, better go and tell that to your father, I want none o’ you here’; second time it was the same, ‘Grand, mother,’ and ‘Go to your father’; third time he said, ‘I’ve broke my arm, mother, and lost my job.’ ‘Well, come in, boy,’ she said, ‘you’ve got nothing for a father now, but a mother’s gratis.’ Well, that’s Hannah, gratis, whenever you need her, as you will. But meantime, whose side, Chris, do you mean to take in the fight between that woman and me?”

“Is there a fight?”

“To the death!”

“Then I will take your side, if you tell me what you wish. But be sure that I shall never cease to be in love with Yvonne.”

“Oh, I shall have you all straight in three weeks. You would cease tonight, if I showed her to you with her hair all shaved off. So you must help me by promising, firstly, not to see her again without my leave.”

“She won’t let me see her.”

“Won’t she? She ought to be ashamed of herself for her miserable lack of self-restraint! Yes, she will, fast enough, if she gets the chance. So promise me that.”

“Well, I’ll try to keep from seeing her.”

“That’s a brave. You see, you do love me, or you could never be so dear and good to me. So promise me, secondly, not to go away from me. Promise me that. Of course, we can only live together on a footing of friendship—”

“Perhaps we had better part, Hannah. It would be most awkward—”

“It will be awkward for us both, but awkwardness is always the wages of some one’s kicking over the traces, and I am prepared to put up with it, if you will. I foresee that that will be best all round: so say yes for me.”

“Well, perhaps I had better do as you wish. I believe in your wisdom and goodness. But better let me think it out first for myself. Perhaps I could smoke. I will put on my boots, and walk out in the park; early in the morning we will talk again. You ought to go to bed, I suppose. Oh, I am in the greatest trouble now, on both our accounts. I had no right in this place, —” etc., etc.

“That one yonder is your room,” said Hannah. “I will tell Grimani about the lights, and leave the syllabub on this table. All else is ready for you. Good night, Chris: I hope for better—”

She could say no more, and his back was hardly turned when all her strain and self-rule tottered and was half in ruins. Stumbling to the frightened Mrs. Langler, she said in a weak voice, “Mummie, I am not well to-night,” and gave way to a sob on the old lady’s bosom.

Chris, meantime, went down by a back stair to think out alone the question of parting or not parting from Hannah. Down there in a shrubbery stood Kathleen, gazing up at the windows of the married couple: and she, seeing Chris come out, followed behind some way, and then joined him.

CHAPTER VI

IN THAT DOUBLY-LOCKED journal of hers the little maid wrote some days later:

“I was hiding on the wedding-night near those three steps at the chapel-side, watching to see the shadow of Chris or Hannah pass by their windows. It was after eleven. I was all trembling with cold, but enjoyed the suffering in that physical way. For a long time I saw nothing. Lights were going out here and there in the windows. Bentley came to the door opening upon the little courtyard by the housekeeper’s room, shutting up for the night. The guests had mostly gone to bed. One could still see the glare on Frean Hill of the wedding bonfire. There was a bright half-moon, and a frost. Once I saw Hannah’s shadow at a window; she must have stayed there five long minutes. How I wondered and hoped then! Since she was alone there, I guessed that she had found out everything from Chris’s manner, and had made a row. I prayed from my heart that he would leave her straight away, before she could have the triumph of sleeping once with him. What a darling thing is marriage, after all! Those windows were to me the windows of the seventh heaven, from which I was shut out in hell. Yes, I suffered. But the battle is not to the strong, but to the fin.

“After seeing Hannah at the window, I waited on about fifteen minutes, when the door which Bentley had just bolted was undone, and, to my wonder and joy, out came Chris. He looked strange to me in his frock-coat, more stout and heavy; his hair fell rumpled over his shoulders, he had no hat, and was smoking a cigar. I thought I must die for the shocking, slow thumps of my heart. But I would not let him out of my sight, for I thought, 'I have him now, and if he ever goes back to Hannah, I must in truth be a paltry, feeble being.' He went westward, and I followed till we were between the rhododendrons and Embree Pond: then all at once I found myself saying to him, 'Well, Chris, this is not well, a bridegroom wandering alone on his wedding night. I am so sorry for you! I assume that there has been a row.'

"'Not at all,' he answered. 'I have told Hannah everything, but she took it beautifully. I am most wretched, Kathleen. I think Hannah the most perfect lady I ever met.'

"I thought to myself, 'Present company not excepted'; and I thought, too: 'He would soon get fascinated by her like the rest of them, if he once lived with her.' So I said: 'Yvonne isn't in bed yet; shall I try to induce her to come out here to you to hold another consultation?'

"'Do you think she'd come?' he asked quickly.

* That would be splendid of you! But then, I promised Hannah not to see her.' "'But surely,' I said, 'that is no promise, to promise the impossible. You would go mad, if you kept it, for I know men, they go mad if they don't have what they want, especially geniuses like you. People think that I am a foreigner in the world, Cousin Chris, an outsider who can make only purblind guesses at the nature of others; but, really, I am just like everybody in every respect, though it is sad to be even thought outside the pale.'

"'Never mind, never mind,' said he twice, patting the hunch. But why, why should I have said all that about people thinking me different? It was so dragged in! He must have guessed at once that it is I who know myself to be different, and only spoke out of the fulness of my own heart; and when I said 'I am like everybody, and so can guess their nature,' he must have thought instantly, 'It is because she is not, that she is so eager for me to think that she is.’ And to say ‘in every respect like every one’! I wonder if he thought that indelicate? He must have understood that I wished to reassure him as to my completeness in case he ever wishes to marry me. Oh, God, how I have betrayed myself to Chris on every occasion, if he has the least insight! I can’t help it. In his presence I get into such a stew, my hands become like wet rags. I say out the first thing that rises to my tongue, revealing to him my inmost nature, and then I hurriedly cover up my blurtings with obvious lies and half-lies and turns of meaning; and afterwards what tortures in grieving over every word that I have said, and in seeing too late what I might have said! That day when I drew the caricature of him in his presence in my sketch-book, shall I ever cease to feel the bliss and shame of it? I did it in a few strong lines, and he took up this bony hand and said, ‘This hand has craft; you are one of the artists’; then, slowly, he pressed his lips on it. Lord, how it poured from every pore of me. I laid my head on his shoulder, and fainted. Oh, Chris, what did you think of me then? Did you not kiss me once while I slept in you?

“With regard to his promise to Hannah not to see Yvonne, I said to him: ‘But you should not help a woman for whom you have no regard against Yvonne, who loves you too. Better let me run and fetch her.’

“At this he got into a sudden temper, dashing down his cigar, and crying out, ‘But, good God, can’t you let me be? I tell you I made a distinct promise! Do you all wish to drive a poor man m-m-mad?’

“I was so startled, that all I could find to say, very foolishly, was: ‘This is all due to Uncle Peter.’ I had no wish to drive a poor man m-m-mad; but I suppose he was irritated by my tempting him to do what he was longing to, yet could not do, because of his pledged word to Hannah. He seems to be a stickler for what he would call ‘his honor.’ Men must have been originally made on the moon, or else was.

“‘What I came out here for,’ Chris next said, ‘was to think out alone the question whether I am to live with Hannah, or what to do.’

“‘If you wish to be alone,’ Chris, you have only to say so,’ I said.

Mmm,’ he went, with his murmur of pitying good-nature, ‘my own dear friend, forgive my peevishness, and stay by my side, I beg. You see what a plight I am in. If it was any one but Hannah, I shouldn’t care in the least, for really a wife has no claim upon the amorous longings of a husband. But Hannah is a personality apart: her pain seems to wound me in a wonderful way, and it is keener, I know, than she has wanted me to guess. She still wishes to live with me on a footing, as she says, of friendship—’

“‘But the false relation, Chris,’ I murmured.

“‘Grotesquely false,’ said he, ‘in the case of an English wife. Still, I somehow feel a longing to please her, Kathleen.’

“I began to see now that, if I was to keep him from her, it must be by showing that the separation would be for Hannah’s good, as well as his own; so I set to work. By this time I was not so excited, and I brought out my arguments, and pleaded so well, that I actually began to feel like Hannah’s best friend, for one must either speak as one feels, or else feel as one speaks. I wonder if I should have made a great actress, a great anything, if I had tried. There is something special somewhere in the little box. But perhaps everything in me faltered and went crooked in sympathy with my back. At any rate, I shed tears, and enjoyed them, when I spoke of ‘the tragedy of poor Hannah’s life’; I showed that if he lived with her, that would only be making her ‘pain’ permanent, which time would otherwise heal. ‘Don’t see her even once again,’ I pleaded; ‘you still have time to catch the twelve-thirty train—’

“‘But what will the good people think?’ he asked.

“‘Oh, Chris, which good people?’ I said to him. ‘How can that matter, when your life, and the life of poor Yvonne, and of poor dear Hannah, are all at stake? If you mean Uncle Peter, hasn’t it all happened through his own quixotic folly? Let him bear the consequences; an old man’s feelings are not to be considered as against the lives of three young people. Go now: don’t let us waste the precious minutes in talk. From what I know of Hannah, she will certainly try to find you, but if you make that impossible by merely going under another name for say six months, by then all will be well. Don’t let a soul know where you are, except me — not even Yvonne, if you can help it, for you know her ‘good heart,’ and she may think it her duty to tell Hannah. If you would like to hear from time to time how your wife is getting on, I will meet you anywhere in England or France, as often as you please, to tell you; or I could even let you know by letter, if you are not anxious to see me.’ So I kept on, heaping words upon him, and it is pretty easy to throw dust in his eyes and persuade him, when he isn’t being hurried the opposite way by one of his heats. He walked by my side staring on the ground, his forehead all puckered with perplexity. At last he said, ‘But could I get off without being seen and worried?’

“‘Easily,’ I said. ‘You can leave Grimani behind till tomorrow, when I will tell him where to join you. We won’t take a carriage from the Hall stables, but one of my own.’

“‘But my violins,’ he said with a start.

“‘Can’t you leave them for one day?’ I asked.

“‘I couldn’t!’ he said.

“‘Then I will run now into the house, and get them,’ I said promptly, to save more words.

“‘But I must write a line of farewell to Hannah—’ he began to say; but I cut all that short — no time, no time. ‘Come, Chris,’ I said, ‘it is now or never: aren't you decided to go?'

"‘Yes, quite,’ he said; and from that moment he became as eager and breathless as I was. He ran half of the way back to the Hall with me, then I showed him Hewersfield Lane, and told him to wait for the carriage at Shooen’s Clause. After watching him start up Hewersfield Lane, I ran my fastest to the Hall, then in by the little courtyard door, and flew to find Grimani. I found him on a sofa in Chris’s private sitting-room; he couldn’t have long come back from the bride’s suite, I think, yet he was certainly drunk: not with alcohol, though — some other drug. I panted to him, ‘Quickly Grimani, give me Mr. Wilson’s hat and three violins,’ and that man looked at me, and went off into the sweetest, scornfulest chuckling. I’m sure I never heard laughter so pure, so full of delight. I understood at once that it must be due to some drug, but oh, I was cross! However, I hunted out for myself all the fiddles and the old cloth hat, Grimani laughing for joy at me all the time, and with them I flew. Only fifty minutes were left before the last train, and I have never got home from the Hall so quickly. I ran direct to the stables, knocked up everybody, ordered the brougham, then into the house, woke up Olivia, borrowed five pounds from her, then back for the stables. I met the brougham coming, got in, and drove fast to Shooen’s Clause.

"Chris was there, waiting by the hedge-gate. I beckoned in advance, and he got in as the carriage stopped. I was all but mad with haste and excitement there alone with him in the dark of the brougham; and how I loved him then! I wanted to go with him to the world’s end, at least to the station; but I didn’t dare. Little time was left. ‘You have only nineteen minutes to get to Wardenham in,’ I said to him. ‘Here are the violins, your hat, and some money to pay your fare.’

"He pressed my hand, saying, ‘You are a treasure; you forget nothing.’

“‘Tell me where Grimani is to join you tomorrow’

“‘Say at the Langham Hotel in London.’

“‘And you will write me soon? You promise?’

“‘Can you doubt it?’

“Then all at once my heart and soul were in my mouth, for I found myself saying: ‘Good-by, Cousin Chris, kiss me.’ I felt as if I had cast myself into an abyss and was falling forever, with something whispering at me, ‘Suppose he won’t?’ It seemed an age before he kissed me on each cheek French-fashion. If I could only have been satisfied with that! but I went crazy for more while I had him at that last moment of parting, and I fastened my lips to his, and couldn’t stop, but kept on. He dared to draw back from me. At least, I think so. I have an impression that I was irksome to him, that he felt sick at that sort of kiss from me. Oh, may thunder crush me, since shame doesn’t kill! After that I knew no more, till I found myself lying near the hedge, the brougham gone. I don’t remember getting out.

“I came back home, they put me to bed, and I slept from sheer exhaustion. The next morning I took one of my long early rambles, and gathered a fine lot of grasses for my botany-table; came home laughing, and Olivia said, ‘Why, you are looking as fresh as a rose this morning.’ Yellow roses, my Livie. She didn’t know what was in me. I asked for news from the Hall: she hadn’t heard, and I was impatient, so drank just a cup of coffee, and went down. It was only just eight. No one was down. I walked about the breakfast and morning rooms, waiting. Bentley and some men-servants came and went. Presently in looked the white face of Mrs. Langler, and vanished. Ten minutes later I heard Uncle Peter’s cough on the front terrace. He had been out for a walk; I saw him in his muffler and top-hat, talking with his head gardener. On coming in, he walked straight into the morning room; must have been surprised to see me, looked at me rather strangely under his eyes without saying anything; I don't know what he could have been thinking of. He always disliked me, and I have disliked him since he fell ill this last time, for it isn't any one's fault if he is weak in the chest. There are things which will not be written: only the heart treasures them. Heaven only grant that he doesn't die for many a long day: I couldn't ever be alone after dusk.

"I had just begun to laugh and say something to him, when Mrs. Langler came in, smiling, but horridly agitated. 'Well,' muttered Uncle Peter, 'how's bride?' 'I was looking everywhere for you, squire,' said she. 'Well, well,' muttered Uncle Peter, 'fine morning for first winter-sowings.' 'Squire, I have to tell you that the married pair are gone.' 'Gone, gone,' muttered Uncle Peter, 'gone where?' 'Gone off to London, squire,' said she. 'What, what,' he muttered, 'Hannah gone without telling me good-by?' 'Oh, forgive her, squire,' she said, beginning to cry, 'all's not well.' 'All not well? What's the matter now, what's it, what's it?' muttered Uncle Peter. 'Well,' said she, 'Miss Kathleen here being one of the family, one may speak before her: they haven't gone together, squire, for all's not well. Mr. Wilson went away last night, and Hannah followed by this morning's train. Not that any one need know it, but they haven't gone together, squire. He left her at eleven last night, didn't come back, and I couldn't get Hannah to go to bed. At three in the morning she went to his apartments, and found out that he was gone away. From then to a quarter past six she sat without saying a word, until she said, 'I shall be starting for Paris by the first train, mother, to look for my husband.' I went on my knees to her, squire, beseeching her only to wait and consult you; but you know that one might as well pray to the tides as beg that girl to alter her mind. She's gone, Hannah's gone. I wanted to wake you up, but she wouldn't let me. She started on foot for Wardenham at a quarter to seven with nothing but a small bag. She left this note for you, squire.'

"The note trembled in Uncle Peter's hand, and I thought to myself, 'You see now, you see, what mischief you have done by your quixotism'; yet I couldn't help pitying him. I don't know why he took it with such frightful agitation. I heard him read three half-sentences half aloud: 'Gone to look for him,' and 'Do forgive him,' and 'He is as good as gold'; then all at once, before he had read all, the awful thing came: his mouth seemed to go crooked, and he staggered half-way round the table, struggling to keep up, but apparently without power on the left side, then gave in and sank down, bawling out something. It made me feel sick, his vain struggle to manage his left leg. But I was pretty brave, I didn't run, I stood over him while Mrs. Langler ran, calling out; his hat lay on the floor near him, the letter still in his right hand; his sick eyes seemed to dwell on my face.

"He was taken away in the middle of a crowd of them, and I sat there for hours, staring before me. Quite an ado was soon going on on the terrace with carriages, trunks, and departing guests, and, on my right, breakfast, talk, and hurrying feet; but I sat on alone, without moving, in a sad mood, I don't know why. The cook cooks and sweats, and adds the gravy, and then has no appetite for all her work: it is a nice world. Once Bentley looked in with his long face, and told me that Dr. Williams said that Uncle Peter had hemiplegia, a stroke all down the left side. I could have told him that. I sat there till the clock struck eleven, when I got up and went to tell Grimani where he was to meet Chris, but found him lying in the same position as during the night, in a sort of trance now apparently, with half-open eyes. When I shook him, his only answer was a murmur. I then scribbled on a bit of paper, 'Go to Miss Sheridan when you wake,' and put it into his hand. Then I came home. Grimani did not turn up till near four in the afternoon, looking smart and wide-awake. He is rather a handsome fellow. I asked him what had made him laugh so heartily the night before when I wanted his master's violins: he answered that he had no recollection of having seen me; then I asked what drug it was which he took, and he very modestly answered — hashish. I gave him the Langham Hotel address, warning him not to mention it to any one, and he went away.”

CHAPTER VII

SHE SAYS AT a later date: "It is five months since the wedding, and this of today is only the second letter I have from Chris. I have lived without seeing him, I couldn't tell why. What a passion for itself this little hunch must cherish! Let worlds perish, it says, but let me continue to bulge about under the sun. Life is nothing, and I know it: but still I like it, I cling to it, and a scratch on one little darling hump hurts more than if all the straight backs on earth were broken. What keeps every one from suicide? It used to be fear, as Hamlet and Plato say, when there was hell-fire; but now it is hope of better things tomorrow and the love of one's personality — chiefly Hope, 'the anchor' which keeps life from drifting into death. For me there is only one hope — somehow, at the last, to have Chris. I care about nothing else. No doubt I shall fail in it, as I failed before my birth, as failure runs like a crack through my being, but I live in order to try. I must go out of this place: Chris and Yvonne must be brought together again, if I can do it; if I only had power and craft, Yvonne could be made my stepping-stone to Chris. He writes that he has kept his word to Hannah and not seen Yvonne, that he thinks of Hannah, and would like to come here to see her, if he did not fear to 'reopen her healing wound.' He has no suspicion that Hannah is away searching Europe for him; he thinks that she is still here, for I have written him that I see her, and no one here but me knows where he is to write him. My belief is that Chris is trying to 'be good,' and will return to Hannah, if something can't be contrived to send him off at a new tangent. And it should be done soon, for he comes out definitely on the third of next month, when he gives his first recital at Queen's Hall. Hannah can't fail to find him after all that publicity. But what can I do? I can only wish and dream of doing. I wish that Yvonne was in England. If Hannah once gets him again, she will keep him. The marriage bond is always such a power in itself, and that girl certainly has some sort of fascination for many people. A fisher-boy named Cooper trudges all the way from Wardenham every Saturday afternoon to ask after her, and the villagers besiege the Langlers with questions and mes-sages. The love of some of them for her really has a touch of passion in it. I hate her. Chris's twenty-five pounds a month continues to come for her, and old Langler forwards it on. What a tax on that poor boy! He has behaved beautifully all round in the money way, refusing, Mr. Bretherton tells me, to touch a penny of the vast sums with which Uncle Peter bribed him into this marriage. I suppose, however, that his beloved Joseph will soon bring him riches — he writes that he has a Joseph now, another present from a lady! He sends me a prelude and fugue of his own writing, with the air of 'get your hair cut' for theme: it is awfully sad. He has been doing orchestral practise at a first desk on the quiet in Berlin under Strauss's baton, and is 'in a sea of music,' working hard — for the recital perhaps. I wonder if he still drinks such a terrible lot of wine. It is rather a pity, but he wouldn't be half so dear without the touch of inflammation in his nose. If he were mine, I should keep him tipsy, and we should live and die in Lethe. Hannah would 'pull him all straight,' as she says in her off-hand vernacular, and just spoil him. The day before yesterday I got a third letter from her, and she continues to write once a week to her parents and Uncle Peter, enclosing hosts of little notes to Tom, Dick, and Harry round about. She irritates me: something in me hisses at the tone of her nature, as cat detests dog. I don't know what she says to Uncle Peter, or he to her. He still babbles when he tries to talk, and old Bentley, who does all his writing now, has a still tongue: however, he has let out to me that Uncle Peter has several times ordered Hannah back — as though any power on earth was ever going to draw that woman off her quest! She has the nature of a bull-dog. But if she doesn't come pretty soon, she will never see 'her benefactor' again, for since the stroke Uncle Peter becomes every week feebler: so I hear, for I don't see him now, I simply don't wish to.

What shall I do, if he dies? I wonder if I shall peep at the body? I shall want to awfully, I know: but shouldn't I pay for it afterwards, if I am ever so mad! Perhaps I shall see him when his spirit is 'passing,' for he always disliked me. I should simply die, I couldn't live after. I wonder if he will have a white ghost or a black. They say it isn't serious to see anything white, but that the black ones are terrible. At any rate his Hannah is really 'uglier than ever' now, for she takes no notice of his command to come back. She is still at Weimar," etc., etc.

This last was not a true statement, for under the same date Hannah herself writes:

"Arrived in Paris last night after jolly voyage from Brussels: met in train two Americans, named Moore, sisters, very rich, with their English masseuse — elder sister has weak heart, but full of fun; wanted me sudden and quick to go with her to Yankee-land! Not Hannah! for what woman, having lost a piece of silver, doth not seek diligently till she find it? Came back to Madame Brault, and, to my delight, found old room free: 197 francs, 3 francs less — a bargain! Woke up blooming, singing, this morning, and, as usual, Paris brought me luck and high spirits. First of all, walking down rue Scribe on my way to rue Croix des Petits Champs, met full-butt a monsieur on pavement, nice fat Frenchman, beautifully dressed: we couldn't get past each other! He dodged to right, I dodged to right; I dodged to left, he dodged to left; wherever I went I found him, wherever he fled, there I was, barring his way; we kept it up for a good half-minute, trying to escape each other, but fastened together by destiny. Kept face stern as I could, but a grieved look came into his eyes, and then I couldn't help, screamed right out. He lifted his hat as we got clear, with a look which meant, 'I forgive.' This has kept me going in laughter for the day every time I think of it. Well, Hannah, a merry heart doeth good like a medicine. It is a shout only to live. My soul shall magnify the Lord, and my spirit shall rejoice in God.

"Didn't go straight to rue Croix des Petits Champs, as I had meant, but off at a tangent to rue de Berri to visit the Gauds. Sad news there, Hannah. Every-thing squalid again, children uncared for, Gaud gone back to the absinthe! Saw it at a glance. Just planted myself down, and had a good old cry, in which madame and little Lucille joined. Said 'Never mind, soon pull him all straight again.' First Frenchman, I suppose, who ever signed a pledge, and what I've made him do once, can make him do twice. But what time does news at rue Croix des Petits Champs leave for anything? Must be in London within a week. Pray, pray for them. 'Alone God sufficeth.'

"Thence straight to rue Croix des Petits Champs" — this is the violin-street of Paris— "and to my dear old friend, Meunier. The old soul's joy at seeing me! His face lit up gloriously. Said I was talking French like a francaise, wicked flatterer. Had great news for me! What news? No, wouldn't tell: must first hear me play in parlor behind shop on a new Lupot which he has, bought from the year's gold-medalist at Conservatoire; so I in parlor, fiddle 'well up' at chin, he and madame all smiles and fat, listening critically, played air from 'Sonnambula' with variations. Meunier's verdict, that I had got on wonderfully, fine tone and taste, would soon get fluency; hoped I wasn't killing myself. 'Fifteen hours most days,' I told him, and the astonishment of the pair of them! They didn't say, 'What a woman!' but 'What a race!' as though all Englishwomen were not a lot of dolls. Then, after much sweet fuss and preparation, came the great news: Chris found, the darling of my soul to be mine again. Let all that is within me shout His Name. Meunier showed English newspaper: great stir in musical Lon-don; Chris already known as 'rising star,' 'coming man,' and taker of Vienna 'by storm'; recital on 3d of next month at Queen's Hall; every one on the look-out to be taken 'by storm.' Hannah, too, will be there, will wait at stage-door, will follow Chris home. And then — what next? Shall I be turned out of doors? Don't know. The Lord judge between me and thee. Meunier sure now that Chris must have changed name after leaving Vienna, or I must have found him long since. Strange that he should go so far as that — not kind, not very like him; perhaps put into his head by some friend. I should certainly have found out about Queen's Hall recital without Meunier's help, but so thankful that it was from him and no other that I learned it, for he sent me all the way to Brussels on a false scent, and that must have been heavy on his poor old heart, but now he will say, 'Yes, I sent her on false scent, but at the last it was I who found him for her.' In three days, then, for London: must lose fortnight's pension, paid in advance, 98 francs, 50. Don't care, all in the day's work."

CHAPTER VIII

CHRIS WILSON WAS in chambers in Gray's Inn when the morning of his recital, the third of the month, came round. He had meant to do his day's practice early, so as to have fresh nerves for the evening, but he lay late abed that morning — awake, indeed, but uncalled. The clock's hands moved on from nine to ten, to half past, and it was pathetic, his meek, smiling patience, the stirring of his eyebrows for wonder that Grimani did not come, and his lack of power to rise without Grimani. He was not altogether sorry to be let alone, for he had sat up till four a. m. with a gay crew in Victoria; but when it became eleven, that was too much, and Chris began to call out for Grimani.

There was no answer.

At last, at twenty past eleven, Chris leapt from bed: and he was no sooner on his feet than he had a fresh insight into the value of time, like a fresh sense and pair of eyes, of which he had been bereft while he lay pleasing himself abed. And he became on a sudden very angry.

Hurrying straightway, therefore, into Grimani's room, Chris began to use strong words, but soon saw that they were wasted, for Grimani lay in the trance which the Arabs call the "kief" — the last of the three states through which one passes under the power of hashish; so Chris, without more words, fell upon his valet, pulling and beating him.

When he had got Grimani more or less awake, he said to him: "I will bear it no longer. Off you go this very day, and this time I mean it. It is simply pitiful how you neglect me. Get me my breakfast quickly, call the woman in, pack your trunk, and never come back to me again.”

Grimani, in a bad temper at being hustled down thus suddenly out of heaven, began to answer back that he was glad enough to get out of such a place, that, if he took hashish, Chris took wine, and it was six of one and half-a-dozen of the other, etc., etc., whereat Chris fled from his valet's tongue with the words, “Off you go.”

Grimani then pulled himself together, and got the breakfast. Not a word was said while he waited at table, till, toward the end, he asked, “Do you really mean me to go away?” to which Chris answered, “Yes, off you go; I mean it this time.”

“C'est tres-bien!” (All right!) said Grimani in the tone of a threat.

He did his work, summoned before her time the house-woman, or “laundress,” as they are called in the Inn, and lingeringly packed his trunks, half expecting Chris to come and make friends before it should be too late. But Chris was now in another world, with a fiddle under his chin. At last Grimani, having no excuse to stay longer, went to be paid his wages, still hoping that Chris would say something pleasant. But Chris paid him with a flushed forehead in an irritated haste at being stopped in his morning work; and Grimani left the room with his check in a grim, Italian mood.

He knew that that night was to be one of the greatest in Chris's musical career, and he made up his mind that Chris, if he played at all, should play badly. Grimani and Chris had been so long and closely bound together, that to be turned off in this way was, naturally, a painful shock to the valet. Something of this kind had, indeed, happened often before, but had never gone so far; and a Neapolitan does not go unavenged. Grimani, accordingly, after being paid, went back to his portmanteau, and took out a little tin box. This box had in it a substance something like greengage jam, but paler; it was hashish, the so-called “fat extract” of cannabis (hemp boiled with butter). One takes only a teaspoonful of this in order to get up into one of Grimani’s heavens, but Grimani now took out nearly a tablespoonful of it; he next took out a decanter of wine from a cabinet in the sitting-room, poured in the hashish, shook it up, put back the decanter; from the next room came the music which Chris was making. The Italian’s lips were banefully set; when his wicked work was done, he made haste to leave the flat.

He knew that Chris, before setting out to play, always drank of the Alicante wine in that particular decanter, which followed Chris from city to city. Grimani was sure, therefore, that the very hashish for which he was being sent away would not fail to bring him his revenge.

That, on the whole, was a day of flurry and trouble for Chris. About one p. m. a mob of idle young men came upon him, and the “laundress” being gone, no one opened the door to them. “Grimani!” shouted Chris, but no Grimani answered. Chris had to let them in himself, and ever and anon broke in upon the babel of their talk by shouting “Grimani!” in a pathetic way, till it dawned upon his memory that he had sent Grimani away; then he had to go out to meet several people, such as his accompanist, a famous Polish pianist, Hill’s, the hall-manager, his agent, and some others whom he was bound to see, but either forgot, or had not enough time. Late in the afternoon the quaint maid with Miss Olivia called upon him, but no one opened to them. When at last Chris returned home to dress with four or five young men at his heels, it was already time for the concert to begin. In the midst of his dressing he ran and poured out a tumbler of the wine drugged by Grimani, but some one speaking to him drew off his mind, and he was in such a prickly heat of haste, that in the end he rushed out of his chambers without having drunk any of the drugged Alicante. Chris was always late for concerts, and for everything; so the tumbler of drugged wine was left standing on the table of his sitting-room.

When he drove up with his friends to Queen's Hall, his audience was already getting restless for him. Hannah wrote of it that "Though I didn't know who was who, I felt that 'everybody' was there; I well in front, area, five shillings; he scandalously late; crowd waiting on one boy; Hannah's heart wild as a bird. Then these eyes saw him — frock-coat, stout, forehead flushed with haste, nose a bit shiny, and very modest and dear he looked, with his meek, drowsy eyes, his meek, dear smile. People clapped; he and H bowed; in another half-minute he had one by the ears — fugue of Bach. That wasn't much, perhaps, but, if I were paid, couldn't describe how it all went on after the Kreutzer bit, I in a kind of ecstasy, and toward the end a scene of really high-wrought excitement throughout that hall, not at all the ordinary applause, but bursting out uncontrollably, like cries of the heart; I, too, clapping without knowing; old gentleman whispered agitatedly at my ear, 'The first English maestro.' During the Kreutzer his E string went — hundreds of opera-glasses bent upon his fingers — didn't mind a bit, on he went, his two hands all over the place at once, plucking, striking, darting, face flushed, hair trembling, octaves coining like one note, harmonics precise as fate; seems greatest in f and bravura passages, 'rides the storm,' has a Joseph now from somewhere — sounded to me like a Joseph; and all the time something whispering to me, 'This boy who is shaking this hall as one shakes a child by the shoulders, as one stirs a pot, as angel troubled waters of Siloam, he is married to you, Hannah, all this crowd strangers to him, but you his own wife.' I cried and laughed, proud of him. Yes, Chris mayn't be a saint or a hero, but a hero in his way, like Samson 'brings down the house,' can do one thing wildly well, is God's workman. If a man can do his work, forgive him all his sins. Chris doesn't play to audience, plays to himself, audience just happens to overhear him playing. That's right! — in all art, in art of living: 'Let not thy left hand know!' Hearty sincerity, 'the inner life': then don't much heed what anybody thinks, just jog stubbornly along the right path, humming to yourself, 'Let's all be jolly, boys.' Chris has this sincerity and inner musical life, and it streams from him in psychic waves which thrill those capable of being thrilled by high things: that's his secret. Others stir, seldom so powerfully. Hall continued to be crowded long after concert, handkerchiefs and programs waving, recalled eighteen times, gave two extra pieces, a Lied, and nocturno out of M.N.'s Dream; felt pained for him coming and going in and out so often; even when hall had slowly emptied, still a sprinkling of enthusiasts calling him back, ladies pressing upon stage-steps to shake hands, then outside another mob besieging carriage, he meek and good, shaking most hands. Procession of four cabs full of men followed his off, don't know who they were, friends: the sixth was mine.

"The lot of us to Grosvenor Square, stopped at big house with porch, where all went in, I waiting in my cab with the empty cabs: something told me he didn't live there, waited a long time, drizzly dark night, hardly any one about there. Then heard fiddling in house, not his at first, but presently his, I was certain, then piece after piece by him. Didn't know what to make of it, at last got out of cab and rapped; asked footman if Mr. Wilson lived there: 'No, was there, didn't live there.' 'Whose house?' 'Lord L 's,' musical patron and amateur. Waited till near mid-night, when out they came again, pitched into waiting cabs, and away, I following, noisy laughter from cabs in front. They got out in narrow street near Leicester Square, and into drinking-place called Gambrinus.' I waited twenty minutes, till they came noisier than ever, then followed to quiet sort of nook called 'the Albany,' behind Regent Street — residential chambers. All went into a house, I waiting with other cabs to see if he would come out, my heart weary for him. One o'clock, half past, two: London well asleep. Soon after two they came again, he arm in arm with loud-laughing, bearded foreigner. The five cabs started off once more, I, as usual, following ten yards behind; in Piccadilly they parted, his going eastward into Long Acre, I after him. Drove into Holborn, where he and two others got out at a gate and rang bell; night-porter opened, they went in; soon I, too, rang, went in, passed through one square into another, and saw them just entering house, he between the other two, arm in arm. I followed into house, and, guided by their noise, went up quaint, rickety stairs with large banisters to second floor. Waiting on landing, heard them behind massive black door which had 'Mr. Chris Wilson' on it in white letters; could just see by light burning on landing below. Knew now where he lived, so ran down and out to gate again, paid cabman — ten shillings after a wrangle! — then in again and up to landing before door. Why couldn't I have waited till next day now that I knew? If I only had! Impulse and warm heart will bring these silly, erring feet into some nice trap some day, Hannah.

"Waited on landing fifteen minutes for two friends to leave, heart literally in my mouth. It had come to the point now. Something said to me, 'It would be far better all round to wait till tomorrow, especially as you are in such a blue fright now'; but the more everything in me urged flight, the more my feet stuck where they were. Headlong self-will passing itself off in the guise of 'duty that lies nearest,' and what has it brought me into now! Oh, it was God's will to humble me horribly that night, that I may know better the poor thing that I am.

"They came out at last, the two friends — miserably tipsy; I stole into the dark higher up the stairs, till Chris had slammed his 'oak' after them; then all was still, till a town-clock struck three; hung up there on stairs fully five minutes, then with a rush was down, knocking at his door.

“Heard him coming, laughing to himself, and the moment he saw me he upset me by bursting out into heartiest laughter! ‘What, a woman?’ said he. ‘Chris, it is I,’ I said. ‘Who are you?’ he asked, laughing. ‘Look at me, Chris,’ I said, ‘it is Hannah.’ He thought it over a moment, then said, ‘What, my own lawful wife?’ — and he went off afresh into the same delicious giggling. Oh, he was tipsy! I should have had to laugh, too, if I hadn’t been so jumpy. ‘If you are glad to see me,’ I said, awfully agitated, ‘I will come in for twenty minutes.’ ‘Mmm,’ he went, ‘my own dear friend, I am charmed to see you; come in instantly.’ Another moment and he was laughing again, his cheek against mine, arm round my waist, drawing me to sofa, where he sat beside me. It was cozy in there, those old rooms most artistically furnished, with a French touch. I felt all shut in with him, alone in a world, and couldn’t help being soft-soaped at my hearty reception, but didn’t quite like the wine-inspired kisses or mocking laughter, and made up my mind sharply, inflexibly (as I thought), to tear myself away within five minutes, for my fiddler began to be pressing, and when I was coy, said, ‘Mmm, are you not my wife?’ as though nothing had ever happened between that boy and me! But that wasn’t good enough for Hannah, though inwardly pleased as Punch, and I thought, ‘He shall never say that I got over and bound him irrevocably to me when he was tipsy: it is urgent that I go quickly!’ It was hard to do, he so fond, endearing, boy-like, but still I was on the very point of going: I remember that much distinctly. Then, why, as a matter of fact, didn’t I go till two P. M. the next day? What a mystery! Did I, too, get tipsy? Seems utterly impossible! True, haven’t drunk wine for ten years, except in church, but I hardly took more then than at Holy Communion! Two sips, perhaps three. Did that get into my head?

Wonderful sort of wine! No, can't think that: no head so weak. But something did happen to me: am as sure of it as of sitting here. In any case, the shame, the weakness and pain of it!

“There was a tumbler half full of wine and a decanter on table near sofa where we sat; twice or thrice Chris sipped from tumbler; I was talking about recital, just ready to fly, when he, left arm round me, held tumbler to my lips with his fond murmur; I shook my head, but when he pleaded ‘Oh, just a little Alicante,’ sipped a little. Have a fancy now that it tasted funny — buttery like: not sure; but from that time remember clearly nothing, nothing that happened: all like wonderful, but most shameful, dream. Either once or twice afterwards, I sipped more Alicante; don't remember; it might have been a dozen times, really, I lived through that night in such a profound haze. Haze of tar-rainbows! Ungodly Utopia! The state I allowed myself to get into! What, what can have happened to me? Every power of mind and body seemed so enlarged! How enormously I loved that night! How we two giggled to each other! Shame, to my last breath. Was it really? No good thing in me, then? Seem to have utterly forgotten promise to myself to fly from him! Can any will be quite so godlessly forgetful? And the wicked pride which puffed me! Remember feeling that whatever I did must be right, had been a fool all my life, but now was ‘all there,’ all the world fools, except Chris and me; and this kept growing, I fancy, beyond measure into impiety, till at last I said, satisfied, ‘Well, I am God; and Chris is with me in the Heavens.’ Can't be too sure, all very muggy and far-off; only know that I must have either gone raving mad, or very drunk.

“Another woman might have sworn that Chris drugged wine! Have heard of such things. But impossible to him in any case, and in my case how foolish, being his already. No, something happened inside my brain, the will of God to humble my womanhood to the dust. Shall I ever laugh again?

“Some time or other I fell into a sleep full of trances and visions that seemed to last a hundred years, and though I only dimly remember whatever I did, I clearly remember whatever I dreamt, for reality seems to have become a dream, dreaming the only reality. When I woke was by the side of Chris, who was asleep. Had never known complete wretchedness till that moment; woke sane, slight pain in head, conscience heavy, like waking in Hell, and, like stab to the heart, a guess, a knowledge of all. Clock pointed to one-thirty — in the day! but room still very dim. Sat up quickly, pulled myself together, saw at once my life done for, since Chris would and must hate me always for tricking him into this while hopelessly tipsy. Dared to pray, even then, for a bruised reed He will not break, and has regard to the humble in heart: and answer came quickly — a flood of inspiration, saying, ‘Get away quickly, for since he was so very tipsy when you came, and his memory always bad, he may forget that you were ever here; then all will be as if nothing had happened; tomorrow or some time you can come afresh.’ Looked close at dear face — fast asleep, eyes a little open; in a moment was up, dressing, never dressed so quickly, not minding buttons, hair anyhow, laces all over the place; was in the act of rushing out with jacket hanging over arm, hatpins, umbrella in hand, when something said, ‘But suppose, suppose: may you not some day need proof that you once passed a night in these rooms?’ Stopped, thought it quickly out; made up my mind to take away something peculiar, precious, which would be at once known, if ever tendered as proof and pledge. Looked about — four violins; didn’t like to take, lest he might want, but, hung up here and there, museum of out-of-date fiddles, old viol d’amore, six-stringed Duiffoprugcar, small viol di Gamba with neck gone, a rebec, crowth, rotta; took viol di Gamba, then, to make sure, took from dressing-table watch and chain, old amethyst ring with intaglio, and nail-brush engraved with word 'Chris' in silver; then made escape.

"Outside on 'oak' five cards pinned up — visitors — also bit of paper with 'Mrs. Hewett, the laundress, called, but could not get in.' What a sleep! All those people knocking, and neither of us hearing a sound!

"Finished dressing on landing, went down, broad day seeming strange to my eyes, got into first cab, and home to Guilford Street. Fresh trouble waiting there for Hannah, as sparks fly upward! Letter from mama: Sir Peter really dying at last, asks for me. Should have started at once, but not equal to it today; head still going round, round, hands shaky; but nothing must keep me from his death-bed: sent telegram, 'Come by early train tomorrow.' Am writing now in bed, half-past ten: last night at this time was following his cab about London, self-sure, silly, little dreaming what trap lay waiting for my feet. How much has happened since! The short distance we see before! 'A little longer lend Thy guiding Hand to these dark steps, a little further on.' To-morrow morning by the nine-fifteen for home. Will write first a note, 'Am at Orrock'; then, if he remembers and cares, he will come to me."

Hannah did duly depart the next morning to Sir Peter Orrock's dying bed, after writing a word to Chris. But her hope that Chris would forget all about her visit when he woke was perfectly fulfilled. Hashish has that effect of blotting out and drowning real happenings under dreams, and Chris had already well drunk of the wine drugged by Grimani before ever Hannah rapped at his door and appeared before him. Even the little that Hannah in her diary remembers of what happened after she had drunk is remarkable, and due only to her very powerful memory. As to Chris's memory, it was even weaker than hers was strong, for it often happened to him, when his head was full of music, to stand still in a street and look about in a lost way, asking himself, 'Am I in Paris now or in London? Whither am I going, and for what?' When therefore he woke from the hashish it was with all memory of Hannah's visit cleared from his mind. She, for her part, had the instinctive feeling that he would forget because of her own very vague memory of all that had happened: hence she had taken the viol and other things as her proofs, and had done well.

Chris, on missing these, made up his mind that he had been robbed by a burglar, and was furious at the loss of his viol di Gamba. He meant to put the matter into the hands of the police, but shirked the boredom of it, and soon forgot.

CHAPTER IX

MEANWHILE, HANNAH HAD left off the chase of a husband to give herself to the dying man; the strain of her mind turned from Chris to Sir Peter in the easiest way; and as to her nursing, Miss Praed, the nurse, said to Mrs. Dene, the housekeeper, "Certainly, whatever her hand finds to do she does with her might; and she is a born nurse, though rather untidy sometimes."

Miss Praed had not left the Hall since that first breakdown of Sir Peter's due to sleeping in a draft seven months before.

"It is extraordinary, too," answered Mrs. Dene, "how the old man rallied when she came. He was expected to die, you remember, that very day of her arrival just five weeks ago, and he is still holding out. I suppose it is because he is so wonderfully attached to her, for he no longer tries to hide it."

"Or it may be simply animal magnetism," said Miss Praed, "the actual passing of power out of a powerful life into a dying one. When old King David was dying they put a young damsel into bed with him, and that kept him living; and so it may be in this case, for I never knew anyone with such beaming health as Mrs. Wilson. Perhaps we all rise better after sitting near those sort of people, and that's why we like them, being just conscious that we get something out of them."

"But is Hannah quite well at present?" said Mrs. Dene. "Hardly quite herself, I have thought — a little falling off in the laughter and fresh color. Haven't you noticed anything?"

Miss Praed smiled mysteriously at this, saying, "Perhaps she and the genius have met oftener than we suppose!"

"Oh, no — nothing," said Mrs. Dene. "They have not met since the wedding day; I have questioned Mrs. Langer — there's nothing, nothing."

"Oh, Mr. Wilson, shall I never meet you again to pour out to you a piece of my mind?" sighed Miss Praed, just as Hannah herself passed swiftly through the apartment, smiling upon them with her eyes; for another nurse having just taken her place at the sick-bed, she was going out for her night-walk. Coming home again had been a gladness to her, she had such a love for small things, and for each tree and face in the old place; but even now, after five weeks, she had not yet peeped afresh at everything, and that night she went all along the cliffs, watching to see what fresh bits the sea had washed away during her months of absence, for she knew every yard of the coast, and wherever change had taken place her memory stored it. A yard more had gone just where Mrs. Dawe's cottage had slipped, and three more coffin-feet were showing — for the coffins are buried with their feet to the east. Up and down the cliff-paths she climbed and slid, or walked along the broad sands, nothing moving in the vast of nature but her, for it was late, the harvest-moon was shining as on that night before her marriage when Chris, Yvonne, Kathleen, and she had strolled thereabouts together; and lonesome she looked in that scene, yet she was of it, the soil was in her blood, the sea had a meaning there which she knew by heart from of old. Paris and London were nice as shows, but here was home and the old rock: and she looked at everything with the feelings of an owner.

After her long stroll she sat down in her favorite spot, the Orrock grave in old St. Peter's churchyard, and there had a spell of what she called "the blues." Her future was so dark. Chris would leave London again before she could leave Sir Peter. Writing again to Chris, she thought, was no good; she had received no answer to her note, 'I am at Orrock'; but she had such a settled faith in her power of "influencing" every one, that she did not doubt that all would be well, if she once got the chance of "influencing" him at close quarters. However, he would be off again somewhere, and she was most eager now to be with him because of a thing which lay locked in her bosom, unknown, she believed, to any one.

But the thing was known to the quaint maid, who about that time wrote of it, "I am burning with fever. Hannah is going to have a child. What a depth of reserve must be in the woman! Her mother or no one has the faintest suspicion! I haven't slept the whole night; read it all in her diary yesterday, for, with all her innate secrecy, she hasn't a scrap of caution, and leaves things about. I knew that she keeps a diary, and have often felt a wish to read about her travels, little imagining that it would ever be gratified, or that I should read the awful things that are in that book. Yesterday when I went down to ask after Uncle Peter, Miss Praed told me that Hannah was with him, so, in passing by Hannah's room, I went in, I don't know why — the pleasure of doing something unseen — certainly, I had no thought of her diary: but there on the top of her clothes it lay. She is by nature untidy, I have heard her mother say, and only tidy by habit; her trunk lay open, a black note-book on the clothes. I pounced upon it — her diary! — one of the entries only a day old. I stood just inside the door, ready to drop it and fly. How very little courage must the gods have breathed into this box at my birth! little courage, much desire. If I had been caught, I should have died, but if I had had to die, I should still have read. There was no real danger of any one coming for hours perhaps, the house up there as soundless as the grave, and I might have read the whole thing at my ease, but read only a few pages, then threw it back, and ran. But I had seen enough.

“She hasn’t written it down in so many words, but from hints in the last few pages it is evident that she is grosse. I nearly fainted. She was at Chris’s recital! but how the woman locks things up in her interior! She has given every one the impression that she has not seen Chris, and now she will have to pay for it, for she is evidently in a pretty scare at what is going to be born without any assignable father. Yes, she was at the recital, followed Chris about London in a cab, then forced herself into his chambers at three in the morning when she knew that he was tipsy. This is the staid Hannah Langer! What a scandal! Uncle Peter’s pet! the ‘saint of Woodside!’ ‘How enormously I loved that night,’ writes this saint on the spree. If she had dropped dead at his door! How dared she? What claim has she upon Chris, when he has shown clearly how he regards her? Her calm self-assurance! How I hate her! And after wantonly drinking with him and getting excited, to insinuate to herself that Chris drugged the wine, and to whine to God to forgive her on that account, when she had well eaten her cake! Oh, Hannah, we are all saints after the fifth act. ‘Follow me as I follow — Chris!’

“After eating her cake she proceeded to steal Chris’s viol de Gamba, his watch and chain, a ring, and a brush, thinking that, if he forgets everything, these would serve as proofs in case of motherhood; so this explains the mystery of the ‘burglar’ of which Chris told me in London. Chris apparently has absolutely forgotten that any one was in his chambers that night, so that, if the proofs were stolen from Hannah — but that way trouble lies, I mustn’t think of that.

“The things must lie in her trunk — unlocked — easy enough to get at; she is careless; and I will surely do it, if I let my mind dwell upon it like this. Lord keep me out of all madness and dangers.

“Uncle Peter won’t last many days now, and when he is dead I shall certainly have to fly from here; so, if I am to do anything as to the viol and trinkets, it must be quickly. They don't belong to Hannah Langer; I am Chris's cousin; and they should be easy enough to get, if I only had the courage, if I am not too hopelessly ill.

“If she becomes a mother, possessing these proofs, she will have Chris. Chris is bete, a stickler for his French ‘honor.’ There isn't any hope left — unless I steal the things from her; and I will, even if I drop with them in my hands, ...” etc., etc.

CHAPTER X

THE LITTLE MAID was soon making her threatened attempt to take Hannah's viol and trinkets; her diary shows her thrice in Hannah's room, but each time she found Hannah's trunk locked, and the fierceness of her wishes was such, that she was even dreaming of forcing the lock, when on the fourth morning, as she was returning from one of her early walks, Miss Olivia ran out of the Hill-house to meet her, saying, "Well, — have you heard the bell tolling?"

A bundle of ferns and grasses in Kathleen's hand trembled.

"Sir Peter passed away at four-fifteen this morning," said Miss Olivia.

"Thank God, I was asleep, Livie," breathed Kathleen in a meek voice.

"He passed away peacefully in Hannah's arms—"

"Don't say 'pass away,' say 'die.'"

"But how pale you have gone! Come, bear up, now. We shall be going away somewhere, and you will soon be quite all right again."

"Livie, I have been in Scoble's Cave all alone for twenty minutes, getting dolomites, never dreaming —"

"Well, but you didn't see anything! You see, it is all right: you are not going to see anything, believe me. Cheer up, now. We must all die, death isn't so very much—"

"Isn't it? Hasn't the very air become sick with it? Oh, promise me, Livie, that you will be my friend and stick well to me!"

"Of course, I shall stick to you," said Miss Olivia; "what nonsense! You will soon be all right, I tell you! The funeral will be on Friday—"

“Am I bound to stay till the funeral?”

“Why, what would people think? It is only four days away! Mr. Bretherton has charge of everything, is already at the Hall, John says, and you know that he doesn’t let the grass grow under his feet. Well, well! Sir Peter is gone, I can’t realize it; one by one we all go, and it will be my turn some day.”

The quaint maid would not be alone all that day; in every sough of the autumn wind a ghost sighed away for her; death was in her water and food. But the fly braved the lion in his very den; for toward evening she went down to the house of death, which fascinated her. Hannah with the nurses and some cronies were there, all in one apartment, telling and hearing tales of Sir Peter’s life; and Kathleen came also among them. It was after dinner; the one lamp in the apartment left in shadow the portraits on the wainscot; in a chamber near lay the body. Mrs. Langler told of one ghost, Mrs. Dene of another, and Miss Praed, who was a spiritualist, of a third, while Kathleen, saying never a word, drank it all in, with Miss Olivia petting her wet hand. The little maid suffered; but there is a bliss in that kind of sickness, as when men can’t help casting themselves into precipices, or die adream in snow, or revel in the trances of drowning.

“Ever heard of Jig-Butt?” asked Hannah of Miss Praed.

“No,” said Miss Praed, all ears for the twentieth anecdote.

“His name is Butt, but we call him Jig-Butt,” said Hannah with twinkling eyes: “little ten-acre farmer with a wall-eye. A set of them were dancing at the Orrock Arms, when Sir Peter passed, heard the noise, and looked in. Everybody dancing, except Jig-Butt in a corner. ‘Well, Butt, why don’t dance?’ asked Sir Peter. ‘Lord bless us all, squire,’ answered Jig-Butt, ‘if a man can’t jig, he can’t jig.’ So ever since then he goes by the name of Jig-Butt.”

It cannot be written as she told it. Her perfect way of taking off Sir Peter and the squeaky country voice saying, "If a man can't jig, he can't jig," set all the cronies laughing.

"Poor old Jig-Butt," said Mrs. Dene, as her laughter died down.

"Tell them, Hannah, about Sir Peter and Harriet Davis," said Mrs. Langler.

"Oh, 'Rest I cannot!'" cried Hannah, nothing loth, with lively eyes. "Greatest liar in the world. Locked up her husband in their cottage one day, and when she came back found him dead. So, five months after-wards, getting somehow into talk with Sir Peter in the home-covert, and wanting to interest him in her, she said, 'I've heard an awful voice in the night, squire, at my bedside.' 'Hm, and what did voice say?' asked Sir Peter. 'Squire, I heard it say, 'Rest I cannot — rest I cannot — rest I cannot' — three times.' Sir Peter thought it over, and said, 'Better not go telling that to any of boys about, woman.' 'You think not, squire?' asked Harriet Davis. 'I do.' 'Then, squire, I wunt,' she said."

"Ah, he had a wonderful dry way with him," said Mrs Dene.

"Aye, and a kindly heart, a kindly heart," added Mrs. Langler. "There never was another like him, no, nor ever will be."

"Look at what he did to Mrs. Dawe," said Hannah. "You know, Miss Praed, that all this coast is going, the churchyard itself — you must have seen the coffin-ends sticking out — they say that some day the sea will be up to Orrock Park; well, Mrs. Dawe's cottage went two years ago this November, and being left homeless, she didn't, of course, expect to have to pay lease-rent on the bit of useless land left; but Sir Peter said she must, a bargain always a bargain for him — hard as nails! and oh! she was in a way, poor thing. Two days before Lady-day she received a heap of bank-notes — hundred pounds — brought them to show me, quite broken down, choking, made me feel lumpy myself, didn't know where it all came from, never found out. Because he did it to the least of these, God accept him."

"And he was awfully good to those Prices, too," said Mrs. Dene, wiping her eyes.

"Ever heard of Brother Kate?" asked Hannah with sparkling eyes. "She's the eldest of the Price family. One day Sir Peter met her brother Tom — a boy of six then — so he said to Tom, 'Got an elder brother, boy?' Now, Tom had had an elder brother, but he was dead, and the silly fellow answered, 'Yes, sir.' 'What's name?' asked Sir Peter. Tom got confused, mixing up the dead elder brother with his elder sister, and he answered, 'Kate, sir.' So ever since the whole family goes by the name of 'Brother Kate'; and if you're fond of black eyes, just murmur 'Brother Kate' to yourself when one of them is about."

"They practically owe their farm to Sir Peter," said Mrs. Dene.

"What is that story?" asked Miss Praed.

Hannah told this also, ending it with a red nose-tip and wet eyelashes, and so they went on, telling anecdotes of Sir Peter's pilgrimage here below, with anon a weird story, talking of the funeral, of the opening of the grave, of how the estate might be devised, and of the chances of Chris and Yvonne coming. It was near ten o'clock when the quaint maid spoke almost her first word, and then secretly at the ear of Miss Olivia—"Come with me"; and they two went out, almost unmarked by the others, who were taken up with their talk. In the corridor outside Kathleen whispered to the other, "You wait just here, till I come back."

"Kathleen, you are not going to dare look at the body?" said Miss Olivia, staring.

"Perhaps I am, yes, I am," said Kathleen. "Don't come after me, wait just here, and if you hear me scream, run to me round that corner."

“But you mustn’t!”

“Sh-h-h — have pity!”

Kathleen, as she whispered this, was gone. In that corridor was a door of the death-chamber, but, passing this, she went round a corner into another corridor in which was also a door of the death-chamber. Miss Olivia thought that she would go in by that second door, but Kathleen had no intention of seeing the body, and only made that an excuse for her going away, crafty even in her utmost terror; her aim was to get to Hannah’s room for a fourth try at the trunk, while Hannah was gossiping. It had taken her two hours to screw her courage to the height of daring the dead man to this extent, and now she was in for it. On she hurried with that long-legged walk which hunchbacks have, and that swaying aside of the head at each step. The passing of the second door of the death-chamber was awful to her, but the corridor being more or less lit, it was only when she entered the gloom of Hannah’s room that her fears became as it were mortal, and her face had the ugliness of death. There was no electric set in the house, she did not know where to look for matches, had neither the power nor the time. When her eye fell upon the trunk and saw it shut, her heart accused the ghost of shutting it against her; and when she tried and found it unlocked, her heart accused the ghost of leaving it unlocked, in order that he might touch and blight her during her search for the things. She stooped at the trunk, groping to the bottom, every instant awaiting the icy hand. When she found the viol, she understood that she had been allowed to find it only in order that he might touch her during her search for the smaller things, and her hairs bristled when the wind stirred the arras. But Hannah’s clothes were not many, and Kathleen had soon in her hand the watch and chain, the ring, and the nail-brush, all in a little cardboard box. She had enough wit left to pat down the clothes and shut the trunk again — the work of an instant; and with a gurgle of escape found herself once more outside in the light.

But having now got the things at so much cost, what was she to do with them? She had not thought of this, having never believed that she would really get them. Hannah, she felt, would soon miss them: they must not, therefore, be taken to the Hill, even if she could pass through the Hall without being seen with them. She had no furnace into which to throw them. If she buried them outside the Hall, she felt that the earth would cast them up again, and the burying would take time — with Olivia waiting for her. In the end, the thought arose in her to hide them in the library bureau, and catching at the first suggestion, she was off at once. A near stair led down to a lobby which opened into the library, and down this she stole swiftly. But there was no light down there, and her terrors now again thickened upon her. When she stumbled over a bear-skin in the darkness, she moaned; but she went straight, and reached her end. Knowing that a bunch of keys often hung in the center of the bureau, she groped, but could not find it; the darkness was deep there; and it was now that it flashed upon her that this was the spot at which she had once opened two oriel windows while Sir Peter slept. Not another instant would Kathleen stay in that place: she just pushed the viol and cardboard box in the space behind the bureau, and moved away, her soul flying, but not her feet, for she feared to fly, rather moving slowly, with moans. It was only when she saw the light above the stair, that she flew, and only when she was up in the corridor again that she screamed a little, and presently fell with a sob into Miss Olivia's arms.

“You have looked at the body?” asked Miss Olivia.

The little maid could not speak, but she nodded. She was got home at once, and had to stay in bed three days, even though she knew that at any moment Hannah's things might be seen in that rather open place between the bureau and the wall. Every hour she waited to hear that Hannah had missed them from her trunk; but no news came. Those three nights she surrounded her bed with a crowd of women till a late hour, reveling in the terrors of the ghost stories which they told; when they went away, Miss Olivia remained to sleep with her.

“Will you be able to get up for the funeral, do you think?” Miss Olivia asked her.

“You know that I shan’t,” answered Kathleen, who did not intend to be up till the day after the funeral, in order then to remove the viol and box from behind the bureau.

“But you must try to be up for the reading of the will, you know,” said Miss Olivia.

“The will?” breathed Kathleen — she had forgotten about the will. It lay in that very bureau; it would be read on the evening of the funeral, probably; people would then be crowding about the bureau, might see the viol and box; or the bureau might be moved. She at once made up her mind to be up and at the funeral the next day, and to remove the viol and box before-hand.

After three days of thought she had decided to hide the viol in a coffer of which she knew in a disused region of Orrock Hall, if she could reach it unseen, and to bury the box in a sea-cave. She was wariness itself, understood that hidden things have a way of working up into daylight, looked forward fifty years, and meant to run as little risk as possible.

On the funeral day she did not drive down till near the “lifting” hour, so that she might act at a time when every one was taken up with what was going forward. A number of people were already there, their carriages, with the hearse, being drawn up before the house. The little maid easily escaped from among the mourners, got into the library, and saw behind the bureau the viol and box quite safe. She was too soon, however. It would be ten minutes yet before the “lifting,” when the eyes of the servants and of every one would be preoccupied. She looked out from a window at the glass-houses, but her knees trembled so under her, shaking even the black plume in her hat, that she had to sit down at the bureau. It was open, Mr. Bretherton, the lawyer, had been at it, and it now came into Kathleen’s mind to read the will. In this she had no motive save that of doing something secretly wayward, and of filling up the time of waiting; so, unlocking three drawers and a panel, she penetrated to the nook of the will, for from childhood she had thoroughly known the mazes of this old piece of cabinet work. To her surprise, the will was in duplicate, for Sir Peter had lately sent over for the copy at Bretherton’s in order to make some notes, but had been surprised by illness and death. Kathleen glanced down the parchment, and her glance caused her to spring up with wonder in her looks: everywhere she saw “the said Hannah Wilson”; it seemed as if every-thing was to be Hannah’s. She herself was rich and not miserly, wanted none of her uncle’s wealth, but she was offended at the “wrong” done to the absent Chris and Yvonne in favor of this outsider, for the estate was not much entailed; and she was also afraid of the power of riches thus put into the hands of Hannah. An impulse to meddle in this overcame her, and when she again locked up the drawers of the bureau, the two copies of the will had been pushed into Hannah’s viol through the sound-holes.

This new impulse drove her to run to hide the viol rather sooner than she had meant; so, covering the viol and box as best she could under her cape, she came out into the lobby, ran up the stairs into a corri-dor, passed Hannah’s room. No one was to be seen, but just there by Hannah’s door she heard behind her a step running up the stair. A sense of the unseen power that is in the world at once turned her faint. The crazy thought came into her mind that the step was Hannah's, who must suspect, and was following her; for it sounded like a woman's step. In fact, it was only Miss Olivia's, who was seeking for Kathleen; but there was a moment when the little maid, bewitched by it, was on the point of stopping, of dropping every-thing, and of screaming out. However, she ran on. The trinkets in the box and the two wills in the viol made sounds, being shaken up, and the steps continued to chase her, for Miss Olivia wished to ask whomever it was that she heard before her where Kathleen was. Here was real trouble for Kathleen, unlike her ghostly fears in this, that in one's fear of ghosts there is always a doubt whether they are really any ghosts; but here was real trouble and shame. When she came to the first door of the death-chamber, the steps behind were about to turn a corner, and in another moment Kathleen would have been seen, if she had not plunged into the room with the corpse. There she stood, staring with her eyes at the coffin, staring with her ears at the footsteps. The footsteps came and went past, but even when they were no longer to be heard, Kathleen stood rooted, unable to move. The coffin was on the bed, the dead man in it, the sheet which had covered it already drawn away, the lid lying askew on it. The chamber was large and airy. No one was there. It was a sunshiny afternoon of autumn. Outside in the dying year a wind arose with the voice of the viol, and died away with that universal meaning at which the soul faints. The little maid now lacked the power to run any farther: her eyes stole round the chamber, seeking a temporary hiding-place for the things. There was the wardrobe. She stepped toward that on tiptoe, her eyes fixed on the coffin. But the wardrobe would not open to her: she should have turned the key twice, but was too much out of herself to think of this; and while fumbling, she heard a troop of steps coming. Now she stood at bay, feeling herself undone: her eyes moved basely a little from side to side. But all at once her craft sprang up and flourished in spite of all things against her, and she was in action the most gallant, as when little timid birds face a wolf. Her eyes, still fixed upon the coffin, saw the safest, surest hiding-place in the world. She guessed that the foot-steps were those of the undertaker and his men, coming to screw down and “lift.” She understood that no eye would peep into that coffin again forever: and she was soon touching what she loathed. Pushing the lid a little more aside at the foot, she fixed the viol between the two legs of the dead; in placing with it the little box, her hand touched what was as cold as marble. When she had fixed the viol and box, she drew back the shroud over them — all in some seconds. The footsteps were now near, but she had still time to take one flying peep at the face, she could not help it now that she was so near: she dared to lift the face-cloth a little, and saw ...

When the men came in the little maid was kneeling at the bedside, sobbing faintly, one of them bore her away, while the others hurriedly screwed down, for they were some minutes late. Kathleen lay on a sofa shaken with sobs almost till the funeral started; a month afterwards she wrote in her diary, “I am perfectly convinced that he scowled at me.”

“We had cards given us,” she wrote, “to show our places. I drove behind Sir George Iliffe, in front of whom were Hannah and her parents. Olivia kept plying me with smelling-salts. The tolling of the bell was awful: that, I think, is the worst of all, the soprano of the knells shivering at the grave. Who invented bell-tolling? How wild a soul! What a poet! No one knew how much was being buried: only I. I felt old and wrinkled; for doing certain things makes one old. Moral people are best off; but there never were any, and never will be. We are all alike, a saint is the same thing as a sinner, and all men are liars. Very regrettable but true: fie, the hand of the Potter shook. I shan’t care; when you are once on a road, you must go on. J’accuse, et je defie! I didn’t fashion my soul any more than I fashioned my back, and we are all humped inside, a happy-go-lucky crew. Look at Hannah, with her ‘How enormously I loved that night!’ — praying, nursing, hymn-shouting Hannah. Christian talk, that! modest behavior! I wish she had dropped dead. She would have loved just the same ‘that night,’ if she hadn’t been married to Chris, and if she hadn’t loved so ‘enormously’ I shouldn’t have had to bury her viol and things deep in brick whence even the hand of Time shall never unearth them. Yes, Uncle Peter, you loved her and disliked me, in each case without cause; but you shall guard her treasure well from her for me. ‘The wicked’ mostly have their way and ‘flourish,’ and the rewards of vice and virtue are about equal. Vice is brackish afterwards; there is a certain failure of satisfaction after the deed is done; but virtue is bitter beforehand, though nice after: so they are about equal. I am pretty happy in my own way, and will jog along. It is only a month since the funeral, and already I am no longer afraid during the daytime; this old Chateaubrun of Yvonne’s is too charming a place to harbor many ghosts. But I suffered truly that day: the tolling of the bell, and the dead-march, it can’t be uttered what they sang to the very quick of me. I wouldn’t go into the church, but the march reached me outside. Then, standing about twenty yards from the grave, I looked on at the lowering, the horrid ropes grating; Olivia could not get me away; I stayed to the very end and after it, till only Hannah was left, with Mrs. Langler and old Watts, the relieving-officer, who was one of the pall-bearers. It was nearly night, and still they stood there, looking down, Hannah with a red nose, at the foot of the grave toward the sea. She did not know all that was just under her feet,” etc, etc.

CHAPTER XI

“CHRIS WAS STAYING with Count Orsi and giving concerts at the Fondo in Naples at the time of the funeral,” writes the quaint maid further. ‘Yvonne was at Chateaubrun, entertaining, so couldn’t come. I didn’t mean to leave the Hill for two days, for I was not ready, but the first thing I heard on opening my eyes the morning after the funeral was that Hannah was gone; and I at once made up my mind to go, too. How crazy, I thought, must she be to be with Chris! She had hardly had the decency to go home from the grave with her mother, when she was off. She must certainly have hoped that Uncle Peter had left her something, but she didn’t even stay to see if there was a will, or what was in it. Even if Chris had been nothing to me, the mere heat of the woman to have him would have made me wish to disappoint her; but what irritates me most is her calm assumption of ownership in Chris, as though she was anything to him. At any rate, she was gone, evidently without missing the viol and things from her trunk — believing them still there! She will never now be able to trace even where she lost them. I felt that if she once got at Chris, who had been trying to be good, and had not seen Yvonne for months, then Chris would easily become her prey, and that nothing could prevent this — except Yvonne; and I at once telegraphed to Yvonne, begging her to invite me to Chateaubrun, since I couldn’t stay at the Hill. I got the answer at noon, ‘Come at once’; and Olivia and I slept in London that night.

“It is an ill wind that blows no one any good, and the death of Uncle Peter, besides making me nearly twice as rich, has left me as free as a bird.

True, he never presumed when alive to meddle in my goings and comings, but he was my ‘guardian’ — tender ‘guardian’! — and I had the consciousness of his old eyes and grumpy censorship being always there. That first night in London I had such a feeling of liberation and of being out on the spree; and Olivia and I enjoyed ourselves thoroughly, like Bohemians. Piccadilly Circus is no fit place for ghosts, mon oncle.

“As soon as we got out of the train at Liverpool Street, I sent a long telegram, like a letter, to the Orsi Palace, telling Chris that since Uncle Peter had died intestate, and most of the oof would be his, it was essential to his interests to meet me after his farewell at the Fondo, so that I might talk over matters with him; and I added that I was on my way to Yvonne at Chateaubrun, which would be a good half-way meeting place.

“I thought to myself, ‘This will furnish an excuse to his conscience, for he can say to himself that he is only coming on business, and, if he has the least longing left to see Yvonne, he will deceive himself, and come.’

“The next morning I left for Paris, and reached Toulouse at 2.15 p. m. the day after. Yvonne was outside the station in a carriage, and almost her first words were, ‘There is a telegram for you at the chateau.’ From Chris! ‘I shall be with you on Thursday the 5th.’

“How I expected him on that 5th! and on the 6th and 7th the same wretchedness over again. He didn’t come, and I began to make sure that Hannah had entrapped him.

“But at eleven in the morning of the 8th, I on the terrace saw him coming. I waved my handkerchief like a flag of victory. There he was in the old short jacket, the Tyrolese cloth hat on the back of his curls, and Grimani (taken back at last!) with the elaborate case of the Joseph in his hand. Ah, what a different Chateaubrun it suddenly became that bright day! The cicadas, the trees, became parts of an orchestra, the world turned into an

Olympian concert-hall. There was no end to the music till dinner, and, oh Heaven, what sweets that day! It was one swoon to me. Music isn't music in England, it must be here in the South, where the sun ripens the heart like a grape, and sets the blood whispering like passionate wine; and I am sure that nobody in the world can really accompany Chris but me: he as good as said so; I do it by nature, with an over-perfection and an over-ease which purrs and becomes voluptuous.

“‘This is a surprise, monsieur,’ said Yvonne on shaking hands. I had not told her a word beforehand, for I wished her to be taken by surprise, but she got through the meeting with perfect chic and unconsciousness — much better than he. ‘Didn’t Kathleen tell you that I was coming to talk over some affairs?’ he blurted out. Yvonne looked at me and said pointedly, ‘Kathleen is always at her best when she speaks, but she often has reasons to be silent.’ I disliked her for it. I, too, have a tongue with a point, and it may sting some day.

“She took no part in the music all the afternoon; her manner was as if she and Chris had not met before. The old baronne d’Estampe, looking like a dame Louis Seize, played her old chords and arpeggios on the harp, and Arbos gave his canzonets: the rest was Chris and I, Yvonne meantime keeping up an elaborate gaiety and aloofness. She loves Chris, cela se voit. In the evening Chris and I in the pine-avenue: Yvonne declined to come; and I unwisely glad of it. He liked the chateau: ‘Charming place!’ I told him the names of plants, and showed him their structure. He said, ‘You know everything; you are both virtuoso and savant.’ I suppose I am a special little one — better somehow perhaps in my essence than anybody! If I could only always feel it, have the pluck of it! Then I should not struggle and stew in this self-consciousness.

But I am only conceited when alone. My soul has no skin, every wind blisters it. It is the hump! — this millstone, this prison. ‘Oh, wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this dead body?’

“I pretended great interest in his Orrock affairs, advised this and that. ‘But,’ said he, ‘how comes it that our good Uncle Peter died without a will? I distinctly remember his telling me that Hannah was to be his heiress.’

“‘It happened so,’ I said; ‘old men are capricious, Chris.’

“‘Or, more likely, it is a mere accident,’ he said. ‘Perhaps I ought to make over to Hannah all this property. It will be only fitting, for Hannah, you know, is not really of yeoman race—’

“‘What do you mean, Chris?’ I asked, too soon, for he said, checking himself, ‘I am under a promise.’

“What could he possibly have meant? I pressed him, but he wouldn’t tell. Something he has dreamt! Hannah would laugh to hear that old Langler isn’t a yeoman. As to making over his inheritance to her, I treated that with derision, telling him that the world is a practical place, not cloud-land. I hope I persuaded him, but am not sure. He couldn’t be so feeble. I asked him if he had seen Hannah since the wedding night: his answer was, ‘You know that I have not been to Norfolk since.’ This relieved me, showing that he still imagines her down in Norfolk, that he has really forgotten her night in his London chambers, and that she has not run across him during his delay in coming to Chateaubrun from the 5th to the 8th, though she was then pretty certainly some-where about Naples, seeking him. I thoroughly enjoyed that walk with him up and down the pine-avenue, but I saw that he still thinks so much of Hannah, that, if she once said to him, ‘A child is going to be born to you and me, I swear it,’ he would be inclined to believe her, however deeply buried in brick the proofs of it may be — unless he had first got well entangled with Yvonne, and so become deaf to Hannah.

Yvonne, as before, was the pivot. I asked him how long he would be staying at Chateaubrun? He answered meekly, 'I have not been asked to stay. I shall go back to Toulouse to-night.' This did not suit me. When we got back to the terraces they were all pacing about in the moonlight, with something eighteenth-century in the scene of statues, waterworks, and pacing groups. Yvonne was with de Marsillac. I left Chris with madame la baronne and Marthe Wesendonk, and joined her. 'Chris,' I said 'is going back to Toulouse presently.' 'Is he?' said she, 'then I must give the necessary orders, or will you see to everything?' 'I will see to everything at once,' I said. At this we both stood silent, until she asked, 'Has he a courier? Will he be sleeping in Toulouse?' 'Yes,' I said, 'but you know, Yvonne, that there is no really comfortable hotel in Toulouse.' 'Oh, everywhere is a palace to poets,' said she; 'but is Lady Wilson with him at Toulouse? I forgot to ask him.' 'There is no Lady Wilson, Yvonne,' I said, 'you know that, though there will be one in three days' time, if Chris is sent away.' 'I'm glad of that,' said she; 'you pronounce it like a threat, but you must mean it as a promise, his wife is in all respects so admirable a lady.' 'That is just where the danger lies,' I said, vexed, 'in the fact that he thinks more of her than of — any one.' 'You excepted, I am certain, Kathleen,' she said. 'And you, perhaps,' I retorted in my rage. '7 perhaps and you certainly,' she said: 'That is an exception and a half.' She referred to my dwarfishness, of course, and the smartness of her repartees don't lessen their smart; but her half-a-cousin has finesse, too, in plenty, when collected, and my revenge may come. I dared not hit back then: my object was to get her to ask Chris to stay, and I was afraid to exasperate her, though I knew that she was hungering to keep him. For a minute I was in too much torture to speak. We stood half turned away, threatening each other to go, but lingering, afraid to part. At last I began to say, 'Well, I will go and tell Grimani,' when she said, 'Have you finished the discussion about money matters with your cousin?’ ‘Not quite,’ I said. ‘Well,’ said she, ‘as he is such a wanderer — it is nine months, for instance, since I had the honor of meeting Monsieur Wilson.’ ‘That’s not his fault, Yvonne,’ I said, ‘he was under a promise to Hannah Langler with regard to you.’ ‘To me?’ ‘Yes, she really would be amused, if you send him away.’ ‘But this is the second time you speak of “sending him away”! Have I not asked him to stay?’ Thus ignominiously mademoiselle gave in to her heart’s lusts. Nothing of the sort had been done, of course: she had been tempted to, had resisted all day, and now could resist no longer. We are all alike, hunch or no hunch. I said, ‘No, you may have meant to ask him, but have forgotten.’ ‘I was almost sure — Well, perhaps you will repeat to him my request, Kathleen,’ she said, going quickly off to rejoin de Marsillac. That was nearly three weeks ago, and Chris must be riding back with her now from the picnicking at La Risolette,” etc., etc.

CHAPTER XII

“HANNAH,” CONTINUED KATHLEEN a little later, “is in Paris. I have a letter from her. She has heard from her parents that I am at Chateaubrun, and asks if I can give her any hint as to the whereabouts of Chris! I am afraid that Chris is also at Chateaubrun, and enjoying himself very much indeed, but what business can that be of Miss Langler of Woodside? She flew from the graveside of Uncle Peter to Italy, knowing that Chris was playing at the Fondo; but by the time she reached Naples he had got my telegram summoning him to Chateaubrun. He stopped on his journey to give a concert at the Milan Scala, and she followed to Milan, but a day too late. Chris had left for Chateaubrun. So, on losing him, she went back to Paris, which seems to be her headquarters, and is there waiting till he turns up somewhere.

“She writes a lot of tattle about Orrock affairs, such as that my groom Parker has influenza, that a bit of coast has slipped just south of Wardenham, etc., etc.: no one would imagine that she has a great grief gnawing at her. No reproach at not being left anything by Uncle Peter, not a mention about the viol and box; but this mayn’t mean that she hasn’t discovered their loss, for miss (or Mrs.?) certainly doesn’t wear her heart on her sleeve. She must have found out by this time; and what a tenfold mystery to her! They are buried pretty deep, my Hannah, and you feel now, don’t you, how headlong and naughty it was of you to forget all the hymns and texts, and force yourself into Chris’s chambers that morning?

“I doubt if she will ever now get Chris. My scheme here has prospered more than I care to witness. Chris is as badly in love again as ever he was at Orrock, and Yvonne ten times more so. No Frenchwoman loves quite disinterestedly: Chris with two decorations, fore-run by a shudder of expectancy in every town which he enters, is not the same boy of ten months ago; and because he is more, she loves him more. I alone should love him as well in rags, so no one has any real right to him but me.

“The day before yesterday Yvonne went into a sort of hysterics. It was down at the village, where a lot of us had gone to patronize the fete in the afternoon. We had left Chris at the chateau, practising in his rooms. Yvonne drove with de Marsillac, flirting as ostentatiously as usual. I was in the brougham with the Comtesse Choderlos de Hanska. We left the carriages at the Villa des Sapins, and walked down to look at the fete. It was jolly — a great crowd of people in bright-colored clothes. I don’t know how de Marsillac lost Yvonne, but presently she was missed. I suspected that she might have a rendezvous with Chris, and this sent me looking for her in the Sapins (pine-wood). She had no rendezvous, however, for I and the comtesse, who would come with me, found her sitting alone on a tree-trunk in the forest-glade which they call ‘le Rond Point.’ There she sat, her face buried in her hands; and the moment the comtesse spoke to her, Yvonne burst out into the most astonishing laughter and sobbing, like hysterics. Her face was just crimson, and I never heard such a thing, it made me want to laugh and cry myself.

“Old Choderlos de Hanska put her hand on mine as we two were driving home again, saying, ‘My dear, after what we have witnessed together, there is no longer any indelicacy in expressing ourselves to each other, for here, you have seen, is that which demands discussion.’

“So it seems, madame,’ I said, thinking to myself, ‘Words, mere words.’

“‘If ever a poor child was in the grip of a tragic destiny,’ the old chatterbox went on, ‘it is this.’ ‘But why tragic, madame?’ I asked.

“‘Because the cause of that which is about to over-take her is in herself,’ she said, ‘and because she has struggled so desperately and so vainly against herself and her destiny. It is said, my dear, that “even the gods weep to see a good man struggling in vain with misfortune.” Here you have a good girl, striving with all her heart to keep the moral law, but little by little losing ground and hope. It has even made me shed a tear to notice her punctuality on her religious duties at the church of late.’

“‘I tried to imagine the old monkey’s tear tearing a ravine through paste, like a geologic river; she daren’t cry, except in the mornings. ‘But I thought that Yvonne pretends to be a pantheist,’ I murmured.

“‘Ah, my dear,’ said the old windbag, ‘but when we need a God, we reconstruct Him. Yvonne’s father and mother were both good Christians, and this disease in her blood is all the more awful to her because, having been practically her own mistress since their death, she has grown accustomed to feel the responsibility of her conduct and of her high name. For the first time, she now finds herself dragged along a path which is repugnant to her principles and her tastes.’

“‘Why doesn’t she marry Monsieur de Marsillac, who adores her?’ I said, ‘then as a married woman she could more properly contract a liaison with Monsieur Wilson.’

“‘I have taken the liberty to advise her in that very sense,’ said madame, ‘but the poor girl has answered me only with her shoulder. Yvonne’s mother was an English lady, and her own point of view is modified in an English way. No, there is no solution but one: it is much to be desired that Monsieur Wilson could be induced to depart from Chateaubrun.’

“‘You should try to induce him, madame,’ I said.

“‘77’ murmured the old thing, lifting her hands in dainty horror.

“‘It cannot be done, madame,’ I said: ‘it would be intolerable, if any one presumed to interfere. And what would happen, if he did go? Yvonne would only become ill.’

“‘She is ill now,’ madame answered: ‘Ernestine assures me that she paces her room far into the mornings, and has dreams from which she awakes with cries; and you have observed her looks.’

“‘I’m afraid I can’t sympathize with all that fuss,’ I said. ‘The affair is a very ordinary one, only Yvonne happens to be of noble blood.’

“‘But that is not precisely where the thorn pierces her, I am certain,’ said madame, ‘but in the fact — is it not a fact that Monsieur Wilson possesses a wife?’ ‘I smiled without answering.

“‘I happen to have reasons for believing it, my dear, and you know that nothing ever escapes my old lips, so you may be open with me. In fact, Yvonne has as good as admitted it to me — an English wife. Well, I believe that that is where this poor child is excruciated: she is unwilling to wrong that other woman. It seems a little unworldly, but then Yvonne is a young girl, with a still tender conscience. Tell me, is not the name of that wife “Hannah”?’

“‘How can you know, madame?’ I asked.

“‘Tell me if it is so, and I will then tell you how I know.’

“‘Well, yes.’

“‘I thought it! For, two mornings ago, Yvonne, on being startled out of sleep by a vase dropped from Ernestine’s hands, broke into sobs, repeating many times that word, “Hannah, Hannah.” She had been dreaming of this “Hannah,” and there, be sure of it, is where the ache lies.’

“‘Well, it seems a ease for the physician,’ I said— ‘a little phosphorus, perhaps. This only comes of people allowing their desires to wander upon forbidden objects.’

“‘It is true,’ said she, ‘the earth has sun-stroke, but from habit I prefer it to Utopia, my dear. This poor child can’t be stoned by me, for, providentially, I also am not without sin. You, no doubt, are: it is all a relation between temptation and strength. In the case of Yvonne, you have a poor child fighting a real battle in loneliness, without help or sympathy. Her guardians are merely well-wishers; her friends are merely visitors; you, her cousine, recommend phosphorus; I, her great-aunt, try to be distressed, but at my age, after the life of fashion, one is no longer distressed at anything, except at a disturbance in one’s habits. Old people are as selfish as babies —”

“‘Oh, but you are not in your second childhood in that respect, madame,’ I murmured, giving it back to her for her ‘temptation and strength’; she answered something, but the carriage was passing over gravel, I didn’t hear, and immediately afterwards we got out.

“Yvonne arrived soon afterwards, ‘retired,’ and did not appear at dinner, which was a failure. Chris had nothing to say, de Marsillac’s Parisian lightness seemed to have got a wetting, and the Conseilleur Municipal and old Choderlos de Hanska were allowed to talk to the air absolutely without pause. Chris escaped at the first chance. I didn’t know where he had gone, went to spy, and after a search saw him in that out-of-the-way balcony behind the armory on the south, near the precipice. He was pacing up and down pretty quickly. The trellis-work being thick with vine, except over the three steps in the center, I got up to it without being seen, and sat down on the old horse trough there, just to be near. He made those old worn dalles of the balcony hold ground. I didn’t know before he ever went there. Couldn’t see him, but could hear his tread, and smell his cigar, the darling god; buried my head in its wrap in the vine leaves, and closed my eyes. It was dark there in spite of bright moonlight, the air heavy with maples and wild sarsaparilla that grow down to the precipice-edge, hosts of cicadas screeching, with a tinkling of the piano from far away. Chris must have had some musical thought in him; now and again he hummed, just a murmur. I was enjoying too deeply to move, but after a time had begun to think of speaking to him about the signing of the lawyer's documents from England, when I heard some one with him. My heart all at once was beating awfully. It was Yvonne. 'She is not too unwell for this,' I thought, and I pushed my ear well into the bush to hear.

"'Ernestine has told me that you were here, Chris,' I heard her say, 'so' — something lost — 'the answer which you demand of me.'

"'Mum, mum, mum,' from Chris; I couldn't hear! They stood fifteen yards away.

"' . . . Believe me,' from Yvonne, 'risen from my knees before my Creator to come here to you, hum, hum, hum.' If they had only spoken in English! I might have caught more.

"'Mum, mum, I prefer you to all things,' from Chris: 'nothing is sacred but you . . . God is less than Love . . . mum, mum, ethics is for unmusical souls who need a lower guide . . . Love in itself is right, and is enough . . . love like ours . . . love, love' — they say it must have been grand to see Will Shakespeare in love, but wild-hearted Chris! I felt to my heart the boundless throbbings of his, but couldn't hear! the cicadas screeching in my ears.

"'Do not mistake me,' from Yvonne: 'the doing of what is right has been made too terribly hard a task! Hum, hum, hum, I have suffered, mon ami, yes, I have suffered, hum, hum, but I love you too much, Chris, my soul . . . I am too ill now . . . I can no longer bear it . . . the great decision of our lives rests henceforth with you.'

“‘Mum, mum, mum,’ from Chris, ‘nothing is so great as infinity, mum, mum.’ I heard her better than him, he mumbles so, his tongue is in his fingers.

“‘In ten days my guests will have departed,’ from Yvonne; ‘you love me . . . tell me then . . . you are my supreme . . . do not fear . . . claim that which is yours, nothing shall dare oppose you . . . seize me, have me, destroy me, kill me . . . death . . . I know that it will end all, hum, hum, hum.’

“‘ . . . destiny,’ from Chris, ‘the grave itself, mum, mum, Love like ours . . . is itself a law-giver . . . destiny . . . cannot be defeated, mum, mum,’ then the wretched castle-bell began that sort of curfew which they ring here, and for two minutes I could hear nothing.’

“‘ . . . these sorts of relations,’ from Yvonne . . . ‘ashes, hum, hum, contempt . . . twenty years . . . Virtue alone is incorruptible . . . poor mortals . . . nets for our feet . . . the road to death, mon ami!’ — with a sob.

“‘To-day is as good as tomorrow,’ from Chris— ‘better, for we are younger today . . . next summer as unimportant as last summer, mum, mum, you may love me less.’

“‘ . . . dreams,’ from Yvonne, ‘Hannah, your wedded wife . . . a good woman . . . speaking to me, pleading with me, warning me, as plainly as I see you now . . . a very strange thing . . . you can see that I am ill . . . the voices of destiny, hum, hum, hum, will end in sorrow.’

“‘ . . . Things are as they are,’ from Chris, ‘we did not make the world . . . excellent woman! . . . out of relation with my longings . . . dare everything, sacrifice everything ...’

“‘Yes! yes!’ from Yvonne; ‘my guests will have departed . . . twelve days . . . Venice . . . even one year of heaven . . . I shall have lived . . . afterwards one may die, hum, hum, hum, Ernestine, mon ami . . . must go away . . . soon, soon.’

“‘...Write it in a song of joy,’ from Chris, ‘how amiable! . . . thievish feet of love . . . Mmm . . . joy forever . . . kiss ...

“‘Yes! give!’ from Yvonne, now first tutoring him— ‘Oui! donne!’ — and I knew that they were kissing. For some minutes I must have fainted away just then, I don’t remember the moment at which Yvonne left him. I wondered at myself for letting her go without flying at her; it seemed that nothing was left me now but to throw my wretched frame into that precipice not twenty yards off; but I had no strength left even for that, I simply sat with my head in the vine, and suffered my forlornness. Lord, what a pain it is! I felt how God had made me ugly, wretched, unloved, wretched, wretched, unchangeably, Lord God, Lord God. If their sweet carryings-on were bad for Hannah, they were as bad for me; but it was all my own doing, I had no right to complain. Why had I brought Chris here? To keep him from Hannah, forsooth! with some notion in me that, since he is married and can’t be Yvonne’s husband, then, at some far-off day, he may somehow be mine. Weak dream! He thoroughly belongs to Yvonne now anyway, may always, and what do I care whether he is Yvonne’s or Hannah’s, if he is not mine? Certainly, I never felt toward Hannah quite the same cat-o’-mountain rancor that I felt for Yvonne that night. I don’t know what kept my hands from her, for I longed to see both him and her struck down in the height of their selfish bliss, the two wantons. If I hadn’t fainted when they kissed, perhaps I should have done something, for in my highest moments, when I am white-hot, this little hunchback towers a head taller than everything, casts off fear like a cloak, and her will is done. No one had better make me mad. “Chris remained alone on the balcony a long while; he must have brought one of his counterfeit Guarneriuses with him, for he presently began to play, rendering an Ernst reverie with delicious peace and intimité.

He seemed to do it to console me. I waited on till he went away near eleven.”

CHAPTER XIII

“THE SAME NIGHT,” continued the quaint maid two days later, “that Chris and Yvonne met on that south balcony, Monsieur de Ballu, the notaire, came over from Toulouse on a visit. In passing through the salon, meaning to go to bed, I saw his old rat-face, which resembles Robespierre’s. All these old fogies down here have an eighteenth-century air to me. De Ballu is Yvonne’s parrain (godfather), and one of the guardians and administrators. I noticed him deep in talk with old Choderlos de Hanska in a far part of the salon, while his mountain of a wife spoke with Olivia and the Conseilleur Municipal. Little did I dream what trouble that old man was even then hatching for my poor head.

“The next morning, while I was being dressed, Olivia came with the news that Chris had gone off to Toulouse. ‘What on earth for?’ I asked. She didn’t know. I went down late with a headache to second dejeuner. A few people were still there, among them old Choderlos de Hanska, who, as she rose from table, passed by me, saying in that sort of court whisper in which the French monde is expert, ‘All will be well: Monsieur Wilson has gone to Toulouse to interview Monsieur de Ballu.’ Before I could say a word the old windbag was gone, with her finger on her lips. I was perfectly astonished. What, I wondered, could Chris possibly have to say to this old French lawyer, or he to Chris?

“I was soon to know! Chris came back about two-thirty o’clock. I was at a window of that huge old room on the ground floor which they call ‘the salle,’ looking out for him. He got out of his carriage precipitately, looking flushed and radiant. As he was passing by me, I stepped out to him. ‘Why, Cousin Chris,’ I said in a wretchedly sycophant voice, ‘I have hardly spoken a word with you for two days.’ I was the last thing in the world of which he was thinking at that moment! ‘Mmm, my own dear friend,’ he said, ‘forgive me. Much has been going forward — but you will soon hear.’ ‘What is it? You have been to Toulouse—’ ‘We will speak together,’ he said, and was gone with a wave of his hand. As he entered the house, I flew to watch, and caught sight of him going up the branch of the stair which leads to Yvonne’s quarters; so whatever was the matter concerned Yvonne.

“I was on thorns. I went searching, for the second time, for old Choderlos de Hanska. They said she was taking siesta; then I found Olivia at the salon piano, and asked if madame la comtesse had not said anything about the object of Chris’s interview with old de Ballu. ‘Not a word,’ she answered. I had to wait about in suspense, the house very still and dull, a party of them having gone riding to Moulin Chantepleure, the rest were scattered about the salon, verandas and terraces, or taking siesta, the sun blazing, the ladies as lightly clad as a man could wish, and strains of studies in chords reaching one’s ears from time to time. They have always been sweet to me, those strains of Chris’s riddle, for I have thought then, ‘He is not near her now, nor thinking of her.’ At last Choderlos de Hanska came, with a raw look of sleep in her eyes, — ghastly old thing, I hate her. I’d rather be a young hunchback than an old beauty. She melted into smiles and nods on seeing my anxious face, and I got her out to the salon balcony, where we were alone. ‘What, then, is happening?’ I asked.

“‘Ma chère, it has all come about by the most extraordinary Providence—’

“‘But what?’ I asked, dreading a rigmarole. ‘Is it possible that you do not even yet surmise that there is about to be a wedding among us?’

“‘Between?’

“‘Monsieur Wilson and Yvonne.’

“‘A wedding?’

“‘A wedding.’ ‘I suppose you jest, madame,’ I said, ‘since you know as well as I do that Monsieur Wilson is already married.’

“‘Ma chère, I never jest after siesta,’ said the old hag. ‘Don’t be so astonished. When Providence wishes to witness a situation, it devises it. Listen, and you shall hear. Last night Monsieur de Ballu was here. You must have seen him. He and I were in conversation, when he happened to mention the case of one of his clients who, having set up a business in London, married an English lady, but the marriage was unhappy, and the young man, on returning to France, married a lady of Toulouse. I had no idea that this could be done, and expressed my astonishment at it, but Monsieur de Ballu assured me that the affair was quite formal, since the marriage in London had not taken place before a French consul, and was therefore null and void in France, the bridegroom being a French citizen.’

“‘My heart ceased to beat; I could only just groan something about ‘some mistake,’ and ‘what madmen could make such a law.’

“‘Laws are like the scheme of things, my dear,’ she said, ‘they only seem mad because we others do not know the spirit of them. At any rate, when I heard this, Monsieur Wilson and Yvonne of course leapt into my mind. I ventured to recount everything to Monsieur de Ballu, and it was then decided between us that all would be well, provided that the musician is really a French citizen, and provided that his English marriage did not take place in the presence of a French consul. If these two things are so, he can marry Yvonne, and I have just received a telegram from Monsieur de Ballu assuring me that they are so.’; ‘But is not Hannah, then, his lawful wife?’

“‘Oh, yes — in England; not in France.’

“‘So a Frenchman can have two lawful wives in Europe?’

“‘Yes, four or five.’

“‘Oh, but, madame, what lunacy!’

“‘I thought you would be pleased,’ she sighed. ‘I am most pleased!’ I answered, like a fool, ‘but who,’ I groaned, ‘could be expected to know this obscure French law in the country parts of England? Chris married in all good faith, not dreaming — no one dreamed — We all assumed that Chris was an Englishman: his father was English-born, his mother an English woman—’

“‘All that does not alter the law, ma chère,’ she said. ‘French laws are not made for the benefit of English ladies, but for the amusement of French men. And, after all, what harm is done? One wife in England and another in France are only two, nor can they be jealous the one of the other, for each will consider the other a mistress. As for me, I am a good Catholic, my dear, but, between us, Mahomet was also a prophet. And, as a matter of fact, is not polygamy more general in Paris than in Cairo — ?’

“‘But at any rate, Hannah is his wife in England!’ I cried. ‘English law isn’t going to permit him to remarry in France, even though French law does.’

“‘No, his marriage in England is final from the English point of view,’ she said, ‘so, if he remarries in France, he will return to England at his own risk, Monsieur de Ballu even says that to a bigamy of that sort English justice would show itself extremely severe — if it knew of it. But then, geniuses are exempt from everything.’

“‘They are not — not in England! I cried, for I couldn’t restrain my rage, ‘and that settles it, for Chris will often have to be in England, and surely Yvonne would never expose him to this awful risk—’

“‘That is not the point with Yvonne, the risk,’ she answered; ‘she has not thought of that, and, in fact the risk is very slight, my dear, whatever you may say of it. But the point with Yvonne is the other lady. She absolutely refuses to marry Monsieur Wilson. After his interview with Monsieur de Ballu this morning, Monsieur Wilson hastened with the good news to Yvonne’s apartments, and Ernestine, who partly over-heard their interview, tells me that Yvonne first waltzed about the room with glee, then suddenly changed, and in the end refused to hear of the marriage. She said that, even if she was willing to wrong the other lady to the extent of entering into a liaison with her husband, bearing the shame of it while enjoying the sin, yet she was not so wicked as to shelter herself behind an international quibble and legally usurp one who is already another’s. “The word ‘wife’ has no plural, Chris,” the poor child said. I don’t know in what grammar she found it; in my time it was ‘wives’ that had no singular, except in the breviary. So for the present there is a deadlock. But sufficient pressure, you may be sure, will be brought to bear upon Yvonne to induce her to be more worldly.’

“‘Pressure by whom?’ I asked; but before she could answer, a flunkey brought her a card. ‘From Monsieur de Ballu,’ she whispered me, and went off, leaving me undone. At that hour the day before such a thought as Chris marrying Yvonne had never entered a human brain; it had all come through the cackle of those two old geese. And it was I who had brought Chris to Chateaubrun! Much thanks did I get for it! I, who had done all for her, was forgotten, ignored, and she swimming in joy. I felt that if ever I should see her the wife of Chris — They have no right to make me mad.

“I wouldn’t believe a word of what the old hag had told me, but at once sent Olivia to order a caleche, and by four o’clock we were off to Toulouse, leaving old Choderlos de Hanska and Monsieur de Ballu in an interview with Yvonne. In Toulouse I put the case before the first lawyer I could find.

He told me that it was true, all, all, that Choderlos de Hanska had said — Chris could marry Yvonne. What a sudden, undreamt-of thing! I had never conceived anything but a short liaison between them, for I always had a girl-to-girl fondness for Yvonne, and could have borne to see that: but this was lifelong union. I understood that Yvonne might say no to the marriage at first, and be on the stage, as all Frenchwomen always are, but I felt that she couldn't long resist the bliss and greatness of owning Chris for life. When I got back to the chateau I went up to the sort of flat to which Yvonne 'retires'; at the top of the stairs Ernestine, hanging about in a state of suspense, whispered me: 'Madame Choderlos de Hanska and Monsieur de Ballu are still in conference with her. She is about to yield.'

"Then a head peeping out between the portieres of Yvonne's ante-chamber, said, 'Ah, it is you, mademoiselle' — old Choderlos de Hanska; she put her lips to my ear with the whisper, 'I have left Monsieur de Ballu alone with her.'

"What for?' I asked.

"It was essential.'

"But why not let Monsieur Wilson do his own persuading, madame?"

"He is not to see her again till all is settled. He has very sagaciously handed over the whole affaire to the tuteurs (guardians).'

"While speaking to me she was touched from behind by Monsieur de Ballu, and they two entered into a whispering with gesticulations which must have lasted twenty minutes, rivers of words. Then Choderlos de Hanska sailed through the little salon, and went in to Yvonne alone, while Monsieur de Ballu sat in the little salon, a book on his knees, but his ferret-eyes fixedly leering at Yvonne's door. I waited in the ante-chamber, feeling all out of it, but after a time ventured to peep into the little salon and say to Monsieur de Ballu, 'May I see my cousine now?' Silly! I ought to have walked in boldly, for at my question that old Jack-in-office cast up his eyes and hands to heaven, then shook his head crazily, stopping and beginning again, meaning ‘A thousand times no.’

“I wished to warn Yvonne of the danger of a second marriage to Chris when he should go back to England, though I knew in my heart that the danger was mainly theoretical, since no one would be busybody enough to act in the matter, even if it were known in London; but I wished to frighten her with it; so when I had withdrawn again into the ante-chamber, I stood near the portiere, feeling shy and out of place, but clinging on.

“Presently Choderlos de Hanska opened Yvonne’s boudoir door a little, and beckoned to Monsieur de Ballu, who went in. This was French ‘intrigue’! Then came Chris almost on tiptoe along the darkling corridor, with pauses and listenings.

“‘Have you seen her?’ he whispered to me; ‘is she about to yield?’

“‘Yes, Cousin Chris, but—’

“‘Sh-h-h’ — with his finger on his lips. He stole off again. My heart failed me. I had nothing to say to him to which he was not deaf.

“Then came a heavy bonhomme with creaking boots and an air of business — one of the tuteurs, I suppose; I had never seen him before. On seeing me, he said at my ear, ‘Is she about to yield?’ Monsieur de Ballu had just come out again from Yvonne, so he and the newcomer met warmly, and went off into whispering, of which I could only hear ‘about to yield,’ ‘will not yield,’ ‘it is necessary,’ ‘mon ami,’ ‘the testament,’ ‘the code Napoleonique,’ ‘the English law,’ the ‘tuteurs,’ ‘yield,’ ‘yield,’ — a thousand times over. Presently Choderlos de Hanska came out, the three whispered together, and the two men went in to Yvonne. I asked Choderlos de Hanska who was the heavy man, and she said, ‘Monsieur Tombarel, the mayor.’

“Then came Olivia, all fuss, wanting me to go to dinner, and I had to, for I was famished. Neither Chris nor Choderlos de Hanska appeared at table, where everyone seemed trying to be unconscious that something was going on. As I went up the stairs again, Ernestine ran down to meet me with the breathless news, ‘Maitre Bibesco has arrived! It is said that she is about to yield.’ I neither knew nor cared who Maitre Bibesco was, but on peeping into the little salon I saw him — a huge Danton of a man with a lowering brow. There were now four of them in there at Yvonne. I hung about the corridor and portieres for hours, waiting my chance to see her, or send in a note, but it never came; one by one, or two, three, four together, they were with her. The to-do that those people made that night! The chaos of words, the plans and shifts, the wine that they drank! They were just in their element, with an ‘affaire’ to let themselves loose over. About eleven I left them, and went to bed shivering and burning at once.

“The next morning, as I lay abed, Ernestine ran in to say, ‘She has not yielded, but it is believed that she will yield this afternoon at about two’ — and rushed out again. Ten minutes later Olivia was saying to me, ‘She has not yielded.’ I said, ‘What, have you, too, caught the epidemic of “yield”?’ Presently my own maid brought me in a note from old Choderlos de Hanska, scribbled with the words, ‘She has not yielded, but signs are not wanting. Monsieur Tombarel will be with her at eleven.’ I said to Olivia, ‘It is all French play-acting, she will “yield” soon enough; but in that case my mind is made up what to do.’ I had resolved during the night: I should tell Hannah all, and let Hannah defend her rights. I might have got dressed in time to go to warn Yvonne of Chris’s danger from English law before any of the tuteurs were with her, but I would not now be at the pains, for I felt that nothing in the end would keep her from ‘yielding’; and my mind was quite made up that one wife is enough for Chris.

“But the fuss all that day! The arrivals and departures, the telegrams, the mounted messengers! Though I was kept informed of most things by one or another of them, still I couldn’t grasp what it was all about, nor could conceive how the ‘affaire’ had become so mightily complex in so short a time. “What made it worse was that those with Yvonne sent hourly telegrams to those in Toulouse: ‘She is about to yield,’ ‘She does not yield,’ ‘Send both documents,’ ‘Your presence is essential,’ ‘Consult Leyds of Paris as to droits de tutelage,’ ‘Influence of Madame de Ballu would prove most useful auxiliary at present juncture,’ and more. Besides, there were the three visits of the physician, who himself became one of the arguers and persuaders. Near two o’clock in the afternoon Choderlos de Hanska told me that Yvonne would become dangerously ill if the strain continued; she had fainted some minutes before in attempting to sit up in bed. I pitied her, but pitied myself more. Twice she sent for Chris to go to her, but Chris was not allowed to go, her longing to see him being one of the means used to persuade her. But soon after three Ernestine ran to me with the news, ‘It is finished: Monsieur Wilson is now with her. She has yielded.’

“My mind was quite made up. I at once telegraphed to Hannah in Paris, ‘Will you be at the same address the day after tomorrow?’ At six I got the answer, ‘Yes.’

“Yvonne’s rooms were still more or less full of her friends enjoying the after-taste of their victory; so, not wishing to see either her or Chris, I simply wrote her a note, saying that Olivia and I were going to Cannes to meet some one, and should soon be back.

“What on earth Hannah would or could do now I couldn’t imagine, but I knew that she would do something effective, and I was determined to set her on the back of Yvonne. One wife at a time for Chris, ladies. At 7.15 I left Toulouse for Paris, arrived at,” etc., etc.

CHAPTER XIV

“BY ELEVEN IN the morning I was at 14 rue Boissy d’Anglas,” continued the little maid three days later. “The concierge told me that Hannah lived at Madame Brault’s, a pension at the top of the hill, so up and up I climbed — to the fifth floor, troops of work-girls hurrying all about the dark stairs. Hannah wasn’t in, but was expected in to déjeuner at noon, a servant said. I answered that I would wait, and was led into a little salon, where I sat a long time, trying to keep my palms dry. When any one came in I felt relieved that it was not Hannah. I don’t know why I should have been so nervous.

“At last Hannah swept in, vomiting her energy like a volcano, uttered a cry, and caught me in her arms, chattering French, slurring her r’s daintily like a Parisienne. She had quite a chic hat and coiffure, with a stole tossing about her, and looked tall and smart, no sign yet of anything coming. I always disliked the girl, but if I had not, I should have liked her. I ceased to be nervous the moment she flew at me and took me to her. She set me down, knelt before me, and caressed my hands, pouring out all the paltry news of a letter received by her from Orrock that morning, without letting me speak.

“‘Well, it is home again to see you,’ she said at last. ‘What brought you to Paris? Tell me about yourself. I believe you have news for me. You know where Chris is.’”

“‘Chris is at Chateaubrun,’ I said.

“Her palms just lifted a little from me, as if hurt, then came back.

“‘With Yvonne?’

“‘Yes.’

“‘Oh, the rogue! he oughtn’t to be.’

“‘I enjoyed her struggle to hide her pang and dismay under a light air.

“‘Hannah, things have come to a fine pass at Chateaubrun,’ I said, ‘and I have come all this way to tell you, because you know that I have your interests at heart, and I could not say everything in a letter. Chris has been at Chateaubrun four weeks—’

“‘And you didn’t tell me,’ she put in.

“‘How could I?’ I said. ‘Yvonne is my friend, too, and my hostess. It was delicate.’

“‘So true. But tell me.’

“‘Prepare yourself to hear the most startling news, Hannah—’

“‘Come, Hannah, sit tight,’ she put in.

“‘Chris is going to marry Yvonne,’ I said.

“‘Again her palms started up a little, and slowly came back upon me.

“‘He can’t do that,’ she murmured.

“‘He can,’ I said, ‘there is a law in France—’

“‘Give it to me in the good old home brogue,’ she said, for I had been speaking in French without knowing, so I changed into English, and told nearly everything. She listened at my knees at first, but presently getting up, stood at a window with her back almost turned to me, but listening attentively. When I had said all, she stood silent awhile, then, chucking up her head, said, ‘Nice young lady that.’ I was astonished at her coolness, but thought to myself, ‘Since she is cool, she will act all the more effectively.’

“‘As to Yvonne,’ I began, ‘she ought to be ashamed—’

“‘So ought you,’ from Hannah.

“‘But why?’

“‘For staying in such a house.’

“‘Oh, as to that—’

“‘Well, God grant them joy.’

“‘You take it coolly, Hannah.’

“At this, she suddenly spun round upon me, crying out in a startlingly loud voice, ‘Oh, my dear, the flames of these fires, such is His mercy, cannot touch me!’ Her face was crimson with passion. I was frightened by the woman’s shout. She then turned sharply to the window again, and I could see her trembling from head to foot. The ‘flames of these fires’ did touch my Hannah. Perhaps she had been reading Dante: something like that was what Beatrice said when she came from heaven into the flames of torment. There she stood, silent and trembling; but in a minute or two I heard her humming ‘viens, pou-poule,’ to herself. I didn’t venture to say anything, I was so startled. Presently she spun round again, picked up a fiddle from the piano-top, and said, showing it to me, ‘I have been practising on it — fifteen hours a day sometimes — for a year, in order to make myself a little worthy of him. That’s all thrown into the deep blue sea now.’

“I was sorry for her at the moment — and alarmed at her resignation.

“‘But why thrown into the sea?’ I said. ‘Don’t take it so coolly, Hannah!’

“‘My dear,’ she answered, ‘at this moment there are ten thousand poor people lying with their death-sweats on their forehead, all worse off than I, and they have to face and bear it. What can’t be cured must be endured.’

“‘But,’ I said astonished, ‘you don’t mean that you are going to allow Yvonne to have it all her own way with your own husband?’

“‘Really, Kathleen!’ she answered, ‘what can you think of me? Am I to strive and cry? One must have some self-respect. I have been following Chris about, not merely because I am married to him, but because I believed that his infatuation for that woman didn't amount to much, and that he really loved me at bottom. But when he proves beyond doubt that he does love her, and cares nothing for me, what's left for me to do? I go back to England to-night.'

"As she said this, all my hopes fell to the ground. Not a doubt had crossed my mind that she would find something strong to do to stop Chris and Yvonne; and now I saw my voyage to Paris taken in vain, and I saw Yvonne in sure, lifelong possession of Chris. I set myself to plead with Hannah with tears in my eyes. I tried her on every side. 'You can never marry again, as long as Chris lives,' I said. She laughed, crying out, 'Oh! one marriage is plenty for a lifetime!' Then I dared to say, 'Of course, I don't know whether you and Chris have ever been together all this time, but, if so, think of what may come, and he another woman's husband.' Her eyes, I thought, rested sharply on me a moment, as I said this; then she laughed rather wildly, but made no answer. I tried every argument, and still she remained 'untouched' by 'these fires,' till it occurred to me that I hadn't yet mentioned about the risk which Chris would run from English law, if he married Yvonne. That did it! While I spoke of it she stood staring strangely at me, and then just breathed: 'You don't mean that he can be imprisoned in England?'

"'I do mean just that,' I said strongly, seeing the effect I had made: 'Imprisonment, penal servitude, infamy — his high career blighted forever, Hannah,—'

"'No one will know,' she said in a low voice.

"'But how do you mean? I said; 'can a public character like Chris marry without every one knowing?' Then, seeing the necessity to clinch the nail, I invented a story, and added: 'Besides, there's a man staying now at Chateaubrun named de Marsillac, who is madly in love with Yvonne and hates Chris; he and Chris have fought a duel, he knows that Chris was married before, and he swears that the moment Chris marries Yvonne he will communicate the fact to the London police—’

“‘My boy,’ she murmured, with her lips trembling.

“‘What will you do, Hannah?’ I asked. ‘You can’t stand quietly by and witness such a disaster.’

“‘She didn’t answer, sat down with her palm under her chin, thinking of it. I had said all that I could now, and felt worn out. It was for her now to act, and I watched her with interest to see what she would do. Presently she sprang up, threw her hat one way, her stole another, and stood again at the window, looking out. I saw her hand steal up and wipe away a tear. Then she said behind her shoulder, ‘Surely the woman doesn’t know all this?’

“‘She does — of course,’ I said.

“‘And Chris, too?’

“‘Yes, of course.’

“‘So it’s no use any one writing to warn them?’

“‘Not the least, I’m afraid.’

“‘But the woman must be mad!’

“‘People who are in love don’t mind the future,’ I said.

“‘In love,” she repeated with contempt.

“‘Will you do something, Hannah?’ I asked.

“‘Will I breathe?’ she answered. ‘Chris is my friend, Kathleen — a one-sided affair no doubt, but still — that’s all right. Husband-and-wife isn’t so much — one flesh — but friend-and-friend is one soul, you know. That goes pretty deep, that. I shall do something, of course; don’t know what. That will be told me later, perhaps.’

“‘But they are to be married soon!’ I said.

“‘Well, we’ll see.’

“Soon after this, dejeuner-bell began to ring, and three people came into the room. Hannah wished me to stay, but I wouldn’t. I told her that I wanted to return at once to Chateaubrun, so that Yvonne might not suspect that I had been to Paris. She kissed me coldly, I thought, at good-bye. Ah, my Hannah, there is more between my soul and you than you know: I should have liked to like you, if I had not disliked you. Anyway, she will be doing something strong and effective,” etc., etc.

CHAPTER XV

HANNAH DID, INDEED, do “something,” going in the first place to the British consul five minutes’ walk, from the rue Boissy d’Anglas, got there the address of an English solicitor, and set off in a cab to find him. But at his offices near the Grand Boulevard, she learned that he was away for a week. It was late then, four o’clock, and knowing of no other English solicitor, she determined to make short work, to go to England, and consult a London expert the next morning.

She drove through London at that early hour when men are washing the streets with hoses, went to her old lodgings in Guilford Street, and by ten a.m. was getting from her detectives in Berners Street — the detectives who were trying to find her viol and trinkets — the address of an expert in international marriage law.

By eleven she was shut in with the great man in a room in the Middle Temple. “Deep as he is long!” she wrote of him. “Never in my life beheld such a paunch: ‘first,’ it says to great little man, and he comes trotting after; and not only legs ridiculously short for what’s up above, but trousers too short for legs.” It was Mr. G ——, the little judge-bullier, an Irishman, since dead.

Mr. G —— stood with his back to a fire, gowned and wigged, ready to step over to the courts, his hands in his large pockets; and Hannah, sitting veiled by a table before him, put her case.

“And you wish to know?” he asked.

“Firstly, whether he can legally marry the French-woman.”

“Is it certain that no French consul was at his first marriage?”

“Quite.”

“Then he can marry in France.”

“Yes. Secondly, I want to know how English law regards this legal marriage in France.”

“As bigamy.”

“Yes, I had heard that. But I want to know what would be the actual consequences to him in England? Surely, since he is a Frenchman, and is only acting according to the laws of his country, no English judge would actually punish him for it?”

“There you are mistaken, madam. Just the contrary — a ruffian of that sort would catch it pretty hot, I can tell you, from an English judge.”

“He is not a ruffian, only a wild boy.”

“What, to leave his English wife, and marry another woman? Shameful conduct.”

“His English wife is hardly very worthy of him, perhaps.”

“Pardon me there, she’s a long way more than worthy of him; for I know.”

“But apart from that, I want to know, thirdly and lastly, what can be done to save him?”

“Why, what do you suppose can be done to save him? except to induce him to behave himself in a respectable manner.”

“‘His paunch laughed,’ wrote Hannah; ‘shouldn’t have known that he was laughing, but saw it going, and drew my own conclusions.’”

“But something must be done,” she said. “He is not an ordinary man, Mr. G — : just think, his career will be only half a career, if he never comes to England — Can this be allowed to hang over him?”

Mr. G —— looked at his watch, smiled, and said almost tenderly, “What can I do, madam?”

“But I felt so sure in the cab coming to you,” persisted Hannah, “that I was being guided, that you would suggest some way out. Oh, pray, think for me! I myself am so utterly at a loss — Perhaps if you only knew who he is! — such a big lot is at stake.”

Mr. G —— . with a puckered brow, said: “I only wish I knew what you mean, and could help you. What way out can there be? The law is clear: if a foreigner comes to England and breaks the law of England, he must suffer. The only thing that could cause the law to condone or forgive such a gross bigamy is the wife’s previous misconduct, or the wife’s previous bigamy, of which the husband knew before his own bigamy, and which he could prove.”

“As he said this,” wrote Hannah, “it was as if God spoke to me by his voice. Sat electrified — all clear before me. Had known with certainty when I crossed that threshold that a message would be sent me, and here it was.”

“Well, that can be done,” she said to Mr. G —— .

“What can, madam?”

“Could not his wife marry illegally, and contrive to let him know before his own second marriage that she had done so? Then he will always have the excuse to plead that she abandoned him before he abandoned her.”

“One part of him,” wrote Hannah, “again went shaky.”

“You can’t be serious, madam,” said Mr. G —— .

“Could it not be done?”

“It could be done, certainly; all sorts of breaches of the law can be done: but woe to the woman who dares do that, I tell you.”

“Why so?”

“Doesn’t she commit a bigamy in order to save a man from the consequences of his bigamy?”

“That’s no sin, if her second marriage is unreal.”

“Oh, crimes that are no sin: I’d commit any number of them before breakfast.”

“Well, I never yet met a woman who respects the law,” said Mr. G — .
“But, madam, if the lady in question is a — friend of yours, do let me warn you most solemnly against any such step on her part. I never heard the like! Tricks of that sort can’t be played with the law, mark you: sooner or later it finds means to avenge itself. There now, I shall consider that I have earned my fee of you, if I have taught you this.”

Hannah hardly heard. She was all inwardness, thought, and feeling; the “law” of Mr. G ——— was hardly to her the highest sort of law; springing up, she warmly thanked and shook hands with the lawyer.

She drove from there to a timber-yard in Lamb’s Conduit Street, leaning over the cab-doors, eager to arrive, an impulse now upon her from which nothing could have turned her. At the gate of the timber-yard she had a fifteen minutes’ talk with a young workman named Willie Dawe, the same whom she had rescued from the sea at Orrock. He had come up to seek his fortune, and she, who knew everything about each Orrock life, had often seen him in London. After her talk with him, she drove the short way to the Clerkenwell Town-hall, and arranged for a marriage there in three days’ time.

But during those three days her heart seems to have often failed her; her diary was filled with doubts and fears, self-accusations of “impulse,” of “pride,” of “stubbornness,” of “self-will,” of “self-love,” of “rashness”; passionate prayers for “guidance,” again and again repeated; terrors as to the future of her child, and of herself; love-cries of her abandoned heart. But if she imagined that to accuse herself many times of “stubbornness” could make less stub-born, she was mistaken, since one can by no means fly oneself: in reality, though all things else in her shrank and were weak, her founded will never budged. “A tailor the ninth of a man,” she wrote, “a genius nine men; so as I stepped from town-hall with my Willie, thought to myself, ‘This your tenth marriage, Hannah.’ Said to my Willie: ‘Understand now, Willie, what I didn’t tell you formally before, though you guessed, that I am not really a widow, Mr. Wilson still alive, so your marriage with me not binding on you, you can marry again whenever you like.’ ‘I guessed as much, Miss Hannah,’ said my dear boy, ‘that’s all right between us’ — shy as a squirrel, looking lovely in Sunday best. I said, ‘Here’s the £2, and mind how you spend it, hear you are a gay one for the girls and the beer; but promise to get back to work this afternoon, and to come to see me sometimes.’ Promised, and we parted fondly. To-night typewritten letter to be posted to Chateaubrun. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away.’

CHAPTER XVI

MEANWHILE, THE QUAIN'T maid at Chateaubrun was writing: "But why does she wait? If she means to do something effective, now, now, is the time, before every one here gets to know of the impending marriage. I thought that she would have been here days ago, and been at Yvonne like a fury. But nothing done. I have written to her at Paris, beseeching her to come, to do something; but no reply. Of what, in God's name, can Hannah be thinking? I am certain that she said she would do something: when I asked her if she would, she answered, 'Will I breathe?' Then why doesn't she come? The marriage is fixed for the 12th before the mayor. Yvonne is crazily excited. She was in bed again yesterday: one day as gay as a bird, the next down in bed. Old Choderlos de Hanska repeats in a court-whisper that she is 'In the grip of a tragic destiny,' whatever that means. Chris just smiles and stirs one eyebrow," etc., etc.

On the day after the date of this entry the little maid was sitting alone in a grape-arbor at the entrance of an avenue near the chateau, some torn envelopes by her side — the post had lately come — and a volume of Kant lying unread, for she was in distress, since among her letters was none from Hannah.

At that hour of ten it looked like noon, so glaring was the Southern morning.

Presently Kathleen heard a step, peeped out of the arbor, and saw Chris coming quickly, looking flushed, an open letter in his hand. "I heard that you were here," he said to her, "just read that."

Kathleen took the letter and ran her quick eyes over the typewritten words:

Dear Sir:

Are you aware that your wife, Hannah Wilson, has lately contracted a second marriage in London? This is the truth, as you may at any time convince yourself by applying at the Clerkenwell Registry-office for a copy of the certificate.

Yours always,

A Friend.

The quaint maid went awfully pale as she read this! for her sharp wits at once pierced to the truth that Hannah had really now done “something,” but the opposite to her hopes, making the new marriage safe for Chris instead of fighting it tooth and nail.

“What do you think of it?” asked Chris.

“It is true,” she murmured, sitting down.

“But it can’t possibly be true,” said Chris.

Kathleen could hardly speak, and disliked Hannah far too much at that moment to be at the pains to explain to Chris what must be Hannah’s motive.

“To me it is merely incredible,” repeated Chris.

“You ought to be glad.”

“If Well, I suppose I ought to be glad in one way, if it can possibly be true: but, on the contrary, I am most sorry. This woman bears my name, and I was prouder of it, Kathleen, than I realized till now, it seems. I should have something to say to the good gentleman concerned, if I met him, I think!”

Kathleen did not care, nor answer: she felt too ill.

“Can Hannah Wilson be base?” asked Chris with opening arms. “If that be so, I shall never again trust a human soul! What have I done, that she should abandon me in this fashion? I who have wished to do all that I could for her, and was about to make over to her most that our good uncle left me? But this letter must be a libel: her soul had for me the noblest perfume —”

“You couldn’t have both Hannah and Yvonne, Chris,” murmured Kathleen.

“But why not?” asked the astonished Chris, “since they would not have met each other? How sorrows come unmerited upon one’s head! It is as when one owns a ring or a precious stone which he never sees, but when it is lost, he has a feeling of poverty. Can nothing be done for me? Will you write, Kathleen, to the office in London, and find out if this is true?”

“If you like,” answered Kathleen, and that day she made Miss Olivia write, she herself being in bed with a racked brow; but before the answer came from London a great grief had fallen upon Chateaubrun, so that when it came, and Chris was shown the proof of Hannah’s marriage, he saw it with bewildered eyes, for he was then bereft of Yvonne as well as of Hannah.

The day after the coming of that typewritten letter from “a friend” was one of the last of the grape-vintage in that part, and it had been arranged that a party from the chateau should go out as reapers to a vineyard named l’Adhemar, two or three miles away. About three, then, in the blazing afternoon they set out gaily in several kinds of carriage, the ladies looking as much like peasant vendangeuses as they could, with straw hats, and coarse gloves on their hands.

Chris and Yvonne drove together with Monsieur de Marsillac and the old comtesse Choderlos de Hanska; Kathleen and Miss Olivia were in an old-fashioned sort of yellow painted coach with some men. Yvonne was rather feverishly gay that day, but Chris was absent-minded: the affair of Hannah had put him into that large, yearning mood in which music is often written, so he had been trying to write his sigh, but had done nothing excellent: and this failure, this musical flea and unrest, was fretting his mind. He had said nothing as yet to Yvonne about the typewritten, letter from London; was waiting to have it first proved or disproved.

As to Kathleen, it was odd that she went with the others that day, since she had worked herself into a fever at what would certainly now take place before Monsieur Tombarel, the mayor, in five days' time; however, no one guessed at her headache and hot skin, for she laughed and talked with the rest.

When they came to l'Adhemar, the vigneron and his family, who expected them, gave out reaping-scissors and baskets, and with a crowd of boys and girls the party went out to the terraced hills, scattered, and reaped with the other reapers.

Yvonne in the vines had filled her basket, had borne it to one of the carts, and was again filling it, when she called out, "Monsieur Wilson! are you there?" — for each reaper was hidden from the rest, the soil thereabouts being deep, and the scene very different from those scrubby vineyards of central France which, however, yield the choicest wine. L'Adhemar gives one of those strong wines, like Hermitage and the Provencal crops, which are reaped almost as late as port; and here the hills are thickly grown, with trellises and espaliers reaching well above one's head.

Chris called back in answer to Yvonne's call, followed the direction of her voice, and soon came upon her. They were there together in a little cave of shadow made of the hairy leaves, of the tendrils, and of the purple grappes (or bunches), Yvonne's gloves already soaked, for at every wound made by the scissors in the vine, sap poured plenteously out.

"You see, it is already 'she' who seeks 'him rather than he her,'" she said to Chris, looking like a saucy vendangeuse, and holding up in her lips a half-crushed grape to his; Chris fed on grape and lips together, whereat she, pretending to be outraged, said, "But, monsieur, this is very English conduct! Oah, shock-eeng! seeing that I have not yet the honor to be Madame Wilson."

"Five days," murmured Chris.

"Four and eight hours: tell me if it seems long."

Chris nodded, gazing into her eyes, and smiling.

"Sometimes, mon ami," sighed Yvonne with sudden soberness, "I have a sharp sensation that it will never be; four days — it is infinitely far, and that which is infinite has no end."

"I get very little sleep," said Chris.

"I sleep very well, but my sleep is full of dreams of one person, a woman, who is never angry, but always smiles: and this causes me to suffer, Chris."

"That will soon be well."

Yvonne sighed.

"After all," she said, "an injustice has been done to us mortals: the problem of life has been made too deep and hard for our blind understandings."

"We were not made to think, but to feel," said Chris; "whoever enjoys is the true worshiper of the Father. The grapes live rightly in their voluptuous nonchalance. In five days we shall be as defiantly perfect and happy as they."

“Very well, I am ready, let us defy: but you must give me a lot, a lot, a whole ocean, to poison the worm. Will you? Tell me.”

Chris said yes with his eyebrows.

“Soon?”

He nodded.

“Yes, soon. One — two — three — four. Do you know beforehand how a wife kisses?”

But their passion was startled by a step. Yvonne pushed Chris from her in a frightened manner (for all this was highly improper in France), and, as Chris disappeared, Kathleen came, looking awfully wan, though trying to laugh, saying, “Oh, you are here.”

“Yes, this is my second basket,” said Yvonne: “and you?”

“I have filled one, but have stopped now, they are too heavy.”

“You do not look well, my poor dear,” said Yvonne, kissing Kathleen’s cheek. “I have been sorry, Kathleen, that we have been so little together lately: you have guessed the cause of it, have you not? But you do look pale today; are you suffering? Would it not be better if you go and sit in the cart over there?”

“I think I will, dear,” said Kathleen, “my head aches terribly.”

“Stay, I will come with you.”

“No, dear, don’t trouble, I can go—”

The little maid turned off, disappeared, and Yvonne was left alone in her little home of leafage. For some ten minutes she now worked industriously, snipping off the cones of grapes, now stooping, now reaching up, and dropping them into her basket; but presently she stopped, looked slyly round, hesitated, and called out, “Monsieur Wilson! are you there?”

There was no answer; she repeated the call twice, but Chris did not come. In fact, he had wandered away, forgetting the vintaging, Yvonne and all, in his effort to catch a musical something, sad and sweet, which buzzed in his brain that day, but ever escaped him.

Yvonne left her basket there, and went a little way to seek him, but checked herself, returned to her nook and worked again; but she could find no rest without him, and again set out to find him, with death treading close now at her elbow, with, as it were, death in her eyes.

She went down-hill through the trellises until she came to a place where the hillside was rocky and bare, though lower down more vines grew; a level path ran across that bare place, and along this she went: but the setting sun was in her eyes, and stopping at one spot, she shaded them with her hand, looking abroad for any sign of Chris.

She stood there with shaded eyes for perhaps not more than a minute, perhaps two or three; but a second would have been long enough for the fate which awaited her.

Those who knew her well, who were living at the time in the same house with her, have never recovered from the shock of it, she was so young and joyous, so beautiful, just about to be married. When they suddenly saw her lying dead that afternoon, it was like a madness to them, they could not believe their eyes.

On a ledge of the hillside perhaps twenty feet above where she stood was one of the little carts, holding the tonneau (or hogshead) into which the grapes are poured from the baskets. These carts are tilted up-ward toward the shafts and the donkey, and, as the hogshead is usually kept in position by a hook and eye, if the hook is slipped, the hogshead tumbles out at the tail of the cart. The tail of the cart above Yvonne was turned down-hill toward her; Kathleen was in the cart, resting; no one was there at the moment; the reapers were all buried in the vines; and during the short time that Yvonne stood below with shaded eyes, the little maid's hand, by some chance, knocked out the hook from the eye, and the hogshead, already heavy with grapes, went bounding down.

Kathleen, seeing what had happened below, stood up in the cart, spread her arms, and howled to Heaven; before any one could come she leapt and ran howling up toward the vines with a face of madness; she met two people running to her, and, half-kneeling to them, her hands trembling together in prayer, she said, “Yvonne, Yvonne, come, come,” and dropped to the ground.

Chris Wilson, happily for him, was nowhere near there: he had gone wandering upward beyond the brow of the hills, not caring whither, alone with that sad musical motif which enticed, yet always escaped him. A note of it came to him Memnonian from that choir of colors going down in the west; the leaves in the breeze seemed to lisp to him, “You see, we know the tune of it, but can’t utter it.” He woke up to himself in an olive-wood a long way from l’Adhemar, looked feebly about, and wondered what had become of him. It was getting dark. He set out at random with the aim of getting back to l’Adhemar or to Chateaubrun, meaning to ask his way of any one whom he might meet. But he had soon forgotten this aim, and wandered for another hour in roundabout ways. Near nine o’clock, a peasant who met him in an avenue asked him if he had heard of “the calamity which the lady from Chateaubrun had met with.” Chris listened absently, and went on his way with a dim knowledge in him that something had happened to some one; he had not well understood: the patois of that part was strange to him. It was ten before he at last asked his way at a cottage; and it was midnight before he reached Chateaubrun.

The chateau seemed to be in darkness. He went in by an out-of-the-way door, and found his way up-stairs, guided here or there by a lonely night-light. Without having met any one, he was passing Yvonne’s apartments toward his own, when he was struck by the strong light coining out between the portieres of her ante-chamber. He peeped in: her petit salon was alight with candles, but no one was there. He went in, and peeped further into her cozy-corner; it, too, was ablaze with candle-light, but without any one in it; he wondered at this, and at the same time was struck by a memory of what the peasant had told him out in the country. Yvonne's chamber-door was a little open, and he could see that her chamber, too, like the other rooms, was ablaze with candle-light. He stood still some time with a beating heart. Not a sound was to be heard, save a very faint clicking sound from minute to minute. At last he peeped into the chamber, went in. Yvonne was lying on her bed, dressed for the grave, in a heap of flowers. No one was there but a nun kneeling in her black robes at the bedside, and telling her beads from minute to minute.

After gazing at the face of his lover for some minutes, Chris went away at an eager walk to his own chamber, in which he found a lamp burning. There he walked to and fro with quick steps a little while, then at an open window put out his arms to the rolling heavens, which was thronged with such stars as one never sees in northern countries; a moment afterwards he turned sharply inward with a crimson, crying face, in a jiffy had paper and ink before him, and for twenty minutes was writing music in a fierce haste and heat of the soul. What he had sought all that day he found now: for this was when his marche funebre quintet in E flat, called "Mortalite" was written.

When it was finished he threw himself on a couch, empty, griefless, hopeless, and very weary.

CHAPTER XVII

“DEAD,” WROTE HANNAH (about Yvonne), “leaving me the humblest creature on God’s earth. What devil could have got into me against that girl? The wicked bile in my heart! That day in rue Boissy d’Anglas Kathleen as good as told me of her noble, brave struggle, letting it out in bits, for she did not want, I think, to say any good of Yvonne, and I should have guessed that the struggle was far greater than the hints; but no, blind to it all — none so blind as those who will not see! And she’s dead now, so young, so young, and so fair, and the sun has gone down forever on my wrath. Oh, forgive, sweet, I’ll never do that again.”

To her self-upbraiding there was no end, month after month it went on, with a grief apparently as fresh as on the first day, the same wearisome prayers for forgiveness, and stream of tears. On whatever subject she wrote it presently turned into a lament over Yvonne: but this much may be left out here.

As to Chris she wrote: “How strangely it turned out! had given him up for good and all, but the very day after my letter telling of second marriage must have reached him, Yvonne met her death, and he became mine in a way once more. But never any more gallopings over Europe after him, Hannah: all that mere holiday-making in guise of right and duty: railway journeys, strange lands, bustle, hotels, fighting-cock fare, like Hodge up for the day in town, all very fine and large, but not doing work of Him that sent me. A woman should have a husband to beat her daily, and if she hasn’t, then must beat herself, put her nose to it, and work. Chastity, chastisement — same things. 7 will have a husband some day, feel as certain of it now as of sitting here, but not for next three years anyway: it should take him quite the four to get well over death of that dear. I wonder? About that. Then will present myself before him with his son's hand in mine. Meantime, must spend my strength without stint, to quell riot within, if for no higher reason, and not let that little whelp asleep there stop me, either. If women were meant to devote themselves to brats, would have half a dozen at a litter, but one only meant to keep you laughing in play-hour," etc., etc.

"But work at London Hospital unsatisfying," she wrote in another place: "five hundred of us, seem as many nurses as patients. Have never once felt weary, and need something to pull me really down, and take it out of me. Wait, the Lord will provide. Perhaps when I become staff-nurse something better may be opened; but no seeking for 'some great thing to do,' let it be humble, so long as real and tough. Meantime, plenty of warm joy inside, and songs in the night.

"Interview yesterday" (in another place) "with Bailey at hospital: brought news that poor innocent Josef at Madame Brault's had been arrested for theft of viol and things, but released. Over there they call being in choky, 'etre au violon,' so just suited poor Josef with viol. Oh, I was cross! Told Bailey that if any more innocent people to be arrested, then shall stop search altogether. 'What next?' I asked, 'any hope?' 'Plenty of hope,' he answered: 'the field of inquiry now definitely narrowed; Mr. Dene quite convinced now that things not lost in France, therefore in England, and in England must be looked for. 'Looked for and found two different things,' I said: 'you must think I am millionaire.' 'We will drop investigation, if you wish,' he said. Told him 'No, keep it going to bitter end'; then told him dream, twice dreamt in three months, in which Sir Peter appeared to me in shroud, holding out viol and box, in such a marvelous light each time.

Bailey not much impressed by dreams! Agent to go down at once to Orrock, search to be transferred there for the present. New check, £17, like getting blood out of stone. Then in afternoon went all alone to inter-'Varsity match at Lords," etc.

"Twenty-seven today," she wrote on the 21st of November, her birthday: "getting on, Hannah, but as blooming today as ever was — more so. 'That ye may have life, and have it more abundantly.' Spent whole afternoon here in Guilford Street with baby, jaws sore with laughing, when, about five, two newsboys shouting in street: 'Great British disaster,' sixty-five killed and wounded, making me feel pretty choky: no end to the devilish war. Birthday letter from mummie this morning, with two turkeys and pigmeat; wants to know if she can't come up to me, since I won't go down. Yes, when my child has a father, not till then. She suspects that paper-shop address is not my real address, asks if I am 'hiding anything from her'! Imagine her stare, if she only dreamt what lies asleep there! Poor mummie, you will know some day. Meantime, 'Let not thy left hand know!' Each live life in own skin, not burden others with one's ha'penny cares, mishaps, and shames: lock it all up in own bosom, and throw key away. Don't mean to be cross-examined, either; shall go down when I want to, not before. They used to say I wasn't very devoted daughter, and now Mrs. Reid here all hints that I am not very devoted mother: 'How you can bear to leave him, I don't know!' Poor thing: so pathetic. God grant me true, manly emotions, not unreal, like most women's: there are a few other things about beside my mother and child, a God in labor pains and a world squalling, both needing nursing. As for brat, if he is neglected, that's self-neglect, for he is the same thing as myself: some things your own, some your ownest own, and some your own ownest own. Toss him about like doll, kill and eat him, if I chose, and not ask anyone's leave — would only be suicide.

“Mummie anxious about my money-matters, thinks the £10 a month since I refused Chris’s money not enough; doesn’t know that I am putting it all away in bank, and, besides, getting £12 a year as probationer, all found down to uniform. Three months hence will begin to get £2 for second year. Can’t she guess that I am not sitting down idly, waiting for husband to turn up? But why couldn’t I have told her about hospital? Liking to go one’s own way in silence may become a fault. Shall tell her in next letter, without saying which hospital.

“Five sweet birthday-letters enclosed in mummie’s, and others from Bishop W, Kathleen, Sir F. T., and my Willie, who never forgets date of his ducking! He working in timber-yard at Chelsea now; hasn’t been to see me for five weeks. Kathleen with Miss Olivia in Paris, still subject to bad dreams, frights, and breakdowns through death of Yvonne, now and again sees Chris, and would like to know ‘What are your plans?’ But this the odd thing: she says, ‘If you had had a child, that would have been a link between you and Chris.’ That’s odd! This the second time she has referred to possibility of a child, as though she knew or guessed something. But not possible. Have never yet found out whether she knows of my second marriage. She was at Chateaubrun when I wrote news of it to Chris. Do hope she doesn’t know: but all the same a hundred years hence, dear, when we both sleeping in mother’s arms, poppies whispering all the summer, little hunch pulled quite straight then, such is His mercy, and Hannah’s brawl nicely hushed.

“Oh, do so hunger and thirst lately to see the old place once more, the cliffs, geese, graves, Woodside old gables, coots on Embree Pond, the sea. Shall go first chance, but late at night, no one to see: a child, and no husband to show for it, ladies. ‘Avoid the very appearance of evil,’ and ‘Let not thy left hand know.’ But a grave in that place draws me. Is it kept fresh with flowers? He had a love for old apples and apple-blossoms, so that's what they should heap on mostly. The dead long for flowers to keep them going. How I have abandoned him! That old man's love for me! And mine for you, too, dear. If you hadn't love me so quick, I should have beaten you and loved you first. Shall soon come to you: it's the hospital, the brat, the eternal violin, and the hard, hard reading that have kept me away; must vow to give up cricket-matches all next summer.
